43023

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

43023

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXXIV

JANUARY 5, 1927, TO JUNE 29, 1927

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

43023

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXIV

JANUARY 5, 1927, TO JUNE 29, 1927

(Nos. 3209-3234)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
C	Correspondence
D	Drama
Dt	Driftway
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
I	International Relations, Documents
IP	International Relations, Foreign Press
IS	International Relations, Signed Articles
M	Music
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

Abie's Irish Rose passes two thousandth performance; EP ... 79
Adams, Brooks. Obituary; EP ... 223
Addams, Jane
Public tribute in Chicago; EP ... 105
Adventurous age; D ... 216
Advertising
Averting calamity. S. Chase; S ... 168
Aeronautics. See also Charles A. Lindbergh Aeronautics
The flights and commercial aviation; E ... 684
The tragedy of the French fliers, Coli and Nungesser; EP ... 544
Agriculture
Drastic farm relief; E ... 199
Akins, Zoë
Thou desperate pilot. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 324
Albania
The Albanian peril. G. E. R. Gedye; S ... 470
Italian-Albanian treaty; I ... 50
Alexander, Will W.; EP ... 3
Ali Baba and the forty thieves; D ... 46
Allen, Harbor
Coal, steel, and "sedition"; S ... 205
Kansas College has its Fling; S ... 13
Two blocks from Broadway; S ... 36
Allen, Robert S.
Chemical warfare, a new industry; S ... 33
Aluminum company of America
Charged violating court decree; EP ... 596
American association for labor legislation
Sponsors federal longshoremen's accident-compensation bill; EP ... 356
American bar association
Upholds resolution unfriendly to admission of colored lawyers; EP ... 625
American chemical society
Reelects and adds eminent German chemists to honorary membership; EP ... 463
American citizenship foundation; C ... 400
American citizenship foundation
Blacklists radicals; EP ... 27
American civil liberties union
Sues chief of police of Aliquippa for $30,000 damages ... 205
American federation of labor
Demands arbitration of Mexican differences; EP ... 103
American legion
Attacks state normal school of West Chester, Pa.; EP ... 355
Americans seen through Russian eyes; Dt ... 91
Americanus
The rape of Syria; C ... 147
Amerindians
The sick Indian; E ... 161
Amherst, Massachusetts
State of communal enlightenment indicated by two news items; EP ... 625
"An American Tragedy"
Defended by Ellery Sedgwick and Alfred R. McIntyre against censor; EP ... 465
An American Radical
The Ford legend; C ... 558
Anderson, Maxwell
Saturday's children. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 194
Anderson, Paul Y.
Twelve good men and true; S ... 9
Anderson, Tennessee Mitchell; S ... 192
Anglo-American friction
Thwacks from the motherland. H. L. Mencken; S ... 434
Anonymous
A deflated rebel ... 11
A hotbed of feminists ... 691
Free—for what? ... 522
In search of adventure ... 630
Lightning speed through life ... 395
Mother-worship ... 283
One way to freedom ... 165
Poet out of pioneer ... 63
Staying free ... 339
The evolution of disenchantment ... 113
The long journey ... 472
"The unpardonable sin" ... 581
Woman alone ... 228
Anti-trust act of 1890
Reversal of in 1927; E ... 107
Arbitration
Call to participate in an American arbitration crusade; EP ... 77
Guadalupe-Hidalgo, treaty of; C ... 92
Looking toward peace; E ... 627
Opposed by government, upheld by people; EP ... 103
The American arbitration crusade. W. Floyd; C ... 92
Archaeology
Still standing walls in Ur; EP ... 27
Architectural league
Awards medal of honor to Ralph T. Walker; EP ... 251
Architecture
The Cleveland reservoir. E. Peets; S ... 145
The reign of the masonry dome. E. Peets; S ... 632
Arkansas
Citizens of Little Rock denounce lynching of Negro; EP ... 570
Civilized Arkansas. C. Fulks; C ... 262
Armstrong, Hamilton Fish
Not unleavened; C ... 237
Arnold arboretum; E ... 466
Art
African art in America. A. Locke; C ... 290
A lively sculptor. E. Evans; S ... 192
A shocking exhibit. B. Robinson; C ... 211
Art and the municipality; E ... 547
Good and bad Negro art. T. Munro; S ... 242
Mr. Stieglitz and Mr. Pach. A. Stieglitz and W. Pach; C ... 40
Revolution and art; E ... 81
The Architectural league exhibition. T. F. Hamlin; S ... 378
Artists
Offered retreat at Yaddo near Saratoga Springs; EP ... 357
Ascher, Charles S.
The Bach festival; M ... 651
Audubon, John James; E ... 518
Auer, Harold
Michigan on the brink; C ... 289
Auerbach, Sol
"Taxi, Mister?"; S ... 255
Austin, Mary
A'wa Tseighe comes home from the war; S ... 367
Native drama in our southwest; S ... 437
Puye; P ... 202
Austria
Voting red in Austria. R. N. Baldwin; S ... 663 Authors
Flappers prefer——; E ... 686
Authors with lanterns; E ... 29
Automobile accidents
Why cars kill. B. Shadwell; C ... 670
Why cars kill. H. B. Titcomb; C ... 343
Automobile industry
The automobile dead list; E ... 573
Automobiles
The pace of the auto industry; E ... 225
Pedestrians versus automobilists; Dt ... 117
Why does nobody love an automobile?; Dt ... 169
Auto tourists
Modern gipsies. L. E. B. Brown; S ... 500

B

Bacchus
Blasphemy. H. R. Vedder; C ... 318
Baker, George Barr; EP ... 131
Bakshy, Alexander
Realism au naturel; S ... 564
Baldwin, Celia
The story of Tom Tynan; S ... 501
Baldwin, Roger N.
A league of nations oppressed; S ... 397
He who gets slapped at Geneva; S ... 259
Refused visa to visit England; EP ... 250
The Dutch war resisters; IS ... 723
Voting red in Austria; S ... 663
Balilla, fascist organization of boys; EP ... 2
Balkan states
Jugoslavia and Albania. G. Gordon-Smith; C ... 695
Those Balkans; E ... 685
Baltimore & Ohio railroad company
A hundred years a railroad; E ... 253
Banditry
Guns for victims. H. Pease; C ... 92
Bannerjea, D. N.
India and China; IS ... 704
Barbusse, Henri
Who will help Barbusse? U. Sinclair; C ... 400
Bari, Valeska
Criticism of, by Florence Kelley; C ... 237
Shall women be protected?; S ... 143
Barnard graduates' jobs. M. V. Libby; C ... 670
Barnhill, John Basil
Congress a preparatory school; C ... 558
Barker, K. Nicholson; D ... 125
Barrie, James M.
Legend of Leonora. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 460
Barrow, bishop Reginald Grant
Wins contest against deportation; E ... 334
Battle, George Gordon
Shall prosecutors conceal facts?; S ... 629
Baumes law
Unfair in case of Gerardo Fonseco; EP ... 516
Bayreuth festival theater
To music lovers. Nanny Larsen-Todsen; C ... 400
Beals, Carleton
Mexico's bloodless victory; S ... 85
New Mexico? Coolidge? Doheny!; C ... 235
Beethoven, Ludwig van
Beethoven: centennial of death; E ... 360
How Beethoven worked. D. G. Mason; S ... 640
Behrman, S. N.
Second man. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 484
Belgium
Sino-Belgian treaty; I ... 75
Bellew, Henry T.
Some love prize poems; C ... 343
Benn, Wedgwood
Leaves liberal and joins labor party; EP ... 196
Bent, Silas
Cruisers and gun caliber; C ... 147
Benton, Thomas H.
A shocking exhibit. B. Robinson; C ... 211
Berg, Carl
The maid militant too; C ... 147
Bernard, Sam. Obituary; EP ... 597
Bernbaum, Ernest; EP ... 597
Bernstein, Henri
Thief. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 540
Bethlen, Steph, premier of Hungary; S ... 259
Betsy. Ziegfeld; D ... 46
Bettelheim. See Fessenden and Bettelheim
Better America federation
Loses cooperation of Leland Stanford University in oratorical contest; EP ... 357
Beveridge, Albert Jeremiah
Albert J. Beveridge. Obituary; E ... 519
Billikopf, Jacob
A victory for force; C ... 262
Black, MacKnight
Turbines; P ... 148
Blackburn, G. F.
Why Italy and Britain are allies; C ... 400
Blumenberg, Ben
Literary ballyhoo; C ... 289
Blumgarten, Solomon ("Jehoash"). Obituary; EP ... 133
Bok, Edward W.; E ... 627
Books
The business of book-making; E ... 413
Why we can't buy books. M. B. Hexter; C ... 558
Books Abroad, new magazine issuing from university of Oklahoma; EP ... 305
Bond, Charles Wood
Have faith in Massachusetts; C ... 236
Borah, William Edgar
Borah—watchdog on the Potomac. R. Clapper; S ... 394
Can assemble foreign relations committee to sit during recess; EP ... 355
Debates prohibition with President Butler; EP ... 409
Neighbors and friends; S ... 392
Pleads for righteousness toward Mexico; EP ... 329
Borup, Henry D., case of; E ... 626
Bostwick, Arthur E.
China's libraries; S ... 208
Boulder dam
Control sought by interests; EP ... 196
Boulenger, Jacques; E ... 254
Bowen, Dr. A. J.
Story of the death of John E. Williams at Nanking; EP ... 410
Brailsford, Henry Noel
League of nations: a misprint in history; S ... 111
Brandes, Georg
Georg Brandes in 1919. W. C. Dreher; C ... 290
The scope of Georg Brandes; E ... 226
Briand, Aristide; E ... 627
Bristol, rear-admiral Mark L.
Refused permission to traverse Russian territory in going to China; EP ... 544
Brite, M. D.
Alice M. House; C ... 527
Brody, Alter
Yiddish: our literary dominion; S ... 435
Brothers Karamazov. J. Copeau and J. Croué; D ... 72
Browder, Earl
A cabled appeal; C ... 502
Brown, Arthur J.
Missionaries, guns, and indemnities; C ... 478
Brown, Dave; S ... 477

BERLIN PUBLIC LIB.

Brown, John
Statement made shortly before his execution; EP 569
Brown, LaRue
Of Thomas W. Gregory; C 479
Brown, Lois E. Buriff
Modern gipsies; S 500
Brown, Martin
Dark. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 216
Praying curve. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 152
Strawberry blonde. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 216
Brown, Wimberly E.; EP 25
Browne, Edythe Helen
The first "boiled" surgeon; S 372
Brutus, Marcus Junius
Enough about his life to blast his reputation. E. W. Messer; C 91
Buckner, Emory R.
Shall prosecutors conceal facts?; S 628
Bulgaria
Atrocities committed against workers; I 354
The Bulgarian worker; I 352
Violence in Bulgaria; I 354
Bull, Earl R.
Fessenden and Bettelheim; C 237
Wanted: descendants of the Kings; C 318
Bunuan, Vicente G.
Whose land—whose rubber?; IS 22
Burgin, William Garner; EP 708
Burns, William
United States supreme court affirms conviction of lower court; EP 569
"Business and the church"
Conservative or revolutionary? J. Davis; C 584
Butcher, Harold
England's middle class—dead or alive?; S 607
Butler, Arthur P.
New generation: better than the old?; C 67
Butler, Nicholas Murray
Calls attention to Briand's peace offer in behalf of France; EP 489
Debates prohibition with Senator Borah; EP 409
Bye bye bonnie; D 125
Byington, Steven T.
Church and school; C 261
On second terms; C 610
Bynner, Witter
Self; P 41

C

C., J.
The Russian censor relents; IS 218
California
Anti-syndicalism law upheld by supreme court; EP 569
Governor Young pardons Anita Whitney; EP 708
Calkins, Clinch
Come tired young women; P 68
The arms of grief; P 68
The skater and other poems; P 433
Canada
Artistic judgment falsified by surviving war-time hate; EP 383
Prosecution of Ernest V. Sterry for blasphemy; EP 79
Canals
Nicaragua canal bobs up once more; E 386
Cape Cod canal
Approximate cost of purchase and operation; EP 2
Purchase by government; EP 2
Capital punishment
A survival of savagery; E 307
Capital punishment. B. Shadwell; C 262
Michigan on the brink. H. Auer; C 289
Receives a blow from the case of Conley Dabney; EP 385
Captive, Sex, Virgin man; E 199
Carlota, last empress of Mexico; S 110
Caruso, Francesco; EP 411
Catalina island channel swimmers
Margaret Hauser, Martha Steger, George Young; EP 77
Cayton, H. R.
The South and "Al" Smith; C 210
Celler, Emanuel
Not permitted to talk on George Washington over station WEAF; EP 250
Censorship
Absurdity reached by Canada's treatment of "The Scarlet Letter"; EP 411
"An American Tragedy" declared obscene in Boston; EP 465
Barring from movies of Spread Eagle explained; EP 657
Decent and indecent literature and art; EP 79
"Elmer Gantry" banned from Kansas City public library; EP 331
Examples of muddled thinking of Mayor Walker and Frank Crowninshield; EP 222
Horace Liveright acquires rights to The Captive to fight censorship; EP 276
Is government to be ordered in the interest of the least valuable element of society?; EP 411
Major Henry Adams proposes to censor Plainfield's war memorial inscription; EP 682
Mary H. Ford cut off in middle of radio address; EP 545
National legislation proposing censorship of the radio; EP 133
Needless campaign inaugurated against theaters; EP 27
Nine books declared unfit for circulation in Boston; EP 305
Order issued in Indiana town to flappers to button their galoshes; EP 105
Poor me and pure Boston. U. Sinclair; S 713
Protection, not prohibition. M. Gaffney; C 170
"Safe" thinking. J. Garrott; C 170
The disappointed censor. M. B. Gilson; C 289
The indecency of censorship. J. W. Krutch; S 162
The movies and their czar; E 599
The Russian censor relents. J. C.; IS 218
Chang Tso-lin; S 716
Charity organization society of New York
Finds it is not most recent immigrant who needs assistance; EP 708
Chase, Stuart
Ask somebody these; S 609
Averting calamity; S 168
Checkers; E 308
Chen, Kwei
Humiliation; S 140
Cherry blossoms; D 405
Cheyney, Ralph, and Lucia Trent
Some love prize poems; C 343
Chicago anarchists
Recollections of trial recorded by Sigmund Zeisler in Illinois Law Journal; EP 159
Chi-chen, Wang
Women and children; C 422
Child labor
Report on legislation proposed and defeated during year; EP 26
Chile
American imperialism in Chile. A. Roller; IS 425
China
A cabled appeal. E. Browder; C 502
A Chinese warlord (Chang Tso-lin). R. Gould; S 716
Americans talk of peace at home, but drift toward war in China; EP 490
An American "subject" in China; I 706
An Asiatic world-war?; E 359
Behind the red walls of Peking; E 658
"Bolshevist" China. L. S. Gannett; S 419
British folly in China. B. Russell; S 227
British not allowed to quarter troops in Shanghai; EP 157
British pacific speeches belied by dispatch of gunboats to Chinese waters; EP 103
Cantonese defeat Sun Chuang-fong near Hangchow; EP 249
China news; E 277
China's libraries. A. E. Bostwick; S 208
China's revolution: history and prophecy. T. F. Millard; S 549
China's war of independence; E 54
Christian schools in China. E. H. Hume; S 341
Collapse of northern armies at Shanghai; EP 329
Comment on reported splits within Chinese nationalist party; EP 303
Demand that foreign settlement in Shanghai be made neutral zone; EP 157
Dragging America into the China war. F. Hough; C 479
Effectiveness of boycott against British; EP 1
Foreign gunboat policy may unite China; EP 464
Hu Shih's return to United States; EP 79
Humiliation. By K. Chen; S 140
Independence of United States destroys coalition of foreign powers; EP 543
India and China. D. N. Bannerjea; IS 704
Influencing American policy. W. Kramer; C 611
Instinctive sympathy of unofficial Americans and many missionaries with nationalist cause; EP 303
Italians support British at Shanghai; EP 249
Labor takes power in Shanghai. F. Godwin; S 475
List of British and American army and naval forces sent to China; EP 103
Misreporting of situation by Frederick Moore; EP 331
Missionaries, guns, and indemnities. A. J. Brown; C 478
Nanking—Serajevo; E 468
No mere military victories, but victories of the spirit; EP 221
Not ripe for civilian government; EP 595
Outrages at Nanking. W. F. Prohme; S 388
Protecting American lives in Chicago. B. Shadwell; C 611
Rising national feeling and efforts to allay it; EP 77
Sabotaging America?; E 517
Search for strong man; EP 490
Shanghai—international danger-spot. T. F. Millard; S 689
Sino-Belgian treaty; I 75
Statistical items indicating progress; EP 132
Sun Yat-sen on Pan-Asia; I 245
Tide of nationalism rolls on; E 658
To Christians! F. J. Pohl; C 478
Vaccinated [by Western revolutionary ideas]; E 198
Variant versions of the death of John E. Williams at Nanking; EP 410
What happened at Nanking. O. D. Rasmussen; C 527
While the bands play "Tipperary"; E 134
Whose war in China?; E 413
Yellow peril or white?; E 387
The British-American alliance; E 332
The Chinese revolution; IP 74
The international settlement of Shanghai. L. S. Gannett; IS 406
The kuomintang. Ti-Tsun Li; IS 592
The meaning of the landing of American marines in Shanghai to Chinese; EP 275
The yellow man's burden. E. C. Stewart; C 584
Chinese students in New York
We hope so too. H. C. Wu, E. C. Tang; C 422
Cigarmakers of Tampa
Reestablish their factory readers; EP 133
Circus princess; D 564
Civil liberties union
Wins permission to hold meeting in a school; EP 596
Civil War
"C. O.'s" in the civil war. E. N. Wright; C 696
"The massacre at Fort Pillow." J. Dinkins; C 423
Clapper, Raymond
Borah—watchdog on the Potomac; S 394
Clark, Alfred S.
Well, maybe; C 344
Clarke, Edward Young; EP 159
Cline, Charles
The case of Charles Cline. A. Schulkind; C 611
Coal
Men who dig coal. R. Raynolds; S 337
Precarious condition of miners in the union fields; EP 384
Coe, George A., and Thomas Guthrie Speers
Keep the schools clean; C 288
Cohen, Julius Henry
Shall prosecutors conceal facts?; S 629
College professors
Demand arbitration of Mexican differences; EP 103
Colleges
The class mind; Dt 373
Colorado
Communism in school of mines; EP 656
Comic; D 510
Conflagration
Fire which stripped top ten stories of the Sherry-Netherlands hotel; EP 465
Congress
Summary of deliberations of sixty-ninth congress; E 278
Congress against colonial oppression and imperialism
A league of nations oppressed. R. N. Baldwin; S 397
Porto Rico's delegate. F. A. Velarde; C 670
Constant nymph. M. Kennedy; D 20
Constant wife. W. S. Maugham; D 20
Contraband
Those neutral rights; E 659
Cooke, Morris Llewellyn
Toward lower electric rates; S 285
Cooksley, S. Bert
The eternal mercy; P 291
Coolidge, Calvin
Action with regard to conferences with newspapermen; EP 595
Call for naval disarmament conference; EP 195
Congratulations for his stand on China; EP 543
Defeats big-navy bloc; EP 51
Delivers characteristic eulogy of George Washington; EP 250
Facts falsify sentiments of memorial-day address; EP 656
Has no claims to a third term in the presidency; EP 515
Lost: Cal's economy. B. H.; C 169
Mr. Coolidge defends his foreign policy; E 493
Need of society for protection against fault-finders; EP 681
Reasons for vetoing bill for a plebiscite on Philippine independence; EP 410
Safe in South Dakota summer home; EP 707
Some men run for office: Calvin sits. F. R. Kent; S 232
Unable to face issues, drifts; E 28
Coolidge, Elizabeth Sprague; EP 53 Cooperation
Cooperatives in South Tyrol. M. Sering; IS 171
Copeau, Jacques, and J. Croué
Brothers Karamazov. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 72
Copeland, Royal Samuel
Sponsors Hindu citizenship bill; EP 545
Copeland, Wilbur F.
Earn your own living; C 236
Correction
American citizenship foundation. M. I. K.; C 400
Elinor Wylie, geographer. A. Niles; C 119
Correspondence
Contacts correspondence club. M. D. Wand; C 373
Cradle song. G. M. Sierra; D 243
Crane, Hart
To Emily Dickinson; P 718
Craton, Ann Washington
Working the women workers; S 311
Craven, Frank
Money from home. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 295
Crime; D 324

Crime
The third degree and crime. A. C. Sedgwick; S..... 666
Crime and punishment
Modern standards in crime. M. Herzfeld; C..... 39
Crotty, John F.
Hail, old timer!; C..... 424
Crowder, Enoch Herbert
Retires as ambassador to Cuba; EP..... 464
Crown prince; D..... 405
Cuba
President Machado demands modification of Platt amendment; EP..... 624
Curti, M. and M.
Arbitration in 1848; C..... 92
Cushing, Tom
Devil in the cheese. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 72
Czecho-Slovakia
Democracy and nationalism in Czecho-Slovakia. G. E. R. Gedye; IS..... 528

D

Dabney, Conley; EP..... 385
Dale, George R.
Indiana house of representatives votes to impeach Judge Dearth for attempted suppression of Dale's newspaper; EP..... 276
State of case in Indiana courts; EP..... 78
Dane, Clemence
Granite. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 350
Mariners. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.. 405
Dark. M. Brown; D..... 216
Darrow, Clarence
Attacked by Ku klux klan in Mobile, Ala.; EP..... 357
Clarence Darrow. D. E. Lilienthal; S..... 416
Daugherty-Miller case
Jury convicts Miller and disagrees with regard to Daugherty; EP..... 275
Davis, Dorrance
Lady in love. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 269
Davis, Dwight F.; E..... 30
Davis, Jerome
Conservative or revolutionary?; C..... 584
Dawes plan
Execution jeopardized by increasing German governmental expense; EP..... 707
Pessimism of German statesmen; EP.... 222
Debs, Eugene Victor
Asking another. A. M. Todd; C..... 423
Delaware
Reporters and spectators barred from courtrooms during divorce proceedings; EP.. 570
Deman, F.
Help wanted; C..... 424
Democracy
Blessed be democracy. G. Weiser; C.... 318
Denmark
The new Danish government. J. Moritzen; S..... 126
Dennis, Lawrence; EP..... 303
Deval, Jacques
Her cardboard lover. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 380
Devil in the cheese. T. Cushing; D..... 72
Dickinson, Lulu; E..... 573
Dictatorships
Brutal oppression in Central Europe and the Balkan countries; EP..... 544
Dictionaries
The "N. E. D."; E..... 660
Dinkins, James
"The massacre at Fort Pillow"; C..... 423
Dogs
Vegetarian dogs; E..... 108
Doheny-Fall case
Jury found; EP..... 3
Supreme court's notable decision affirming corruption of Harding's cabinet in oil-land cases; EP..... 250
Twelve good men and true. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 9
Uncle Sam wins back oil lands; EP..... 249
Douglas, Paul H.
National railway of Haiti; S..... 59
Drama
Native drama in our southwest. M. Austin; S..... 437
Padlock for plays; E..... 360
Spread Eagle draws fire as an anti-war play; EP..... 491
War on the theater [by the New York police department]; E..... 199
The Neighborhood Playhouse; E..... 548
Drees, F.
A catholic replies; C..... 146
A fair-minded Catholic asks fairness of us; C..... 343
Dreher, William C.
Georg Brandes in 1919; C..... 290
Dunn, Robert W., and four others
Democracy in the unions; C..... 668

E

Earth; D..... 350
Economic research
A chart of world business. W. Mitchell; IS..... 48
Eddy, Sherwood
Opposed by American legion in delivering a speech in Toledo; EP..... 196
Editor, what is an?; E..... 494
Edman, Irwin
Mr. Kallen and Mr. Edman. H. M. Kallen; C..... 696 Education
American universities break all records for enrolment; EP..... 53
Awakening many American university students; EP..... 251
Children and art. K. A. Porter; S..... 233
A city's schools on strike; E..... 573
College students display liberal spirit at a Milwaukee conference; EP..... 27
Democracy in the making at Manumit school. N. M. Seeds; S..... 608
Education—for what? S. Nearing; S.... 577
Fight at West Chester. R. T. Kerlin; C... 558
Floating university aboard the Ryndam; Dt. 399
Glenn Frank favors complete academic freedom; EP..... 52
Kansas College has its Fling. H. Allen; S. 13
New generation: better than the old?; C. 67
Pious hysteria terrorizing teachers; EP... 571
Precarious position of teachers; EP..... 516
School of medicine of Howard university appeals for endowment fund; EP..... 657
School with a lantern. S. W. Simpson; C. 119
Students and teachers; E..... 333
Teacher goes job-hunting—I and II. T. Minehan; S.....576, 605
Teachers must organize. C. Hall; C..... 585
Textbooks for moderns. R. Seinfel; S.... 579
Winthrop college, South Carolina, dismisses professor for teaching evolution; EP.... 708
Electra. Sophocles; D..... 564
Ellis, Havelock
Moral criticism; S..... 638
Unchanging Spain; S..... 178
Ellison, George Bond
Heads drive to endow a $2,000,000 American citizenship foundation; EP..... 27
Emerson, Haven, on American Indian; E..... 161
Endowment of men
Endow men. W. E. Sweet; C..... 92
Earn your own living. W. F. Copeland; C..... 236
Engelke, William F.
Modern Martin Luther; C..... 318
Englishwoman, An
The turnip year in Germany..... 370
Ernst, Margaret S.
Lindbergh's "bolshevik" father; S..... 662
Ernst, Morris L.
Deception according to law; S..... 602
The newest profession; S..... 525
Erskine, John
Sane remarks on indecency; EP..... 545
Ervin, Charles W.
The Catholic church in Mexico; C..... 261
Europe
For Europe—free trade or ruin. R. R. Kuczynski; S..... 206
The decline of Europe; E..... 29
Evans, Captain Waldo; EP..... 132
Evans, Ernestine
A lively sculptor; S..... 192
Evolution
Nullification in Tennessee; E..... 161

F

F., R. P.
He stays in Wall street's America; C..... 40
Fall-Doheny case. See Doheny-Fall case
Faragoh, Francis Edwards
Pinwheel. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.. 216 Farmers
A solution of the farm problem. G. W.; C. 422
Tariff—the farmers' enemy; E..... 252
What will become of the farmer? R. G. Tugwell; S..... 664
Fascism
An appeal to murder; IP..... 488
Fearing, Kenneth
Bracelet; P..... 586
Federal council of churches
Criticizes Western Maryland railroad strike; EP..... 222
Favors arbitration of Mexican differences; EP..... 103
Ferril, Thomas Hornsby
This foreman (prize poem)..... 173
This foreman; C..... 502
Fessenden and Bettelheim. E. R. Bull; C.... 237
Field god. P. Green; D..... 510
Films
How Hester won her A. A. E. Holman; C 527
Protection of film industry in England against American competition; EP..... 517
Fincke, William M. Obituary; EP..... 657
Fink, Edgar M.; EP..... 304
Fischer, Louis
A new ring around Russia; S..... 310
Kerensky; S..... 473
Pilsudski's militarism; S..... 61
Fiske, George Converse
George Converse Fiske. W. E. Leonard, G. Showerman; C..... 170
Fitch, John, vs. Robert Fulton; E..... 659
Flappers prefer——; E..... 686
Fling, Gerald; S..... 13
Floods
Appeal for the relief of sufferers in the Mississippi valley; EP..... 489
Curbing the Mississippi. W. Parker; S.... 521
Mississippi—father of waters; E..... 518
The Negro and the flood. W. White; S.. 688
The scene at Red River Landing; EP.... 544
Waters rushing "like a dozen Niagaras"; EP..... 571
Floyd, William
Editor Arbitrator; EP..... 77
The American arbitration crusade; C..... 92
Flynn, William J.
Thompson the cowboy rides in; S..... 420
Fog; D..... 216
Fog bound; D..... 460
Fonseco, Gerardo; EP..... 516
Ford, Edsel
Pays a quarter of a million for a Holbein; E..... 6
Ford, Henry
Cash value of a genius; E..... 279
Quoted on capital punishment; E..... 307
The Ford legend. An American Radical; C..... 558
Ford, Julia Ellsworth
Find out if you can; C..... 15
Ford, Mary H.; EP..... 545
Foreign Affairs
Not unleavened. H. F. Armstrong; C.... 237
Wisdom of endowing publication questioned; EP; 133
Foreign policy association
Mexican-American oil and land law controversy; I..... 98
Fort Pillow, massacre of; E..... 135
France, Anatole
Anatole France, moralist. F. W. Garrison; C..... 399
France
Change in Franco-German relations; EP.. 1
New books in France. R. Lalou; S..... 532
People gifted with verve and common sense; EP..... 656
Poincaré's achievement [in French finance]; E..... 307
Shift to left in senatorial election; EP.... 52
The rape of Syria. Americanus; C..... 147
Unemployment in France; IP..... 298
Frank, Glenn; EP..... 52
Frank, Walter
What Mexico is doing; C..... 235
Frankfurter, Felix; E..... 415
Replies to Dean Wigmore's attack; EP.... 516
Free press
Kansas College has its Fling. H. Allen; S. 13
Ernest V. Sterry imprisoned for blasphemy in Canada; EP..... 357
New modernism in Ohio. N. Klein; C.... 289
Suppression of freedom by means of contempt process; EP..... 78
Free speech
Antagonized by reactionaries of all shades; EP..... 196
Coal, steel, and "sedition." H. Allen; S... 205
Free speech and the Legion; E..... 414
Imperiled in California and Alabama; EP.. 357
Reporters and spectators barred from Delaware courtrooms during divorce proceedings; EP..... 570
Free trade
For Europe—free trade or ruin. R. R. Kuczynski; S..... 206
Fulks, Bryan
The South and "Al" Smith; C..... 210
Fulks, Clay
Civilized Arkansas; C..... 262
Fundamentalism
Successes and failures in state campaigns to pass anti-evolution laws; EP..... 105

G

Gaffney, Margaret
Protection, not prohibition; C..... 170
Games
Checkers; E..... 308
Gannett, Lewis S.
"Bolshevist" China; S..... 419
Dollars and Bullets: a history; S..... 89
The international settlement of Shanghai; IS..... 406
Gardner, Gilson
Roosevelt, trust-buster; C..... 211
Garrison, Frank W.
Anatole France, moralist; C..... 399
Garrott, Jane
"Safe" "thinking"; C..... 170
Gastronomy
Meals while you wait; E..... 56
Germany
Change in German-French relations; EP... 1
Change since the signing of the treaty of Versailles and Dr. Stresemann's presiding at the league of nations council in Geneva; EP..... 303
Court convicts Lieutenant Schultz and others of murdering political opponents; EP 356
Difficulties in the way of commercial agreement with Poland; EP..... 222
Germany's war guilt. A. v. Wegerer; IS. 485
Gloomy outlook for future of Dawes plan; EP..... 222
Most reactionary cabinet in history of German republic; EP..... 158
New books in Germany. D. T.; S..... 531
Theodor Wolff resigns from Democratic party; EP..... 52
Gedye, G. E. R.
The Albanian peril; S..... 470
Democracy and nationalism in Czecho-Slovakia; IS..... 528
George, Lloyd
Declares all governments engage in spying and stealing documents; E..... 626

Georgia
Governor Walker curbs Ku Klux Klan; EP. 25
Widespread violence and intimidation of citizens; EP. 304
Geographic names; Dt. 421
Gerstein, Evelyn
"Metropolis"; S. 323
Ghosts. H. Ibsen; D. 97
Gibson, Hamilton
New generation: better than the old?; C.. 67
Gilbert and Sullivan
Pirates of Penzance. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 20
Ruddigore. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.. 652
Gilbert, S. Parker
Warns Germans of increasing governmental expenditures; EP. 707
Gillett, dean Emma. Obituary; EP. 571
Gilman, Elisabeth
Lucy Salmon; C. 290
Gilson, Mary B.
The disappointed censor; C. 289
Glaspell, Susan
Inheritors. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.. 350
Glusman, I. A.
Ten years after; C. 422
Goat alley; D. 540
Godron, George
Vivid but rotten; C. 585
Godwin, Frank
Labor takes power in Shanghai; S. 475
Gold, Michael
Broadcasting a Coney island hope; C. 289
Goldstein, Elizabeth
Christ's race; C. 317
Gordon-Smith, Gordon
Jugoslavia and Albania; C. 695
Gorman, Herbert S.
These for your hurt; P. 697
Gould, Arthur R.
"Cleared" by senate elections committee; EP 276
Gould, Randall
A Chinese warlord; S. 716
Governments, spying, and propaganda; E. 626
Granbery, John C.
The South and "Al" Smith; C. 210
Granite. C. Dane; D. 350
Grant, Percy Stickney. Obituary; EP. 197
Great Britain
England's middle-class—dead or alive? H. Butcher; S. 607
Film bill to protect British movies against American competition; EP. 517
The British menace; E. 709
Great Britain—Foreign relations
British note to Russia a boomerang; EP.. 249
Cabinet decides on break with Russia; EP.. 595
Chamberlain's promises with regard to China belied by martial demonstrations; E 134
Government on rampage in raiding soviet offices; EP. 656
Recognition of Canton government; EP... 1
The great soviet raid in London; E. 572
The soviet raid in London; I. 677
Why Italy and Britain are Allies. G. F. Blackburn; C. 400
Great Britain—Labor
Britain's blow at labor; E. 599
Cost of coal strike to the people; EP. 383
England learns from America in dealing with strikers; EP. 26
The British anti-strike bill; IP. 512
Great Britain—Politics and government
British political parties. J. R. MacDonald; S 138
Disaffection of Wedgwood Benn marks continuing decomposition of liberal party; EP 196
Extension of the suffrage to "flappers"; EP 383
Growth of pacifist sentiment shown by victory of Wilfred Wellock; EP. 329
Liberals win third by-election in ten days; EP 682
Liberals win two by-elections; EP. 410
Mosley's election to parliament; EP. 2
Reading of Sermon on the Mount in House of Commons; EP. 329
Great Britain—Trade unions
British trade unions and the law; E. 279
Greece
Greece saves herself. H. C. Jaquith; S. 552
Green, Paul
Field god. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.. 510
In Abraham's bosom. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 72
Gregory, Thomas Watt
Of Thomas W. Gregory. L. Brown; C. 479
Supports Governor Smith's presidential aspirations; EP. 355
Grierson, Francis. Obituary; EP. 683
Griffin, Clarence
One soul saved; C. 119
Gruening, Ernest H.
The last empress of Mexico; S. 110
Guadalupe-Hidalgo, treaty of; C. 92

H

H., B.
Lost: Cal's Economy; C. 169
Haggin, B. H.
Criticism by radio; M. 589
Music and common sense; S. 72
Hahn, Emanuel
Lost artistic award in Winnipeg on account of German birth; EP. 383
Hail, old timer! J. F. Crotty; C. 424
Haiti
Comment on President Borno's refusal to permit Senator King to visit island; EP. 304
Haze in Haiti. R. W. Logan; S. 281
National railway of Haiti. P. H. Douglas; S 59
To have free election January, 1928; EP.. 682
Hall, Covington
Teachers must organize; C. 585
The South and "Al" Smith; C. 210
Hamlin, Talbot Faulkner
The Architectural league exhibition; S. 378
Hanson, J. C. M.
Gesegnete Mahlzeit!; C. 423
Hapgood, Norman
Why "Al" Smith is great; S. 164
Hard, William
Mr. Coolidge, here's a court; S. 58
My first press conference as secretary of state; S. 84
The urge toward empire; S. 109
Who was the criminal?; C. 423
Harding, T. Swann
Adele, and the Swami, and I; S. 693
Harding, Warren Gamaliel
Cleared from charge of being an imperialist by Secretary Kellogg; EP. 515
Harmon, Judson. Obituary; EP. 251
Harris, Louis I.; Dt. 667
Hartson, C. P.
What is a "modern woman"?; C. 373
Haste, Gwendolen
Epitaph on a first citizen; P. 504
Haugen-McNary bill; S. 664
Hauser, Margaret; EP. 77
Hayden, Palmer C.; EP. 3
Hayes, Roland
Builds model school for colored people in Calhoun, Georgia; EP. 683
Hays, Arthur Garfield
Bootlegging religion; S. 139
Hays, George W.
The solid south backs "Al" Smith; S. 117
Hays, Will
The movies and their czar; E. 599
Headmaster, Another
New generation: better than the old?; C.. 67
Hearts are trumps; D. 484
He loved the ladies; D. 590
Help wanted. F. Deman; C. 424
Her cardboard lover. J. Deval; D. 380
Herd psychology
Noblesse oblige. J. Jensen; C. 236
Herzfeld, Max
Modern standards in crime; C. 39
Hexter, Maurice B.
Why we can't buy books; C. 558
Hillyer, E.
For free seamen; C. 479
Hindus
Status of American citizenship; EP. 545
Hit the deck; D. 540
Hitch-hiking and hitch-hikers; Dt. 695
Hobson, John A.
The rich socialist; S. 556
Hodges, Charles
Two world tribunals; IS. 270
Hoernle, R. F. Alfred
The South African color problem; IS. 153
Holden, Hiram; EP. 571
Holden, Raymond
The man economy has caught; P. 400
Holland
The Dutch war resisters. R. N. Baldwin; IS 723
Holman, A. E.
How Hester won her A; C. 527
Holmes, John Haynes
The moral lessons of the war; S. 369
Twentieth anniversary of pastorate; EP.. 159
Holmes, Oliver Wendell
Celebrates eighty-sixth birthday; EP. 275
Honor of the family; D. 46
Honor roll
The Nation's honor roll for 1926; E. 4
Horvath, Clara
The really oppressed; C. 611
Hough, Frederick
Dragging America into the China war; C. 479
House, Alice M.
Alice M. House. M. D. Brite; C. 527
Howard, Sidney
Silver cord. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 20
Howard university
School of medicine appeals for endowment fund; EP. 657
Howe, Edgar Watson
Dinner tendered at the hotel Biltmore; EP. 465
Hume, Edward H.
Christian schools in China; S. 341
Hungary
He who gets slapped at Geneva. R. N. Baldwin; S. 259
Husband, A
These modern husbands; C. 39
Hu Shih's return to United States; EP. 79
Hyman, Louis
The left wing replies; C. 668
Hynicka, Rudolph. Obituary; EP. 251

I

Ibsen, Henrik
Ghosts. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 97
Ice-cream
Standardized and regulated in Massachusetts; EP. 517
Illinois
Bitter mayoralty campaign in Chicago; EP. 384
Democracy in Illinois. E. D. Loewenthal; C 209
Samuel Insull's corrupt political practices; EP 250
Thompson the cowboy rides in. W. J. Flynn; S. 420
U. S. senate refers Frank L. Smith case to committee on privileges and elections; EP 104
Illinois vigilance association
Two investigators order paintings taken down; EP. 79
Immigration
Foreign-born not chief concern of charity workers; EP. 708
In Abraham's bosom. P. Green; D. 72
Income-tax system
Secretary Mellon vs. Senator Couzens; E.. 279
India
India and China. D. N. Bannerjea; IS.. 704
Indians skeptical of British favors; EP... 682
Indiana
Tom Taggart sponsors Evans Woollen for presidency; EP. 571
Indians
A'wa Tseighe comes home from the war. M. Austin; S. 367
Industry
The mortgage bond industry. H. S. Villard; S. 258
Inheritors. S. Glaspell; D. 350
Insull, Samuel
Cross-examination by James A. Reed; EP. 250
Intercollegiate debates
Collegians discuss the government's Nicaraguan policy; EP. 355
International seamen's club
For free seamen. E. Hillyer; C. 479
International seamen's union
The last serfs; E. 107
Interracial
Friendship and intermarriage. H. M. W.; C 503
Investment counsel
The newest profession. M. L. Ernst; S... 525
Ireland
Result of Free State elections; EP. 707
Italy
Cooperation between capital and labor under new labor contract; EP. 597
Cornerstones of fascist charter of labor; EP 490
Fascism recruits school-children; EP. 196
Fascist creed clothed in words of the Ten Commandments; EP. 78
Fascist labor charter; I. 567
Italian-Albanian treaty; I. 50
Methods devised by Mussolini for muzzling press; EP. 596
Mussolini at once a lion and a lamb; EP. 26
Mussolini chokes the press. G. Salvemini; S 34
Pope Pius in opposition to Mussolini; EP. 2
Why Italy and Britain are allies. G. F. Blackburn; C. 400
Italy and Bessarabia
Exchange of notes between Mussolini and Kamenev; I. 486
Italy. See also Mussolini, Benito

J

Jackson, Andrew
Farewell addresses composed by anonymous writers; Dt. 557
Jacksonville agreement
Failure of; S. 336
Jaquith, H. C.
Greece saves herself; S. 552
Jameson, A. Y., jr.
No rules for war?; C. 118
Japan
Accepts President Coolidge's invitation to conference to limit naval armaments; EP. 221
Ascension of throne by Prince Hirohito; EP 1
Japanese and Anglo-American methods in China contrasted; E. 359
On the verge of economic and political upheavals; EP. 490
A volcanic country with a history of a volcanic people; EP. 304
Jensen, Jens
Noblesse oblige; C. 236
Jerome, Jerome K. Obituary; EP. 708
Jesus
The man Bruce Barton doesn't know. N. Schmidt; C. 236
Jewish Daily Forward
Congratulations on completion of thirtieth anniversary; EP. 491
Johnson, Albin E.
Great Britain—seven or one; IS. 636
Jonas, Barukh; E. 29
Jugoslavia
Striking tactics of opposition in parliament; EP. 276

Julie; D..... 590
Jurisprudence
Mechanical jurisprudence and constitutional law; E..... 253
Justh, Ivan de; S..... 259
Justice vs. law
Disparity shown in the case of Francesco Caruso; EP..... 411

K

K., M. I.
American citizenship foundation; C..... 400
Kallen, H. M.
Mr. Kallen and Mr. Edman; C..... 696
Kamenev, Leon B.
Reply to Mussolini on Italy's signing a treaty with Rumania; I..... 487
Katy did; D..... 590
Keane, Warwick
A pan-American conference; S..... 582
Kelley, Florence
What kind of equality for women?; C.... 237
Kellogg, Frank B.
Blundering diplomacy in dealing with foreign nations; E..... 224
Placed in embarrassing position with the French people by tactless subordinates; EP..... 570
Referred to F. B. K. H. Neumann; C.... 235
Kennedy, Margaret
Constant nymph. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 20
Kent, Frank R.
Dawes or Coolidge?; S..... 286
Good old Bill Vare; S..... 14
Government of minnows; S..... 115
In weakness there is strength; S..... 167
Settling down to "Al" and "Cal"; S..... 335
Smith in 1928?; S..... 65
Some men run for office: Calvin sits; S.. 232
Kenworthy, Joseph Montague
The international naval race; S..... 203
Kerensky, Alexander
Hiding behind his illusions concerning Russia; EP..... 275
Kerensky. L. Fischer; S..... 473
Kerlin, Robert T.
The fight at West Chester; C..... 558
Keyes, Frances Parkinson
Virtue of shaking hands; S..... 8
King, Charles W.
Wanted: descendants of the Kings. E. R. Bull; C..... 318
Kirchwey, George W.
Sacco-Vanzetti; S..... 415
Kirkley, Donald
Death and dancing; P..... 93
Kirkwood, David, fined £25; EP..... 2
Klein, Nicholas
New modernism in Ohio; C..... 289
Kohns, Lee. Obituary; EP..... 105
Kramer, Walter
Influencing American policy; C..... 611
Kreutzweiser, E.
Catholics in high office; C..... 670
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Another captive; D..... 20
Ballyhoo; D..... 125
Clemence Dane discourses; D..... 405
Comedy of manners; D..... 484
Contemporaneity; D..... 194
Cradle song; D..... 243
Elegant comedy; D..... 46
Fireworks; D..... 216
Folk tragedy; D..... 510
Harlequinade; D..... 324
Intelligence vs. intensity; D..... 152
Jesting Pilate; D..... 295
On dramatizations; D..... 72
On makebelieve and acting; D..... 350
Paradox of Gilbert; D..... 652
Pastiche; D..... 269
Revolutions to order; D..... 460
Sierra and his theater; D..... 590
Solis occidere; D..... 616
Spring novels and "The Magic Mountain"; S..... 637
Summary—I, II, III; D.....675, 702, 721
The indecency of censorship; S..... 162
Two successes; D..... 380
Well made play; D..... 540
What's Hecuba to him; D..... 564
Who's afraid; D..... 97
Kuczynski, Robert René
For Europe—free trade or ruin; S..... 206
Ku klux klan
Denounces Clarence Darrow in Mobile, Ala.; EP..... 357
Kutta Nagar, dog city founded by Shet Arjunlal; E..... 108

L

Labor
British trade unions and trade disputes bill; E..... 599
Labor takes power in Shanghai. F. Godwin; S..... 475
Linen-washing within labor unions; EP.. 78
Religious leaders indict labor conditions in southern states; EP..... 356
The fascist labor charter; I..... 567
The really oppressed. C. Horvath; C.... 611
Labrador
Rival groups competing for water-power rights; EP..... 331
Lady alone; D..... 152
Lady in love. D. Davis; D..... 269
Lally; D..... 380
Lalou, René
New books in France; S..... 532
La Motte, Ellen N.
The opium trade at Geneva; IS..... 618
Lansdowne, Henry Charles Keith Petty-Fitzmaurice. Obituary; EP..... 657
Larsen-Todsen, Nanny
To music lovers; C..... 400
Latimer, Admiral Julian Lane; EP..... 1
Lawrence, David
Statement on American press analyzed; E. 333
Advertisers, publishers, masses; C..... 400
Lawson, John Howard
Loud speaker. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 324
League for the abolition of capital punishment
A survival of savagery; E..... 307
League of nations
Americans at economic conference sitting in Geneva; EP..... 384
Council adjourns without action on French troops stationed in the Rhineland; EP. 707
Great Britain—seven or one. A. E. Johnson; IS..... 636
League of nations: a misprint in history. H. N. Brailsford; S..... 111
Mr. Coolidge, here's a court! W. Hard; S. 58
No immediate possibility of America joining world court; EP..... 196
Plea in behalf of by Elihu Root; EP.... 26
Practical collapse of disarmament preparatory commission; EP..... 410
That world court. S. Nearing; C..... 210
The opium trade at Geneva. E. N. La Motte; IS..... 618
The permanent mandates commission; I.. 594
Two world tribunals. C. Hodges; IS.... 270
Legend of Leonora. J. M. Barrie; D..... 460 Legislation
Absurd proposals; Dt..... 317
Modern Martin Luther. W. F. Engelke; C..... 318
Leland Stanford university
Withdraws from oratorical contest arranged by Better America federation; EP..... 357
Leonard, William Ellery; Showerman, Grant
George Converse Fiske; C..... 170
Letters in reply to comment that "nobody loves an automobile"; Dt..... 260
Lewis, Alfred Baker
"Al" Smith's weak knees; C..... 317
Lewis, George Chase; E..... 30
Lewisohn, Alice and Irene; EP..... 411
Li, Ti-Tsun
The Kuomintang; IS..... 592
Liaptcheff, Andrew
Reply to report of Bulgarian labor unions; I..... 352
Libby, Mary V.
Barnard graduates' jobs; C..... 670
Libraries
China's libraries. A. E. Bostwick; S.... 208
Library of Congress
Pamphlet describing notable possessions; EP..... 53
Trust fund board; EP..... 53
Liebovitz, D.
Some love prize poems; C..... 343
Light and power
Toward lower electric rates. M. L. Cooke; S..... 285
Lilienthal, David E.
Clarence Darrow; S..... 416
Lindbergh, Charles A.
Flight a purely civilian undertaking; EP. 655
"I am Charles Lindbergh"; E..... 625
Lindbergh and the army and navy. O. G. Villard; S..... 712
Lindbergh's "bolshevik" father. M. S. Ernst; S..... 662
New York triumphal celebration; EP.... 681
Record-breaking flight; EP..... 655
Skoal! Charles Lindbergh, skoal!..... 600
The flights and commercial aviation; E.. 684
Lindsey, Ben B.
Recital of his encounters with the Ku klux klan in Denver; EP..... 197
Lippmann, Walter
Convicts department of state of falsification and misrepresentation; EP..... 355
Lister, Sir Joseph
The first "boiled" surgeon. E. H. Browne; S..... 372
Literary agents; Dt..... 342
Literary guild of America
Literary ballyhoo. B. Blumenberg; C..... 289
Organization for publishing and distributing books at low prices; EP..... 197
Who chooses your books? J. W. Rogers; C. 344
Literature
Biographers, beware!; E..... 254
Concerning scarcity of good editors of old books; EP..... 597
First glance at the season's books. M. Van Doren; S..... 440
For recreation read the best; E..... 627
Homage to Isaac Watts; E..... 280
Moral criticism. H. Ellis; S..... 638
New books in France. R. Lalou; S..... 532
New books in Germany. D. T.; S..... 531
Recent Spanish literature. E. Vivas; S... 530
Spring novels and "The Magic Mountain." J. W. Krutch; S..... 637
The sense of joy; E..... 468
Translated literature; E..... 519
Lithuania
The Soviet-Lithuanian guaranty pact; I... 128
Litvinov, Maxim
A soviet rebuke to England; I..... 326
Liveright, Horace
Appraisal of action in acquiring rights of The Captive; EP..... 276
Takes over the production of The Captive; EP..... 222
Locke, Alain
African art in America; C..... 290
Locklin, D. Philip
Railroad valuation; C..... 635
Locutions
"By and large." E. Matthews; C..... 147
"By and large." O. W. Zeigler; C..... 40
Loewenthal, Edw. D.
Another explanation of "Big Bill" Thompson; C..... 670
Democracy in Illinois; C..... 209
Logan, Rayford W.
The haze in Haiti; S..... 281
Loh, Fanchen
Gesegnete Mahlzeit!; C..... 423
Loud speaker. J. H. Lawson; D..... 324
Louisiana
Fundamentalists supersede elected legislature; EP..... 159
Luther, Martin, on legislation. See Legislation
Lynching
Citizens of Little Rock, Arkansas, denounce lynching of Negro; EP..... 570
Statistics for 1926; EP..... 52
Two Negroes burned in Mississippi; EP.. 681

M

MacDonald, James Ramsay
British political parties; S..... 138
Ramsay MacDonald. O. G. Villard; S.... 495
Welcome in America; EP..... 463
Mack, Maynard
To my mother; P..... 477
MacMahon, Edme Patrice Maurice de; C..... 717
Macmahon, Benjamin
A Catholic president; C..... 717
MacMurray, John Van Antwerp; E..... 517
Magazines
Unsolicited contributions and literary agents; Dt..... 342
Mahlzeit
Gesegnete mahlzeit! E. J. Ward; C..... 288
Gesegnete mahlzeit! F. Loh; C..... 423
Gesegnete mahlzeit! J. C. M. Hanson; C.. 423
Nin-che-go-fan-liao-ma? E. J. Ward; C.. 611
Nin-che-go-fan-liao-ma? J. Pollinger; C. 611
Mandates
The permanent mandates commission; I.. 594
Manners
Eating with the knife; Dt..... 526
Judge threatens to fine woman for powdering face in court; EP..... 41
Man, not monkey. U. Sinclair; C..... 236
Many Years a Reader
Big brute men; C..... 317
Mariners. C. Dane; D..... 405
Marks, Lester H.
"Al" Smith, progressive?; C..... 373
Marshall, Charles C.
Attacks Governor Smith for his catholicism; E..... 412
Marshall, Henry Rutgers. Obituary; E..... 547
Marshall, Robert
Precipitation and presidents; S..... 315
Mary and her little lamb; Dt..... 209
Masaryk, Thomas
Study of suicide; EP..... 251
Mason, Daniel Gregory
How Beethoven worked; S..... 640
Massachusetts
Standardizes and regulates manufacture of ice-cream; EP..... 517
Statute forbidding sale of "obscene and indecent literature"; EP..... 465
Masters, Edgar Lee
Bacchus; P..... 238
Matthews, Elbert
"By and large"; C..... 147
Maugham, W. Somerset
Constant wife. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 20
Maul, Grace
In grandmother's name; C..... 39
Mauve decade
A different decade? M. Wheeler; C..... 503
Maxwell, Lawrence. Obituary; EP..... 251
McAdams, Clark
Honor where honor is due; C..... 118
McCausland, General John
A "Hun" of the civil war; E..... 135
McGee, Maurine Halliburton
Swift injustice in Oklahoma; S..... 477
McGhee, judge Abner
Charge to grand jury in lynching case; EP 570
McNary-Haugen bill
Drastic farm relief; E..... 199
What will become of the farmer? R. G. Tugwell; S..... 664
Mellon, Andrew William
"The greatest secretary since Hamilton"; E..... 547
Richmond News Leader scrutinizes secretary's claim to greatness; EP..... 681
Memorial day
Sentiments conflict with facts in President's address; EP..... 656
Menace; D..... 350

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB.

Mencken, Henry Louis
H. L. Mencken. E. S. Sergeant; S..... 174
Thwacks from the motherland; S..... 434
Menuhin, Yehudi
Yehudi Menuhin and The Nation. M. Menuhin; C..... 170
Menuhin, Moshe
Yehudi Menuhin and The Nation; C..... 170
Mergers
Merging 12,000 miles of railway; E..... 107
Northern Pacific-Great Northern merger; E..... 107
Roosevelt, trust buster. G. Gardner; C.. 211
Messer, Erle Wilson
Brutus: enough about his life to blast his reputation; C..... 91
Meteorology
Precipitation and presidents; S..... 315
Mexican federation of labor
Through flags to freedom. E. Morris; C.. 235
Mexico
A fair-minded Catholic asks fairness of us. F. Drees; C..... 343
Arbitration instead of growling; EP..... 25
Arbitration in 1848. M. and M. Curti; C.. 92
Are Americans deceived with regard to Mexico?; EP..... 158
Bandits attack train and kill 100; EP.... 489
Bishops and the knights. B. Vaughan; C. 261
Borah's plea for righteousness; EP..... 329
Catholic church in Mexico. C. W. Ervin; C..... 261
Catholic church tolerates revolutionary activity; EP..... 489
Cause of the conflict with Mexico; I..... 98
Forged and stolen documents which reached President Calles; EP..... 409
Government's reply to Secretary Kellogg in matter of oil lands; EP..... 221
Last empress of Mexico. E. H. Gruening; S..... 110
Mexico's bloodless victory. C. Beals; S.. 85
Need of foreign policy based on arbitration; EP..... 131
Neighbors and friends. W. E. Borah; S. 392
No, Mr. Coolidge—no!; E..... 80
Pan American Oil Co.'s interest; EP.... 131
President Coolidge playing fast and loose with regard to arbitration; EP..... 103
Right to confiscate; E..... 160
Situation cleared up by Evening Post dispatches; EP..... 131
Unrecorded history of attack upon Vera Cruz in 1916; EP..... 52
What about the Catholics?; E..... 81
What Mexico is doing. W. Frank; C.... 235
Michigan
Acclaiming capital punishment. H. Auer; C..... 289
Milk—a public utility. W. J. Rapp; S..... 230
Militarism
Military menaces the world; E..... 306
Pilsudski's militarism; S..... 61
Military training
Denounced by liberal Jewish women in United States; EP..... 104
Keep the schools clean. G. A. Coe, T. G. Speers; C..... 288
Well, maybe. A. S. Clark; C..... 344
What does the war lord mean?; E..... 30
Millard, Thomas F.
China's revolution: history and prophecy; S..... 549
Shanghai—international danger-spot; S.... 689
Miller, Thomas W.; EP..... 276
Milne, A. A.
Mr. Pim passes by. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 510
Minehan, Thomas
The teacher goes job-hunting—I and II; S..... 576, 605
Mississippi
Mob burns two Negroes; EP..... 681
Mississippi flood
Mississippi—father of waters; E..... 518
Need of immediate federal relief in flood region; EP..... 595
New Orleans makes a correction. A. G. Newmeyer; C..... 635
Yielding to other events, flood is still to the fore; EP..... 655
Mitchell, Edward P. Obituary; EP..... 105
Mitchell, Wesley
A chart of world business; IS..... 48
Mobile, Alabama
Good for Mobile. L. Swarz; C..... 479
Money from home. F. Craven; D..... 295
Monroe doctrine and the Coolidge doctrine; E.. 106
Moore, Frederick
Misreports situation in China; EP..... 331
Moritzen, Julius
The new Danish government; S..... 126
Morris, Ernest
Through flags to freedom; C..... 235
Mosley, Oswald; EP..... 2
Motor vehicles
American and world statistics; EP..... 53
Moving pictures
Metropolis. E. Gerstein; S..... 323
Realism au naturel. A. Bakshy; S..... 564
Mozart. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 46
Mr. Pim passes by. A. A. Milne; D..... 510
Mugridge, Henry
Put him on the free list?; C..... 424
Mulford, E. G.
On the evolution of the psyche; C..... 696
Munro, Thomas
Good and bad Negro art; S..... 242
Music
Criticism by radio. B. H. Haggin; S.... 589
Music and common sense—II. B. H. Haggin; S..... 72
Musicians and their jobs; E..... 711
New wine in old and new bottles. H. Straus; S..... 404
Rochester opera company in New York. H. Straus; S..... 483
Sensations—good and bad. H. Straus; S. 483
The Bach festival. C. S. Ascher; S..... 651
The king's henchman. H. Straus; S..... 267
Mussolini, Benito
Attacks U. S. constitution. H. Neumann; C..... 235
Dangerous pronunciamento about a huge army; EP..... 624
Declares women the "pleasant parentheses of life"; EP..... 276
Letter to Kamenev on treaty between Italy and Rumania; I..... 486
Mussolinied prosperity. F. R.; C..... 635
Secrets of his toilet; EP..... 51
Solidifies Italy's control of Southeastern Europe; EP..... 330
Tyrant's luck; E..... 308
My first press conference as secretary of state. W. Hard; S..... 84
Mystery ship; D..... 350

N

Nardi, Marcia
When women talk; P..... 345
Nathorst, Gwinne Trego
Freedom from Americans; C..... 15
Nation, The
Afraid of socialism? D. B. Welles; C.... 170
Complimented by faculty and students of Harvard university; EP..... 331
Replies to attack of Times for publishing a presumedly erroneous Nanking dispatch; EP..... 464
National bureau of economic research
How rich are you?; E..... 467
National council of Jewish women. D. Rosenberger; C..... 237
National federation of temple sisterhoods
Champions large liberal program; EP..... 104
National reserve officers' association
Hostile to liberalism among college students; EP..... 27
Naval conference
The naval proposals at Geneva; E..... 710
Nearing, Scott
Education—for what?; S..... 577
That world court; C..... 210
Needle Trades
The collapse of the needle trades. B. Stolberg; S..... 496, 524, 554
Democracy in the unions. R. W. Dunn, P. Hibben, H. W. L. Dana, H. Black, A. W. Craton; C..... 668
Fair words. N. Thomas; C..... 669
Left wing replies. L. Hyman; C..... 668
Strike finances. B. Stolberg; C..... 668
Negroes
Blessed are the sons of Ham. G. S. Schuyler; S..... 313
Grand jury of Aiken county finds evidence against lynchers insufficient; EP..... 132
Medals awarded to members of race; EP.. 3
Negro and the flood. W. White; S..... 688
Peonage and lynching as exemplified in the South; EP..... 158
Roland Hayes builds model school for his people in Georgia; EP..... 683
Runaway colored boy sought through advertisement; EP..... 683
Negroes. See also Lynching
Neilson, William A.
Honored by establishment of the William A. Neilson chair of research; EP..... 597
Nelles, M.
What is a "modern woman"?; C..... 373
Nernst, Walter; EP..... 463
Neumann, Henry
Referred to F. B. K.; C..... 235
Newbold, J. T. Walton
The great oil myth; C..... 169
New English dictionary; E..... 660
New Jersey
Advent of Jim Crow; EP..... 304
Introduction of school segregation tempered by judicial decisions favorable to Negroes; EP..... 304
Police lawlessness rebuked and two troopers convicted of manslaughter; EP.132, 708
State troopers kill woman and demolish farmer's home; EP..... 25
Unhappy state of textile workers lately on strike; EP..... 305
New Masses questionnaire; E..... 81
New Mexico? Coolidge? Doheny! C. Beals; C. 235
Newmeyer, A. G.
New Orleans makes a correction; C..... 635
New playwrights theater
Broadcasting a Coney island hope. M. Gold; C..... 289
Newspapers
Advertisers, publishers, masses. D. Lawrence; C..... 400
Bad news service between China and the United States; E..... 277
Camera learns to lie. S. Tenenbaum; S.. 633
Congratulations on completion of thirtieth anniversary of Jewish Daily Forward; EP..... 491
Fabulous growth of tabloid sheets; EP.. 464
New York Telegram passes into control of the Scripps-Howard organization; EP... 197
New York Times prints limited edition on rag paper; EP..... 3
Our morning's mail; E..... 494
Press and the individual; E..... 333
Use for tabloids. A. C. Young; C..... 236
What is a news agency's job?; EP..... 656
New year's resolutions; Dt..... 14
New York (city)
Board of education reverses itself with regard to the Civil liberties union; EP.... 596
Machinery of great city at work; Dt..... 611
Ten most beautiful things; Dt..... 146
Ten most beautiful things—further remarks; Dt..... 234, 317
New York (state)
Governor Smith's annual message; EP.... 52
Governor asks for referendum on power authority question; EP..... 305
Municipal licensing commissioner may suppress unpopular plays; E..... 360
New Zealand
In the Blackball mine. A. W. Page; S.. 603
Nicaragua
American intervention; EP..... 157
Basing a war on rumors; E..... 225
Beware the "larger issue." J. S. Schapiro; C..... 91
British-American alliance; E..... 332
Buys ammunition on credit from United States; EP..... 355
California is awake. R. T.; C..... 118
Col. Stimson enforces peace by threat of war measures; EP..... 623
Conflict between promise and performance of President Coolidge with regard to intervention; EP..... 516
Continuing policy of deception by United States department of state; EP..... 570
Crisis ended by disarmament of contending parties; EP..... 543
Diaz too abject for United States state department; EP..... 249
Dollars and bullets: a history. L. S. Gannett; S..... 89
Eagle and the red bird: a fable. A. Warner; S..... 86
Establishment of censorship after landing of marines; EP..... 25
Is there a British-American alliance?; EP. 249
Kellogg needs memory training. A. Sims; C..... 146
Landing of American marines; EP..... 1
Mr. Coolidge, here's a court. W. Hard; S. 58
Nicaragua canal bobs up once more; E.... 386
No, Mr. Coolidge—no!; E..... 80
President Coolidge appoints Henry L. Stimson to study situation in Nicaragua; EP 490
Realistic description of revolution; EP..... 195
United States state department playing fast and loose with regard to Nicaraguan affairs; EP..... 303
Urge toward empire. W. Hard; S..... 109
War or peace?; E..... 55
What about the Catholics?; E..... 81
What the world thinks of America..... 88
Nicholl, Louis Townsend
Egypt; P..... 12
Nicholson, Kenyon
Barker. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 125
Night in Spain; D..... 564
Nightingale; D..... 72
Niles, Abbe
Elinor Wylie, geographer; C..... 119
Noise a danger to health and life; Dt..... 667
Norrie, Margaret
Poison or protection?; C..... 209
Norris, George W.
Opposes renomination of President Coolidge for a third term; EP..... 515
Restates position on world war; EP..... 464
Wishes to round out public service as governor of Nebraska; EP..... 383
North, Jessica Nelson
Biography; P..... 499
Northern securities case
Roosevelt, trust-buster. G. Gardner; C.... 211
Norton, Benjamin P.
A challenge to Russia; C..... 40
Nugent, James R. Obituary; EP..... 516
Nungesser and Coli; EP..... 544

O

Oaks, Gladys
Praise of Diana; P..... 16
Oath
On the decreased sanctity of the oath; Dt.. 634
Obscenity
Indecency not in a book or a thing, but in a mind; EP..... 545
Oh Ernest; D..... 590
Oil. See Petroleum
Oklahoma
Swift injustice in Oklahoma. M. H. McGee; S..... 477
Olivier, Sydney
A new slavery in South Africa; S..... 142
Olmstead, Frank I.
Accused of favoring soviet form of government at Colorado school of mines; EP... 656
Olmsted, Wm. Beach
New generation: better than the old?; C.. 67
One soul saved. C. Griffin; C..... 119

Onlahan, Richard T.
Charges President Harding was an imperialist; EP ... 515
Open road; EP ... 384
Opium trade
Find out if you can. J. E. Ford; C ... 15
The opium trade at Geneva. E. N. La Motte; IS ... 618
Optimism
Things to be thankful for; EP ... 571
Ostwald, Wilhelm; EP ... 463

P

Pach, Walter
Mr. Stieglitz and Mr. Pach; C ... 40
Page, Alfred W.
In the Blackball mine; S ... 603
Panama
Government withdraws pact with United States; EP ... 131
The Panama treaty; E ... 6
Pan-Americanism
A pan-American conference. W. Keane; S 582
Pandit, S. G., naturalized Hindu; EP ... 26
Pankhurst, Emmeline; EP ... 383
Paper box makers' strike; S ... 36
Paper box makers' strike
A victory for force. J. Billikopf; C ... 262
Paper box manufacturers' association
Unwilling to arbitrate with striking workers; EP ... 158
Park, Stephen
Should be punished for slandering students; EP ... 27
Parker, Nathan K.; EP ... 3
Parker, Walter
Curbing the Mississippi; S ... 521
Passaic strikers
Six former strikers admit throwing explosives with intent to injure property; EP 105
Pastoral letter of catholic episcopate; C ... 146
Peace
The naval proposals at Geneva; E ... 710
Pease, Harlow
Guns for victims; C ... 92
Peets, Elbert
The Cleveland reservoir; S ... 145
The reign of the masonry dome; S ... 632
Peggy Ann; D ... 46
Pennsylvania
Coal, steel, and "sedition"; S ... 205
Good old Bill Vare. F. R. Kent; S ... 14
Pensions
Old-age pensions coming; E ... 493
Petroleum
Elk Hill oil lands return to United States; EP ... 250
A glut of oil; E ... 574
The great oil myth. J. T. W. Newbold; C. 169
Philippine islands
Carmi Thompson's compromise; E ... 5
Freedom from Americans. G. T. Nathorst; C ... 15
Reasons for vetoing bill for a plebiscite on Philippine independence; EP ... 410
The virtue of shaking hands. F. P. Keyes; S ... 8
Whose land—whose rubber? V. G. Bunuan; IS ... 22
Pinchot, Gifford
Appeals for regulation of power corporations; EP ... 330
Pinero, Arthur Wing
Trelawny of the wells. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 216
Pinwheel. F. E. Faragoh; D ... 216
Pirandello, Luigi
Right you are if you think you are. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 295
Pirates of Penzance. Gilbert and Sullivan; D. 20
Poems
The arms of grief. C. Calkins ... 68
Bacchus. E. L. Masters ... 238
Biography. J. N. North ... 499
Bracelet. K. Fearing ... 586
Come tired young women. C. Calkins ... 68
The corrosive season. L. Riggs ... 319
Death and dancing. D. Kirkley ... 93
Egypt. L. T. Nicholl ... 12
Epitaph on a first citizen. G. Haste ... 504
Escape into the night. E. Sapir ... 612
The eternal mercy. S. B. Cooksley ... 291
The man economy has caught. R. Holden ... 401
The map of places. L. Riding ... 671
Never, perhaps. H. S. White ... 559
Praise of Diana. G. Oaks ... 16
Puye. M. Austin (second prize poem) ... 202
The second daughter. I. Purnell ... 480
Self. W. Bynner ... 41
Shadows there are. A. J. M. Smith ... 671
The skater and other poems. C. Calkins ... 433
Skoal! Charles Lindbergh, Skoal! ... 600
These for your hurt. H. S. Gorman ... 697
This foreman. T. H. Ferril (prize poem) ... 173
To Emily Dickinson. H. Crane ... 718
To my mother. M. Mack ... 477
Turbines. M. Black ... 148
When women talk. M. Nardi ... 345
The wind beyond time. J. Rorty ... 641
Has poetry retired?; E ... 685
The poet of Georgia [F. L. Stanton]; E ... 55
Pohl, Frederick J.
To Christians!; C ... 478
Poisoned alcohol, night clubs, curfew; Dt ... 66
Poison gas
Chemical warfare, a new industry. R. S. Allen; S ... 33
German atrocity—American necessity. H. S. Villard; S ... 32
No rules for war? A. Y. Jameson, jr.; C. 118
Poland
Civil liberties in Poland; I ... 426
Difficulties in coming to agreement with Germany; EP ... 222
Pilsudski's militarism. L. Fischer; S ... 61
Political economy
How rich are you?; E ... 467
Politicians and anonymous scribes; Dt ... 557
Pollinger, Jules
Nin-che-go-fan-liao-ma?; C ... 611
Pollymoosuke and other strange show creatures; Dt ... 583
Ponsonby, Arthur
Moves abolition of British air force; EP ... 329
Porter, Katherine Anne
Children and art; S ... 233
Porter, Stephen G.; EP ... 77
Portugal
A B C class explanation of revolution; EP 195
British investments at bottom of revolutionary uprising; EP ... 195
Post-Dispatch, St. Louis
Honor where honor is due. C. McAdams; C ... 118
Praying curve. M. Brown; D ... 152
Precipitation, presidents, pennies, potatoes. G. B. Vetter; C ... 399
Presidential campaign
The silence of Governor Smith; E ... 412
Straw votes indicating favorite candidates; EP ... 623
Prize poem
That foreman. U. Sinclair; C ... 611
This foreman. T. H. Ferril; C ... 502
Some love prize poems—some do not. D. F. Robinson, L. Trent and R. Cheyney, H. T. Bellew, D. Liebovitz; C ... 343
Procrastination
In praise of procrastination; Dt ... 502
Professor of law
Shall prosecutors conceal facts?; S ... 630
Prohibition
Borah-Butler debate in Boston; EP ... 409
Congress upholding policy of poisoning; EP 25
Poison or protection? M. Norrie; C ... 209
Prohme, William F.
The outrages at Nanking; S ... 388
Psyche
On the evolution of the psyche. E. G. Mulford; C ... 696
Public utilities
Milk. W. J. Rapp; S ... 230
Publishers' autocaster service; EP ... 623
Pueblo indians
Earth horizon. E. S. Sergeant; S ... 714
Pullman company
Wages of porters; EP ... 305
Pullman porters, brotherhood of Experience of Bennie Smith, organizer; EP 624
Pun pests and alliteration addicts; Dt ... 716
Purnell, Idella
The second daughter; P ... 480
Put him on the free list? H. Mugridge; C ... 424
Putnam, Herbert; EP ... 53

Q

Questionnaire
Ask somebody these. S. Chase; S ... 609

R

R., F.
Mussolinied prosperity; C ... 635
Race prejudice
Christ's race. E. Goldstein; C ... 317
Only of Christ's race. Unemployed; C ... 235
Radio
Legislation aiming at subjecting radio to censorship; EP ... 133
Passage of Dill bill subjects radio to control; EP ... 250
Railroads
A hundred years a railroad; E ... 253
Los Angeles and Salt Lake case; EP ... 250
Railroad valuation. D. P. Locklin; C ... 635
Religious bodies criticize Western Maryland for strike of employees; EP ... 222
Railroad valuations
Supreme court decision thwarts settlement of pressing problem; EP ... 250
Randolph. Virginia Estelle, educator; EP ... 3
Rapid transit; D ... 510
Rapp, William Jourdan
Milk—a public utility; S ... 230
Rasmussen, O. D.
What happened at Nanking; C ... 527
Raynolds, Robert
Men who dig coal; S ... 337
Rechi Kitai; Dt ... 91
Religion
Adele, and the Swami, and I. T. S. Harding; S ... 693
Bootlegging religion. A. G. Hays; S ... 139
Church and school. S. T. Byington; C ... 261
On religion. C. E. Stowe; C ... 169
Remsen, Ira. Obituary; EP ... 277
"Revolt in the Desert"
Vivid but rotten. G. Godron; C ... 585
Revolution and art; E ... 81
Riding, Laura
The map of places; P ... 671
Riggs, Lynn
The corrosive season; C ... 319
Rhoades, Theodora. See Sun Yat-sen on Pan-Asia
Rhodes, James Ford. Obituary; EP and E. 105, 136
Right you are if you think you are. L. Pirandello; D ... 295
Rio Rita; D ... 216
Road to happiness. G. M. Sierra; D ... 590
Roberts, Edith A.
Let's have lots of holly; C ... 119
Robinson, Boardman
A shocking exhibit; C ... 211
Robinson, D. T.
Some love prize poems; C ... 343
Robinson, Edwin Arlington
Public ovation on occasion of fiftieth birthday; EP ... 545
Robinson, Karl Spies
Arrested for selling The Nation in Los Angeles; EP ... 196
Rogers, John William
Who chooses your books?; C ... 344
Roller, Arnold
American imperialism in Chile; IS ... 425
Roman catholicism
Catholic conscience. M. I. Swift; C ... 717
Catholics in high office. E. Kreutzweiser; C ... 670
A Catholic president. B. Macmahon; C ... 717
A catholic replies. F. Drees; C ... 146
Differences between Nation and catholic readers with regard to Mexico; EP ... 132
Roman catholic church
What about the catholics?; E ... 81
Roosevelt, Theodore
Roosevelt, trust-buster. G. Gardner; C ... 211
Root, Elihu
Plea in behalf of League of Nations; EP ... 26
Rorty, James
The wind beyond time; P ... 641
Rosenberg, James N.
The debt unsettlements; S ... 116
Rosenberger, Dora
National council of Jewish women; C ... 237
Ross, Frank
Down with "March" and "Thursday"; C ... 119
Rouzier, lieutenant, kills German; EP ... 1
Ruddigore. Gilbert and Sullivan; D ... 652
Russell, Bertrand
British folly in China; S ... 227
Russell, Brigadier general John H.
Makes damaging revelation as to American rule in Haiti; EP ... 682
Russia
All aboard for Russia. E. K. Van Alstyne; C ... 558
American god in Russia. M. Tyler; S ... 37
British menace; E ... 709
Challenge to Russia. B. P. Norton; C ... 40
He stays in Wall street's America, R. P. F.; C ... 40
Litvinov refutes British charges; EP ... 249
New ring around Russia. L. Fischer; S ... 310
News from Archangelkoye. M. Tyler; C ... 236
Russian censor relents. J. C.; IS ... 218
Soviet-Lithuanian guaranty pact; I ... 128
Soviet raid in London; I ... 677
Soviet rebuke to England. Litvinov; I ... 326
Russian-American industrial corporation
RAIC will redeem shares of stockholders at par; EP ... 569

S

Sacco-Vanzetti case
Dean Wigmore's attack on Felix Frankfurter; EP ... 516
Deception according to law. M. L. Ernst; S ... 602
Judge Thayer revealed; E ... 546
Parallel statements of John Brown and Bartolomeo Vanzetti; EP ... 569
Prosecutor's duty. C. H. Strong; C ... 717
Returns of Nation readers' petitions to the governor of Massachusetts; EP ... 624
Sacco-Vanzetti. G. W. Kirchwey; S ... 415
Shall prosecutors conceal facts? Symposium by E. R. Buckner, A. Wardwell, S. Untermyer, J. H. Cohen, G. G. Battle, a professor of law, and M. D. Steuer; S ... 628
To the governor of Massachusetts by the editors of The Nation; E ... 492
Sacco-Vanzetti
Vanzetti's address to Judge Thayer; EP ... 409
Sacker, Edward; EP ... 682
Safe-deposit vault musings; Dt ... 288
Salmon, Lucy
Lucy Salmon. E. Gilman; C ... 290
Salmon, Lucy. Obituary; EP ... 222
Salvemini, Gaetano
Mussolini chokes the press; S ... 34
Sand, George; E ... 254
Sapir, Edward
Escape into the night; P ... 612
Sargent, Charles Sprague
The tree man; E ... 466
Saturday's children. M. Anderson; D ... 194
Sayre, John Nevin; E ... 30
Schapiro, J. Salwyn
Beware the "larger issue"; C ... 91
Schmidt, Nathaniel
The man Bruce Barton doesn't know; C ... 236
Schulkind, Adelaide
The case of Charles Cline; C ... 611
Schuyler, George S.
Blessed are the sons of Ham; S ... 313

Schwartz, Bruno; IP..... 74
Science league of America
The science league. M. Shipley; C..... 237
Scopes anti-evolution trial; EP..... 78
Seasickness
Can seasickness be ended?; E..... 223
Second man. S. N. Behrman; D..... 484
Sedgwick, A. C.
The third degree and crime; S..... 666
Seeds, Nellie M.
Democracy in the making at Manumit school; S..... 608
Seinfel, Ruth
Textbooks for moderns; S..... 579
Seligman, Edwin R. A.
Editor-in-chief of Encyclopedia of the social sciences; EP..... 385
Senate filibuster
Who was the criminal? W. Hard; C..... 423
Sergeant, Elizabeth Shepley
Earth horizon; S..... 714
H. L. Mencken; S..... 174
Sering, Max
Cooperatives in South Tyrol; IS..... 171
Set a thief; D..... 269
Sex and The virgin man found obscene; EP.. 411
Sex, Captive, Virgin man; E..... 199
Shadwell, Bertrand
Capital punishment; C..... 262
Protecting American lives in Chicago; C... 611
Why cars kill; C..... 670
Shakespeare, William
Twelfth night. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 20
Shepheard, William
Reads Sermon on the Mount in House of Commons; EP..... 329
Sherry-Netherlands hotel fire; EP..... 465
Shet Arjunlal, millionaire of Boroda; E..... 108
Ship subsidy; E..... 82
Shipley, Maynard
The science league; C..... 237
Shipping
Excellent behavior of passengers of the President Harding when vessel meets with accident; EP..... 197
Three ghastly harbor disasters; EP..... 356
Shotwell, James T.; E..... 627
Sierra, G. Martinez
Cradle song. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 243
Road to happiness; D..... 590
Silver cord. S. Howard; D..... 20
Simpson, S. W.
A school with a lantern; C..... 119
Sims, Addison
Kellogg needs memory training; C..... 146
Sinclair, Upton
Fights for rights in Boston; EP..... 683
Man, not monkey; C..... 236
Poor me and pure Boston; S..... 713
That foreman; C..... 611
Who will help Barbusse?; C..... 400
Singer, Theodore
Germans also gave; C..... 147
Smith, Alfred Emanuel
"Al" Smith, progressive? L. H. Marks; C 373
"Al" Smith's weak knees. A. B. Lewis; C 317
Effect of his declaration on the religious controversy; EP..... 463
Presidential candidacy compromised by accession of old-line politicians; EP..... 355
Promptly answers Charles C. Marshall's challenge; EP..... 463
Reply to Charles C. Marshall's challenge improves on rereading; EP..... 491
Signs theater-padlock bill; EP..... 411
Silence of Governor Smith; E..... 412
The South and "Al" Smith. C. Hall, H. R. Cayton, B. Fulks, J. C. Granbery; C.... 210
Tribute to Jane Addams; EP..... 105
Why "Al" Smith is great. N. Hapgood; S 164
Smith, A. J. M.
Shadows there are; P..... 671
Smith, Bennie
Pullman porters' organizer; EP..... 624
Smith college
Honors President Neilson by establishment of the William A. Neilson chair of research; EP..... 597
Smith, Frank L.; EP..... 104
Smith, jr., James. Obituary; EP..... 385
Social Science
Encyclopedia of the social sciences; EP.. 385
Socialism
America's war-time socialism; S..... 364
The rich socialist. J. A. Hobson; S.... 556
Sophocles
Electra. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 564
South Africa
Compromise solution of differences between East Indians and whites; EP..... 356
New slavery in South Africa. Lord Olivier; S..... 142
South African color problem. R. F. A. Hoernle; IS..... 153
South Carolina
Winthrop college removes Professor Burgin for teaching evolution; EP..... 708
Soviet raid in London; E..... 572
Spain
Spanish intellectuals declare conferring honorary degree on King Alfonso unwarranted and inopportune; EP..... 597
Recent Spanish literature. E. Vivas; S... 530
Unchanging Spain. H. Ellis; S..... 178
Sperry, Elmer A.
Perfecting gyro stabilizer designed to do away with seasickness; E..... 223
Spider; D..... 380
Spinoza, Baruch
Spinoza today; E..... 200
Sport
Rugby game vs. American collegiate football; EP..... 3
Spread eagle; D..... 460
Spread eagle; EP and E.....491, 599
Stanton, Frank Lebby. Obituary; E..... 55
Steamboat
Who invented the steamboat?; E..... 659
Stearns, Alfred E.
New generation: better than the old?; C.. 67
Steger, Martha; EP..... 77
Stelzle, Charles
Returns to questionnaire on religion; Dt. 38
Sterry, Ernest V.; EP.....79, 357
Steuer, Max D.
Shall prosecutors conceal facts?; S..... 630
Stewart, E. C.
The yellow man's burden; C..... 584
Stieglitz, Alfred
Mr. Stieglitz and Mr. Pach; C..... 40
Stimson, Henry L.; EP..... 490
Stolberg, Benjamin
The collapse of the needle trades; S.496, 524, 554
Strike finances; C..... 668
Stone, Harlan Fiske
Opinion on "commerce clause" of the constitution; E..... 253
Stowe, Charles Edward
The labors of Harriet Beecher Stowe; C.. 635
On religion; C..... 169
Stowe, Harriet Beecher
The labors of Harriet Beecher Stowe. C. E. Stowe; C..... 635
Straton, John Roach; EP..... 159
Straus, Henrietta
The king's henchman; M..... 267
New wine in old and new bottles; M.... 404
Sensations—good and bad; M..... 483
Strawberry blonde. M. Brown; D..... 216
Strickland, W. W.; E..... 29
Strikes—Great Britain
Cost of the British coal strike; IP..... 23
Germans also gave. T. Singer; C..... 147
Who helped the British miners. E. G. Wolfe; C..... 290
Strikes—United States
Two blocks from Broadway. H. Allen; S. 36
Strong, Charles H.
The prosecutor's duty; C..... 717
Sueter, rear-admiral Murray Fraser
Demands destruction of all battleships; EP 221
Suicide waves products of newspaper psychology; EP..... 251
Superior, Wisconsin
A city's schools on strike; E..... 573
Supreme Kingdom
Macon Telegraph exposes its activities; EP 159
Swarz, Leon
Good for Mobile; C..... 479
Sweet, William E.
Endow men: C..... 92
Swetland, R. W.
New generation: better than the old?; C. 67
Swift, Morrison I.
The Catholic conscience; C..... 717
Swindall, judge Charles; S..... 477
Syria
The rape of Syria. Americanus; C..... 147

T

T., D.
New books in Germany; S..... 531
T., R.
California is awake; C..... 118
Tacna-Arica
Good offices of United States nullified by Nicaragua-Mexican policy; EP..... 104
Peru and Chile reject Kellogg proposals; EP..... 131
Taff-Vale railway case; E..... 279
Tariff
The tariff specter will not be denied; E.. 598
"Taxi, Mister?" S. Auerbach; S..... 255
Telegraph, Macon, Georgia
Exposes activities of Supreme Kingdom and shows up John Roach Straton; EP.... 159
Ten years after. I. A. Glusman; C..... 422
Ten years after. A. F. Wheeler; C..... 422
Tenenbaum, Samuel
The camera learns to lie; S..... 633
Tennessee
Inconclusive decision of supreme court in Scopes anti-evolution trial; EP..... 78
Nullification in Tennessee [Scopes case]; E 161
Terrace vs. Thompson; E..... 160
Thayer, judge Webster
Judge Thayer revealed; E..... 546
Thayer, W. G.
New generation: better than the old?; C.. 67
Theater
Neighborhood Playhouse closes at end of season; EP..... 411
Neighborhood Playhouse, the; E..... 548
Thief. H. Bernstein; D..... 540
Thomas, Norman
Fair words; C..... 669
Thompson, Carmi; E..... 5
Thompson, William Hale
Another explanation of "Big Bill" Thompson. E. D. Loewenthal; C..... 670
Thompson the cowboy rides in; S..... 420
Thou desperate pilot. Z. Akins; D..... 324
Tippett, Tom
Miners tighten their belts; S..... 336
Titcomb, Hubert B.
Why cars kill; C..... 343
Todd, Albert M.
Asking another; C..... 423
Trade-union movement
Working the women workers; S..... 311
Trapped; D..... 216
Trask, Mrs. Spencer
Wills Yaddo as retreat for artists; EP.... 357
Travel
Assistance afforded students and travelers by the Open Road; EP..... 384
The ferry to Europe. A. Warner; S.... 390
Revolt of the traveler; E..... 388
Trelawny of the wells. A. W. Pinero; D.... 216
Trent, Lucia, and Ralph Cheyney
Some love prize poems; C..... 343
Tugwell, Rexford G.
America's war-time socialism; S..... 364
What will become of the farmer?; S..... 664
Tuttle, Charles H.; Dt..... 634
Twelfth night. W. Shakespeare; D..... 20
Tyler, Marian
The American god in Russia; S..... 37
News from Archangelskoye; C..... 236
Tynan, Tom
The story of Tom Tynan. C. Baldwin; S. 501
Twain, Mark; E..... 518
Two Worlds Monthly
European authors protest against action of Samuel Roth; EP..... 277

U

Unemployed
Only of Christ's race; C..... 235
United mine workers of America
The miners tighten their belts. Tom Tippett; S..... 336
United Press
Mr. Coolidge defends [his foreign policy]; E..... 493
United States—Army
Lindbergh and the army and navy. O. G. Villard; S..... 712
United States—Congress
Congress a preparatory school. J. B. Barnhill; C..... 558
The dead congress; E..... 278
Supreme court says Congress has right to compel witnesses to attend its hearings; EP..... 78
United States—Department of justice
Remiss in investigating charges against Aluminum company; EP..... 596
United States—Department of state
Dollars and bullets: a history. L. S. Gannett; S..... 89
Equivocal official conduct with regard to Nicaraguan affairs; EP..... 303
Overruled by federal courts in case of S. G. Pandit, naturalized Hindu; EP..... 26
United States—Federal trade commission
Report on activities of power corporations; EP..... 330
United States—Foreign relations
Basing a war on rumors; E..... 225
British-American alliance; E..... 332
Coolidge diplomacy breeds ill will in South America; EP..... 249
Is there a British-American alliance?; EP 249
Kellogg must go; E..... 224
Kellogg's response to Norris resolution regarding Mexican oil lands; EP..... 221
Monroe doctrine and the Coolidge doctrine; E..... 106
Need of policy based on arbitration; EP.. 131
Nicaraguan crisis ended by dangerous means; EP..... 543
Settlement of Tacna-Arica differences nullified by Mr. Kellogg's Nicaragua-Mexican policy; EP..... 104
State department spurns Diaz's offer to turn his country into an American colony; EP..... 249
The tariff specter will not be denied; E.. 598
Those neutral rights; E..... 659
War or peace? [in Nicaragua]; E..... 55
United States—Foreign relations committee
Resolution proposing conciliatory policy toward China; EP..... 77
Votes not to report out Norris resolution demanding investigation of state department's dealings with Associated Press; EP..... 158
United States—History
1917-1927; E..... 358
United States—Intellectual life
Culture—how to avoid it; E..... 6
United States—Interstate commerce commission
Important decision in regard to railroad valuation for rate-making; EP..... 384
Questionable appointment of Cyrus E. Woods; EP..... 51
Senate rejects appointment of Cyrus E. Woods; EP..... 132
United States—Navy
Cruisers and gun caliber. S. Bent; C.... 147
Defeat of big-navy bloc; EP..... 51
The international naval race. J. M. Kenworthy; S..... 203
Lindbergh and the army and navy. O. G. Villard; S..... 712
Marines wanted for service in China; EP. 157
Naval disarmament conference; EP..... 195
Naval proposals at Geneva; E..... 710

Unrecorded history of attack upon Vera Cruz in 1916; EP..... 52
United States—Politics and government
Bills that slipped through during filibuster in senate; EP..... 330
Case of Frank L. Smith before the senate; EP..... 104
Condition of solving riddle of political government; EP..... 3
David Reed's filibuster in U. S. senate; EP 330
Dawes or Coolidge? F. R. Kent; S..... 286
Drastic farm relief [McNary-Haugen bill]; E..... 199
Good old Bill Vare. F. R. Kent; S..... 14
Government of minnows. F. R. Kent; S. 115
Have faith in Massachusetts. C. W. Bond; C..... 236
In weakness there is strength. F. R. Kent; S..... 167
No, Mr. Coolidge—no!; E..... 80
Offensive and defensive alliance between farmers and bankers; EP..... 158
On second terms. S. T. Byington; C..... 610
Panama treaty; E..... 6
Right to confiscate; E..... 160
Senator Borah can call foreign relations committee together; EP..... 355
Settling down to "Al" and "Cal." F. R. Kent; S..... 335
Smith in 1928? F. R. Kent; S..... 65
Solid south backs "Al" Smith. G. W. Hays; S..... 117
Some men run for office: Calvin sits. F. R. Kent; S..... 232
Wanted—an opposition; E..... 28
United States—Politics and meteorology
Precipitation and presidents. R. Marshall; S..... 315
United States—Shipping board
The ship subsidy again; E..... 82
United States—Supreme court
Decision in case of Giovanni di Santo vs. Pennsylvania; E..... 253
Finds California criminal syndicalism law constitutional; EP..... 569
Upholds validity of Virginia sterilization law; EP..... 624
United States—Tariff
The tariff—the farmers' enemy; E..... 252
United States—Tariff commission
Increase of duty demanded for protection of native imitation Swiss cheese; EP.... 491
Orders investigation into costs of producing cherries; EP..... 357
United States—Taxation
Reduction of taxes planned for well-to-do only; EP..... 623
United States—War
Sells ammunition on credit to Nicaragua; EP..... 355
United States Line
Passengers loyal to President Harding in distress; EP..... 197
Unknown Wife
Moderns—male and female; C..... 209
"Unparliamentary" tactics
Instances of, in U. S. senate and Jugo-slav parliament; EP..... 276
Untermyer, Samuel
Shall prosecutors conceal facts?; S..... 628

V

Van Alstyne, Elizabeth K.
All aboard for Russia; C..... 558
Van Doren, Mark
First glance; S..16, 25, 68, 93, 120, 180, 212, 263, 291, 319, 345, 374, 401, 504, 559
First glance at the season's books; S.... 440
van Loon, Hendrik Willem
Cartoons..7, 57, 137, 201, 309, 389, 469, 520, 575, 601, 661, 687
Vanishing plants
Let's have lots of holly. E. A. Roberts; C. 119
New year's resolution not to use live holly; EP..... 3
Vanities; D..... 72
Vanzetti, Bartolomeo
Statement made on being sentenced to death; EP..... 569
Vaughan, Bernard
The bishops and the knights; C..... 261
Vedder, Henry Rossiter
Blasphemy; C..... 318
Velarde, Federico Acosta
Porto Rico's delegate; C..... 670
Vetter, George B.
Precipitation, presidents, pennies, potatoes; C..... 399
Villard, Henry S.
German atrocity—American necessity; S.. 32
The mortgage bond industry; S..... 258
Villard, Oswald Garrison
Lindbergh and the army and navy; S.... 712
Ramsay MacDonald; S..... 495
Ten years after; S..... 362
Virgin islands
Appointment of Captain Waldo Evans as governor; EP..... 132
A forward step; E..... 334
The Virgin Man and Sex found obscene; EP. 411
Virgin man, Captive, Sex; E..... 199
Vivas, Eliseo
Recent Spanish literature; S..... 530
Vivisection
Big brute men. Many Years a Reader; C. 317

W

W., G.
A solution of the farm problem; C..... 422
W., H. M.
Friendship and intermarriage; C..... 503
Walcott, Henry P.
Retires from corporation of Harvard university; EP..... 709
Walker, Ralph T.; EP..... 251
Wall street; D..... 540
Walsh, David I.
Favors purchase of Cape Cod canal; EP.. 2
Walsh, Thomas James
Charges Aluminum company of America with violating court decree; EP..... 596
Wand, M. D.
Contacts correspondence club; C..... 373
War
Down with "March" and "Thursday." F. Ross; C..... 119
1917-1927; E..... 358
War debts
The debt unsettlements. J. N. Rosenberg; S..... 116
War resisters
The Dutch war resisters. R. N. Baldwin; IS..... 723
War spirit
Women and children. W. Chi-chen; C.... 422
Ward, E. J.
Gesegnete mahlzeit; C..... 288
Nin-che-go-fan-liao-ma?; C..... 611
Wardwell, Allen
Shall prosecutors conceal facts?; S..... 628
Warner, Arthur
The eagle and the red bird: a fable; S.. 86
The ferry to Europe; S..... 390
Washington, George; EP..... 250
Waterman, Charles Winfield
Evidence of corruption in election to U. S. senate; EP..... 276
Water-power
Hypocritical attitude of interests toward Boulder dam; EP..... 196
Wegerer, Alfred von
Germany's war guilt; IS..... 485
Weiser, G.
Blessed be democracy; C..... 318
Welles, Doris Berger
Afraid of socialism?; C..... 170
Wellock, Wilfred
Wins victory in the Stourbridge division by-election; EP..... 329
West Chester, Pennsylvania
Free speech and the Legion; E..... 414
State normal school criticized for questioning government's Nicaraguan policy; EP 355
What Ann brought home; D..... 295
What never dies; D..... 46
What the world thinks of America..... 88
Wheeler, A. F.
Ten years after; C..... 422
Wheeler, Benjamin Ide. Obituary; EP..... 545
Wheeler, M.
A different decade?; C..... 503
White, Hal Saunders
Never, perhaps; P..... 559
White House Spokesman. Obituary; EP..... 515
White, Walter
The Negro and the flood; S..... 688
Whitney, Charlotte Anita
United States supreme court affirms conviction of lower court; EP..... 569
Is pardoned by Governor Young of California; EP..... 708
Whitney studio club
Exhibit of work of Mexican and American children. K. A. Porter; S..... 233
Wigmore, Dean John H.
Attacks Felix Frankfurter for position in Sacco-Vanzetti case; EP..... 516
Wilbur, Curtis Dwight
Shies at the Third international; EP.... 196
Willstätter, Richard; EP..... 464
Wilson, Woodrow
Woodrow Wilson's wisest words; S..... 363
Window panes; D..... 295
Wireless telephony
Ears, not hands across the sea; EP..... 53
Wolfe, Ella G.
Who helped the British miners; C..... 290
Wolff, Theodor; EP..... 52
Women
American wives; E..... 135
Barnard college graduates engaged in gainful occupations; EP..... 357
Deflated rebel. Anonymous..... 11
Evolution of disenchantment. Anonymous. 113
Free—for what? Anonymous..... 522
Hotbed of feminists. Anonymous..... 691
In grandmother's name. G. Maul; C..... 39
In search of adventure. Anonymous..... 630
Lightning speed through life. Anonymous 395
Long journey. Anonymous..... 472
Maid militant too. C. Berg; C..... 147
Memorial service in honor of Dean Emma Gillett; EP..... 571
Moderns—male and female. Unknown Wife; C..... 209
Mother-worship. Anonymous..... 283
On the conservatism of the ultra-modern young woman; Dt..... 478
One way to freedom. Anonymous..... 165
Poet out of pioneer. Anonymous..... 63
Shall women be protected? V. Bari; S.. 143
Staying free. Anonymous..... 339
These modern husbands. A Husband; C.. 39
"The unpardonable sin." Anonymous..... 581
What is a "modern woman"? C. P. Hartson; C..... 373
What is a "modern woman"? M. Nelles; C..... 373
What kind of equality for women? F. Kelley; C..... 237
Woman alone. Anonymous..... 228
Working the women workers. A. W. Craton; S..... 311
Woodhull, Victoria Claflin
"The Woodhull." Obituary; E..... 711
Woodrow Wilson foundation
Awards Elihu Root $25,000; EP..... 26
Woods, Cyrus E.; EP.....51, 132
Woollen, Evans; EP..... 571
Woolley, Leonard; EP..... 27
Workers' travel association
Arranges holidays and excursions for British students and workmen; EP..... 385
World war
America's war-time socialism. R. G. Tugwell; S..... 364
A'wa Tseighe comes home from the war. M. Austin; S..... 367
The balance sheet; E..... 361
The moral lessons of the war. J. H. Holmes; S..... 369
Ten years after. O. G. Villard; S..... 362
The turnip year in Germany. An Englishwoman..... 370
Wright, Edward N.
"C. O.'s" in the civil war; C..... 696
Wriston, Henry Merritt
On danger in contact with immature minds; E..... 333
Wu, H. C., and Edgar C. Tang
We hope so too; C..... 422

Y

Yeomans, Henry Aaron
Testifies to growth of promising students; E 333
Yiddish: our literary dominion. A. Brody; S. 435
Young, Arthur C.
A use for tabloids; C..... 236
Young, George
Catalina island channel swimmer; EP.... 77
Yours truly; D..... 194

Z

Zaleski, August
Defines role of news agencies; EP..... 656
Zeigler, Oscar Woodward
"By and large"; C..... 40
Zeisler, Sigmund
Records recollections of trial of Chicago anarchists; EP..... 159

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Across Arctic America. K. Rasmussen; AN.. 458
Adler, Mortimer J.; R.....123, 240
Adventure in constructive finance. C. Glass; B..... 452
Aeschylus and Sophocles. J. T. Sheppard; AN 191
Age of the earth. A. Holmes; B..... 672
Albright, Evelyn May
Dramatic publication in England, 1580-1640; AN..... 615
Alexander and three small plays. Lord Dunsany; B..... 18
Alexander, Hartley; R..... 673
All summer in a day. S. Sitwell; B..... 265
Allen, Henry T.
Rhineland occupation; B..... 534
Allen, Hervey
Israfel: the life and times of Edgar Allan Poe; B..... 17
Allinghams. M. Sinclair; B..... 613
Allison, Francis G.
Lucian, satirist and artist; AN..... 191
Allison, John M.
Thiers and the French monarchy (1797-1848); B..... 150
Alvord, Clarence Walworth; R.....182, 402
Alpha. E. Balint, L. Rittenberg, translator; B..... 321
America comes of age. A. Siegfried; B..... 533
American in England during the first half century of independence. R. E. Spiller; B. 266
American criticism, 1926. W. A. Drake, editor; AN..... 215
American Indians and their music. F. Densmore; AN..... 458
American race problem. E. B. Reuter; B.... 402
American senate. L. Rogers; B..... 190
Amerika ist anders. A. Rundt; AN..... 538

Amorous Fiammetta. G. Boccaccio; B..... 212
An American saga. C. C. Jensen; B..... 504
Annals of the New York stage. G. C. D. Odell; B..... 718
An old man's folly. F. Dell; AN..... 322
Anderson, Sherwood
Tar: a mid-west childhood; B..... 121
Andy Brandt's ark. E. Bryner; B..... 481
Anet, Claude
Ariane; AN..... 675
Angell, Norman
Must Britain travel the Moscow road?; B 188
Anthology of Catholic poems. S. Leslie, compiler; AN..... 192
Anthology of magazine verse for 1926 and yearbook of American poetry. W. S. Braithwaite; AN..... 45
Antoine and the théâtre-libre. S. M. Waxman; B..... 293
Archer, Charles, translator Cross; AN..... 649
Aretino, works of. S. Putnam, translator; B. 212
Ariane. C. Anet; AN..... 675
Armstrong, Hamilton Fish; A. C. Coolidge, introduction
New Balkans; B..... 266
Armstrong, Martin
Desert: a legend; AN..... 267
Arnold, Julian
China: a commercial and industrial handbook; AN..... 721
Arrow. C. Morley; AN..... 675
Art epochs and their leaders. O. Hagen; B. 646
Art of being ruled. W. Lewis; B..... 446
Arthur, Sir George, translator
Memoirs of Raymond Poincaré. Vol. I; B. 671
Asbury, Herbert
Methodist saint; AN..... 675
Ashley, Clifford W.
Yankee whaler; B..... 70
Aspects of Mexican civilization. J. Vasconcelos, and M. Gamio; B..... 374
Aspects of science. J. W. N. Sullivan; AN.. 483
Asquith, earl of Oxford and
Fifty years of British parliament; B.... 213
At the sign of Sagittarius. R. B. Ince; AN. 589
Audubon, John James. F. H. Herrick, collector
Delineations of American scenery and character; B..... 93
Aufruhr um den junker Ernst. J. Wassermann; AN..... 540
Aurner, Nellie Slayton
Caxton, mirror of fifteenth-century letters; B..... 240
Austin, Mary; R..... 41
Autobiographies. W. B. Yeats; B..... 291
Autobiography of a Chinese dog. F. Ayscough, editor; AN..... 20
Ayscough, Florence, editor
Autobiography of a Chinese dog; AN.... 20

B

Babbitt warren. C. E. M. Joad; B..... 434
Bailey, Cyril, J. Bell, and others
Mind of Rome; AN..... 192
Bakshy, Alexander; R..... 535
Baldwin, Roger N., introduction
Letters from Russian prisons; AN..... 616
Balint, Emery. L. Rittenberg, translator
Alpha; B..... 321
Baring, Maurice
Daphne Adiane; B..... 586
Barker, Virgil
Peter Bruegel the elder; B..... 444
Barnes, Harry Elmer; R..... 671
Barreyre, Jean
Blind ship; AN..... 294
Barthou, Louis
Prodigious lover; B..... 587
Barton, Sir D. Plunkett, C. Benham, and F. Watt
Story of the inns of court; AN..... 45
Bates, H. E.
Two sisters; AN..... 151
Baumann, Arthur A.
Last Victorians; AN..... 675
Beach, Joseph Warren
Outlook for American prose; AN..... 96
Beadle, P. Smith; AN..... 649
Beals, Carleton; R..... 374
Beard, Charles A.; R..... 560
Beard, Charles A., and Mary R.
Rise of American civilization; B..... 559
Becker, Carl; R..... 559
Beebe, William
Pheasant jungles; AN..... 458
Behind the scenes with a newspaperman. E. J. Stackpole; AN..... 674
Bell, J., C. Bailey, and others
Mind of Rome; AN..... 192
Bell, Lisle; R..... 122
Belloc, Hilaire
Emerald; AN..... 649
Benét, Laura; R..... 347
Benét, William Rose
Wild goslings. A selection of fugitive pieces; AN..... 458
Benham, Charles, Sir D. P. Barton, and F. Watt
Story of the inns of court; AN..... 45
Best plays of 1925-26. B. Mantle, editor; AN. 404
Best poems of 1926. L. A. G. Strong, editor; AN..... 192
Best short stories of 1926. E. J. O'Brien, editor; AN..... 404
Bettauer, Hugo. S. N. Brainin, translator
City without Jews; B..... 95
Bible in Ireland. A. Nicholson. A. T. Sheppard, editor; B..... 449
Birth-control laws. M. W. Dennett; AN..... 295
Bixler, Julius Seelye
Religion in the philosophy of William James; AN..... 124
Black April. J. Peterkin; AN..... 649
Black death. J. Nohl, compiler; C. H. Clarke, translator; AN..... 192
Blake, William. O. Burdett; AN..... 96
Blatchington tangle. G. D. H., and M. Cole; AN..... 649
Bleyer, Willard Grosvenor
Main currents in the history of American journalism; B..... 322
Blind ship. J. Barreyre; AN..... 294
Boccaccio, Giovanni
Amorous Fiammetta; B..... 212
Bodenheim, Maxwell
Returning to emotion; AN..... 458
Bodley, Temple
George Rogers Clark: his life and public services; B..... 403
Boodin, John Elof
Cosmic evolution; B..... 294
Book and the people. A. S. Peake, editor; AN..... 125
Book lists
Interesting books of 1926.....20, 46, 71, 97
Book of navy songs. J. W. Crosley; B..... 647
Bowers, Claude G.
Diary of Elbridge Gerry, Jr.; AN..... 702
Boyd, Madeleine, translator
The Thibaults; B..... 183
Brackie the fool. Klabund, H. G. Scheffauer, translator; AN..... 650
Brainin, Salomea Neumark, translator
City without Jews; B..... 95
Braithwaite, William Stanley
Anthology of magazine verse for 1926 and yearbook of American poetry. Sesquicentennial edition; AN..... 45
Brewster, Dorothy; R..... 19
Brinton, Crane
Political ideas of the English romanticists; AN..... 215
British general strike. S. Nearing; B..... 188
Britton, Kenneth Philips
Morning, noon and night; AN..... 675
Brody, Alter; R.....95, 214, 321, 401, 646
Brooks, Van Wyck
Emerson and others; B..... 401
Broun, Heywood, and M. Leech
Anthony Comstock: roundsman of the Lord; B..... 319
Brown, W. Norman; R..... 506
Browne, Edward Granville
Year among the Persians. Impressions as to the life, character, and thought of the people of Persia; AN..... 192
Brownell, Baker
New universe. An outline of the worlds in which we live; B..... 321
Brücken über den Atlantik. O. E. Lessing; AN..... 538
Bruegel, Peter, the elder. V. Barker; B.... 444
Bryce, James. H. A. L. Fisher; B..... 442
Bryner, Edna
Andy Brandt's ark; B..... 481
Buchanan, Scott; R..... 321
Buchholz, H. E.; R..... 150
Burbank, Luther
Harvest of the years; AN..... 675
Burdett, Osburt
William Blake; AN..... 96
Burrell, Angus; R..... 648
Business and the church. J. Davis, editor; B..... 504
Byzantine portraits. C. Diehl; B..... 536

C

Cabell. James Branch
Music from behind the moon; B..... 18
Calkins, Clinch; R..... 646
Candle in the cabin. V. Lindsay; AN..... 97
Cankar, Ivan
Yerney's justice; AN..... 509
Cargoes and harvests. D. C. Peattie; AN..... 349
Carmina Cantabrigiensia. K. Strecker, editor; AN..... 540
Carr-Saunders, A. M.
Eugenics; AN..... 215
Carré, Jean-Marie
La vie aventureuse de Jean-Arthur Rimbaud; B..... 699
Case of Mr. Crump. L. Lewisohn; B..... 149
Case, Shirley Jackson; R..... 454
Caxton. N. S. Aurner; B..... 240
Cendrars, Blaise. H. L. Stuart, translator
Sutter's gold; AN..... 295
Cerf, Barry
Anatole France: the degeneration of a great artist; B..... 69
Changing east. J. A. Spender; B..... 345
Chariot of fire. B. De Voto; AN..... 20
Charlotte de Belgique. H. de Reinach Foussemagne; AN..... 538
Charwoman's shadow. Lord Dunsany; B.... 18
Chase, Cleveland B.
Young Voltaire; B..... 122
Chase, Stuart; R.....120, 263, 642
Chatterton-Hill, Georges, translator
Struggle for the Rhine; B..... 534
Chaucer and the medieval sciences. W. C. Curry; B..... 720
Chesterton, G. K.
Return of Don Quixote; AN..... 649
Children of ancient Egypt. L. Lamprey; AN. 124
Children of the sun and other poems. J. Rorty; B..... 16
Chilton, Eleanor Carroll
Shadows waiting; AN..... 323
China: a commercial and industrial handbook. J. Arnold; AN..... 721
China and the powers. H. K. Norton; B.... 480
China in revolt. T. Leang-li; AN..... 721
China in turmoil. L. M. King; AN..... 721
China: yesterday and today. E. T. Williams; AN..... 721
Churchill, Winston S.
World crisis, 1916-1918; B..... 613
City without Jews. H. Bettauer. S. N. Brainin, translator; B..... 95
Civilization or civilizations. E. H. Goddard and P. A. Gibbons. F. C. S. Schiller, introduction; AN..... 241
Clark, George Rogers. T. Bodley; B..... 403
Clarke, C. H., translator, J. Nohl, compiler
Black death. A chronicle of the plague; AN..... 192
Clarkson, J. D.; R..... 674
Clemenceau, Georges
Demosthenes; AN..... 96
Close chaplet. L. R. Gottschalk; B..... 120
Close, Upton
Revolt of Asia: the end of the white man's world dominion; B and AN.....480, 721
Coats, R. H.
John Galsworthy as a dramatic artist; AN. 241
Colby essays. F. M. Colby. C. Day, editor; B 68
Colby, Frank Moore. C. Day, editor
Colby essays; B..... 68
Colby, Nathalie Sedgwick
Green forest; AN..... 294
Cole, G. D. H., and Margaret Blatchington tangle; AN..... 649
Collected poems of J. G. Neihardt; AN..... 192
Colum, Padraic; R..... 449
Colum, Padraic
Road round Ireland; B..... 41
Complete history of the lives and robberies of the most notorious highwaymen, footpads, shop-lifts, and cheats of both sexes. Captain A. Smith; AN..... 192
Compton, Thomas; R..... 699
Comstock, Anthony. H. Broun and M. Leech; B..... 319
Contemporary thought in Italy. A. Crespi; B. 71
Cooley, Rossa B.
Homes of the freed; AN..... 267
Coolidge, Archibald Cary, introduction. H. F. Armstrong
New Balkans; B..... 266
Coombs, Whitney, and A. R. Ellingwood
Government and labor; B..... 292
Copeland, Charles Townsend, compiler
Copeland reader: an anthology of English poetry and prose; B..... 148
Copeland reader. C. T. Copeland, compiler; B. 148
Coppard, A. E.
Field of mustard; B..... 239
Correspondence schools, lyceums, Chautauquas. J. S. Noffsinger; B..... 150
Cosmic evolution. J. E. Boodin; B..... 294
Cournos, John; R..... 239
Crane, Hart
White buildings: Poems by Hart Crane; B. 120
Crane, Mannin
Yarns from a windjammer; AN..... 20
Crane, Nathalia
Singing crow and other poems; AN..... 97
Crane, Stephen
The work of Stephen Crane; B..... 180
Crashing Thunder; P. Radin, editor; AN..... 616
Crawford, Nelson Antrim; R..... 18
Creel, George
People next door; AN..... 509
Crespi, Angelo
Contemporary thought in Italy; B..... 71
Croghan, George, and the western movement. A. T. Volwider; B..... 182
Crosby, Joseph W.
Book of navy songs; B..... 647
Crosby, Oscar T.; R..... 93
Cross. S. Undset. C. Archer, translator; AN 649
Crump, C. G. and E. F. Jacob, editors
Legacy of the middle ages; B..... 645
Culberley, Ellwood P.
Introduction to the study of education; AN 615
Culture of ancient Greece and Rome. F. Poland, E. Reisinger, and R. Wagner; AN 267
Curry, Walter Clyde
Chaucer and the medieval sciences; B..... 720

D

Daly, James
Guilty sun; AN..... 459
Daphne Adiane. M. Baring; B..... 586
Dark dawn. M. Ostenso; AN..... 20
Dark, Sidney, H. Rushbury, drawings
Paris; B..... 453
Darwin, Leonard
Need for eugenic reform; AN..... 457
Davis, Jerome, editor
Business and the church; B..... 504
Day, Clarence, editor
Colby essays; B..... 68
Days of my life. R. Haggard; AN..... 151
Decadence. M. Gorky. V. Dewey, translator; B..... 401

de Casseres, Walter
Sublime boy; AN..... 124
Deeping, Warwick
Doomsday; B..... 347
Deland, Margaret
Kays; B..... 214
Delineations of American scenery and character. J. J. Audubon. F. H. Herrick, collector; B..... 93
Dell, Floyd
Outline of marriage; B..... 41
An old man's folly; AN..... 322
De' Lucchi, Lorna, translator
Minor poems of Dante; AN..... 192
De Montgomery, B. G.
Issues of European statesmanship; AN.... 483
Demosthenes. G. Clemenceau; AN..... 96
Dennett, Mary Ware
Birth-control laws; AN..... 295
Densmore, Frances
American Indians and their music; AN.. 458
de Reinach Foussemagne, comtesse H.
Charlotte de Belgique, impératrice du Mexique; AN..... 538
Desert: a legend. M. Armstrong; AN..... 267
De Voto, Bernard
Chariot of fire; AN..... 20
Dewey, Veronica, translator
Decadence; B..... 401
Dibble, R. F.; R..... 536
Diehl, Charles
Byzantine portraits; B..... 536
Diplomatic correspondence of the United States concerning the independence of the Latin-American nations. W. R. Manning, selector; B..... 535
Dondore, Dorothy Anne
Prairie and the making of middle America: four centuries of description; B..... 148
Doomsday. W. Deeping; B..... 347
Dorothea Angermann. G. Hauptmann; AN... 538
Dorsey, George A.
Nature of man; B..... 672
Douglas, Donald; R.....94, 293, 587
Drake, William A., editor
American criticism, 1926; AN..... 215
Dramatic publication in England. E. M. Albright; AN..... 615
Dubliners. J. Joyce; AN..... 192
du Gard, Roger Martin. M. Boyd, translator
The Thibaults; B..... 183
Dunsany, lord
Charwoman's shadow; B..... 18
Alexander and three small plays; B..... 18
Dymer. C. Hamilton; AN..... 96

E

East side west side. F. Riesenberg; B..... 214
Edgar, Pelham
Henry James: man and author; B..... 375
Edman, Irwin; R.....187, 448
Education for adults and other essays: F. P. Keppel; B..... 150
Eight years with Wilson's cabinet. D. F. Houston; B..... 93
"Elizabeth"
Introduction to Sally; AN..... 20
Ellingwood, Albert R., and W. Coombs
Government and labor; B..... 292
Elliott, G. R.; R..... 612
Elmer Gantry. S. Lewis; B..... 291
Emerald. H. Belloc; AN..... 649
Emerson and others. Van W. Brooks; B..... 401
Emile-Bayard, Jean
Latin quarter, past and present; B..... 453
Montmartre, past and present; B..... 453
English life in the middle ages. L. F. Salzman; B..... 645
English women in life and letters. M. Phillips and W. S. Tomkinson; AN..... 458
Enough rope. D. Parker; AN..... 589
Epicure's guide to France. C. and M. Rouff; B..... 453
Erskine, John
Galahad; B..... 42
Eugenics. A. M. Carr-Saunders; AN..... 215
Evolution of modern capitalism. J. A. Hobson; AN..... 589
Expansion of rural life. J. M. Williams; B.. 18
Exploring the universe. H. Ward; B..... 642

F

Fadiman, Clifton P.; R.....42, 121, 451, 588, 642
Farmers of forty centuries. F. H. King; AN.. 241
Feast of the cannibals. B. Jonas; AN..... 702
Feigenbaum, Dorian; R..... 537
Ferber, Edna
Mother knows best; AN..... 675
Ferril, Thomas Hornsby
High passage; AN..... 458
Feuchtwanger, Lion
Power; B..... 122
Field of mustard. A. E. Coppard; B..... 239
Fields of work for women. M. S. Leuck; B.. 347
Fifty years of British parliament. Asquith; B 213
Finck, Henry T.
My adventures in the golden age of music; B..... 239
Fine clothes to the Jew. L. Hughes; B..... 403
Fire under the Andes. E. S. Sergeant; B.... 345
First glance at the season's books; B..... 440
Fischer, Louis; R.....95, 700
Fisher, H. A. L.
James Bryce; B..... 442
Flake, Otto
Villa U. S. A.; AN..... 538
Fogs and clouds. W. J. Humphreys; AN..... 192
Ford, Ford Madox
Man could stand up; AN..... 322
Good soldier; B..... 451
Foreign rights and interests in China. W. W. Willoughby; AN..... 721
Fowler, F. G. and H. W.
Oxford pocket dictionary; AN..... 459
France, Anatole. B. Cerf; B..... 69
France, Anatole, rambles with. S. Kemeri; B. 69
France and America. Some experiences in co-operation. A. Tardieu; B..... 718
France. S. Huddleston; B..... 699
Franciscans in England. E. Hutton; AN.... 615
Frank, Florence Kiper; R..... 700
Frankenberger, Julius
Walpurgis. Zur Runstgestalt von Goethe's Faust; AN..... 538
Franklin, Benjamin. P. Russell; AN..... 71
Free-lance writer's handbook. W. D. Kennedy, editor; AN..... 125
Freud, Sigmund
Hemmuny, symptom, und angst; B..... 537
From myth to reason. W. Riley; B..... 588
Frontier in American literature. L. L. Hazard; B..... 148
Fry, Roger
Transformations: critical and speculative essays on art; B..... 455
Fry, Ruth A.
Quaker adventure; B..... 96
Fuchs, James; R..... 150

G

Galahad. J. Erskine; B..... 42
Gale, Zona
Preface to a life; B..... 69
Galsworthy, John, as a dramatic artist. R. H. Coats; AN..... 241
Gamio, Manuel, and J. Vasconcelos
Aspects of Mexican civilization; B..... 374
Gang. F. M. Thrasher; AN..... 192
Gannett, Lewis S.; R.....265, 480
Gassner, John Waldhorn; R..... 265
Gedye, G. E. R.; R..... 534
Gerry, Elbridge, Jr., diary of. C. G. Bowers, preface and footnotes; AN..... 702
Gershoy, Leo; R..... 122
Giant of Oldborne. J. Owen; AN..... 404
Gibbons, P. A., and E. H. Goddard. F. C. S. Schiller, introduction
Civilization or civilizations. An essay on the Spenglerian philosophy of history; AN..... 241
Gilbert and Sullivan. A. H. Godwin; B..... 293
Giraud, Victor
Sœurs de grands hommes. Jacqueline Pascal, Lucile de Chateaubriand, Henriette Renan; AN..... 538
Girl from China. B. Van Vorst; AN..... 241
Gissing, Algernon C. and Ellen, editors
Letters of George Gissing; B..... 648
Gissing, George, letters of. A. C. and E. Gissing, editors; B..... 648
Glass, Carter
Adventure in constructive finance; B..... 452
Glenn, Isa
Little pitchers; B..... 264
Goddard, E. H., and P. A. Gibbons. F. C. S. Schiller, introduction
Civilization or civilizations. An essay on the Spenglerian philosophy of history; AN..... 241
God's trombones. J. W. Johnson; B..... 721
Godwin, A. H.
Gilbert and Sullivan: a critical appreciation of the Savoy opera; B..... 293
Goldberg, Isaac
Theater of George Jean Nathan; AN.... 510
Golden tales of Anatole France; AN..... 192
Good soldier. F. M. Ford; B..... 451
Gorky, Maxim. V. Dewey, translator
Decadence; B..... 401
Gorman, Herbert S.; R..... 264
Gottschalk, Laura Riding
Close chaplet; B..... 120
Gottschalk, Louis R.; R..... 238
Government and labor. A. R. Ellingwood, and W. Coombs; B..... 292
Graves, Charles L.
Hubert Parry, his life and works; B..... 44
Greeley, Horace. D. C. Seitz; B..... 16
Green forest. N. S. Colby; AN..... 294
Griffin in China. G. Wimsatt; AN..... 241
Guilty sun. J. Daly; AN..... 459
Gulick, Charles Burton
Modern traits in old Greek life; AN..... 191
Gullah. R. Smith; AN..... 589

H

Hagen, Oscar
Art epochs and their leaders; B..... 646
Haggard, Rider
Days of my life; AN..... 151
Haggin, B. H.; R.....239, 348
Hall-Quest, Alfred L.
University afield; B..... 150
Hamilton, Clive
Dymer; AN..... 96
Handbook of rural social resources. H. Israel and B. Y. Landis, editors; B..... 18
Hapgood, Powers; R..... 797
Happy marriage. A. MacLeish; B..... 185
Happy tree. R. Murray; B..... 586
Hardy, Thomas, collected poems of; AN..... 192
Harrison, Austin
Frederic Harrison: thoughts and memories; AN..... 267
Harrison, Frederic: thoughts and memories. A. Harrison; AN..... 267
Harrison, G. B., editor
Willobie his avisa; AN..... 510
Harrison, Oliver; R..... 319
Hatcher, O. Latham, editor
Occupations for women; B..... 347
Harvest of the years. L. Burbank; AN..... 675
Harvey, Alexander Gordon Cummins, memoir of. F. W. Hirst, editor; AN..... 349
Hawkers and walkers in early America. R. Wright; AN..... 702
Hauptmann, Gerhart
Dorothea Angermann; AN..... 538
Haydon, Benjamin Robert, autobiography and memoirs; B..... 212
Hazard, Lucy Lockwood
Frontier in American literature; B..... 148
Headley, Leal A.
How to study in college; AN..... 615
Hedin, Erik. J. Koppel, translator
Strindberg, leben und dichtung; B..... 508
Hemmung, symptom, und angst. S. Freud; B. 537
Hepplethwaite, Martha, life and times of. F. Sullivan; AN..... 45
Herculano, Alexandre
History of the origin and establishment of the inquisition in Portugal; AN..... 702
Herrera, Alfonso L.
La plasmogenia; B..... 701
Herrick, Francis Hobart, collector
Delineations of American scenery and character; B..... 93
Herskovits, Melville J.; R..... 402
High passage. T. H. Ferril; AN..... 458
Himrod, James Lattimore
Johnny Appleseed. The true story of Jonathan Chapman, 1775-1846; AN..... 45
Hinkhouse, Fred. J.
Preliminaries of the American revolution as seen in the English press, 1763-1775; AN 510
Hirst, Francis W., editor
Memoir of Alexander Gordon Cummins Harvey; AN..... 349
Hirst, Francis W.
Early life and letters of John Morley; B.. 442
History of caricature. B. Lynch; B..... 644
History of Russia. V. O. Kluchevsky. C. J. Hogarth, translator; B..... 674
History of the life of the late Mr. Jonathan Wild the great. H. Fielding; AN..... 192
History of the origin and establishment of the inquisition in Portugal. A. Herculano; AN..... 702
History of witchcraft and demonology. M. Summers; B..... 43
Hobson, J. A.; R.....68, 184, 345, 442
Hogarth, C. J., translator
History of Russia, Vol. IV; B..... 674
Hobson, John A.
Evolution of modern capitalism: a study in machine production; AN..... 589
Holism and evolution. J. C. Smuts; B..... 614
Hollingworth, Harry L.
Psychology of thought; B..... 240
Holloway, Edward Stratton
Practical book of learning decoration and furniture; AN..... 192
Holmes, Arthur
Age of the earth; B..... 672
Holmes, John Haynes; R..... 42
Holroyd-Reece, translator
Spanish journey; B..... 673
Homes of the freed. R. B. Cooley; AN..... 267
Horwill, Herbert W.; R..... 613
Hourwich, Rebecca; R..... 615
House, Roy Temple; R.....508, 673
Housman, Laurence
Ironical tales; AN..... 650
Houston, David F.
Eight years with Wilson's cabinet—1913 to 1920; B..... 93
How to study in college. L. A. Headley; AN.. 615
Huddleston, Sisley
France; B..... 699
Hughes, Langston
Fine clothes to the Jews; B..... 403
Hume, Martin
Wives of Henry the eighth; AN..... 267
Humoresque. H. Wolfe; AN..... 192
Humphreys, William J.
Fogs and clouds; AN..... 192
Huntington, Ellsworth
Pulse of progress; B..... 700
Hunt, Violet
I have this to say; B..... 215
Hutchison, Keith; R..... 188
Hutton, Edward
Franciscans in England, 1224-1538; AN.. 615
Huxley, Aldous
Jesting Pilate; AN..... 20
Huxley, Julian S.
Stream of life; B..... 672

I

I, the Jew. M. Samuel; AN..... 701
Ibáñez, Vicente Blasco
Pope of the sea; AN..... 675
I have this to say. V. Hunt; B..... 215
Imperialism and world politics. P. T. Moon; B..... 68

Ince, Richard B.
At the sign of Sagittarius; AN..... 589
Introduction to the study of education. E. P. Cubberley; AN..... 615
Introduction to Sally. "Elizabeth"; AN..... 20
Irene Iddesleigh. Mrs. A. M'K. Ros; AN..... 650
Ironical tales. L. Housman; AN..... 650
Is it God's word. J. Wheless; AN..... 616
Israel, Henry, and B. Y. Landis, editors
Handbook of rural social resources; B.... 18
Israfel: the life and times of Edgar Allan Poe. H. Allen; B..... 17
Issues of European statesmanship. B. G. de Montgomery; AN..... 483
Istrati Panait
Kyra Kyralina; AN..... 323

J

Jacob, E. F., and C. G. Crump, editors
Legacy of the middle ages; B..... 645
James, Harlan
Land planning in the United States for the city, state, and nation; AN..... 350
James, Henry. P. Edgar; B..... 375
Jastrow, Joseph; R.....123, 672
Jeffers, Robinson. G. Sterling; AN..... 192
Jeffrey, Jeffrey E.
Longest shadow; B..... 586
Jennifer. J. Palmer; B..... 586
Jennings, H. S.; R..... 184
Jennings, J. T., and others
Libraries and adult education; B..... 150
Jensen, Carl Christian
An American saga; B..... 504
Jesting Pilate. A. Huxley; AN..... 20
Joad, C. E. M.
Babbitt warren; B..... 434
Johnny Appleseed. The true story of Jonathan Chapman. J. L. Himrod; AN..... 45
Johnson, James Weldon
God's trombones; B..... 721
Jonas, Barukh
Feast of the cannibals; AN..... 702

K

Kallen, Horace M.
Why religion?; B..... 448
Kaltchas, Nicholas S.; R..... 266
Kaye-Smith, Sheila
Spell land; AN..... 294
Kays. M. Deland; B..... 214
Keith, Arthur Berriedale
Religion and philosophy of the Veda and Upanishads; B..... 506
Keller, Albert Galloway, and W. G. Sumner
Science of society; B..... 698
Kelly, Luther S., memoirs of. M. M. Quaife, editor; AN..... 216
Kemeri, Sandor
Rambles with Anatole France; B..... 69
Kennedy, William Dorsey, editor
Free-lance writer's handbook; AN..... 125
Keppel, Frederick Paul
Education for adults and other essays; B.. 150
Keyser, Cassius J.
Thinking about thinking; B..... 240
King, F. A.
Farmers of forty centuries, or permanent agriculture in China, Korea, and Japan; AN..... 241
King's henchman. E. St. V. Millay; B..... 263
King, Louis M.
China in turmoil; AN..... 721
Kirkwood, Kenneth P., and A. J. Toynbee
Turkey; B..... 614
Klabund. H. G. Scheffauer, translator
Brackie the fool; AN..... 650
Kluchevsky, V. O. C. J. Hogarth, translator
History of Russia, Vol. IV; B..... 674
Kollontai, Alexandra
Red love; B..... 700
Koppel, Julia, translator
Strindberg, leben und dichtung; B..... 508
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..17, 69, 149, 212, 291, 320, 376, 446, 505, 562, 718
Kyra Kyralina. P. Istrati; AN..... 323

L

Laburnum branch. N. Mitchison; AN..... 241
L'agonie du christianisme. M. de Unamuno; B. 481
Lalou, René
New books in France; B..... 532
Lamprey, L.
Children of ancient Egypt; AN..... 124
Land planning in the United States for the city, state, and nation. H. James; AN..... 350
Landis, Benson Y., and H. Israel, editors
Handbook of rural social resources; B.... 18
Language and thought of the child. J. Piaget; B..... 123
Lanterns, junks, and jade. S. Morrill; AN.. 241
La plasmogenia. A. L. Herrera; B..... 701
Last Victorians. A. A. Baumann; AN..... 675
Latin quarter, past and present. J. Emile-Bayard; B..... 453
Latterday symphony. R. Wilson; B..... 378
Lawrence, colonel T. E.
Revolt in the desert; B..... 374
Leang-li, T'ang
China in revolt: how a civilization became a nation; AN..... 721
Leary, Daniel Bell; R..... 44
Lee: a dramatic poem. E. L. Masters; AN 45
Leech, Margaret, and H. Broun
Anthony Comstock: roundsman of the Lord; B..... 319
Legacy of the middle ages. C. G. Crump and E. F. Jacob, editors; B..... 644
Legouis, Emile
Spenser; AN..... 192
Lessing, O. E.
Brücken über den Atlantik. Beiträge zum amerikanischen und deutschen geistesleben; AN..... 538
Letters from Russian prisons. R. N. Baldwin, introduction; AN..... 616
Letters of a Roman gentleman. A. P. McKinley, translator; AN..... 45
Letters of George Eliot. R. B. Johnson, selector; AN..... 192
Leuck, Miriam Simons
Fields of work for women; B..... 347
Lewis, Sinclair
Elmer Gantry; B..... 291
Lewis, Wyndham
Lion and the fox; B..... 446
Art of being ruled; B..... 446
Lewisohn, Ludwig
Case of Mr. Crump; B..... 149
Roman summer; B..... 646
Lewisohn, Ludwig, translator
Wedlock; B..... 94
Libraries and adult education. J. T. Jennings, and others; B..... 150
Lincoln's parentage and childhood. L. A. Warren; AN..... 350
Lindeman, Eduard C.
Meaning of adult education; B..... 150
Lindsay, Vachel
Candle in the cabin. A weaving together of script and singing; AN..... 97
Lion and the fox. W. Lewis; B..... 446
Little pitchers. I. Glenn; B..... 264
Lodge, Sir Oliver
Science of today; B..... 672
Loeb classical library; B..... 191
Log of the grand Turks. R. E. Peabody; AN. 20
Long old road in China. L. Warner; AN.... 241
Longest shadow. J. E. Jeffrey; B..... 586
Love is enough. F. B. Young; B..... 642
Loving, Pierre; R..... 699
Lowell, Amy: a critical study. C. Wood; AN. 45
Lowes, John Livingston
Road to Xanadu; B..... 559
Lucian, satirist and artist. F. G. Allison; AN. 191
Lud-in-the-mist. H. Mirrlees; B..... 586
Ludovici, Anthony M.
Personal reminiscences of Auguste Rodin; B..... 17
Ludwig, Emil. E., and C. Paul, translators
Napoleon; B..... 238
Lynch, Bohun
History of caricature; B..... 644

M

MacDonald, William; R.....190, 719
MacLeish, Archibald
Happy marriage; B..... 185
Pot of earth; B..... 185
Streets in the Moon; B..... 185
Macy, John; R..... 148
Mahan, Bruce E.
Old fort Crawford and the frontier; AN. 241
Main currents in American thought. V. L. Parrington; B..... 560
Main currents in the history of American journalism. W. G. Bleyer; B..... 322
Main stream. S. Sherman; AN..... 702
Main street and Wall street. W. Z. Ripley; B 263
Man could stand up. F. M. Ford; AN..... 322
Manning, William R., selector
Diplomatic correspondence of the United States concerning the independence of the Latin-American nations; B..... 535
Människor jag mötte. A. Wall; AN..... 295
Mann, Thomas
Unordnung und frühes leid; AN..... 540
Mantle, Burns
Best plays of 1925-26; AN..... 404
Marco Millions. E. O'Neill; B..... 562
Marks, Percy
Which way Parnassus?; AN..... 349
Marlowe, Julia. C. E. Russell; AN..... 509
Marriage bed. E. Pascal; AN..... 650
Martin, Everett Dean
Meaning of a liberal education; B..... 123
Mason, Daniel Gregory; R.....44, 189
Masters, Edgar Lee
Lee: a dramatic poem; AN..... 45
Max Havelaar. Multatuli, W. Siebenhaar, translator; AN..... 650
McKinley, Arthur Patch, translator
Letters of a Roman gentleman. Selected from the correspondence of Cicero; AN. 45
Meaning of adult education. E. C. Lindeman; B..... 150
Meaning of a liberal education. E. D. Martin; B..... 123
Meier-Gräfe, Julius. J. Holroyd-Reece, translator
Spanish journey; B..... 673
Mencken, H. L.; R.....434, 533
Methodist saint. H. Asbury; AN..... 675
Migrations. E. Scott; B..... 505
Middleton, Scudder
Upper night; AN..... 458
Millay, Edna St. Vincent
King's henchman; B..... 263
Miller, E.
Types of mind and body; B..... 672
Mind of Rome. C. Bailey, J. Bell, and others; AN..... 192
Miniature. E. Phillpotts; B..... 586
Minor poems of Dante. L. De' Lucchi, translator; AN..... 192
Minutes of the Albany committee of correspondence, 1775-1778. Vol. II: Minutes of the Schenectady committee; AN..... 404
Mirrlees, Hope
Lud-in-the-mist; B..... 586
Mitchison, Naomi
Laburnum branch; AN..... 241
Modern traits in old Greek life. O. B. Gulick; AN..... 191
Mohr, Anton
Oil war; B..... 95
Monarch of the sky. A. Rutledge; AN..... 616
Monteverdi, his life and work. H. Prunières; B..... 189
Montmartre, past and present. J. Emile-Bayard; B..... 453
Moon, Parker Thomas
Imperialism and world politics; B..... 68
Morgan, Thomas Hunt
Theory of the gene; B..... 184
Morley, Christopher
Arrow; AN..... 675
Morley, F. V.
Tailor of Mount Holly: John Woolman; AN..... 45
River Thames; AN..... 192
Morley, Felix
Our far eastern assignment; B..... 480
Morley, John, early life and letters of. F. W. Hirst; B..... 442
Morning, noon and night. K. P. Britton; AN. 675
Morrill, Samuel
Lanterns, junks, and jade; AN..... 241
Morris, Lawrence S.; R..... 186
Morris, Lloyd; R..... 586
Morris, Lloyd
Rebellious puritan: portrait of Mr. Hawthorne; B..... 320
Mother knows best. E. Ferber; AN..... 675
Mr. Fortune's maggot. S. T. Warner; B.... 588
Mr. Gilhooley. L. O'Flaherty; AN..... 650
Mullin, Glen; R..... 644
Multatuli. W. Siebenhaar, translator
Max Havelaar; AN..... 650
Munch, Andreas
Norse mythology. Legends of gods and heroes; AN..... 458
Munro, Thomas; R.....17, 455
Murasaki, lady. A. Waley, translator
Wreath of cloud. Being the third part of the "Tale of Genji"; AN..... 458
Murray, Rosalind
Happy tree; B..... 586
Music from behind the moon. J. B. Cabell; B. 18
Mussey, H. R.; R..... 452
Must Britain travel the Moscow road? N. Angell; B..... 188
My adventures in the golden age of music. H. T. Finck; B..... 239
Myth of the individual. C. W. Wood; B..... 480

N

Napoleon and Marie Louise: The Fall of the Empire. Walter Geer; B..... 15
Napoleon. E. Ludwig. E. and C. Paul, translators; B..... 238
Nature of man. G. A. Dorsey; B..... 672
Nature of the world and man; B..... 44
Nearing, Scott
British general strike; B..... 188
Needed readjustments in rural life. University of Chicago press; B..... 18
Need for eugenic reform. L. Darwin; AN.. 457
Negro illegitimacy in New York city. R. Reed; AN..... 267
Neill, A. S.
Problem child; B..... 615
Nevins, Allan; R..... 266
Nevinson, Henry W.; R..... 180
New Balkans. H. F. Armstrong, A. C. Coolidge, introduction; B..... 266
New books in France. R. Lalou; B..... 532
New books in Germany. D. T.; B..... 531
New Grub street. G. Gissing; AN..... 192
New schools for older students. N. Peffer; B. 150
New universe. B. Brownell; B..... 321
Nicholson, Asenath. A. T. Sheppard, editor
Bible in Ireland; B..... 449
Niles, Abbe; R.....18, 647
Noffsinger, John S.
Correspondence schools, lyceums, Chautauquas; B..... 150
Nohl, Johannes, compiler, C. H. Clarke, translator
Black death. A chronicle of the plague; AN..... 192
Norse mythology. A. Munch; AN..... 458
Norton, Henry Kittredge
China and the powers; B..... 480

O

O'Brien, Edward J.; editor
Best short stories of 1926; AN..... 404
O'Brien, William
Parnell of real life; AN..... 509
Occupations for women. O. L. Hatcher, editor; B..... 347
Odell, George C. D.
Annals of the New York stage. Vols. I and II; B..... 718

O'Flaherty, Liam
Mr. Gilhooley; AN... 650
Oil. U. Sinclair; B... 643
Oil war. A. Mohr; B... 95
Old countess. A. D. Sedgwick; B... 376
Old fort Crawford and the frontier. B. E. Mahan; AN... 241
One crystal and a mother. E. DuP. Taylor; B. 346
O'Neill, Eugene
Marco millions; B... 562
Orphan angel. E. Wylie; B... 18
Orpheus, or the future of music. W. J. Turner; B... 239
Osgood, Henry O.
So this is jazz!; B... 348
Ostenso, Martha
Dark dawn; AN... 20
Our far eastern assignment. F. Morley; B.. 430
Oursler, Fulton
Step child of the Moon; AN... 96
Outline of history. H. G. Wells; AN... 192
Outline of marriage. F. Dell; B... 41
Outlook for American prose. J. W. Beach; AN 96
Owen, John
Giant of Oldborne; AN... 404
Oxford pocket dictionary. F. G. Fowler and H. W. Fowler; AN... 459

P

Palmer, John
Jennifer; B... 586
Paris. S. Dark, H. Rushbury, drawings; B... 453
Parker, Dorothy
Enough rope; AN... 589
Parnell of real life. W. O'Brien; AN... 509
Parrington, Vernon Louis
Main currents in American thought; B... 560
Parrish, Anne
Tomorrow morning; AN... 294
Parry, Hubert, his life and works. C. L. Graves; B... 44
Parsons, Alice Beal; R.....69, 214, 481, 673, 719
Party campaign funds. J. K. Pollock, Jr.; AN 404
Pascal, Ernest
Marriage bed; AN... 650
Paul, Eden and Cedar, translators
Napoleon; B... 238
Peabody, Robert E.
Log of the grand Turks; AN... 20
Peake, Arthur S., editor
Book and the people. Essays on the old Testament; AN... 125
Peattie, Donald Culross
Cargoes and harvests; AN... 349
Peck, W. E.
Shelley, his life and work; B... 612
Peffer, Nathaniel
New schools for older students; B... 150
People next door. G. Creel; AN... 509
Peterkin, Julia
Black April; AN... 649
Philippines. N. Roosevelt; AN... 378
Phillips, M., and W. S. Tomkinson
English women in life and letters; AN.. 458
Phillips, Mary E.
Edgar Allan Poe; B... 17
Phillpotts, Eden
Miniature; B... 586
Pheasant jungles. W. Beebe; AN... 458
Phythyon, Harry
Rock dust remedy; B... 797
Piaget, Jean
Language and thought of the child; B.... 123
Plutocrat. B. Tarkington; B... 186
Poe, Edgar Allan. M. E. Phillips; B... 17
Poincaré, Raymond, memoirs of. G. Arthur, translator; B... 671
Poland, F., E. Reisinger, and R. Wagner
Culture of ancient Greece and Rome; AN. 267
Political ideas of the English romanticists. C. Brinton; AN... 215
Pollock, James K.
Party campaign funds; AN... 404
Poorhouse Sweeney. E. Sweeney; B... 504
Pope of the sea. V. B. Ibáñez; AN... 675
Poppies and mandragora. E. and M. Saltus; AN... 192
Pot of earth. A. MacLeish; B... 185
Potamkin, Harry Alan; R...403, 721
Pound, Ezra, collected poems of; B... 120
Power. L. Feuchtwanger; B... 122
Powys, Llewelyn; R...183, 444
Practical book of learning decoration and furniture. E. S. Holloway; AN... 192
Prairie and the making of middle America. D. A. Dondore; B... 148
Prall, D. W.; R... 614
Preface to a life. Z. Gale; B... 69
Preliminaries of the American revolution as seen in the English press. F. J. Hinkhouse; AN... 510
Priestly, Herbert I., and M. Saenz
Some Mexican problems; B... 374
Primitives: poems and woodcuts. M. Weber; AN... 97
Problem child. A. S. Neill; B... 615
Prodigious lover. L. Barthou; B... 587
Pruette, Lorine
Saint in irony; B... 719
Pruette, Lorine; R...347, 698
Prunières, Henry
Monteverdi, his life and work; B... 189
Psychology of thought. H. L. Hollingworth; B... 240
Pueblo of Jemez. E. C. Parsons; B... 673
Pulse of progress. E. Huntington; B... 700
Putnam, Samuel, translator
Works of Aretino; B... 212
Putnam Weale, B. L.
Vanished empire; AN... 241

Q

Quaife, M. M.
Yellowstone Kelly: memoirs of Luther S. Kelly; AN... 216
Quaker adventure. A. R. Fry; B... 96

R

Radin, Paul, editor
Crashing Thunder, the autobiography of a Winnebago Indian; AN... 616
Ransom, John Crowe
Two gentlemen in bonds; B... 346
Rasmussen, Knud
Across Arctic America. Narrative of the fifth Thule expedition; AN... 458
Read 'em and weep. S. Spaeth; AN... 45
Realm of mind. F. J. E. Woodbridge; B... 187
Rebellious puritan. L. Morris; B... 320
Recent Spanish literature. E. Vivas; B... 530
Red love. A. Kollontai; B... 700
Redman, Ben Ray
Edwin Arlington Robinson; AN... 191
Reed, Ruth
Negro illegitimacy in New York city; AN. 267
Reisinger, E., F. Poland, and R. Wagner
Culture of ancient Greece and Rome; AN. 267
Religion and philosophy of the Veda and Upanishads. A. B. Keith; B... 506
Religion in the philosophy of William James, J. S. Bixler; AN... 124
Return of Don Quixote. G. K. Chesterton; AN. 649
Return of the native. T. Hardy; AN... 192
Returning to emotion. M. Bodenheim; AN.. 458
Reuter, Edward B.
American race problem, a study of the negro; B... 402
Revolt in the desert. T. E. Lawrence; B.... 374
Revolt of Asia. U. Close; B... 480
Revolt of Asia. U. Close; AN... 721
Rhapsody. A. Schnitzler. O. P. Shinnerer, translator; B... 456
Rhineland occupation. H. T. Allen; B... 534
Riesenberg, Felix
East side west side; B... 214
Riley, Woodbridge; R... 71
Riley, Woodbridge
From myth to reason; B... 588
Rimbaud, Jean-Arthur. J. M. Carré; B... 699
Ripley, William Z.
Main street and Wall street; B... 263
Rise of American civilization. C. A. and M. R. Beard; B... 559
Rittenberg, Louis; translator, E. Balint
Alpha; B... 321
River Thames. F. V. Morley; AN... 192
Rivoira, G. T.
Roman architecture; AN... 702
Road round Ireland. P. Colum; B... 41
Road to Xanadu. J. L. Lowes; B... 559
Robertson, William Spence; R... 535
Robinson, Edwin Arlington. B. R. Redman; AN... 191
Robinson, Edwin Arlington
Tristram; B... 586
Rock dust remedy. H. Phythyon; B... 797
Rodin, Auguste, personal reminiscences of. A. M. Ludovici; B... 17
Rogers, Lindsay
American senate; B... 190
Roman architecture. G. T. Rivoira; AN... 702
Roman summer. L. Lewisohn; B... 646
Roosevelt, Nicholas
Philippines: a treasure and a problem; AN 378
Rorty, James
Children of the sun and other poems; B.. 16
Ros, Mrs. Amanda M'Kittrick
Irene Iddesleigh; AN... 650
Ross, Mary; R...346, 378, 613
Rouff, Curnosky and Marcel
Epicure's guide to France. Volume I. Paris, the environs of Paris, Normandy; B... 453
Rourke, Constance Mayfield
Trumpets of jubilee; AN... 675
Royde-Smith, Naomi
Skin-deep; B... 586
Rundt, Arthur
Amerika ist anders; AN... 538
Rural sociology. C. C. Taylor; AN... 125
Rushbury, Henry, drawings, S. Dark
Paris; B... 453
Russell, Charles Edward
Julia Marlowe: her life and art; AN.... 509
Russell, Phillips
Benjamin Franklin, the first civilized American; AN... 71
Rutledge, Archibald
Monarch of the sky; AN... 616

S

Sadleir, Michael
Anthony Trollope: A commentary; B.... 375
Saenz, Moises, and H. I. Priestly
Some Mexican problems; B... 374
Saint in irony. L. Pruette; B... 719
Saltus, Edgar and Marie
Poppies and mandragora; AN... 192
Salzman, L. F.
English life in the middle ages; B... 645
Samuel, Maurice
I, the Jew; AN... 701
Sapin, Ruth; R... 456
Schapiro, J. Salwyn; R...377, 480
Scheffauer, Herman George; translator, Klabund
Brackie the fool; AN... 650
Schiller, F. C. S., introduction to, E. H. Goddard and P. A. Gibbons
Civilization or civilizations. An essay on the Spenglerian philosophy of history; AN... 241
Schinnerer, Otto P., translator
Rhapsody; B... 456
Schnitzler, Arthur. O. P. Schinnerer, translator
Rhapsody; B... 456
Schuyler, R. L.; R... 213
Science of society. W. G. Sumner and A. G. Keller; B... 698
Science of today. O. Lodge; B... 672
Scott, Evelyn
Migrations; B... 505
Sedgwick, Anne Douglas
Old countess; B... 376
Seitz, Don C.
Horace Greeley; B... 16
Selections, collections, series, and reprints, AN. 459
Selections, collections, series, and reprints; AN. 702
Serajevo. R. W. Seton-Watson; B... 180
Sergeant, Elizabeth Shepley
Fire under the Andes; B... 345
Seton-Watson, R. W.
Serajevo: a study in the origins of the great war; B... 180
7 P. M. and other poems. M. Van Doren; B. 482
Shadows waiting. E. C. Chilton; AN... 323
Shelley, his life and work. W. E. Peck; B.... 612
Sheppard, Alfred Tresidder, editor
Bible in Ireland; B... 449
Sheppard, J. T.
Aeschylus and Sophocles, their life and work; AN... 191
Sherman, Stuart
Main stream; AN... 702
Shipley, Maynard; R... 701
Short outline of comparative psychology. C. J. Warden; B... 672
Siebenhaar, W., translator
Max Havelaar; AN... 650
Siegfried, André
America comes of age; a French analysis; B... 533
Sinclair, May
Allinghams; B... 613
Sinclair, Upton
Oil; B... 643
Singing crow and other poems. N. Crane; AN. 97
Sitwell, Sacheverell
All summer in a day. An autobiographical fantasia; B... 265
Skin-deep. N. Royde-Smith; B... 586
Smertenko, Johan; R...375, 586, 643, 720
Smith, Pauline
Beadle; AN... 649
Smith, Reed
Gullah; AN... 589
Smuts, J. C.
Holism and evolution; B... 614
Snider, Charles Lee; R... 588
Social progress. U. G. Weatherly; AN... 349
Soddy, Frederick
Wealth, virtual wealth, and debt; B... 120
Sœurs de grands hommes. V. Giraud; AN.... 538
Some Mexican problems. M. Saenz and H. I. Priestly; B... 374
So this is jazz! H. O. Osgood; B... 348
Spaeth, Sigmund
Read 'em and weep. The songs you forgot to remember; AN... 45
Spanish journey. J. Meier-Gräfe, J. Holroyd-Reece, translator; B... 673
Spell land. S. Kaye-Smith; AN... 294
Spender, J. A.
Changing east; B... 345
Spenser. E. Legouis; AN... 192
Spiller, Robert E.
American in England during the first half century of independence; B... 266
Springboard. R. Wolf; B... 720
Stackpole, E. J.
Behind the scenes with a newspaperman; AN... 674
Stegemann, Hermann
Struggle for the Rhine; B... 534
Step child of the Moon. F. Oursler; AN.... 96
Sterling, George
Robinson Jeffers: the man and the artist; AN... 192
Stolberg, Benjamin; R...292, 504
Stories and dramas. L. N. Tolstoy, Mrs. L. Turin, Mrs. H. M. Lucas, and C. J. Hogarth, translators; AN... 45
Story of the inns of court. Sir D. P. Barton, C. Benham, and F. Watt; AN... 45
Stream of life. J. S. Huxley; B... 672
Strecker, Karl, editor
Carmina Cantabrigiensia; AN... 540
Streets in the Moon. A. MacLeish; B... 185
Strindberg, E. Hedén; B... 508
Struggle for the Rhine. H. Stegemann. G. Chatterton-Hill, translator; B... 534
Stuart, Henry Longan, translator
Sutter's gold; AN... 295
Sublime boy. W. de Casseres; AN... 124
Sullivan, Frank
Life and times of Martha Hepplethwaite; AN... 45

Sullivan, J. W. N.
Aspects of science, second series; AN.... 483
Summers, Montague
History of witchcraft and demonology; B. 43
Sumner, William Graham, and A. G. Keller
Science of society; B..... 698
Sutter's gold. B. Cendrars. H. L. Stuart, translator; AN..... 295
Sweeney, Ed.
Poorhouse Sweeney: life in a country poorhouse; B..... 504

T

T., D.
New books in Germany; B..... 531
Tardieu, André
France and America. Some experiences in cooperation; B..... 718
Tar. S. Anderson; B..... 121
Tarkington, Booth
Plutocrat; B..... 186
Tate, Allen; R.....185, 346, 482
Taylor, Carl C.
Rural sociology; AN..... 125
Taylor, Ellen DuPois
One crystal and a mother; B..... 346
Theater of George Jean Nathan. I. Goldberg; AN..... 510
Theatrical October. Various authors. Book I. Leningrad and Moscow; B..... 535
Theory of the gene. T. H. Morgan; B..... 184
Thibaults. R. M. du Gard. M. Boyd, translator; B..... 183
Thiers and the French monarchy. J. M. Allison; B..... 150
Thinking about thinking. C. J. Keyser; B.. 240
Third British Empire. A. Zimmern; B..... 377
Thirty years of modern history. W. K. Wallace; B..... 184
Thomas, Edward; R..... 96
Thorndike, Lynn; R..... 43
Thrasher, Frederic M.
Gang. A study of 1313 gangs in Chicago; AN..... 192
Three plays. E. St. V. Millay; AN..... 192
Tolstoy, Leo N.
Stories and dramas; AN..... 45
Tomkinson, W. S., and M. Phillips
English women in life and letters; AN. 458
Tomorrow morning. A. Parrish; AN..... 294
Tom-Tom. J. W. Vandercook; AN..... 349
Toynbee, Arnold J., and K. P. Kirkwood
Turkey; B..... 614
Tristram. E. A. Robinson; B..... 586
Trollope, Anthony. M. Sadleir; B..... 375
Transformations. R. Fry; B..... 455
Trumpets of jubilee. C. M. Rourke; AN.... 675
Truth about publishing. S. Unwin; B..... 319
Tsanoff, Radoslav A.; R..... 294
Tupper, Frederick; R.....240, 645, 720
Turgenev. A. Yarmolinsky; B..... 19
Turkey. A. J. Toynbee and K. P. Kirkwood; B..... 614
Turlington, Edgar; R..... 614
Turner, W. J.
Orpheus, or the future of music; B..... 239
Twelve modern apostles and their creeds; B.. 42
Two gentlemen in bonds. J. C. Ransom; B.. 346
Two sisters. H. E. Bates; AN..... 151
Types of mind and body. E. Miller; B..... 672

U

Unamuno, Miguel de
L'agonie du christianisme; B..... 481
Undset, Sigrid. C. Archer, translator
Cross; AN..... 649
University afield; A. L. Hall-Quest; E..... 150
University of Chicago press
Needed readjustments in rural life; B.... 18
Unordnung und frühes leid. T. Mann; AN.. 540
Unwin, Stanley
Truth about publishing; B..... 319
Upper night. S. Middleton; AN..... 458
Upstream. L. Lewisohn; AN..... 192

V

Vandercook, John W.
Tom-Tom; AN..... 349
Van Doren, Mark
7 P. M. and other poems; B..... 482
Van Doren, Mark; R....16, 41, 68, 93, 120, 148, 180, 212, 263, 291, 319, 345, 374, 401, 440, 504, 559
Vanished empire. B. L. Putnam Weale; AN. 241
Van Vorst, B.
Girl from China (Soumay Tcheng); AN.. 241
Vasconcelos, José, and M. Gamio
Aspects of Mexican civilization; B..... 374
Villa U. S. A. O. Flake; AN..... 538
Villard, Henry S.; R..... 293
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R..... 322
Vivas, Eliseo
Recent Spanish literature; B..... 530
Vivas, Eliseo; R..... 481
Voltaire, the young. C. B. Chase; B..... 122
Volwider, Albert T.
George Croghan and the western movement; B..... 182

W

Wagner, R., F. Poland, and E. Reisinger
Culture of ancient Greece and Rome; AN. 267
Wall, Annie
Människor jag mötte; AN..... 295
Wallace, William Kay
Thirty years of modern history; B..... 184
Walpurgis. J. Frankenberger; AN..... 538
Wang, Tsi C.
Youth movement in China; B..... 265
Warden, C. J.
Short outline of comparative psychology; B..... 672
Ward, Henshaw
Exploring the universe; B..... 642
Warner, Arthur; R.....70, 453
Warner, Langdon
Long old road in China; AN..... 241
Warner, Sylvia Townsend
Mr. Fortune's maggot; B..... 588
Warren, Louis A.
Lincoln's parentage and childhood; AN.. 350
Wassermann, Jacob
Der Aufruhr um den junker Ernst; AN.. 540
Wassermann, Jacob. L. Lewisohn, translator
Wedlock; B..... 94
Watt, Francis, Sir D. P. Barton, and C. Benham
Story of the inns of court; AN..... 45
Waxman, Samuel Montefiore
Antoine and the théâtre-libre; B..... 293
Wealth, virtual wealth, and debt. F. Soddy; B 120
Weatherly, Ulysses G.
Social progress; AN..... 349
Weber, Max
Primitives; poems and woodcuts; AN..... 97
Wedlock. J. Wassermann. L. Lewisohn, translator; B..... 94
What and why in China. P. Hutchinson; AN 721
Wheless, Joseph
Is it God s word; AN..... 616
Which way Parnassus? P. Marks; AN..... 349
White buildings: poems by Hart Crane; B.... 120
White, William Allen; R..... 16
Why religion? H. M. Kallen; B..... 448
Wild goslings. W. R. Benét; AN..... 458
Williams, E. T.
China: yesterday and today; AN..... 721
Williams, James Mickel
Expansion of rural life; B..... 18
Willobie his avisa. G. B. Harrison, editor; AN 510
Willoughby, Westel W.
Foreign rights and interests in China; AN 721
Wilson, Romer
Latterday symphony; B..... 378
Wimsatt, Genevieve
Griffin in China; AN..... 241
Wives of Henry the eighth. M. Hume; AN.. 267
Wolf, Robert
Springboard; B..... 720
Wolfe, Humbert
Humoresque; AN..... 192
Woodbridge, F. J. E.
Realm of mind; B..... 187
Wood, Charles W.
Myth of the individual; B..... 480
Wood, Clement
Amy Lowell: a critical study; AN..... 45
Woodward, Helen; R..... 215
Woolman, John: the tailor of Mount Holly. F. V. Morley; AN..... 45
Workman, Herbert B.
John Wyclif: a study of the medieval church; B..... 454
World crisis. W. S. Churchill; B..... 613
Wreath of cloud. Lady Murasaki. A. Waley, translator; AN..... 458
Wright, Richardson
Hawkers and walkers in early America; AN..... 702
Wyclif, John. H. B. Workman; B..... 454
Wylie, Elinor
Orphan angel; B..... 18

Y

Yankee whaler. C. W. Ashley; B..... 70
Yarmolinsky, Avrahm
Turgenev. The man, his art, and his age; B..... 19
Yarns from a windjammer. M. Crane; AN.. 20
Year among the Persians. E. G. Browne; AN 192
Yeats, William Butler
Autobiographies; B..... 291
Yerney's justice. I. Cankar; AN..... 509
Young, Francis Brett
Love is enough; B..... 642
Youth movement in China. T. C. Wang; B. 265

Z

Zimmern, Alfred
Third British Empire; B..... 377

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1927 No. 3209

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1
EDITORIALS:
The Nation's Honor Role for 1926 4
Carmi Thompson's Compromise 5
The Panama Treaty 6
Culture—How to Avoid It 6
ON THE RIVIERA. By Hendrik van Loon 7
THE VIRTUE OF SHAKING HANDS. By Frances Parkinson Keyes 8
TWELVE GOOD MEN AND TRUE. By Paul Y. Anderson 9
A DEFLATED REBEL. Anonymous 11
EGYPT. By Louise Townsend Nicholl 12
KANSAS COLLEGE HAS ITS FLING. By Harbor Allen 13
GOOD OLD BILL VARE. By Frank R. Kent 14
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 14
CORRESPONDENCE 15
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Praise of Diana. By Gladys Oaks 16
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 16
Editor-Politician. By William Allen White 16
Poe Again. By Joseph Wood Krutch 17
Rodin and Modern Art. By Thomas Munro 17
Feats of Fancy. By Abbe Niles 18
The Farmer Today. By Nelson Antrim Crawford 18
The Russian Hamlet. By Dorothy Brewster 19
Books in Brief 20
Interesting Books of 1926. Chosen by Mark Van Doren 20
Drama: Another Captive. By Joseph Wood Krutch 20
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Whose Land—Whose Rubber? By Vicente G. Bunuan 22
The Cost of the British Coal Strike 23

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

WE ARE AT WAR in Nicaragua. It is nonsense to call our intervention a step for "protection of American lives and property." It is war—unauthorized by Congress, unjustified by any principle of international law or custom, unknown to the American people—and a low-down, bullying kind of war. "President" Diaz, the ex-secretary of an American mining corporation, could not hold office by himself. Our State Department recognized him; our marines guarded the ports for him; Americans collected the customs for him; American fliers in American airplanes chased his enemies for him; Washington denounced his opponent, the constitutional President, Sacasa, as a Mexican-aided Bolshevik. Still Diaz tottered. His chief aide, Chamorro, deserted the sinking ship. Finally Admiral Latimer landed marines at Sacasa's capital, Puerto Cabazas; declared the city and all the country about it a neutral zone; ordered Sacasa, his ministers and army, to disarm or get out; instructed the American mahogany companies to pay tariff dues to Diaz agents rather than to the Sacasa men who held the town. To prove his "neutrality" he announced that he would also disarm any Diaz soldiers who tried to return to the city from which they had been driven. Neutrality? Protection? It is imperialism of the most brazen cast.

TIMES CHANGE. Nine years ago—five years ago—even two years ago, either the discoveries lately made of secret German-Russian arms traffic, or the palpable distortion of justice by a French military court in the Rhineland, would have caused a howl of recrimination on both sides of the Rhine. The German Ministry of Defense since 1921 has been subsidizing a German armament firm to maintain near Moscow a factory at which military airplanes have been produced for both Germany and Russia; the eastern German fortresses have secretly been strengthened, and secret arms consignments have entered Germany from Russia. Poincaré—the same old Poincaré—is in power in Paris. Does he preach hate every Sunday? Does he threaten another Ruhr invasion? Does he yell and scream, as of old, that Germany must be kicked into reform? He does not. Time, the great teacher, has taught him something. And the result is that Germany is voluntarily reforming her Reichswehr. Meanwhile Lieutenant Rouzier, the French officer who in September killed one German and wounded two others in a drunken brawl in the occupied territory, has been acquitted and six of the Germans with whom he fought, including the men he wounded, sentenced to short terms in prison. Courts martial seem to be impartially and internationally stupid; French courts in the Rhineland behave precisely as German courts did in Alsace before the war. The Germans, of course, protested, but with a new note, and in 1926 French liberal opinion forced an almost immediate revision of this outrageous sentence.

GREAT BRITAIN HAS TURNED a flying somersault in its Chinese policy and come out for virtual recognition of the Canton Government and admission of China's right to levy customs taxes in excess of the treaty rates. Our own State Department, which has sat quietly on a shelf, doing nothing but admire its own benevolent intentions, must be wondering what kind of earthquake has hit Downing Street. The Chinese know the answer very well: It is the economic boycott. For sixteen months Canton boycotted British goods in South China, nearly ruining British Hongkong; now, with the Cantonese occupying the Yangtze valley, the British face a possible extension of this devastating policy of economic starvation. In the old days—not so very long ago—the white men in the East had a conviction that the Oriental understood nothing except force. The Chinese, cannier, have a conviction of their own: that the Occidental understands nothing except money; the place to hit him is in the pocketbook. This is the second great revolution in foreign policy which China has achieved. Japan, since the Washington Conference, has adopted, at least in her public actions, the role of a friend of the new China. Now Great Britain is following suit. America's trade ranks third in China, behind Japan's and England's; apparently our diplomacy also ranks a poor third.

HIROHITO, MOUNTING THE THRONE, will be the first Emperor of Japan who has donned trousers and visited Europe. And, accordingly, his reign is likely to mark a recession in that Mikado-worship which is one of the many anachronisms of modern Japan. Faith shatters on

Sullivan, J. W. N.
Aspects of science, second series; AN.... 483
Summers, Montague
History of witchcraft and demonology; B. 43
Sumner, William Graham, and A. G. Keller
Science of society; B..... 698
Sutter's gold. B. Cendrars. H. L. Stuart, translator; AN..... 295
Sweeney, Ed.
Poorhouse Sweeney: life in a country poorhouse; B..... 504

T

T., D.
New books in Germany; B..... 531
Tardieu, André
France and America. Some experiences in cooperation; B..... 718
Tar. S. Anderson; B..... 121
Tarkington, Booth
Plutocrat; B..... 186
Tate, Allen; R.....185, 346, 482
Taylor, Carl C.
Rural sociology; AN..... 125
Taylor, Ellen DuPois
One crystal and a mother; B..... 346
Theater of George Jean Nathan. I. Goldberg; AN..... 510
Theatrical October. Various authors. Book I. Leningrad and Moscow; B..... 535
Theory of the gene. T. H. Morgan; B..... 184
Thibaults. R. M. du Gard. M. Boyd, translator; B..... 183
Thiers and the French monarchy. J. M. Allison; B..... 150
Thinking about thinking. C. J. Keyser; B.. 240
Third British Empire. A. Zimmern; B..... 377
Thirty years of modern history. W. K. Wallace; B..... 184
Thomas, Edward; R..... 96
Thorndike, Lynn; R..... 43
Thrasher, Frederic M.
Gang. A study of 1313 gangs in Chicago; AN..... 192
Three plays. E. St. V. Millay; AN..... 192
Tolstoy, Leo N.
Stories and dramas; AN..... 45
Tomkinson, W. S., and M. Phillips
English women in life and letters; AN. 458
Tomorrow morning. A. Parrish; AN..... 294
Tom-Tom. J. W. Vandercook; AN..... 349
Toynbee, Arnold J., and K. P. Kirkwood
Turkey; B..... 614
Tristram. E. A. Robinson; B..... 586
Trollope, Anthony. M. Sadleir; B..... 375
Transformations. R. Fry; B..... 455
Trumpets of jubilee. C. M. Rourke; AN.... 675
Truth about publishing. S. Unwin; B..... 319
Tsanoff, Radoslav A.; R..... 294
Tupper, Frederick; R.....240, 645, 720
Turgenev. A. Yarmolinsky; B..... 19
Turkey. A. J. Toynbee and K. P. Kirkwood; B..... 614
Turlington, Edgar; R..... 614
Turner, W. J.
Orpheus, or the future of music; B..... 239
Twelve modern apostles and their creeds; B.. 42
Two gentlemen in bonds. J. C. Ransom; B.. 346
Two sisters. H. E. Bates; AN..... 151
Types of mind and body. E. Miller; B..... 672

U

Unamuno, Miguel de
L'agonie du christianisme; B..... 481
Undset, Sigrid. C. Archer, translator
Cross; AN..... 649
University afield; A. L. Hall-Quest; E..... 150
University of Chicago press
Needed readjustments in rural life; B.... 18
Unordnung und frühes leid. T. Mann; AN.. 540
Unwin, Stanley
Truth about publishing; B..... 319
Upper night. S. Middleton; AN..... 458
Upstream. L. Lewisohn; AN..... 192

V

Vandercook, John W.
Tom-Tom; AN..... 349
Van Doren, Mark
7 P. M. and other poems; B..... 482
Van Doren, Mark; R....16, 41, 68, 93, 120, 148, 180, 212, 263, 291, 319, 345, 374, 401, 440, 504, 559
Vanished empire. B. L. Putnam Weale; AN. 241
Van Vorst, B.
Girl from China (Soumay Tcheng); AN.. 241
Vasconcelos, José, and M. Gamio
Aspects of Mexican civilization; B..... 374
Villa U. S. A. O. Flake; AN..... 538
Villard, Henry S.; R..... 293
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R..... 322
Vivas, Eliseo
Recent Spanish literature; B..... 530
Vivas, Eliseo; R..... 481
Voltaire, the young. C. B. Chase; B..... 122
Volwider, Albert T.
George Croghan and the western movement; B..... 182

W

Wagner, R., F. Poland, and E. Reisinger
Culture of ancient Greece and Rome; AN. 267
Wall, Annie
Människor jag mötte; AN..... 295
Wallace, William Kay
Thirty years of modern history; B..... 184
Walpurgis. J. Frankenberger; AN..... 538
Wang, Tsi C.
Youth movement in China; B..... 265
Warden, C. J.
Short outline of comparative psychology; B..... 672
Ward, Henshaw
Exploring the universe; B..... 642
Warner, Arthur; R.....70, 453
Warner, Langdon
Long old road in China; AN..... 241
Warner, Sylvia Townsend
Mr. Fortune's maggot; B..... 588
Warren, Louis A.
Lincoln's parentage and childhood; AN.. 350
Wassermann, Jacob
Der Aufruhr um den junker Ernst; AN.. 540
Wassermann, Jacob. L. Lewisohn, translator
Wedlock; B..... 94
Watt, Francis, Sir D. P. Barton, and C. Benham
Story of the inns of court; AN..... 45
Waxman. Samuel Montefiore
Antoine and the théâtre-libre; B..... 293
Wealth, virtual wealth, and debt. F. Soddy; B 120
Weatherly, Ulysses G.
Social progress; AN..... 349
Weber, Max
Primitives; poems and woodcuts; AN..... 97
Wedlock. J. Wassermann. L. Lewisohn, translator; B..... 94
What and why in China. P. Hutchinson; AN 721
Wheless, Joseph
Is it God s word; AN..... 616
Which way Parnassus? P. Marks; AN..... 349
White buildings: poems by Hart Crane; B.... 120
White, William Allen; R..... 16
Why religion? H. M. Kallen; B..... 448
Wild goslings. W. R. Benét; AN..... 458
Williams, E. T.
China: yesterday and today; AN..... 721
Williams, James Mickel
Expansion of rural life; B..... 18
Willobie his avisa. G. B. Harrison, editor; AN 510
Willoughby, Westel W.
Foreign rights and interests in China; AN 721
Wilson, Romer
Latterday symphony; B..... 378
Wimsatt, Genevieve
Griffin in China; AN..... 241
Wives of Henry the eighth. M. Hume; AN.. 267
Wolf, Robert
Springboard; B..... 720
Wolfe, Humbert
Humoresque; AN..... 192
Woodbridge, F. J. E.
Realm of mind; B..... 187
Wood, Charles W.
Myth of the individual; B..... 480
Wood, Clement
Amy Lowell: a critical study; AN..... 45
Woodward, Helen; R..... 215
Woolman, John: the tailor of Mount Holly. F. V. Morley; AN..... 45
Workman, Herbert B.
John Wyclif: a study of the medieval church; B..... 454
World crisis. W. S. Churchill; B..... 613
Wreath of cloud. Lady Murasaki. A. Waley, translator; AN..... 458
Wright, Richardson
Hawkers and walkers in early America; AN..... 702
Wyclif, John. H. B. Workman; B..... 454
Wylie, Elinor
Orphan angel; B..... 18

Y

Yankee whaler. C. W. Ashley; B..... 70
Yarmolinsky, Avrahm
Turgenev. The man, his art, and his age; B..... 19
Yarns from a windjammer. M. Crane, AN.. 20
Year among the Persians. E. G. Browne; AN 192
Yeats, William Butler
Autobiographies; B..... 291
Yerney's justice. I. Cankar; AN..... 509
Young, Francis Brett
Love is enough; B..... 642
Youth movement in China. T. C. Wang; B. 265

Z

Zimmern, Alfred
Third British Empire; B..... 377

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1927 No. 3209

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1
EDITORIALS:
The Nation's Honor Role for 1926 4
Carmi Thompson's Compromise 5
The Panama Treaty 6
Culture—How to Avoid It 6
ON THE RIVIERA. By Hendrik van Loon 7
THE VIRTUE OF SHAKING HANDS. By Frances Parkinson Keyes 8
TWELVE GOOD MEN AND TRUE. By Paul Y. Anderson 9
A DEFLATED REBEL. Anonymous 11
EGYPT. By Louise Townsend Nicholl 12
KANSAS COLLEGE HAS ITS FLING. By Harbor Allen 13
GOOD OLD BILL VARE. By Frank R. Kent 14
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 14
CORRESPONDENCE 15
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Praise of Diana. By Gladys Oaks 16
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 16
Editor-Politician. By William Allen White 16
Poe Again. By Joseph Wood Krutch 17
Rodin and Modern Art. By Thomas Munro 17
Feats of Fancy. By Abbe Niles 18
The Farmer Today. By Nelson Antrim Crawford 18
The Russian Hamlet. By Dorothy Brewster 19
Books in Brief 20
Interesting Books of 1926. Chosen by Mark Van Doren 20
Drama: Another Captive. By Joseph Wood Krutch 20
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Whose Land—Whose Rubber? By Vicente G. Bunuan 22
The Cost of the British Coal Strike 23

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

WE ARE AT WAR in Nicaragua. It is nonsense to call our intervention a step for "protection of American lives and property." It is war—unauthorized by Congress, unjustified by any principle of international law or custom, unknown to the American people—and a low-down, bullying kind of war. "President" Diaz, the ex-secretary of an American mining corporation, could not hold office by himself. Our State Department recognized him; our marines guarded the ports for him; Americans collected the customs for him; American fliers in American airplanes chased his enemies for him; Washington denounced his opponent, the constitutional President, Sacasa, as a Mexican-aided Bolshevik. Still Diaz tottered. His chief aide, Chamorro, deserted the sinking ship. Finally Admiral Latimer landed marines at Sacasa's capital, Puerto Cabazas; declared the city and all the country about it a neutral zone; ordered Sacasa, his ministers and army, to disarm or get out; instructed the American mahogany companies to pay tariff dues to Diaz agents rather than to the Sacasa men who held the town. To prove his "neutrality" he announced that he would also disarm any Diaz soldiers who tried to return to the city from which they had been driven. Neutrality? Protection? It is imperialism of the most brazen cast.

TIMES CHANGE. Nine years ago—five years ago—even two years ago, either the discoveries lately made of secret German-Russian arms traffic, or the palpable distortion of justice by a French military court in the Rhineland, would have caused a howl of recrimination on both sides of the Rhine. The German Ministry of Defense since 1921 has been subsidizing a German armament firm to maintain near Moscow a factory at which military airplanes have been produced for both Germany and Russia; the eastern German fortresses have secretly been strengthened, and secret arms consignments have entered Germany from Russia. Poincaré—the same old Poincaré—is in power in Paris. Does he preach hate every Sunday? Does he threaten another Ruhr invasion? Does he yell and scream, as of old, that Germany must be kicked into reform? He does not. Time, the great teacher, has taught him something. And the result is that Germany is voluntarily reforming her Reichswehr. Meanwhile Lieutenant Rouzier, the French officer who in September killed one German and wounded two others in a drunken brawl in the occupied territory, has been acquitted and six of the Germans with whom he fought, including the men he wounded, sentenced to short terms in prison. Courts martial seem to be impartially and internationally stupid; French courts in the Rhineland behave precisely as German courts did in Alsace before the war. The Germans, of course, protested, but with a new note, and in 1926 French liberal opinion forced an almost immediate revision of this outrageous sentence.

GREAT BRITAIN HAS TURNED a flying somersault in its Chinese policy and come out for virtual recognition of the Canton Government and admission of China's right to levy customs taxes in excess of the treaty rates. Our own State Department, which has sat quietly on a shelf, doing nothing but admire its own benevolent intentions, must be wondering what kind of earthquake has hit Downing Street. The Chinese know the answer very well: It is the economic boycott. For sixteen months Canton boycotted British goods in South China, nearly ruining British Hongkong; now, with the Cantonese occupying the Yangtze valley, the British face a possible extension of this devastating policy of economic starvation. In the old days—not so very long ago—the white men in the East had a conviction that the Oriental understood nothing except force. The Chinese, cannier, have a conviction of their own: that the Occidental understands nothing except money; the place to hit him is in the pocketbook. This is the second great revolution in foreign policy which China has achieved. Japan, since the Washington Conference, has adopted, at least in her public actions, the role of a friend of the new China. Now Great Britain is following suit. America's trade ranks third in China, behind Japan's and England's; apparently our diplomacy also ranks a poor third.

HIROHITO, MOUNTING THE THRONE, will be the first Emperor of Japan who has donned trousers and visited Europe. And, accordingly, his reign is likely to mark a recession in that Mikado-worship which is one of the many anachronisms of modern Japan. Faith shatters on trifles; it is difficult to worship a god who plays golf and talks with common people. Yet the decay in emperor-worship may be the smallest problem of Hirohito's reign, for Japan is a synthetic nation come of age, ready to burst out of the test tubes of its political chemists. Surely there is no other record in history of a nation so consciously molded into modernity by a group of statesmen aware of their colossal function. The Mikado was restored to power in 1867; Japan's constitution dates only from 1889 and today she has universal manhood suffrage; in one generation her population has doubled and illiteracy been virtually wiped out. Within a quarter century she has developed newspaper circulations vaster than any in America, and built, beginning with a fleet of sailing junks, one of the great merchant marines of the world. The whole process has been planned and executed by a group of Elder Statesmen, one of whom, Marquis Saionji, can today, at the age of 88, clearly recall the days when Japan first opened her locked ports to the West. But Marquis Saionji is a survival and has no successor; the emperor-worship which the Elder Statesmen developed as a counterbalance to the modern influences is losing its magic; universal suffrage is yet to be tried in practice; and industrial feudalism and peasant tenantry mock the dreams of the founders.

THE POPE, apparently the only person in Italy at odds with Mussolini who dares to say so, has once more earned the gratitude of anti-Fascists wherever they may be. In a recent allocation issued from the Vatican, His Holiness expressed himself as displeased by the violences to which Fascism has resorted and in thorough disagreement with the Fascist ideal of the state as the supremely important organization: "Everything in the state, everything from the state, nothing outside the state." The church, from being in the position of first importance, has reluctantly consented to a position of equality with the state; it is, of course, not surprising that the head of the church should resent any further encroachment on this power. However, more important than either of these, are Pope Pius's fears for the secularization of the youth of Italy by means of the Balilla, an organization of boys from eight to eighteen years old, which prepares them for entrance into the Fascist militia. The young lambs are the shepherd's most precious wards—whether the shepherd be pope or minister, a fact of which Mussolini is well aware. He, in turn, is in opposition to the Catholic Pioneers, a sort of boy-scout organization, and to similar groups, because they are international in feeling.

OSWALD MOSLEY'S ELECTION as the Labor M. P. from Smethwick is another triumph for that sort of fairness which we think of as being peculiarly British. The son of a baroness, his wife the daughter of a marquess, both rich, both reared in the aristocratic tradition, Mr. Mosley, without even troubling to take off his fur coat or leave his limousine at home, was able to convince 16,000 hard-headed working men and women, among them members of the Communist Party, that he could represent them in Parliament. The returns, after a campaign of violent heckling on both sides, showed a plurality of some 7,000 votes for Labor, an increase of 1,500 over the last election; with only 2,000 votes the Liberal candidate ran a bad third. Thus the trend toward the Labor Party in the by-elections continues; it will only be a question of time before another Labor Government has its chance. When that time comes a member of Parliament probably will not be fined, as David Kirkwood recently was, £25 and costs for saying, in a speech about the coal strike, that "If I had to choose between enslaving the miners and flooding the pits I would not only flood them but destroy them." Three constables on whose testimony alone the conviction was made disagreed on the exact wording of the dangerous sentiments, even adding certain Anglo-Saxon words which Mr. Kirkwood says he uses neither in public nor private. "Two of the constables wrote their notes underneath their coats at the back of the meeting; this was the first time they had tried to report a meeting, while another heard what I said from a hidden place outside the hall"—so runs Mr. Kirkwood's statement in the Glasgow Forward. This sort of super-deftness and clairvoyance is a new wrinkle in the detection of bolshevism; our own secret service may profit by it.

WE ARE TO BE SANDBAGGED into buying a sandbar, it appears, at the present session of Congress. The means is suited to the end, and with the present Congress a few grains of sand on the head seem to be sufficient to guarantee the purchase of acres of it on the hoof. The effort, unsuccessfully made for the past two years, to incorporate in the rivers and harbors bill an appropriation of $11,500,000 for the purchase by the federal government of the Cape Cod canal has this winter carried such a provision through the Senate by a vote of 47 to 28. The rivers and harbors bill, previously passed by the House, now goes to conference, but the Washington correspondents predict that it will eventually go to the President—and of course be signed by him—with the appropriation intact for relieving the heirs and friends of the late August Belmont of the losses to which he subjected them through his financial fiasco at Cape Cod. For, baldly stated, that is the purpose of the appropriation—that and to discredit public ownership by debiting it with another undertaking which cannot possibly be operated without making up large annual losses through taxation. The Nation told the story of this white elephant of Wall Street in its issue of January 7, 1925, and has reverted to it since. Hitherto public opposition has been sufficient, supported by a few good men in Congress, to forestall the grab, but this year we find even a supposedly progressive and independent Democratic Senator such as David I. Walsh of Massachusetts voting in favor of the appropriation.

POSSIBLY THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT ought to take over the Cape Cod canal and operate it, even at a heavy annual expense, as part of the coastal waterways system. It is a useful, though far from a necessary, waterway; the tonnage passing through it has not amounted to a tenth of that predicted when the ditch—it is nothing more than an inverted sand dune—was opened to traffic in 1914, after an expenditure of about $10,000,000. The benefits so far have been mostly to a single corporation, the Eastern Steamship Company, which has paid two-thirds of the annual tolls for a passenger service through the canal. But, if purchased by the nation, one-half the sum provided in the rivers and harbors bill would be generous. Senator Howell of Nebraska tried to fix an amount in that neighborhood, but was outvoted. A price of $6,000,000 would pay the interest on the bond issue, which is the utmost the investors are entitled to ask, the operating profits having fallen well below the sum necessary for that purpose. It should be borne in mind, too, that if taken over by the nation the canal will doubtless be operated without tolls, as are other federal waterways, thus increasing the annual bill for upkeep. On top of this is the certainty that the nation will be asked to deepen the canal from the present twenty-five feet to thirty-five—and probably to widen it too. The cost of this, originally set at $10,000,000, is now placed at $20,000,000; doubtless it will prove to be $30,000,000. Buying a pig in a poke is a stroke of economy by comparison with purchasing a furrow in the sand.

THE NEW YORK TIMES begins 1927 with a most commendable enterprise. It will publish henceforth a limited edition on rag paper, so that libraries and other institutions which desire to keep the files of that daily may have an edition which will survive the lapse of years. This is a genuine service. For fifty years our dailies have been printed upon wood-pulp paper which speedily becomes so brittle that it breaks, even with the most careful handling, and those libraries which could afford it have in recent years covered the pages with a transparent protection. On the other hand, if one turns back to the files of any newspaper prior to 1880 one finds the paper in a perfect state of preservation. Even files more than one hundred years old are as strong, as clean, and as readable as on the day when they were printed. There has been fear, naturally, lest contemporary journalistic records of the last few decades should disappear entirely. Newspapers have been considering the idea for a long time, but have been deterred, first, by the cost of the rag paper, and, secondly, by the difficulty of obtaining a sufficient supply. We sincerely trust that the Times will be well rewarded for its public-spirited undertaking—so well rewarded that other newspapers will be moved to follow suit, and that varying shades of opinion on current events may be preserved.

THEY FOUND TWELVE good men and true in Washington who had never heard of or had never heeded the Fall-Doheny scandal and who accordingly were fit to serve as jurymen. Try today to find a draftsman, a cigar clerk, a steamfitter, a newspaper-vendor, a cook, or an electrician who has no opinion on the "Ty" Cobb-"Butch" Leonard baseball scandal. You can't do it. They are all arguing about it. And there you have the explanation of the rise of the tabloid newspapers and evidence of the futility of politics today. We have not begun to solve the riddle of political government until we learn to make politics as absorbing as baseball. If the breath of scandal continues to blow over baseball, professional baseball will blow up. People will be no more interested in it than they are in politics—because they will suspect the players of the kind of histrionic insincerity that destroys faith in politicians of both parties.

ANOTHER FOOTBALL STAR has said publicly what so many must think privately, that the American college game, however diverting it may be to the spectator, is mighty slim fun for the player. Nathan K. Parker, who captained Dartmouth's undefeated eleven in 1925 and is now a Rhodes scholar in Oxford, declares himself to be a convert to the Rugby game in preference to American collegiate football. "Here is a game played for the sport of it," he writes, "while American football has developed into a serious proposition that might well be designated a business." After discussing the salaries of coaches and other commercial aspects of the American game, Mr. Parker concludes that it "assumes far too great an importance in the minds of both public and participants for the good of either—particularly the latter." Mr. Parker is probably deceiving himself in thinking Rugby a better game than American football. What he prefers is not the game but the attitude of players and students toward it. In England university football is still on an amateur basis; it is played for fun. Here an equally good game has been spoiled because it has been professionalized and commercialized until the fun has been lost for the player in a grim and grimy business. Harvard's gross football receipts in 1926 exceeded a million dollars—the players are mere pawns in one of our great vested interests.

ARTIST, BUSINESS MAN, missionary, poet, scientist, woman, and white man—this varied and interesting group of persons, all of them Negroes but the last, have just been honored by receiving the gold medals awarded by the Harmon Foundation for distinguished achievement by and for the Negro race. The woman is a pioneer educator: Virginia Estelle Randolph of Virginia, who began the now widespread system of combining in a rural community the teaching of the three R's with instruction in the rudimentary principles of the art of living—cleanliness, good food, proper cooking, fresh air, etc. She it was, also, who in an editorial in the Richmond News Leader was as a prize winner compared not unfavorably with Elihu Root, the winner of the Wilson award for public service—a distinction that not many Negro women have enjoyed to date. The white man honored by the Harmon Award was Will W. Alexander of Atlanta, Georgia; that a Southern white man should be singled out for a Negro medal marks a long step forward in the relations between the two races. The artist, Palmer C. Hayden, earns his living by doing odd jobs of house-cleaning, and paints in his spare time; the remaining recipients of the awards have each in his own way contributed something significant to the Negro race—and thus to the world at large.

NOW THAT CHRISTMAS is well over, we can begin the New Year with good resolutions never to use live holly again. The holly-tree is well nigh the most beautiful of Eastern American trees, and it once ranged north to Long Island and the edge of New England. Two decades ago it still grew within the limits of New York City—but not today, except in gardens. The annual holiday raids are driving it further and further back into the coastal swamps—and the holly-tree, a slow grower at best, does not regain lost ranges. It can be grown in captivity—berries planted in the earth of a palm-pot now are likely to send up small shoots six months hence, and a few years will produce at least a lunch-table spray of holly. We are beginning to moderate our consuming appetite for Christmas trees—to satisfy part of it from nurseries, and to grow our own, usable year after year, in back yards. Some of the Northern States have begun vigorous campaigns to save vanishing plants—every Connecticut automobile driver's license is accompanied by a warning not to pick azalea, arbutus, laurel, dogwood, or fringed gentian; will not Southern States adopt a holly-conservation program? Women have learned to do without aigrettes, and the once-vanishing white egret has been saved; why not holly too?

The Nation's Honor Roll for 1926

WE list below a number of Americans who seem to us to have deserved well of their countrymen and the world. We trust that this honor roll will commend itself to our readers and that another year we may have their counsel in our selection.

For 1926 we place upon the honor roll the following:

Literature

THEODORE DREISER, for his "An American Tragedy," the greatest American novel of our generation.

CARL SANDBURG, for his "Abraham Lincoln, The Prairie Years," the most notable biography of 1926.

THOMAS BEER, for reminding us in "The Mauve Decade" of what we do not wish America to be again.

CLAUDE G. BOWERS, for recalling in his "Jefferson and Hamilton" the two ideals between which American politics perennially oscillates.

HARRY ELMER BARNES, for his efforts to discover and set forth the truth as to the origins of the World War.

H. L. MENCKEN, for adding, in three new books and in his American Mercury, to the gaiety and sanity of the nation.

Drama

WINTHROP AMES, for his revivals of "Iolanthe" and "The Pirates of Penzance."

SIDNEY HOWARD, for "The Silver Cord."

IRENE and ALICE LEWISOHN, for "The Dybbuk," part of the beautiful experiment of the Neighborhood Playhouse in "pure theater."

EUGENE O'NEILL, for a fresh demonstration of power and depth in "The Great God Brown."

Architecture

ROBERT T. WALKER, and the firm of McKenzie, Voorhees, and Gmelin, for the new Telephone Building in New York City.

Music

GEORGE EASTMAN, of Rochester, for making possible the recent Mozart Festival, and for demonstrating how much a lesser city can achieve in the domain of music.

JOHN CARPENTER and ROBERT EDMOND JONES, for their jazz ballet "Skyscrapers"—virtually a new American art form.

Journalism

The editors of the New York World, for the crusading devotion to liberal ideals which makes of their daily the finest public servant in the urban press of the North.

JULIAN and JULIA HARRIS, of the Columbus (Ga.) Enquirer-Sun, for gallantry, wisdom, and patriotism in the conduct of their daily.

R. CHARLTON WRIGHT, editor of the Columbia (S. C.) Record, for his efforts to compel the punishment of the lynchers of Aiken in his State.

THOMAS F. MILLARD, for telling the truth about China in the New York Times.

GROVER CLARK, for editing an American newspaper in Peking and keeping it true to the best American traditions.

Science and Discovery

Commander RICHARD E. BYRD, for his North Polar flight.

DR. WILLIAM DAVID COOLIDGE, of Schenectady, for his discovery of the cathode ray tube.

Business

HENRY FORD, for his advertising of the five-day week.

Athletics

GERTRUDE EDERLE, for proving that women can break athletic records made by men.

The Pursuit of Justice

ALBERT WEISBORD, for rousing the nation to the plight of the Passaic strikers.

CLARENCE DARROW and ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS, for pleading and winning the cause of race justice in Detroit.

WALTER F. WHITE, for crossing the color line at the risk of his life and discovering the Aiken lynchers.

Service Abroad

S. PARKER GILBERT, Agent General of Reparations in Berlin, brilliant American administrator, bent on doing justice to all.

MARK L. BRISTOL, Rear Admiral and American diplomatic representative in Turkey, a man of sterling integrity and ability.

ALANSON B. HOUGHTON, Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, for most undiplomatic and most admirable truth-telling about the European situation.

DR. JOSEPH ROSEN, for devoted service in leading in the establishment of thousands of Jewish families on farm lands in South Russia.

CHARLES P. HOWLAND, of New York, a private citizen, who conferred luster upon the American name by his services in the repatriation of the Greeks from Turkey.

ELLEN LA MOTTE, for her struggle against the Opium Bloc at Geneva.

JEREMIAH SMITH, JR., for notable services in the reconstitution of Hungarian finance and economic life.

Public Service at Home

Governor ALFRED E. SMITH, for preserving for the people the remaining water-powers of New York State.

Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, for almost singlehandedly preventing the stealing of Muscle Shoals from the American public and for consistent independence of party lines.

Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH, for his old-fashioned honesty in denouncing the policy of force by all the Powers in China and by the United States in Mexico and Nicaragua.

AUGUST HECKSCHER, for pitting his wits and wealth against the slums of New York.

Religion

HARRY F. WARD, of Union Theological Seminary, for distinguished service as chairman of the Civil Liberties Union, than which there is no more useful or necessary or patriotic American organization.

SHERWOOD EDDY, a Y. M. C. A. official who dared lead a party to Russia and report what they saw.

Bishop WILLIAM M. BROWN, for his expulsion from his church; the man who "lost a religion and found a faith."

Heroism

Captain GEORGE FRIED and his crew of the President Roosevelt for proving anew that none exceed Americans in gallantry at sea.

Carmi Thompson's Compromise

THE President, faced with the perennial problem, What to do about the Philippines, chose his man more wisely than most of us suspected. Carmi Thompson, his envoy, had grown up in the Ohio-gang school of politics, where life's highest ideal is to provide something for everyone and to keep all the boys friendly. There are times when that is impossible, even for an Ohio politician; but there are other times when the fixer is a useful public servant. Considering that a year ago President Coolidge was recommending backward steps, that Governor Wood has been demanding more autocratic powers, that Representative Bacon had been making headway with his proposal to divide the islands in the interest of the rubber-growers, Carmi Thompson's compromises make a pretty encouraging document.

Independence, to be sure, fades into the hazy distance. The Thompson report recommends that absolute independence "be postponed for some time to come." That at least leaves the presumption that independence is at most a few decades away, which causes the New York Herald Tribune to foam with rage. His reasons for opposing immediate independence are strange: First, because they "lack the financial resources necessary to maintain an independent government"—this, although half the states represented in the League of Nations have a smaller annual income from taxation; second, because "they lack a common language"—although nearly a tenth of the entire population of the islands is today attending schools conducted by Filipinos in English, and four times that number have been to such schools; third, because the islands lack a "controlling public opinion"—strange comment from a member of the Ohio Gang; fourth, because the United States needs the Philippines "as a commercial base"—a clear suggestion that money interest should induce us to make scraps of paper of our solemn promises; fifth, because Philippine independence "might complicate international relations in the Orient"—in other words, give impetus to the rising tide of Asiatic protest against colonial subservience to Europe, an end which we should like the United States, recalling 1776, to encourage; and sixth, because "immediate independence would end the free-trade relationship between the United States and the Philippines"—under which we have forced the islands into a position of economic dependence upon the United States.

Yet we may for the moment let Mr. Thompson's argument against independence pass. The question of Philippine independence will never down; the more Philippine contacts with America grow, the more Filipino boys and girls read of the history of the American struggle for independence, the more their human demand for self-government will rise. But the present Congress would not conceivably grant independence. That their national hope is postponed at least until after the election of 1928 is no new disappointment for the Filipino leaders. They had not hoped for better things at this time; they had feared worse. And Carmi Thompson, as a good working politician, has had the common sense to realize that any attempt to lessen the autonomy of the islands could only result in increased friction and in political disaster.

Against what may be called the Wood-and-rubber propositions Thompson sets his face with decision. He recommends that the Jones Law, the present national charter of the islands, be not changed; that Congress make no attempt to amend the land laws which hamper the projects of the Firestones and others who want to develop rubber in million-acre lots, with the concurrent conditions of virtual human slavery which have disgraced the Congo and the Putumayo district of Peru; that Mindanao and the Sulu archipelago be not separated from the rest of the islands. The attempt to cut off the rich, undeveloped South of the Philippines and keep it for American capital was a suggestion of the rubber interests which would have affected Filipino development somewhat as the United States would have been affected had the trans-Alleghanian hinterland been cut off in our early years. And Carmi Thompson's report should mean a veto upon these suggestions.

In positive proposals Mr. Thompson is a bit indefinite. Possibly a more detailed report will follow. He frankly admits that the blame for the deadlock between Governor Wood and the Filipino Legislature and Cabinet is divided—which must cause the old general to snort with indignation. He proposes that steps be taken to reestablish cooperation between the legislative and executive branches of the government. Unfortunately he suggests no such steps; but the natural first step would seem to be substitution of a more flexible figure for Governor Wood—perhaps he will resign of his own accord. Mr. Thompson recommends that Governor Wood's "cavalry cabinet" of army officers—a product of inability to get along with the Filipino officials—be abolished; in its stead he recommends that "the necessary civil advisers" be provided. This might imply more American officials; it would be wiser for the Governor to get along with Filipino assistants. He suggests incorporation of the islands in our Federal Reserve System—a misstep which would prolong their period of economic and financial tutelage; establishment of federal land banks, lending to farmers at reasonable rates of interest—a good plan, but requiring detailed elaboration if it is to do more than promote the creation of great American landed estates; that the Philippine Government withdraw from private business at the earliest possible date—by which he means sell its most valuable properties to American capitalists for private exploitation; and that the Philippine Legislature amend the land law—which we most earnestly hope it will not do. If the Filipinos do not yet know that the creation of huge absentee-landlord estates is the surest way to destroy their independence, they are indeed without the knowledge necessary for independence. And finally, he urges that the Philippines, with Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and our other island possessions, be transferred to a new independent department—a sort of Department of the Colonies—a suggestion which has administrative merits, but suggests an un-American intention to develop the colonial business.

Probably nothing whatever will be done at this session of Congress, and that, after all, is about as much as one has reason, under the rule of Calvin Coolidge, to hope. If the American people resists the immediate onslaught of the rubber imperialists that at least is one step to the good. We earnestly hope that a group of men will soon sit in Congress and in the executive offices determined to fulfil America's promises of independence to the Filipino people.

The Panama Treaty

A NEW and extraordinary departure in Pan-American relations is the signing of an offensive alliance between Panama and the United States. Under this treaty Panama gives us her pledge that the republic > will consider herself in a state of war in case of any war in which the United States should be a belligerent, and in order to render more effective the defense of the Canal will, if necessary in the opinion of the United States Government, turn over to the United States in all the territory of the Republic of Panama, during the period of actual or threatened hostility, the control and operation of wireless and radio communication, aircraft, aviation centers, and aerial navigation.

In addition the Republic of Panama agrees that "the United States shall have the direction and control of all military operations in any part of the territory of the Republic of Panama" during any actual or threatened hostilities.

We are aware that the Republic of Panama, which was set up by American arms after Theodore Roosevelt, as he boasted, "took Panama," has from the beginning been a creature of our Government, as much a vassal of ours as the Island of Malta is of Great Britain. Its government holds office under the shadow of American guns; its President would never dare do anything which the commanders of the Canal and our military zone did not wish him to undertake. Of course, Panama is not alone; as we dragged Panama into the World War so we forced in Cuba, Haiti, and Liberia—because we coveted a few German ships that had sought refuge in their waters. In a sense this treaty merely legalizes or recognizes an existing status. Having from the first made the mistake of refusing to internationalize the Panama Canal, we continue to lavish hundreds of millions of dollars upon its defenses and seek to justify our military interventions in Haiti and Nicaragua on the theory that if those countries should become hostile to us they would "menace" the Panama Canal—which "menace" was also the excuse for retaining our naval base in Cuba. It is, of course, precisely the plea of "military necessity" upon which Germany sought to excuse her invasion of Belgium.

If the treaty legalizes an existing status, it is none the less a bad status to legalize. It is an "entangling alliance" if there ever was one. It will add to the unrest and dislike of us throughout Pan-America—the London Times, in commenting on the treaty, declares that unrest in Latin America over the steady southward march of the United States is increasing and will continue to increase. Meanwhile, there is an immediate complication at hand since Panama is a member of the League of Nations. League officials agree that the Panama-United States treaty conflicts with three articles of the League Covenant and "does not do the United States, Panama, or the League any good and may do the last two considerable moral damage." With many of the irreconcilable Senators this will be an argument for approval of the treaty. In our judgment this treaty is another step in our most unhappy and imperialistic Pan-American policy, which must inevitably cost the United States dear. It would seem almost better to annex the isthmus outright than to lay down the law that our Government in Washington shall have the right to drag into a conflict the innocent people of the Republic of Panama, whose sole offense is that they live near the Canal.

Culture—How to Avoid It

HENRY FORD thought that history was bunk, and if he held any higher opinion of the arts he successfully concealed it; but his son Edsel has just paid a quarter of a million dollars for a Holbein portrait, illustrating once more the inevitable gravitation of wealth toward "culture." Even in the highly favorable atmosphere of the Italian Renaissance it took the Medici family four generations to evolve an Art Patron out of an Aboriginal Financier; but here in America evolution is speeded up, and two generations are enough to compass the change. God only knows what the earnest young mechanician would have said, at the time when he first dreamed his dream of Tin Lizzies, of the proposal to pay a cool $250,000 for a portrait painted four hundred years ago by a man of whom he had never heard. But at least the lesson is clear: the only way to escape culture and to maintain a proper respect for the value of money is not to make too much of the latter. Possessors of vast wealth can no more keep from turning into patrons of the arts than a caterpillar can help from turning into a butterfly. It's a law of nature.

Indeed some student of social statistics might profitably investigate the correlation between financial status and the outward manifestations of an aspiration toward culture. Just how much money does a man have to have before his wife will refuse to let him dine in his undershirt; what is the point at which his daughters begin to worry about their grammar; just what stage corresponds to a purchase of the Harvard Classics; and at what rather high elevation does the inevitable acquirement of gilt-edged art begin? These and similar questions demand serious investigation and we are inclined to believe that what statisticians call the mean deviation from the norm would be found exceedingly small. Moreover, the greater the wealth required for the production of a given phenomenon, the more exact the correlation would be, for it is easier for moderate prosperity to keep its "ain'ts" than for a multimillionaire to refrain from buying old masters.

Even the founder of the Ford dynasty has felt the stirrings of aspiration, and he has gone in for as much culture as he can understand. He has patronized music—the village fiddler; gone in for literature—first editions of McGuffey's Readers; and even concerned himself with the bunk called history—witness the Wayside Inn and the foundations of that little red schoolhouse into which Mary's snow-white lamb intruded its unwelcome presence. Indeed he has shown a certain sturdy common sense. He has stuck to those arts he can appreciate as well as to that part of the past which is meaningful to him, and he has thereby revealed a strain of intelligence which makes it possible to imagine that some descendant of his—a grandson perhaps—might possibly be capable of doing something for the living arts of his country. But whether or not so desirable a state of affairs should ever come about, we may rest assured of one thing. From now on the Ford family will not speak of either traditions or art with the contempt of its raw youth, for richesse oblige. Even when great wealth remains a bit vague upon such subjects as "tactile values" and "significant form" it can appreciate the conspicuous expenditure involved in the purchase of dimmed canvases. The Fords will reverence the things of the past as rapidly as they discover them, and Edsel has already got back to Holbein.

On the Riviera. "I see that even the King suffered from the coal shortage in England at Christmas time."
"The poor dear. Why doesn't he take a run out here where it's warm?"

The Virtue of Shaking Hands

By FRANCES PARKINSON KEYES

"I DON'T know at all how they live—in a very slack, haphazard way, I suppose; but since I've never been in a Filipino house, I really can't judge."

"You've never been in a Filipino house?" I echoed stupidly, staring at my hostess across a table bright with poinsettias, and glittering with wafer-thin, cut shells which served as place cards. Her casual statement, a nonchalant fragment of dinner-party small-talk, was to me so astounding as to be stunning. She was the wife of a United States official who has been for years in the Philippine Islands, and she lived in the "best" residential section of Manila, surrounded on every side by Filipino neighbors. And when she had reiterated, with slightly more detail, what she had said before, it was all I could do to keep from exclaiming, "Well, you certainly have missed a great deal!"

For I had come to this dinner almost directly from a Filipino house; and the picture of elegant and ordered living which I had carried away with me was still as softly vivid as if it had been colored on my consciousness by a master painter: at the end of a driveway which wound quietly up a little hill stood a large garden, the generous green of its central plot fringed with roses; and my hostess, as she greeted me at the open door, handed me a bouquet of dusky roses, their perfume as heavy as their own rich crimson heads. Her satin saya was looped up on one side to show a petticoat of fine lace; the same fine lace was etched against the sheer piñar cloth, made of pineapple fiber, of her camisa (bodice); and her neckerchief was fastened with a superb diamond brooch.

"You would like to go upstairs, perhaps," she suggested, "before you take your place in the receiving line?"

She led me up a stairway with a balustrade of dark hardwood, exquisitely carved, into a bedroom where this hardwood and this carving were repeated in every piece of furniture—in the immense, canopied fourpost bed, in the dressing table, cheval glass, wardrobe, and chairs. I could not refrain from exclamations of admiration; and I received my reward when I was taken into four other bedrooms, each more beautifully furnished than the last. Then I was conducted downstairs again, to the spacious drawing-room: the portrait of my host's mother, painted by a Filipino artist when she was sixteen—a dainty, wistful, expectant sixteen, as the artist had understood and interpreted—hung over the grand piano; the casement windows, with their tiny square panes of opalescent shell—that same shell which my American hostess used for dinner cards, and which serves, in the Philippines, so many beautiful and varied purposes—were thrown open to let the mellow afternoon light stream in over burnished brass bowls filled with flowers, over bits of golden brocade gleaming down the length of polished tables, over Chinese rugs of Ming blue spread across a shining floor. Here, in course of time, after I had met a hundred or so women, all dressed, like my hostess, in that lovely costume which is surely one of the most suitable and striking of national dresses, and nearly as many men, in spotless linen and pongee, all cordial, sophisticated, and charming, my hostess brought refreshments to me—pale tea in a thin, priceless cup; sherbet in carved crystal; frosted cakes on a pierced silver salver . . . yes, certainly, the woman who lives for years where she might go daily to houses like these, and never enters one of them, misses a great deal!

I spoke of this episode to another American woman, also long resident in the Philippines. Her comment, also, was surprising.

"Oh, their houses are pretty, many of them," she said with a little disparaging laugh, "and they're pretty, quite pretty, often. I agree with you that the costume is lovely, and the women are really hospitable, charming, and gracious. But they haven't any mentality. Their education is superficial. They don't read. You never see a book in a Filipino house."

Passing over, for the moment, the rather formidable array of women doctors, lawyers, and educators who had been presented to me during my brief stay, I nevertheless ventured to disagree with her. For I had sat, the greater part of the evening before, with another old friend, a Filipino woman whom I had known before coming to the islands, in her library. This library so far surpassed my own—and I am proud of my library—that I was green with jealousy. It was a large room—much larger than mine—and the books were crowded on three sides, clear to the ceiling, row after row; on the fourth side, under the broad windows, three more rows of books were squeezed in. The large central table was covered with magazines and newspapers in several languages; the latest works of fiction, biography, history, and travel were scattered lavishly about; and as the owner of all these envied treasures talked with me about what she had "recently read" my sense of being almost illiterate myself grew stronger and stronger, such was the variety, depth, and extent of her reading.

The Spaniard, with all his faults as a colonist, did not shut his eyes to the fact that the Philippines were producing men and women of culture, refinement, and intellect, and mingled with them socially as a matter of course. The American colonist, loudly proclaiming his superiority, refuses to do anything of the kind. The line of cleavage between the two races—Anglo-Saxon and Malay—has been drawn as it certainly is not drawn in Java, where the Dutch, it would seem, are facing much the same problem which confronts us in the Philippines, with another Malay race.

And how are the Dutch dealing with it? By recognizing, first of all, the Javanese as a social equal, if, by birth, breeding, and education, he is entitled to such recognition. The native sultans and regents have been shorn of all but nominal power; but the Dutch residents and governors and the Governor General invite them to dinner and dine with them in return, display and exact respect for their religious and domestic customs, and address them in terms of brotherly affection. This may be merely surface courtesy; but it certainly results in a smooth and pleasing surface! Nor is this all; the Dutch declare that a child with a drop of Dutch blood in its veins is a Dutch child, entitled to all the rights and privileges of a Dutch child, not only while it is a child but after it is grown, not only in Java and elsewhere in the Dutch East Indies, but in the Netherlands. If you go into the Queen Wilhemina School, one of the best private schools in Bandoeng—and Bandoeng has a system of schools, both public and private, of which any city in the world might well be proud—you will find sitting beside a flaxen-haired, blue-eyed, snowy-skinned little girl a black-haired, black-eyed, dusky-skinned little boy. Not a single instance of this, but many; not only dusky little boys sitting by fair little girls, but dusky little girls sitting by fair little boys. If you go in the afternoon to one of the fine concerts held in the clubs which are the centers of adult social life you will notice that the pretty woman, exquisitely dressed, sitting at the next table to you beside her blonde, rotund, and placid Dutch husband is a slim brunette herself; and glancing about at all the other couples who are drinking cool beverages and listening to the music, at dozens of other little tables, you will realize how many of them bear the unmistakable sign of an admixture of races. More than this: you will find, if you are fortunate enough to be invited to some of the official households, that your hostess, the wife of a great Dutch functionary, would not be called Dutch by you, and neither would many of the guests. If you motor over the excellent island roads, reveling in scenery which is at once exotic and controlled, with wet fields of terraced rice and acres of plumy sugar cane, and mountains veiled with a rosy mist of sunset, you will see troops of soldiers marching, with corporals at the head of private soldiers far lighter in color than they.

You will also find, now and then, a whispered murmur, "Java for the Javanese," or a hint that these Javanese, like all other subject races governed by aliens, are resenting foreign rule with a new world-consciousness. But this is indefinite, unformed, and not at all troublesome. The Dutch are losing no sleep, no time, and no money over it; they are sending out no committees appointed by Queen Wilhemina to report to the Dutch Parliament at the opening session and justify their tenacity in clinging to their richest possession. They are not talking about the economic and political causes of Javanese ingratitude. For they have accorded social recognition to the Javanese, in a very wide sense of the word; and in doing so they have eliminated the greatest source of open, hot rebelliousness and rancor.

The Dutch are far harder taskmasters than we have ever been. The poorer Javanese—and most of them are poor—old and young, work early and late, and for wages so small that it is incomprehensible to the outsider that they should sustain life upon such a pittance. Their village homes are untouched by the sanitary reforms which we have thrust upon the Filipinos. Their village schools, though these, like village banks, do exist—it being pure slander to say that the Dutch have allowed the natives no educational opportunities—cut a poor figure beside the substantial concrete buildings in the Philippines, to which the Filipino children eagerly flock, being much more interested in primers than they are in plumbing. While, should a Javanese journal once attempt the expression of such sentiments toward the Dutch as are flung out against Americans daily across the front pages of several Manila newspapers, without interference from our authorities, its suppression would be both speedy and severe. Yet in Java are order, peace, and prosperity to a remarkable degree; in the Philippines violent dissatisfaction, chaos, turmoil, and unsettled financial conditions.

Is it possible that in denying social privileges to a race peculiarly sensitive in regard to such recognition we have been guilty not only of an offense against good manners, but of a national blunder the consequences of which may be grave? Mr. Hughes is generally supposed to have forfeited the Presidency because of his failure to shake hands with Senator Johnson. Are we to forfeit the Philippines because we have, so to speak, refused to shake hands with the Filipinos? We need not go as far as the Dutch; we may leave aside all question of racial intermarriage, the advisability of which we shall probably always question, and which—let us not forget—the races with which we decline to intermarry question quite as anxiously as we do. Might it not be well to admit that there are Filipinos who are our social equals, and to accept the hospitality which they, more than any other race with which I have come in contact, offer so lavishly and so whole-heartedly? Might it not be well perhaps to offer them a little in return?

It is no idle epigram, more graceful than veracious, which states that the fate of nations has often been decided over a dinner table. It is the sober truth. And it is a truth to which we might listen with profit in considering the problem of the Philippines.

Twelve Good Men and True

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

SAY what you will, criticism of the Fall-Doheny verdict comes down in the end to a criticism of the jury system. From observation as a reporter assigned to the trial, and from a long interview had with a juror after the trial, this writer is satisfied that the disappointing outcome of this celebrated prosecution is simply a part of the price we pay for protection against judicial oppression.

None of the excuses so common for verdicts which allow rich and powerful malefactors to go free can properly be offered here—Senator Heflin to the contrary notwithstanding. The case was ably prosecuted, the presiding justice was conspicuously austere and impartial, yet Albert Fall and E. L. Doheny, already condemned by two courts, the Senate, and the overwhelming preponderance of public opinion, managed to get off. To one familiar with the facts, the reason for this is obvious. Consider the jury; here is a list of its members:

Vernon Snow, 30, draftsman
Stephen Vermillion, 29, clerk
Henry J. Briggs, 35, architect
Henry Byers, 24, teamster
Clinton Carver, 24, steamfitter's apprentice
George B. Cobb, 29, railway clerk
Windfield Mardindill, 23, bank clerk and law student
Alphonso Parker (foreman), 43, news-stand proprietor
Chester F. Parker, 40, grocery clerk
Herbert Via, 41, cigar clerk in a drug-store
Christian Vogel, 43, second cook
William B. Farmer, 25, electrician

"This typically American jury," Mr. Doheny proudly called it, in the jubilant moment following acquittal. Alas, he may have been right. Nearly all these men declared, when examined for duty, either that they had never heard of the oil scandals or that they had paid very little attention to them. None had formed an opinion concerning the guilt or innocence of the accused. That able journalist, Mr. Frank Kent, exclaimed in amazement over the fact that twelve such men could be found in the United States. They were found, and found in a comparatively short time.

Consider, then, the nature of the questions they were required to answer. They were asked to decide whether a President of the United States had been imposed upon by one of his Cabinet; whether another Cabinet officer had been incredibly fatuous and gullible; whether the exchange of royalty oil for construction work was an improper invasion of the legislative field by the executive branch; whether a rear-admiral had misled his chief in order to effect a pet scheme of defense in the Pacific; whether $100,000 sent in cash by a multimillionaire to a Cabinet officer was a bribe or a loan; whether in either case it was the consideration for the subsequent letting of a contract containing a joker clause under which the lease was afterward granted, and whether navy officials had reason to expect trouble from Japan in 1921.

True, the federal district and circuit courts had pronounced the transaction "saturated with fraud," but federal judges are men trained in sifting and weighing evidence and in penetrating to motives. True, the Senate had condemned it, but after months of study and debate. True, 95 per cent of the newspaper correspondents considered it a plain case of corruption, but they had lived with it since 1923.

These jurors were yanked from shop, counter, truck, and desk. Without warning or background, their bewildered eyes and confused ears were assailed with a huge volume of oral and documentary evidence, much of it highly contradictory. For three weeks they gazed upon the benign face and bandaged arm of Old Man Doheny. For three weeks they were exposed to the famous and contagious smile of lawyer Hogan. They read the dead President's letter approving the lease. They heard former Secretary Denby's sworn statement that he initiated it. They heard a score of prominent persons, including a member of Mr. Coolidge's Cabinet, testify to the exalted reputations and sterling characters of the accused. They heard the court's instruction on "reasonable doubt."

To err is human; to forgive is even more so, especially by men who are not suffering from any sense of personal injury. The jury retired to deliberate. From the outset nine favored acquittal, two were for conviction, one was undecided. The juror who held out longest for conviction was the one whose intelligence and educational advantages had most impressed spectators during the process of selecting the jury. He is a professional man. The other juror voting for conviction possessed some knowledge of law. From a juror's subsequent account of the "deliberations" the writer received a distinct impression that a number of the young clerks and mechanics were antagonized by the professional man's calm sifting of the evidence. Their determination to overbear him hardened accordingly. I quote a part of the discussion, as my informant remembered it:

"You can't tell me old man Doheny is a crook," declared a youthful mechanic. "I'll stay here till hell freezes over before I'll vote to send him to the pen. Didn't all those navy guys beg him to get in on this proposition? Why didn't they indict them, too?"

"But," protested the professional man, "how can you escape from that $100,000 transaction?"

"Oh, hell, didn't you hear them say it was just a loan between old friends? They had been friends for forty years. Doheny is a millionaire; why shouldn't he loan him the money? I like a fellow that stands by his friends. It's too bad there aren't more like him."

"All very well," said the professional man, "but you know and I know that a big business man like Doheny doesn't send $100,000 cash in a satchel by his son when he wants to make a loan. He sends a check. If it was just a loan, why did Fall lie about it? Why did he persuade McLean to lie about it?"

"Well," retorted one of the youths, "it was his own money, and he had a right to send it any way he pleased, and it was nobody's business. Fall would have had a yellow streak a foot wide if he hadn't told that white lie to protect a friend, especially after what Doheny had done for him."

Of the ex-juror who reported this discussion I inquired: "Did anyone ask why it should have been necessary to protect a friend if the transaction was legitimate?"

"No," he said, "if that was mentioned, I don't remember it. The consensus seemed to be that they were old friends, and that whatever happened in connection with the loan was their own business."

The outstanding weakness of the Government's case, in his opinion and in the opinion of the others, he said, was the failure to show by direct evidence that the $100,000 was given as a consideration for obtaining the lease. Unless the Government could prove that by first-hand evidence, a majority of the jurors felt that no conspiracy had been shown. I suggested to him that the character of such transactions must nearly always be established by collateral circumstances. Men who give and receive bribes seldom expressly designate them as such, hence usually it is impossible to produce first-hand evidence of the understanding with which the money was paid.

"Exactly," he agreed. "That's just what we decided —they hadn't made a case."

To think of all the energy, brains, and high purpose which had been lavished upon the long and difficult struggle to get these two men to trial, and then to realize that the final verdict had been written out of such reasoning and in such a mood as the foregoing discloses, is enough to make men despair. Of what avail was the splendid courage and brilliant intellect of Senator Walsh, of what use the prodigious labor of Roberts, the whole stirring three-year fight to have justice upon this faithless official and his brazen millionaire patron?

Yet the very nature of our criminal procedure made the outcome almost inevitable. Upon a time-honored rule extensive knowledge of the case is sufficient to disqualify a talesman for jury service. In other words, the availability of a citizen for jury duty was in direct ratio to his lack of information, in a case where possession of that information was a condition of intelligent citizenship! Nobody will contend that a man should be permitted to sit on a case when he has formed and expressed pronounced opinions as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, but there seems no excuse for enforcing the rule to the extent where mental paralysis becomes the goal of achievement in selecting a jury.

Under such conditions as obtained here, a little ingeniousness in the planning and commission of a fraud becomes a defense safer than an alibi. Few jurors will convict on evidence which they cannot understand. "When in doubt, acquit," is not only the psychology of the juror; it is also the law. Very soon the Government will bring Fall and Harry F. Sinclair to trial on the charge of having conspired to defraud the Government in the Teapot Dome lease. One contemplates the event with pardonable cynicism. The very heart of the alleged conspiracy in that case is a highly complicated set of dealings, revolving around a bogus trading company, organized across the border in Canada.

True, from its devious activities, $230,000 in Liberty Bonds eventually found their way to Fall and persons closely connected with him. True, Fall secretly leased Teapot Dome to one of the guarantors and organizers of that company. But would these two circumstances have any significance to a jury which could see no connection between the $100,000 in the little black bag and the lease which Fall subsequently gave Doheny? The writer respectfully assumes to doubt it.

These Modern Women

A Deflated Rebel

ANONYMOUS

FROM a rebellious childhood I have settled into a comfortable middle age of marriage, children, a couple of strenuous and pleasantly creative avocations, and a slight tendency to bridle when men deal in generalizations about women—despite the fact that I indulge in generalizations about men. An explanation of my continuously angry soul as a child is as far beyond me as an explanation of my present complacency. But I find an impersonal interest in the conflicts which surrounded us at home, now that they are revealed. They were at the time unmentioned and by an heroic effort almost unnoticed in our upright Quaker household.

We print herewith the fifth of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of women with a modern point of view. The next article will appear in The Nation for January 19.

A psychoanalyst and a behaviorist will analyze these articles in an attempt to discover the underlying causes of the modern woman's rebellion.

Women predominated in the family. We were two grandmothers, father, mother, and three daughters. Grandfather Evans, who left at his death a business which was our life's catastrophe, dominated the family circle to some extent by his grave portrait and by my grandmother's and my mother's adoration of him as a symbol of great competence. Grandfather Haynes, a vague family hero, since he lost his life in an underground railway freeing slaves, was unknown even to my father, born after his death.

Father and mother married about the time of her father's death. Owing to a flight in advertising, his business was willed to his widow and daughter (my mother) in a bankrupt condition. Bankruptcy proceedings would have saved the day, but my Grandmother Evans's proud and stubborn spirit prevented. Therefore, as my father and mother started on their marital career, they assumed the responsibility of paying off an enormous debt, reviving a fading business, supporting two grandmothers, and keeping intact the large house and garden of my mother's mother. We had to move into this house within a few years to save expense. Grandma Evans looked upon this arrangement as an imposition, although her own rigid and upright standards of conduct had made it necessary. But sacrifices were essential. My grandmother's maid must go; our "hired girl" must go. The house was apportioned; the household work divided.

Now for various reasons my father's mother, Grandma Haynes, a good and kindly practicing Quaker, was thoroughly despised by my mother's mother, an intelligent and presumably gentle practicing Quaker. I think Grandma Haynes was considered "common," or perhaps it was her more poverty-stricken past that gained her my other grandmother's antagonism. But the problem of keeping these two eminently sweet old ladies from meeting in the house became another burden upon my father and mother. Grandma Evans would peer down the long hall from the door of her room before stepping out in order to guard against any chance meeting with Grandma Haynes. Should that tragic event occur in spite of every precaution, there would be a quickened tread and an averted head on the part of Grandma Evans and a sad, hurt look of bewilderment on the face of Grandma Haynes. When I witnessed one of these meetings, the gorge rose within me. I was aligned forever with the more humble side of the family—my Grandmother Haynes and her son, my father.

The division of tasks in the household was tragically perverse. Grandma Evans—intellectual, individualist, and undomestic—assumed complete charge of the kitchen, planning and cooking for this entire family which her conscience had imposed upon her. Otherwise her martyrdom would have been insufficient, and we should have been less in the position of irritating and unwelcome guests. Grandma Haynes, who craved hard manual labor for the sake of those she loved, was barred from the kitchen. She was forced to eke out her unsatisfied zeal in devoted care of us—who would have none of it—and in endless knitting. Besides the kitchen Grandma Evans had as her sanctuary the library, with heavy doors eternally drawn together, and her own front bedroom. Neither of these rooms can I ever remember entering, except to sniff their dignity and remoteness. Her quiet superiority and her endless labor were exasperatingly evident; though she never complained or discussed her affairs in our hearing. Utterly dependent on my father and mother, she was yet the unquestioned head of the house, while they were the driven slaves of the business she had refused to allow them to abandon.

Grandma Haynes was more a part of the family. We all, except Grandma Evans, used the office, which English-like was in the house, in the evening as a sitting-room. Here my mother and father worked at the ledgers and typewriter during the day; here an enormous safe bearing my grandfather's name, fondly surrounded by pink painted roses and many flourishes, was a constant reminder of his once prosperous state. The parlor was for piano lessons and parties.

We children were brought up to speak the Quaker tongue out of consideration for our grandmothers, and the Quaker tongue in a thoroughly un-Quaker community in the mouths of three fairly unrefined little brats often expressed itself in such demure remarks as "Damn thee. I'm just as tough as thee is."

But to Grandma Evans was due more than mere respect. Virtue in our family consisted in helping her with the dishes and household chores. Wickedness was to refuse dishwashing and play with the undesirable family next door, whom Grandma Evans despised but whom my father and Grandma Haynes could see no reason for disdaining, poor and uneducated though they were. My elder sister chose the good; I chose the evil; my younger sister remained neutral. I chose the side of no work and free associations. I hated my sister for winning Grandma Evans's difficult approval by dishwashing and snobbish behavior. I rebelled against the quiet superiority which lent a fictitious dignity to tiresome tasks and poured silent contempt on the gentle head of Grandma Haynes. Although the antagonism between them was unspoken and unacknowledged, I sided passionately with the under-grandmother and rejected all the standards set up by Grandma Evans. Perhaps I yearned secretly for her approval, but could not stoop to win it. Certainly I did not. I went my way, angry and resentful. I sought out the toughest companions of the neighborhood. I played with boys winter and summer, whose bravado, being normal, seemed of a far less glorious nature than my own. They were no better and no worse than I at the game of tip-cat under the lamplight on the corner of a spring evening. Boys were slightly more stupid in school, but occasionally better at games. Though I tried football, it bored me and I freely granted superiority on that field if they claimed it. I felt magnificently glorified in being a girl—a girl who could do anything she wanted to. I also felt proud of my democratic ways. I played with and liked the most "undesirable" children I could find, just as at home I associated with and adored the grandmother who I knew was looked down upon. Having to do dishes and run errands was an injustice; and so was our everlasting economy and poverty. I was in a state of continual rebellion.

Since we were brought up with economic handicaps, it had been taken for granted by us all that once out of college the efforts of our father and mother were finished as far as we were concerned. We had to earn our own living; no feminist faith was necessary. Since the work of supporting the family had been done as much by my mother as by my father, there was nothing to indicate that we should not be as capable of earning money as any son would have been. I can remember no suggestion in the minds of any of us of sex inferiority, male or female. Both my father and mother believed in and worked for woman suffrage. There was no preaching to us of woman's duty being thus and so. Certainly we were not brought up to be charming; our clothes were grotesque, expressing my mother's latent color sense, if they expressed anything at all.

Later on, in college, I became imbued with sufficient formulism to feel that it was up to me to prove that women were as capable as men in the world's achievements. But owing to a natural dislike of hard work, still heavy upon me from childhood, I was soon able to prove to my own satisfaction that no important task had to be done by me as a woman, since other women were covering themselves with glory in every field of effort. That let me out personally. Inwardly, I looked upon earning my living primarily as a chance for further adventure, for experience and amusement, and gained my objective with scant satisfaction to my employers. I worked in factories; briefly I held a position as secretary; I went in for newspaper and magazine work. I enjoyed my various jobs for the personal contacts they involved, for their variety and occasional excitement. I disliked them for their drudgery—the reminiscent flavor of duty and dishwashing.

In the early days of my marriage the formulas of feminism pestered me because I allowed my husband to support me. But since I had used my economic independence previously as a means to adventure, and the immediate adventure of my life was the entirely unforeseen one of adjusting to intimacy and conflict in marriage, I found it easy to still the accusing voice which pointed out that principles were at stake. Besides which, having found that most of my principles were generated out of perversity, it became necessary as I grew older either to cast rigid rules of conduct out altogether or to invent them as the situation arose or to remold new ones out of a more adult attitude. My feminism is a part of my ego and perhaps nothing more. I like myself—and I am a woman. Therefore, I naturally resent injustice on the basis of sex.

As an individual I want, and have found, an opportunity to do what interests me—inside my home and outside as well. My deficiencies and my capacities are my own—not those of my sex. Having come from under the pressure to perform imposed tasks I have gained both freedom and eagerness in the work I do. Since I no longer have to work, I am no longer lazy; since I am not disapproved of, I am not angry. I have traded my sense of exhilarating defiance (shall we call it feminism?) for an assurance of free and unimpeded self-expression (or shall we call that feminism?). In other words, I have grown up.

Egypt

By LOUISE TOWNSEND NICHOLL

Look, it is Egypt in my soul today,
A geometric, pyramided calm;
Death's neatness is the necessary way,
To measure and to build and to embalm.

This desert is a staring, mute mosaic
Laid dryly out in death and stone and heat.
The only human face is flat, archaic,
And sand has hid the futile hands and feet.

But sometimes there were water-boys calling,
Singing the Water-Song along the Nile.
It was a soft song and like water falling,
And I may hear it in a little while.

Kansas College Has Its Fling

By HARBOR ALLEN

STUDENTS who criticize their professors, object to faculty censorship of their publications, write favorable reviews of Cabell and Cather, quote Bernard Shaw and The Nation, and demand a modicum of self-government are agents of Soviet Russia: it has been so decreed by the administration of the Kansas City, Missouri, Junior College. After expelling five students for publishing the Sacred Cow, a weekly paper, President E. M. Bainter announced: "This is part of a nation-wide movement of the Reds to wreck our educational institutions." Clarence O. Senior, an alumnus who sought legal aid for the expelled students, was accused of being a "paid organizer" for the Reds.

When the faculty censorship board and the staff of the weekly Collegian failed to reach an agreement over certain censored articles, the university president announced that the staff had been dissolved. The faculty censors had stated flatly that a student publication must not criticize the school authorities, and that Willa Cather's and Cabell's novels must not be reviewed. The Student Council then boldly voted to abolish the Collegian on the ground that a severely censored "student" journal was just expensive waste paper. At the same time a faculty committee emasculated the constitution drawn up by the council for student self-government, although the constitution in question proposed nothing more startling than to place the control of extra-curricular activities in the hands of the students, to be subject to faculty control only when the students "by overt acts indicate their incapability."

In the midst of the subsequent hubbub the Sacred Cow made its first appearance, proclaiming free speech and free press. It drew its name from the "sacred cow" of the college: the faculty "to whom all must bow in worship." In its columns appeared all the articles barred from the more sacrosanct columns of the Collegian, including the reviews of "The Professor's House" and "The Silver Stallion," an excerpt from The Nation on The American College and Its Rulers, and a letter from the president of the council rebuking the faculty for its suppressive measures. In addition the Sacred Cow brazenly published Wendell Phillips's opinion on free speech, cited the action of President Glenn Frank of Wisconsin in refusing to oust an editor for attacking the dry laws, and observed of the address of a Congregational minister that it was "the type usually given before a group of high-school students rather than before college students, who are supposed to be of superior intelligence. College students in the main are not interested in the number of times 'Red' Grange practiced."

A review in the second number intimated that Cabell lets the "institutions of marriage and religion come in for a great share of ridicule." As for faculty members: "There are some who merit the highest praise—but there are others. The disagreeable members are placed in practically all the key positions of faculty-student relations. They are placed where their presence will be most obnoxious to the student body, because they stand as a bulwark against progressive student initiative." And from Bernard Shaw the Sacred Cow drew this: "If the students of America do not organize their own education, they will not get any. In forming Intellectual Soviets and establishing the Dictatorship of the Learner, the American students may save their country—if it is capable of being saved."

The five editors of the Sacred Cow were—by special-delivery letters—summarily dismissed from the college and the Student Council was dissolved. The editors' efforts to defend themselves were brushed aside as "mere quibbling." One of them immediately capitulated and wrote the abject apology demanded by the president and the Kansas City Board of Education. Apologies from the other four, less cringing, were rejected. Given a second chance under threat of permanent expulsion, three of these four sent in letters suspiciously alike. All were convinced of the error of their revolt. All had experienced profound inward changes and had come to realize how mistaken was their judgment of the faculty and the administration. "I now understand the futility, the absurdity of trying to think out independently a line of conduct for myself," wrote one of the quondam rebels. "I am too young, too impulsive, too immature." "Any attempt by the students of Junior College to run their own education would be foolish and would undoubtedly result in failure," recanted another who had talked of the "dictatorship of the learner." The third could only attribute his former attitude to his "youth, inexperience, and overdeveloped ego."

All these were taken back into the fold. Despite temporary aberrations, they had convinced the Board of Education that they were fit children for an American college. The Board of Education, incidentally, in an open letter to the President made itself painfully plain on the relative position of faculty and students:

> You and your faculty are held responsible for all activities connected with the Junior College, curricular and extra curricular. . . . To accord such a privilege (the control of extra-curricular activities) to students and to permit them to undertake to organize, administer, and carry out some of the most important functions connected with a public institution of learning is revolutionary, and that beneficial results may be obtained from such a procedure is contrary to all human experience.

One of the recreant editors, Gerald Fling by name, stubbornly refused to consider himself so young, foolish, and immature that he could not formulate his own judgments or his own line of conduct. "Fling," he was warned by the Superintendent of Schools, I. I. Cammack, "you are dangerous. A man with your opinions belongs in Russia."

To a friend this dangerous student writes:

> Read the statements of the students who were readmitted and you will better understand the state of conditions in Junior College: how student opinion is muzzled; how student government is denied; how controversial matters—military training, socialism, etc.—are not allowed on bulletin boards, even though pains are taken to see that both sides are fairly presented; how teachers are muzzled and, through fear of losing their jobs, subscribe to "economic determinism"; how the board asserts that it will get rid of teachers possessing liberal opinions; how noted liberal speakers are not allowed to address the students; how, when students rebel, they are clubbed into submission by fear of a dishonorable dismissal; how President Bainter maintains an espionage system by which any student guilty of "radical" or liberal views is proscribed and is subsequently asked to leave because of "cuts" or "low grades."

Gerald Fling is still sticking to his guns and he is still barred from Kansas City Junior College. How the Board of Education damned itself and the American college when it decreed: "Fling, you are dangerous."

Good Old Bill Vare

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, December 24

NEW records for humbuggery promise to be hung up in the Senate as a result of the cases of Mr. Vare of Pennsylvania and Mr. Smith of Illinois. Contests over Senatorial seats always evoke a display of unctuous hypocrisy upon the part of the party in power. Senators carefully comb the poor old Constitution to find reasons to conceal the practical political motives that control their vote. Invariably there is vast posturing and posing but in the end the decision is not on the evidence or the facts but almost exclusively on a partisan basis. There are some Senators unmoved in matters of this sort by political considerations, but not many. The majority on both sides never get away from the purely political aspect.

By the time this is printed the militant Mr. Smith with his odoriferous credentials from his smelly Illinois Governor may have been, as is now indicated, enthusiastically ejected by the Senate on the broad ground of general political turpitude—with Jim Watson acting as one of the most enthusiastic of the ejectors. That, when it is considered in the red light of the recent Indiana campaign and the unkind allegations against the noble James along with his general reputation, is not without its element of rollicking humor. Or Mr. Smith may have failed to present himself for the well-advertised kick in the pants or he may when this appears be still desperately trying to dodge the Senatorial boot. In any event it will not be the end of his case. Both he and the high-minded Mr. Vare will be beating on the doors of the Senate early in March if there is a special session or early in December if there is not.

The really interesting thing about the fights of these two Republican Senators elect, charged with having corruptly obtained their nominations; the thing that justified the statement made at the beginning of this article; the thing that ought to be understood before the great Constitutional lawyers start in to beat their breasts and rave about the "vanishing rights of the States" and the iniquitous direct primary which subjects pure and patriotic men to the unjust suspicion of trying to buy their way in whereas all they wanted to do was to show their hearts to be in the right place—that thing is the simple fact that the Republican machine leaders have determined to make Mr. Smith the goat in order to save Mr. Vare if they can. In this more or less laudable movement will be enlisted the full support of the Mellon-Coolidge Administration. It is doubtful whether they will be able to put over the Vare part of this program, but there is no doubt at all that they intend to try. The reasons are perfectly clear. In the first place arguments of the inside Republican organization for keeping Vare are far stronger than those for helping Smith. It is Mr. Smith's hard luck that he is nothing like the politically potent person in the Illinois machine Mr. Vare is in Pennsylvania. It is true that if both Vare and Smith are thrown out they would be succeeded by Republicans and there would be no party loss in the Senate. It would be possible therefore for regular and righteous Republicans, of the Fess type for example, to vote against both without helping the Democrats—which from the Fess standpoint nothing could justify. Here, then, is the rare chance to be both right and regular and there is little doubt, if left to themselves, that most Republican Senators, sweeping aside the fine-spun Constitutional arguments of the brilliant Beck, would vote against Vare as unctuously as against Smith. Both cases are equally ugly, and there remains in the Senate mind a still vivid memory of the amazing mortality among Senators who supported the unfortunate Newberry—a dreadful political tight-wad when stacked up beside this pair of free-handed spenders.

However, there exists a powerful political reason for saving Vare. Peace, it is declared, has been made between the factions of the party in Pennsylvania—between the Vare machine on the one side and the Mellon-Grundy-Reed machine on the other. By the terms of this peace it is asserted Mr. Vare's seat in the Senate is practically underwritten. If he is thrown out he will come back, but the Reed-Mellon-Grundy faction is to do its noble best to keep him from being thrown out. This means, of course, that Senator David A. Reed is to make the fight to give Vare his seat. If he is successful then Vare and his Philadelphia machine will support Senator Reed in the 1928 primaries for renomination and "go along" with the Mellon machine in the matter of delegates to the national convention. If he should be unseated, then Reed and Vare will run together two years hence, each supporting the other. Of their simultaneous success under such circumstances in primary and general elections there could be no question. Of course what this involves is support for Mr. Vare in his Senate contest by the benign but partisan Mr. Mellon, who is politically guided and represented by Mr. Reed, and that involves the support of the equally partisan but more cunning and cautious Mr. Coolidge whose third-term aspirations are vitally linked up with Pennsylvania. Thus in its conservative, under-cover way the whole Administration will be back of Vare when the time comes. But not back of Mr. Smith. Mr. Smith is the goat. It is recognized that it will be easier for Republican Senators to vote for Mr. Vare if they are allowed to vote against Mr. Smith. That is what they are preparing to do, justifying it on the ground that Smith accepted money from the wicked traction magnate whose rates he was supposed to regulate, whereas all good old Bill Vare's friends did was to spend $800,000 for him in the primaries and cheat a little in the general election—really a mere trifle. The plan is to heave Mr. Smith out as morally unfit, but to find a good Constitutional excuse for keeping Vare in. If that does not beat the humbug record, what does?

In the Driftway

NEW YEAR'S resolutions, like New Year's calls and New Year's egg-nog, are going out of fashion. Perhaps it is just as well. Now that the egg-nog is served on the last night of the year, it is a comfort to be able to sleep through the ensuing afternoon, instead of having to wake up and drink more egg-nog in the presence of friends and acquaintances. But the Drifter, always old-fashioned, has made a few resolves, and as a result he, and not his up-to-date contemporaries, will be able to enjoy the pleasurable sense of sin attendant on breaking them.

* * * * *

FIRST, he will be brave. When invited to make a speech or attend a reception for a prominent foreigner just awarded the Keys of the City, or to dine or drink tea or eat breakfast for the purpose not of sociability but of meeting someone, he will not reply cravenly that he is about to leave town, or that his aunt has typhoid fever, or that he is suffering from rabies, or some other transparent and unoriginal lie. No. From January first forward, his answer will be as follows: "Dear Sir or Madam: I will not attend your dull party, not because I am not perfectly free at that time and physically able to come but because I would much rather stay home."

* * * * *

SECOND, he will not hurry. If he should enter a subway station as a train is pulling in he will turn his back to it and stroll quietly to the end of the platform. If by running he can just cross Fifth Avenue before the traffic lights change he will dally on the curb instead. He will not even try to be on time for appointments, nor arrive breathless and apologetic with some trumped-up excuse when inevitably he is late. On moving stairways (this reform should perhaps come under his first resolve instead of this one) he will not run upstairs merely because persons behind him want to run; on the contrary, he will plant himself firmly and comfortably on a step and will ride up, as the inventor of this particular device certainly intended him to do, paying no attention to the cries of the line pressing him from behind.

* * * * *

THIRD, he will not be influenced by public opinion, even by public and forcibly expressed derision. Thus, if some one belligerently inquires if he has read the latest novel or exposé of political scandal he will confidently and loudly answer: "I have not, nor have I any intention of doing so." To the scornful sniffs provoked by this intransigence he will be deaf. If at a week-end party in the country his fellow-guests demand that he go skating, he will move his chair nearer the fire and prop his feet higher above his head, without even the trouble of a refusal. He will sleep late or rise early, as the spirit moves him; he will work at midnight or at noon or not at all, without regard for the raised eyebrows or incredulous hoots of his associates. He will, in short, spend the year 1927 in making himself as disagreeable to other persons as he can and as agreeable to himself. He will do as he likes—until something unforeseen occurs to make him break his resolutions.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Find Out if You Can

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your readers will be interested in the following letter recently received from Ellen La Motte.

New York, December 20 JULIA ELLSWORTH FORD

DEAR JULIA: Things look bad to me in the opium world—the Opium Bloc, of which Lord Cecil is spokesman, is doing its best to get that Geneva Convention ratified. If ratified, the whole situation will be handed over to a Board of Control or Central Board, members of which will be appointed by the League, after which event they will function alone, without public sessions. The Italian delegate at the Fifth Committee of the Assembly this past September strongly protested against the League handing the opium situation over to this board, saying that it was a highly dangerous thing to do. He seemed to think that the League, intrusted with the enforcement of the Hague Convention, was slipping out of its treaty obligations. He further stated that this board was to be composed of countries the majority of which had large financial stakes in opium production, drug manufacture, and consumption—that it would be a "packed" committee, undiluted, or practically so, by countries which can view the opium situation in other terms than those of financial interests. Lord Cecil, however, carried the Fifth Committee into indorsing a resolution urging the Assembly to support the Geneva Convention—to ask the states members of the League to indorse this convention at Geneva. Which the Assembly did. As this Geneva Convention does nothing about production, manufacture, or smoking, presumably the League likes these things to continue. Certainly the opium interests like it that way. And this Central Board, whose function is to watch opium and drugs traveling from one country to another, can probably watch the transit with equanimity. Their reports, handed in three months after each meeting, may be misleading. At any rate, what good is this Central Board except to tip off the insiders? And why are the opium-profiting countries so dead keen on it? And how comes the League to be delegating its authority to a packed committee like this?

ELLEN

Freedom from Americans

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The continuous cry from Filipinos of all classes for "independence" is, when sifted down, less a cry for independence from America than from Americans.

Not all the Americans in the Philippines are roughnecks. There is a considerable group of young American business men of education and there is a much smaller group of earnest Americans in the service of the Philippine government. These people do their work and are largely inarticulate. The business men have but few Filipino contacts that count, while the lips of government officials are better sealed for obvious reasons. But a large group of American business men, many of whom came to Manila as soldiers in the Spanish-American War, are most noisy and offensive about their "rights." They seem to feel that because they helped take this country away from Spain the Filipinos should be undyingly grateful to them for staying on, making money, and being condescending. They make bad feeling between Americans and Filipinos. A Filipino who has been met with courtesy and sympathy by America's best at home wants independence from this sort of American in the Philippines.

One of the leading American papers of Manila "kids" the Filipinos because they are small, because they are brown, because they are politicians, because they are house servants, because they are peasants, because they eat rice and fish, because they ask for independence, because their English is poor, because they are lawyers instead of farmers and merchants, because, finally, they are not Americans of the same unpleasant type as the editorial writer. This paper, a daily insult, nurses an enormous amount of Filipino hatred of Americans.

Filipinos of birth, education, and breeding are acceptable to Americans similarly qualified for the same reason that intelligent people the world over can mingle profitably. It is when people of different caste, as well as race, mingle that the trouble begins. The Americans who understand and sympathize with the articulate Filipinos are unfortunately inarticulate; they do not go about writing for publication and making speeches. If they did they would undoubtedly be attacked as un-American by the ex-soldiers and carpet-baggers who think that offensive provincialism proves allegiance to America.

Naturally the Filipinos want to be rid of such Americans. Some of the most thoughtful Filipino leaders hope for some such relation between the United States and the Philippines as exists between England and Canada. Home rule would not banish all undesirable Americans, but it might be made to act as a muzzle.

Manila, P. I., November 1 GWINNE TREGO NATHORST

Books and Plays

Praise of Diana

By GLADYS OAKS

No more the young Diana whom he knew
With golden limbs on paradisal hills,
Laughing a little at the red that spills
Down the white arrow that her fingers drew. . . .

But she would run from him to other skies,
New hunting grounds that darkened in the south,
Then back with tired feet and eager mouth—
And with his mounting heart the moon would rise.

Where nights are counted as our minutes fall
She married him a thousand years ago.
She waits for him with clustered children now,
A faithful woman aging by a wall.
The fleet, the proud Diana—she is dead;
And does he bless the wifehood of his bed?

First Glance

THE poems of James Rorty, appearing singly in magazines during the past half-dozen years, have impressed me chiefly on the score of their movement. The quality of movement is in itself of the first importance to poetry, and Mr. Rorty's sinewy rhythms, running their rapid course through series of long or short lines, through rhyme or free verse, have seemed to me sufficient reason for calling their manipulator one of the most interesting poets in America. Whatever else the poems had to recommend them, or whatever they lacked, they stepped out; they were rousing. Now, after a delay which is difficult to understand, they appear in a volume called "Children of the Sun and Other Poems" (Macmillan: $1.75); and it is possible to speak of other important qualities which they have. It is possible, for instance, to say where in Mr. Rorty they come from, and what they are about.

All of them, from the longest and loudest, What Michael Said to the Census Taker, down to the shortest and softest, Entry to the Desert, have the same scene—the earth below, the sky above, and man between. It is a large scene, and by no means a new one, yet Mr. Rorty makes it very much his own and never departs from a highly personal method of looking at it—or of hearing it make noise. Mr. Rorty feels the physical universe as keenly and freshly as any poet does these days, and has as much power to bring that universe close to the reader. He brings it there, however, for a purpose: to remind men how little they deserve such a setting. I do not mean to place Mr. Rorty among the "nature poets," among those poets, that is to say, who moon over the superior moral virtues of clouds and seas. I am sure that his first interest, like his last, was in man; he feeds no morals into nature. But it cannot be without purpose that he has so insistently sung of the feebleness and absurdity of the human creature as he struts under the morning. Mr. Rorty rings the great bell of dawn, or calls upon the flowers, or invokes the fog, or magnifies the moon in order that we shall know how excellent these are, and how freely they go about their business. Our lack of strength, our fear of freedom—these are Mr. Rorty's subjects, and he has treated them as a poet should treat them, by making his verse both strong and free. He has treated them also—and this is perhaps the chief distinction of the present volume—with an erect and moving humor. It is seldom that satire is conveyed in such beautiful verse, seldom that beautiful verse is made to chortle and bustle as does the verse in When We Dead Awaken, The Day, Mr. Nevinson Arrives by Moonlight, California Dissonance, and Sunday Morning. Mr. Rorty in one page can rouse to shame, to laughter, and to delight.

Mr. Rorty's one specific defect will, I fancy, disappear in future volumes. This is a tendency, when he is at the crest of a rhythmical wave, to forget how scrupulous he can be with words and slide off into sheer eloquence. The outward sign is generally a mixture of metaphors, none of which is sufficiently original with Mr. Rorty. The inward sign he doubtless knows and has already conquered.

MARK VAN DOREN

Editor-Politician

Horace Greeley. By Don C. Seitz. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

MR. SEITZ has written most entertainingly and with intelligence and courage about the men and events of our American Victorian period. He has recreated in his latest book the political atmosphere which, being overcharged with hate, suspicion, and fear after the Mexican War, released the spiritual lightning which became the Civil War. The Horace Greeley whom Mr. Seitz has created moves amid the confusion, malice, and greedy ambitions of his day in the forties and fifties, a baffled hero. Mr. Seitz has not made a bronze statue for the park; rather he has pictured an earnest man, more than reasonably honest, whose intelligence is directed rather by his courage than by the insight which should come from wide information. The author has not made a god but instead "the busiest and boldest editor in America" during the forty years of his career.

The influence of Greeley during those years upon a small provincial country with most of the population located within a two-days' trip of the front door of the New York Tribune office was tremendous. He used that influence courageously even though he was unquestionably afflicted with ambition which biased his courage. The Greeley whom Don Seitz makes in his book is essentially an agitator. Greeley was never a constructive statesman, but he aroused emotions in the popular heart which did mold events and did make history. We see in this book a soft, shrill-voiced, moon-faced, pudgy little man, physically and morally leonine in his courage, who heroizes himself a bit, pities himself a little, assumes the king-maker, and does in truth play a Warwick's game. But we see also how out of the hates that men harbored during the first half of the century, how out of sectional greeds having their basis in economic conditions, passions were stirred which led in some kind of inexorable tragic Greek procession to the cataclysm of Civil War. Reading Mr. Seitz's book, in which history is dramatized around this editor-politician, one sees how futile the war was, how unnecessary if there had been wisdom where there was ambition, if there had been a sincere national desire to settle the slavery question rather than to cherish it as a political issue for the benefit of the politicians of the North and South.

The reader of Don Seitz's "Greeley," seeing his hero blunder and fail so many times under his tremendous responsibility, is saddened by the overwhelming knowledge that sincerity is not enough in statesmanship, that courage is not enough in statesmanship, that even the unusual honesty that Greeley used is not enough in statesmanship. One realizes that to overcome the passions of men which arise when ambitions meet and grapple with vast self-interests only the wisdom of a demigod can keep men out of war. The thing Don Seitz has done in this book most beautifully is to show quite casually and without moralizing how easily, indeed how inevitably, self-interest tempts politicians to trade humanity's advantage for their own preferment. This life is a tragedy, not the tragedy of Greeley but the tragedy of America—walking blindly through "the irrepressible conflict" which comes, with the economic differences between the North and the South, to be the bloodiest war the world had seen before, the American Civil War! With a fine repression, with a splendid refusal to be melodramatic in piling up detail, Mr. Seitz has written his story of this tragedy as though he were not conscious of it. He has detached himself from the passions of the day and has set them down as the coloring of his pageant, and has moved the puppets of his pageant, Greeley, Seward, Lincoln, Douglas, with a calm hand, forward into the terrible holocaust which overwhelmed them.

So Don Seitz has made a book that is easy to read, a delightful book on the whole, yet not a book which those who believe in highly moral tales will enjoy. Nor is it a book which those will approve who believe that this is merely a mechanistic universe and that pure chance guides human destiny in its great decisions. One closes this book with a sense that man some way, some day, will solve the problem of his destiny on this planet, will civilize himself in the mass as he has to some extent civilized himself individually. Seeing here set down the play of these titanic forces with which Greeley, Lincoln, Seward, and Douglas struggled so impotently, so blindly, and yet so honestly and so bravely, one realizes that just a little more wisdom, a little more foresight, a little more vision in understanding hearts would have choked the hates which made the Civil War and solved without the war some of the problems which the war so compromised. Don Seitz has done his country a service if only a thousand of his countrymen turn to his story and read it wisely.

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Poe Again

Israfel: The Life and Times of Edgar Allan Poe. By Hervey Allen. George H. Doran Company. Two volumes. $10.

Edgar Allan Poe. By Mary E. Phillips. Philadelphia: The John C. Winston Company. Two volumes. $10.

THE two works here under review aggregate some 2,600 pages and constitute an impressive monument to the persistence of human curiosity. When Poe died in 1849 such brief accounts of his life as were already in existence or were called forth by his death were wrong in nearly every important particular. He himself had lied elaborately with deliberate intent to conceal the truth, and at least until a very short time ago those in possession of essential documents kept them closely guarded. It was not until he had been dead for more than half a century that Woodberry first discovered the whole lost chapter of his life in the army, not until a few years ago that Killis Campbell first conclusively proved that Poe's story of a romantic expedition to Europe (invented in order to conceal his service as a private soldier) was unadulterated fiction, and not until last fall that letters of absolutely capital importance were first released for publication. Every biographer has had to struggle with contradictions and concealments, and nearly every new fact has had to be won at the cost of laborious investigation. Yet so persistent has the quest been, and so eager the reception of every addition to our knowledge, that when Professor Campbell, searching the voluminous papers of the firm of Ellis and Allan, discovered that at a certain date the infant Edgar had suffered from a children's disease the fact was duly recorded in the pages of a learned journal. Neither the shifty prevarication of poor Poe, desperately ashamed of the outwardly sordid details of his career, nor the stubborn squeamishness of those connected in one way or another with him has availed against the equally stubborn persistence of scholars, and it is now possible for Mr. Allen to say in the preface to his biography: "There is no longer any necessity for talking about 'the Poe mystery,' indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that there are few other literary figures whose personal life is so fully documented." Poe's character and genius are both still mysteries, but we now know as much of the outward events of his career as there is any necessity for knowing.

Both of the present works are the result of great labor and both contain much information, a portion of which is new and a portion of which is, at least, not conveniently available in the pages of any other one book. Unfortunately, however, Miss Phillips's complete lack both of a critical sense and of any capacity for the arrangement of material renders her work nearly useless for any except those scholars who will employ it as they would employ any miscellaneous collection of documents. Mr. Allen, on the other hand, in spite of the extremely detailed character of his treatment, possesses sufficient sense of form to render his book readable. He has completely synthesized all previously known facts, he has added some details of his own, and, thanks to his labors, we are able to follow step by step the movements of Poe with an exactitude which leaves little to be desired.

It is to biography in the narrowest sense of the word that Mr. Allen has devoted himself. All criticism is definitely eschewed, and even character analysis is subordinated to objective narration. Obviously an admirer of Poe, he nevertheless makes few excuses for the more questionable incidents in his hero's career, and he appears to accept the theories which I advanced in my own study of Poe both in regard to the influence of the apparently psychic inhibition of his sexual impulses and in regard to the role which the exhibition of his powers of "ratiocination" played in his efforts to maintain his neurotic sense of superiority. But his chief concern is with outward events, and to these he devotes himself. The result is a work which will definitely supersede Woodberry's as the standard factual biography and which performs its task so well that for many years to come no similar work will be necessary. To the psychologist and to the critic he has left an open field, to the biographer little useful to do.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Rodin and Modern Art

Personal Reminiscences of Auguste Rodin. By Anthony M. Ludovici. J. B. Lippincott and Company. $3.

THE legendary figure of Rodin, as the Michelangelo of our days, has grown hugely since his death in the confusion of war time. The recent gift of an elegantly housed Rodin collection to the city of Philadelphia and the steady flow of hero-worshiping books by his admirers are indications of the vitality of that popular legend. Meanwhile the judgment of artists is divided; a few academicians still shudder at his "sadistic distortions," and the radicals commonly ignore him as the last writhe of a dying Hellenistic tradition.

These memoirs of an uncomfortable year as private secretary to the sculptor have no surprising revelations to offer; but they do good service in helping replace the fictitious Titan with a human being, likable for his rough honesty, keen discourse, and fresh enthusiasms, yet at close range often domineering and childishly vain. "It is never an easy task," Mr. Ludovici remarks, "to be associated, except on terms of equality, with a man of genius. . . . I found it impossible in the long run to maintain that attitude of unflinching sympathy, tolerance, and devotion . . . which he certainly did obtain from many of the women friends that surrounded him."

The chapters on Rodin as an artist are illuminating in their description of his aims and methods, but absurdly exaggerated in their estimate of his importance. All of modern art except Rodin's, from impressionism to cubism, is denounced as "puritanical and negative" because it has neglected the faithful portrayal of humanity (art's highest duty) and gone in for mere design—arrangements of color, line, and mass that lack subject interest, and therefore (for Mr. Ludovici) all interest. As evaluation this is unsound because based on the author's personal inability to enjoy design; but it points to a real difference, often ignored, between Rodin's motive for "distorting" and that of the younger modernists in sculpture. In distorting to secure a striking design of planes and masses, they are going back to certain archaic and primitive traditions (especially the Egyptian and Negro) with which Mr. Ludovici is apparently unfamiliar. They learn, too, from the Gothic, which he mistakenly interprets as stressing living movement rather than design. Rodin, he rightly shows, distorted to gain more vivid expression of physical life and emotion, and thus carried a step farther the late Greek and Renaissance tendencies. But in trying to seize the momentary aspects of things, the ripples and shadows of a changing surface, Rodin followed not only the late Greeks but those very impressionists whom the author condemns, and in the attempt he lost the monumental strength that his early works derived from Michelangelo. His masses became flaccid and shapeless, and unity of structure was swept away, in the feverish struggle to express in stone vague strivings and evanescent dreams for which that medium is hopelessly unsuited. The result is failure from the standpoint of adequate expression or integrated form. How could Rodin, or anyone else, have achieved the "success" which Mr. Ludovici claims for him in the self-contradictory task of "freeing the plastic medium from the limitations inherent in it"? The leaders in present-day sculpture frankly recognize the essential limits and possibilities of their medium, and try to utilize rather than escape from it. Yet, even in partial failure, Rodin is a more heroic figure than most of his modernist successors, who have found an easy road to trivial success through turning marble into neat mechanical patterns.

THOMAS MUNRO

Feats of Fancy

The Orphan Angel. By Elinor Wylie. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.
The Charwoman's Shadow. By Lord Dunsany. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.
Alexander and Three Small Plays. By Lord Dunsany. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.75.
The Music from Behind the Moon. By James Branch Cabell. The John Day Company. $6.

MISS WYLIE has achieved two difficult feats, one of which would seem worth double the pains to have avoided. This —the other being to confer upon the lamented Percy Bysshe Shelley an extended lease of life spent adventuring in the United States of 1822—was to resuscitate the unregretted narrative manner of the same period. One finds, accordingly, Miss Wylie being intermittently refined, being sarcastic at the expense of her own characters, being sentimental, being vivacious, approaching the boundary of archness; one wades through the observations of a comic relief and foil for Shelley, the egregious David Butternut; one hopes that honest fellow, who believed Portsmouth to be in Vermont, was equally misinformed as to the locutions to be expected of one born in the State of Maine. The story is a beautiful creation, an adventure in understanding which no amount of research could have seen through without some genuine sympathy with its subject's temper; in the writer's opinion it has been sacrificed to pastiche.

It may not have been sodden stupidity on the part of the reading public that accounted for the complete commercial failure of Dunsany's first two novels; it was not any degree of intelligence or taste; whatever it was, no different fate is likely to befall "The Charwoman's Shadow"—their shadow also in point of likeness as to color and substance. The Messrs. Putnam are to be commended for continuing to act on their recognition of work which should be published and the public be damned; one hopes they will yet be rewarded; yet if the fire, gold, laughter, music, and moonlight of "Don Rodriguez: Chronicles of Shadow Valley" could pass unnoticed, what is to be done? "The Charwoman's Shadow" is a monograph on shades and their magic and the black art in general; its scene is Spain again, this time at the end of the Golden Age and two generations after Rodriguez. It is to be observed, first that it is wholly delightful, then that it shows a distinct dilution of fancy and lessening of vitality as compared with "The King of Elf-Land's Daughter," just as that lovely drowsy tale did when read after Don Rodriguez. Such comparisons between works of art would gladly be foregone were they not inevitable where so superlative a standard has been established at the outset. Less compunction is felt on filing a return of nulla bona as to the collection of plays. As to "Alexander (The Great)" alone, it is difficult to predict that on the boards its lack of any particular idea will be noted in the face of its visual and atmospheric effectiveness. As to the playlets, one is nearly a self-parody on a favorite theme: "Don't Laugh, It May Be True"; one a faintly fatuous hymn to discouragement; one a portentously absurd conceit of Watt foreseeing the horrors of his industrial age, to an obligato of Satanic laughter. A melancholy array.

Mr. Cabell's brief and exquisite allegory expresses in compact form several of his previous observations on life and some of his literary philosophy. It is not for the first time, and one hopes not for the last, that his young man has his love through superhuman exploits only to find that she now shuts from him rather than conducts as before the music he supposed emanated from her very person; the music which indeed may have been no more than his own worthiest imagining. The book as concisely illustrates its author's consummate craftsmanship in the telling of stories and the happy concatenation of words, his wry humor, his soaring and probably inexhaustible invention, for all of which gifts the writer thanks him or whomever he himself would thank; it exhibits no less clearly his incurable didacticism, his occasional but inevitable unlovely snicker, his lapses—especially where he cannot but hit out at contemporary figures or idiocies unworthy his printed record—from the ironic to the sarcastic plane; in spite of all which the writer will continue eagerly to read him without hope of surprise or fear of disappointment.

ABBE NILES

The Farmer Today

The Expansion of Rural Life. By James Mickel Williams. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.
Handbook of Rural Social Resources. Edited by Henry Israel and Benson Y. Landis. University of Chicago Press. $2.
Needed Readjustments in Rural Life. University of Chicago Press. $2.

CONTRARY to common belief, the farmer has regularly been dominated by the subjective rather than the objective. In spite of his working constantly with things rather than ideas, his beliefs and attitudes have been determined by traditional religion, by theories of education, by ancient agricultural beliefs. And the typical book dealing with the farmer and rural life proceeds in the same way. It fits rural life to a theory, a pattern, instead of building theories and patterns on actual examination of rural conditions and the rural mind.

The only important exceptions to this method among the works that I know are the two books of James Mickel Williams, "Our Rural Heritage," published a year or so ago, and its sequel, "The Expansion of Rural Life," just issued. The former dealt with the period up to 1874, during which rural conditions determined the course of American theory and life. The latter book treats of the period from 1874 to today. The author's method in gathering his material offers an illuminating contrast with the usual type of rural investigation. The typical "student of rural life" surveys the United States—and sometimes France, Germany, and Scandinavia as well—in six months, and arrives at the anticipated conclusions. Mr. Williams for more than twenty years has studied the history and social psychology of a single rural community in the State of New York. He has not, of course, used this community alone. He has used it as a norm, with frequent comparisons with other communities.

"The Expansion of Rural Life" presents as vivid and realistic a picture as did its predecessor. Its conclusions are the necessary outgrowth of the author's minute study. They will be subject to future modification, but only on the basis of investigation similar to that which Mr. Williams has made. The book is the best published study of the gradually changing psychology of the farmer under modern conditions. Family life, religion, education, intellectual attitudes, political views, the cooperative movement are presented with a wealth of illustrative detail. Mr. Williams is not only a profound research scholar but a wise, tolerant observer of humanity.

The "Handbook of Rural Social Resources," edited for the American Country Life Association and the Department of Research and Education of the Federal Council of Churches, will prove useful to any observer of rural life. Fourteen articles of varying merit, ranging in subject from rural art to farm credit, are followed by a section embodying the programs of national agencies engaged in rural social work. The lack of adequate bibliographical references is unfortunate, since the book cannot treat its subjects exhaustively and many of its readers will be persons untrained in hunting up such data.

"Needed Readjustments in Rural Life" consists of the proceedings of the American Country Life Conference held in 1925 in Richmond, Virginia. The volume is as dull as the stenographic reports of most meetings—possibly duller, because this convention was devoted largely to perfecting the technique of what is called "the discussion method" of carrying on a conference. The published comment of E. C. Lindeman, chief proponent of this method, will enable any reader to decide whether he will be either informed or thrilled by the book:

> I had a feeling this morning that in our little group—and I have it here now—at last, out of many of these confusions, and sometimes differences which amounted to antagonistic feeling, there is being born in this group a desire to be not only friendly with each other, not only to understand and comprehend all of the various points and approaches, but there seems to be in this group now, there seems to have developed in the last four or five hours, a really spiritual kind of unity. If we only had the time now, I think we could do something quite glorious, quite adventurous, quite new and fresh for the American Country Life Association.

Romantic, I call it.

NELSON ANTRIM CRAWFORD

The Russian Hamlet

Turgenev. The Man, His Art, and His Age. By Avrahm Yarmolinsky. The Century Company. $4.

A STUDY like Mr. Yarmolinsky's is a challenge to those who insist that relating a writer's personality and his experience to his books may be interesting, but is not literary criticism. There are the novels. Why go behind them? In Turgenev's case no one has gone behind them in any systematic and scholarly way. This biography is the first in any language. In the absence of efforts to link related phenomena in his life and his art, certain mistaken notions have become the battered coinage of criticism. His own explanation of the premature death of Bazarov, his strongest character, has been accepted: that this nihilist was "doomed to perish because he was only on the threshold of the future." But Mr. Yarmolinsky suggests that Turgenev killed Bazarov off in obedience less to a law of that man's nature than to a law of his own nature; that "he could never quite bring himself to crown the work of his characters with success, or to grant them that sense of accomplishment which he had never fully tasted himself." Yet Turgenev has always been considered among the most objective of novelists; and so the frustration, futility, and incapacity for action so marked in his heroes have been assumed to be typical Russian traits.

The Russian Hamlet has had as strong a hold on the popular imagination as that mystic Slav soul which we owe largely to sentimentalized, selective versions of Dostoevsky's life and fiction. Biographical data have been recently clearing up the mists around Dostoevsky and the Slav soul. Mr. Yarmolinsky is fairly safe now in contrasting Turgenev, the "meek pagan," with Dostoevsky, the "vicious Christian," in the chapter devoted to the quarrel between the two artists. The mists around the Russian Hamlet—so far as Turgenev is responsible for him—are almost dissipated by this biography. Anyone, Danish or Russian or what you will, with a mother like Turgenev's, is cast for the stellar role in "Hamlet." It is true that as a novelist Turgenev was studiously objective in intention. Like his mother, whose letters reveal her as an acute observer with a gift of pithy expression, he was alert to every aspect of the sensible world. "His mind, nevertheless, was a mind that turned inward. He lived, like a character in one of his early works, in a room walled with mirrors, and created most of his heroes in his own image." Bazarov, the apparent exception, is "in some respects a fulfilment of Turgenev's day-dream of the self he vainly longed to be."

The deepest quality of a work of art, as Henry James said, is the quality of the mind of its producer. Broaden the conception of mind to include all those outlying twilight regions that were still unexplored when James made this remark, and one will be in a position to grasp the deepest quality of Turgenev's work. It is the special distinction of Mr. Yarmolinsky's biography that it disengages this quality. There are half a dozen aspects that tempt the reviewer of his complete, illuminating, and—in the final impression—deeply moving study. But the central fact for the understanding of both Turgenev's life and his art is his emotional subjection to two women, his mother and the famous singer, Pauline Viardot. And it is in the telling of this story that the most valuable unpublished material has been drawn upon. What a portrait emerges of the mother! This eccentric and imperious woman, who knew the bitterness of the dissatisfied wife, and the pleasures, tinged with sadism, of the serf-owner, built her emotional life, after her husband's death, upon her children, especially Ivan. Old-fashioned people would say that she broke her son's will. New-fashioned ones will enjoy a Freudian holiday over significant passages in her letters. She addresses her son as "ma chère fille"; she calls herself his father, and says "I alone conceived you." "As your first love was naturally your mother, pale, sallow, nervous, so you are accustomed to love sallow women." He escaped from her dominating presence whenever he could and developed a hatred of self-assertiveness that made him incapable of ever standing up for his rights. To him, as to his heroes, the call to action was the cue for evasion.

He first met Mme Viardot in 1843, some years before his mother's death, and only the withholding of supplies from Russia drew him back from France. It was his mother's misfortune to be passionate without being lovable. It was his misfortune that Mme Viardot was lovable without being passionate. At least she was afraid of passion, except as it could be expressed through her art. She made her relation with Turgenev and with her other admirers what she desired it to be—that of friendship. He came finally to accept the cold comfort of sitting on the edge of another man's nest—a broad and well-cushioned edge. What finally died in him was not his love but the hope of its being returned. This incomplete and wistful liaison, as Mr. Yarmolinsky calls it, lasted until his death, and runs, like a leit-motif, through all his activities and friendships. It furnished him, among other things, with the satisfaction of self-pity, and allowed him "to nurse his sense of unfulfilment and frustration." Mr. Yarmolinsky's convincing and subtle handling of it brings us at the end to complete agreement with the words in his imagined epitaph on Turgenev: "One who knew no fulfilment save in his art."

DOROTHY BREWSTER

Books in Brief

The Log of the Grand Turks. By Robert E. Peabody. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.75.

Yarns from a Windjammer. By Mannin Crane. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

The first of these volumes is built around the fact that within the last 150 years four sailing vessels have borne successively the unusual name Grand Turk. Elias Hasket Derby, a shrewd merchant of Salem, fitted out the original Grand Turk as a privateer in the War of the Revolution, and she piled up money in his counting-house through many rich captures. The same owner sent out the second Grand Turk a number of years later, and she was equally profitable in the early commerce with China. The third Grand Turk was a privateer in the War of 1812; the last a trading schooner in the World War. Mr. Peabody has been as successful in digging historical and nautical gold out of the log books and other records of these four vessels as they themselves were in making hard dollars for their owners. Mr. Crane's volume is written from the log books of his memory, and contains some pleasant reminiscences of sailing-ship days.

The Dark Dawn. By Martha Ostenso. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

Our novelists continue their intensive cultivation of the prairie country, and the furrows grow longer if not deeper. "The Dark Dawn" springs from soil which is fairly rich and certainly dependable, and the harvest is romance mixed with tragedy. The characters are strongly drawn and retain their reality until they come to emotional climaxes, when their creator lets down the bars of melodrama. On the whole, a swift-moving and convincing tale.

The Chariot of Fire. By Bernard De Voto. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The groves were God's first temples, and the backwoods were his first camp-meeting grounds. The author has imagined a frontier community of a hundred years ago in the throes of a religious frenzy, and if the story does not yield much butter, it certainly is not from lack of churning. One finds the novel fairly plausible as a study of revivalism, but it fails to capture one's interest as a story.

Introduction to Sally. By "Elizabeth." Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.50.

This novel is written with the courage of its potential readers' convictions, and that is a comfortable majority. The fact that Sally is so dumb as to be uninteresting, if not incredible, and the fact that she is so beautiful as to be incredible, if not uninteresting, is beside the best-seller point. The book is frequently witty, occasionally observant, but rarely real. As for the heroine—well—as the author herself says—"Sally was necessarily dumb."

Jesting Pilate. By Aldous Huxley. George H. Doran Company. $3.50.

Mr. Huxley travels wisely but not too well. He has a chronic indisposition to accept the world as he explores it, and his objections are voiced—and sustained—in provocative paragraphs. This volume is a record of his observations in India, Burma, and other parts of the Orient, topped off with his reactions to America. It proves to be an adroit blend of sightseeing and soothsaying.

The Autobiography of a Chinese Dog. Edited by Florence Ayscough. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

As was to be expected, Mrs. Ayscough here delivers a great deal of information concerning China; the vehicle she has chosen, however, is her dog—and one is never quite sure of the pertinence of this medium.

Interesting Books of 1926

CHOSEN BY MARK VAN DOREN

Abraham Lincoln. By Carl Sandburg. Harcourt, Brace.
Israfel. By Hervey Allen. Doran.
Jefferson. By Albert Jay Nock. Harcourt, Brace.
George Washington. By W. E. Woodward. Boni and Liveright.
Edgar Allan Poe. By Joseph Wood Krutch. Knopf.
The Verdict of Bridlegoose. By Llewelyn Powys. Harcourt, Brace.
The Mauve Decade. By Thomas Beer. Knopf.
Social and Economic History of the Roman Empire. By M. Rostovtzeff. Oxford.
The Art of Being Ruled. By Wyndham Lewis. Harper.
The Heart of Emerson's Journals. By Bliss Perry. Houghton Mifflin.
The Golden Day. By Lewis Mumford. Boni and Liveright.
Transition. By Edwin Muir. Viking.
Prejudices: Fifth Series. By H. L. Mencken. Knopf.
The Road Round Ireland. By Padraic Colum. Macmillan.
The Collected Poems of Ezra Pound. Boni and Liveright.
Children of the Sun. By James Rorty. Macmillan.
The Second Book of Negro Spirituals. By James Weldon Johnson and J. Rosamond Johnson. Viking.
The Great God Brown. By Eugene O'Neill. Boni and Liveright.
The Time of Man. By Elizabeth Madox Roberts. Viking.
Palimpsest. By H. D. Houghton Mifflin.
Four Tales by "Zelide." Scribner.
Nize Baby. By Milt Gross. Doran.

Drama

Another Captive

IN "The Silver Cord" (John Golden Theater) Sidney Howard dramatizes a complex and does it more successfully than anyone else has succeeded in doing since Freud first presented the playwright with a new implement of analysis. Two seasons ago there was a series of special matinee performances of a piece called simply "The Complex," which transferred a case history directly to the stage, and this fall the public has been rather unaccountably enthusiastic over the mediocre merits of "The Captive," which uses a phenomenon of abnormal psychology in the construction of a play which is, in every other respect, thoroughly conventional. Mr. Howard, however, has gone much further. Not only has he written a drama in which the conflict is always and consistently a conflict between psychological forces, but he has, in addition, so thoroughly assimilated the point of view of the psychopathologist as to use it successfully for the transvaluation of values. In "The Captive" the lesbian passion of the heroine is merely postulated, never anatomized, and so far as any understanding of the conclusions to be drawn from a recognition of the existence of such passions is concerned it leaves us exactly where we were in the beginning; Mr. Howard, on the other hand, boldly delineates the features of the abnormality with which he is concerned, and in a superb concluding scene he manages, in powerfully dramatic fashion, to confront the conclusions of the scientist with those of the layman. Compared with this, "The Captive" is merely conventional stage carpentry disguised by sensationalism.

The theme of the play is the abnormal devotion of a mother to her sons, and it is treated in a situation which lies upon the borderline between definite neurosis and what would ordinarily be regarded as a mere quirk of character. Victim of a loveless marriage, the mother has transferred the whole of her affection to her two boys and demanded of them the undivided devotion which her dead husband had failed to give her. Disguising her perverted love even from herself under the form of maternal solicitude, she has accustomed them to center every thought and desire around her, and neither has ever severed the cord which makes him still part of her. The one, escaping abroad to study, has all but freed himself, while his younger brother, remaining at home, has been reduced to the position of a mere tame cat by the fireside, and when the elder returns he too finds himself once more under the spell of his deadening fixation. His young wife, a research biologist, senses the situation, and the play centers about the struggle between her and the mother for the possession of his soul.

Not only has Mr. Howard maintained the suspense and anatomized the situation with a touch both sure and delicate; he has gradually deepened the tone as the play proceeds so that while it begins as comedy it skirts the edge of tragedy before it reaches its highly dramatic denouement. Forced at last to declare themselves openly as enemies, the two women face each other in a duel for which the son is an unwilling referee. In a speech full of passionate conviction the mother states her case and then the girl, with the cool ruthlessness of intellectual analysis, dissects it bit by bit, exposing the sinister mechanism which sentimentality would hide and insisting upon the cruel fact that affection too much prolonged is mere usurpation. "You," cries the mother, "do not know good from evil." "At least," replies the girl, "I know Life from Death." And with that the case must rest—not only this case but the whole case of rationality versus feeling, the new morality versus the old.

I remember no recent play which has so successfully undertaken to transvaluate values. No subject is more delicate and no subject more commonly held too sacred for examination than the subject of mother love. Yet so skilfully has Mr. Howard conducted his argument and so clearly has he defined the limits of his thesis that even moderately robust spirits will find the piece absorbing rather than offensive; and thus he has not only written a very fine play but won for intelligence the right to exercise itself upon a subject still generally taboo. Nothing which the Theater Guild has produced this season can give it a more legitimate occasion for pride. It has provided an excellent cast—Laura Hope Crews, Margalo Gillmore, Elliot Cabot, Elizabeth Risdon, and Earl Larimore—and it has found a play worthy of their efforts.

Three other recent plays call for some mention. "The Constant Wife" (Maxine Elliott Theater) is an urbane and amusing comedy which W. Somerset Maugham has composed and in which Ethel Barrymore is appearing. It tells the story of a wife who set out to earn her own living in order that she might have a right to commit adultery, and it is—as this synopsis may indicate—rather desperately sophisticated; but a sufficient number of the author's epigrams actually come off to make it entertaining. "The Constant Nymph" (Selwyn Theater), made from the very popular novel of the same name, will, like most pieces so constructed, please most those who read the novel with great delight. Considered merely as a play it is rather too sketchy to be wholly successful. At the Civic Repertory Theater Miss Le Gallienne has added "Twelfth Night" to the already long list of her productions. Though no one would be inclined to call the presentation perfect, she is obviously on the right track in discarding the Victorian tradition which made of this comedy a semi-realistic sentimental play and in presenting it instead as a completely fantastic comedy with conventionalized setting and costume. The performances of Egdon Brecher as Sir Toby and Sayre Crawley as Malvolio are individually very fine.

At the Plymouth Theater substantially the same company which gave such a delightful performance of "Iolanthe" is appearing in an equally delightful one of "The Pirates of Penzance." Nothing at present on Broadway is more emphatically worth seeing.

A correction. Credit for the extraordinary performance of the fanatical priest in "The Witch" should be given to Mr. Erskine Sanford.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

DEBATES ☐ LECTURES

The Rand School of Social Science
7 East 15th Street, New York

MARGARET BONDFIELD, M.P.

Secretary to the Ministry of Labor in the Macdonald Government and Former Chairman of the Trades Union Congress General Council will speak on

"The Labor Struggle in Britain"

Wednesday, January 5, 8:30 P. M.

Reserved Seats $1.00 General Admission 50c

DEBATE

CLARENCE S. DARROW Famous Debater and Lawyer
VERSUS
WILL DURANT Author of "Story of Philosophy"

SUBJECT

IS MAN A MACHINE?

DARROW says YES! DURANT says NO!

Chairman Dr. JOHN B. WATSON (Author of "Behaviorism")

SATURDAY, JANUARY 8th, 8.30 P. M.
CARNEGIE HALL

Tickets: $1.10, $1.65, $2.20, $2.75, $3.30, including tax.
ON SALE at Box Office or by mail or at offices of
LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION 500 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK Telephone Longacre 4447

N. B.—Out-of-towners can reserve a printed ad verbatim report of this debate by remitting $1 now.

DEBATE

"Have the Mechanical Aspects of Civilization benefited Humanity?"

WM. B. GUTHRIE, Prof. of Government, C. C. N. Y., says "YES."
LEON SAMSON, Well known lecturer, says "NO."
Chairman, ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 9, 1927, 2 P. M.
Manhattan Lyceum, 66 E. 4th St.

Tickets, 75 cents. For sale at Rand School, 7 E. 15th Street, and Jimmie Higgins Bookshop, 127 University Place.

"ASIA AND THE WESTERN WORLD"

COURSE OF SIX LECTURES
By WILLIAM R. SHEPHERD, Ph.D., L.H.D.
In the COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM
Park Avenue and 34th Street
On THURSDAY EVENINGS, Jan. 6, 13, 20, 27; Feb. 3, 10 at 8:15
Course Tickets, $3.50, can be secured in advance at the office of the Community Church, 12 Park Avenue, New York City. Single Admission 75 cents.

☐ DINNER ☐

ARTHUR PONSONBY, M. P.

(First appearance in America)

head of the movement to obtain a million pledges not to support any future declaration of war by Great Britain,

WILL BE GUEST OF HONOR AT A DINNER OF THE

Women's Peace Society

Hotel Astor, New York, January 25, 1927, 7 P. M.

For reservations, at $3.50 a plate, write at once to
Women's Peace Society, 20 Vesey St., New York

International Relations Section

Whose Land—Whose Rubber?

By VICENTE G. BUNUAN

THE Filipinos want to help America solve her rubber problem. Our land laws, applicable to all, Filipinos included, were designed to protect our country from concentration of huge tracts of land in the hands of a few. This policy reflects the conservation era of America's history, and was applied to the Philippines by Congress itself when it passed the Philippine Organic Act of 1902, which contained provisions even more restrictive than those in the present law. So far as the Philippines are concerned it is distinctly American both in concept and application and was heartily embraced by Filipinos.

During the Spanish regime the effects of immense landholdings in the Philippines were disastrous; the American Government itself sent William Howard Taft to Rome in 1907 to negotiate with the Pope for the purchase for $7,500,000 by the Philippine Government of the vast friar lands that they might be sold in small parcels to the tenants; in addition to this, the sufferings of peoples under the old feudal system; the ghastly conditions now existing in the rubber areas of the Congo and Amazon forests; and the present conflicts in Mexico have served as a warning to the Filipinos of the dangers of opening up their national wealth to unrestricted investment.

The restrictions in our land laws are such that development of our rubber lands by moderate-size holdings is perfectly possible. An individual or a corporation may, under the present law, purchase 2,500 acres and lease an equal amount for a period of twenty-five years, subject to renewal for two additional twenty-five-year periods. This provision is neither too restrictive to make impossible the profitable growing of rubber nor too liberal to convert us into victims of exploitation. In this connection the report of the committee authorized by Congress to investigate rubber growing in the Philippines, entitled "Possibilities for Para Rubber Production in the Philippine Islands," says:

> The present land laws, designed to retain a diffused land ownership, do not lend themselves to large-capital corporations in rubber lands. Nevertheless moderate-size plantations are possible with foreign capital and, moreover, the small native planter might become a producer of important further supplies.

Dr. James W. Strong, vice-president and general manager of the American Rubber Company of Mindanao, who has been in the rubber business in the archipelago for twenty-one years, in an article in the June, 1926, issue of the American Chamber of Commerce Journal of the Philippines, says:

> There is no reason why America cannot grow her own rubber in the Philippine Islands under present conditions. . . . The present land law permits the buying of 2,500 acres and the leasing of an equal amount. This area is a good economic unit. Were it permissible to hold larger areas, they would certainly be split up into similar sizes for advantageous management. Why not start it off in that way?

Even large-scale production is possible under the present law. Corporations to purchase lands within the limitations of the present land laws may be financed by American capital and, in this way, rubber in quantities sufficient for the needs of the United States may be grown. Contracts could be entered into between the financing company and the small corporations by which rubber would be delivered to the former at the market price or at a price specified in the contract. Whether or not American capital enters the Philippines, the Filipinos are experimenting in rubber production and will produce great quantities in the next twenty-five years. An arrangement of a similar nature has been going on in connection with our sugar industry; its success testifies to the fact that the application of our present land legislation is not hampering the economic growth of our country. Millions of dollars have been invested in the sugar centrals by corporations that do not own the lands but have contracts with the farmers, who, by virtue of such contracts, turn over the sugar cane raised by them to the centrals.

It is suggested—almost with the gesture of a threat—that if the Filipinos do not open their lands to what would amount to unlimited investments, Congress should take a hand and modify the present land laws of the Philippines. To do so would be an infringement of the rights granted by Congress to the Filipino people. Section 9 of the Jones Act, the present organic act of the Philippines, provides:

> All property and rights which may have been acquired in the Philippine Islands by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain signed December 10, 1898, . . . are hereby placed under the control of the government of said islands to be administered or disposed of for the benefit thereof, and the Philippine Legislature shall have the power to legislate with respect to all such matters as it may deem advisable: but acts of the Philippine Legislature with reference to land of the public domain, timber, and mining, hereafter enacted, shall not have the force of law until approved by the President.

The intention of Congress as expressed in this section of the Jones Act is made the more clear by the proviso that all such legislation must first be approved by the President of the United States before taking effect: the Philippine Legislature to legislate and the United States Government through the President to check. For Congress, therefore, to initiate legislation with reference to our public lands, instead of letting our legislature act as it deems best, would be an unjustified curtailment of our right.

It is here reiterated that only the granting of independence will finally solve the economic problems of the Philippines. This point of view is clearly expressed in a resolution adopted by the Philippine Legislature which was presented to Colonel Thompson upon his departure from Manila:

> We believe that the chief reason why the full material development of the country has not been accomplished is that we have been denied the powers necessary to shape our economic policies. We are firmly convinced that independence alone will give us these powers. Delay in granting independence prevents us from adopting a policy which would facilitate the coming of capital from abroad, and constrains us to oppose an amendment of our land laws which would permit vast organizations of capital securing unlimited areas of our public lands. We likewise are opposed to any economic policy which would allow selfish exploitation of our natural resources.

The Cost of the British Coal Strike

THE following résumé of the enormous cost to British industry occasioned by the five months' coal strike just ended was compiled by the London General Press.

The coal industry was completely shut down at the outbreak of the General Strike in May, the only coal of British production which was forthcoming being a weekly total of about 100,000 tons from outcrops, a mere trickle compared with the weekly flow of 5,000,000 tons obtaining under normal conditions. Early in August the first serious breach in the miners' front occurred and thereafter the return of dissatisfied members of the Miners' Federation continued fairly steadily.

On a broad calculation the monthly loss of commercially disposable coal arising out of the stoppage may be put at about 19,000,000 tons during the period May-August, thereafter declining to about 14,000,000 tons in the four weeks preceding the settlement of the dispute. The total loss of production was probably in the neighborhood of 110,000,000 to 120,000,000 tons, which at the abnormally low pit-head prices prevailing before the strike would represent a gross monetary loss of about £90,000,000 to £95,000,000. Of this total about three-fourths, or say £70,000,000, is represented by loss of wages. The miners thus were called upon to shoulder the heaviest individual share of the cost of the stoppage.

The railways are among the most obvious of the secondary sufferers by the dispute. Depression in the "heavy" industries —iron and steel, etc.—had already left its mark on the earnings of the railways in 1925, when every trunk line drew on reserves in order to pay dividends on its ordinary stock. Early in 1926, however, recovery was in progress and receipts were running ahead of those of the corresponding months of 1925. Then came the General Strike which almost completely immobilized the railways for nearly a fortnight. Full passenger services were restored a few weeks after the General Strike, oil fuel and imported coal being pressed into service, but reduced general traffic, the absence of any outward movement of coal, and stagnation in the iron and steel trades were largely responsible for a drop of £26,000,000 in gross earnings up to the first week of November, 1926, as compared with the corresponding period of 1925. Some part of this loss will doubtless have been offset by the reduced wages enforced as a penalty for the General Strike, but the foreign coal and oil fuel used in maintaining services have been many times more expensive than the domestic commodity as normally consumed.

Next come the iron and steel trades. The more finished branches, such as structural steel, maintained some sort of production under difficulties, drawing on whatever stocks of fuel and semi-finished materials happened to be close at hand during the early weeks of the stoppage, and on foreign supplies later on. In this respect those works nearest the seaboard enjoyed the greatest advantage. The production of pig-iron and steel, however, came to an almost complete standstill, the monthly loss under this heading averaging, on a conservative computation, about 500,000 tons of pig-iron and 600,000 tons of steel. At prestrike prices and allowing for the absence of any expenditures under the heading of fuel, the total monetary loss will probably reach £35,000,000. This figure allows for a period of three or four months after the present coal settlement, which must necessarily elapse before the industry is again fully under way. Part of the loss may, of course, be recovered if a period of unusual activity follows the settlement, representing the "catching up" of orders which have accumulated during the dispute, but the lion's share can probably be put down as lost.

For other industries we have no direct data, reliable figures as to home production being lacking, but two sets of official returns throw considerable light on the matter, viz., the statistics of overseas trade and the unemployment-insurance returns. Exports of cotton yarns and manufactured goods have fallen off by £36,500,000 in the first ten months of 1926, as

Mr. EDWARD W. TITUS, publisher, of 4, Rue Delambre, Paris XIV, France, invites subscriptions to the autographed de luxe edition, limited to 500 copies for America and not to be printed there, of

THE CASE OF MR. CRUMP

by

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Author of Up-Stream, Israel, etc.

a work that enlarges the boundaries of imaginative narrative and exhibits the writer's mind and style at a new and unforeseen height of culmination.

Ten dollars the numbered copy.

To obtain a copy mail your check to the above address to-day.

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

The course is open to graduates of colleges and universities of recognized standing.

Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.

Special courses will be arranged for social workers in accordance with their needs.

For information, address the

Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL

For

JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)

210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

compared with the same months of 1925, woolen and worsted yarns manufactures by £7,250,000; other textiles and clothing by £3,000,000; pottery by £1,000,000; leather, boots, and shoes by £500,000. The falling off in British exports of all kinds for the same period amounts to no less than £97,000,000. Similarly, we find in every case a significant increase in the numbers for Great Britain and Northern Ireland of registered unemployed, exclusive of coal miners on strike.

TOTAL NUMBERS UNEMPLOYED

	On the eve of stoppage	After five months' stoppage
Cotton	56,708	139,555
Woolen and worsted	25,012	43,818
Other textiles	68,168	92,145
Pig iron	3,426	16,613
Steel	40,722	101,461
Engineering	70,213	109,950
Shipbuilding	83,896	99,285
Boot and shoe	10,413	18,497
Pottery	9,663	22,501
Railways	9,376	22,330
Other trades	716,232	982,167
All trades	1,093,829	1,648,322

These disturbances of the national earning power will be reflected, in due course, in a decline in the national revenue in 1926-1927, and still more in 1927-1928, though its dimensions will not be known until many months have elapsed. The small surplus budgeted for last April has already disappeared, and the Chancellor cannot well escape the necessity of asking Parliament for its assent to new taxation proposals next year.

The figures given above afford some idea of the extremely costly nature of the late stoppage, and the wide area over which its losses have been spread. An approximate idea of the total loss under all headings can be arrived at by adopting the estimate of the Westminster Bank (one of the "Big Five" British institutions), that the stoppage reduced the effective productive power of the country by 15 per cent, involving a weekly falling-off in the national income of £10,000,000. For the twenty-nine weeks of the stoppage, and including an extra £15,000,000 on account of the General Strike in the first fortnight of May, the aggregate loss thus comes out at £305,000,000.

Contributors to This Issue

FRANCES PARKINSON KEYES, the wife of Senator Keyes of New Hampshire, is an editor of Good Housekeeping and author of "Letters from a Senator's Wife."

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is in Washington as national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

FRANK R. KENT will speak on Calvin Coolidge at the fifth Nation dinner, April 12.

HARBOR ALLEN is publicity director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

GLADYS OAKS is a New York poet.

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE is editor of the Emporia (Kansas) Gazette, and author of numerous books.

THOMAS MUNRO is one of the authors of "Primitive Negro Sculpture."

ABBE NILES is one of the editors of "Blues: An Anthology."

NELSON ANTRIM CRAWFORD is director of information, United States Department of Agriculture.

DOROTHY BREWSTER is assistant professor of English at Columbia University.

VICENTE G. BUNUAN is director of the Philippine Press Bureau in Washington.

The author of A Deflated Rebel is at present an accomplished amateur.

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

A LUNCHEON RESORT FOR THE DISCRIMINATING CLIENTELE—THOSE APPRECIATING UNEXCELLED CUISINE AND SERVICE.

EVENINGS—SPECIAL PARTIES ONLY. ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS, SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.

OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management
by THEODORE KEMM

GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

Conveniently located
Modern fireproof
Last minute efficiency
Elaborate café
Systematized operation
Select accommodations

Washington boasts many hotels, but the Brighton is unique in combining the best quality of all.

It is a mark of distinction to stop at the Brighton Hotel in Washington

—the Brighton offers you real Southern hospitality plus every modern convenience of a beautifully appointed fire-proof hotel. Here you find an atmosphere you expect at the National Capital. Each guest gets courteous personal attention under our system. The Brighton is within a few minutes of Government activities, parks, clubs, embassies, shopping district, golf courses, bridle paths, and the business section.

Rates $2.50 and up per day.
Booklet mailed on request.

THE BRIGHTON HOTEL
2123 California St., N. W. Washington, D. C.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 12, 1927 No. 3210

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 25

EDITORIALS:

Wanted—An Opposition 28
The Decline of Europe 29
Authors with Lanterns 29
What Does the War Lord Mean? 30

CARTOON. By Harry S. Bressler 31

POISON GAS, 1915-1926:

German Atrocity—American Necessity. By H. S. Villard 32
Chemical Warfare, a New Industry. By Robert S. Allen 33

MUSSOLINI CHOKES THE PRESS. By Gaetano Salvemini 34

TWO BLOCKS FROM BROADWAY. By Harbor Allen 36

THE AMERICAN GOD IN RUSSIA. By Marian Tyler 37

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 38

CORRESPONDENCE 39

BOOKS AND PLAYS:

Self. By Witter Bynner 41
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 41
The Beginning and End of Marriage. By Mary Austin 41
The Scandal of the Sects. By John Haynes Holmes 42
The Process of John Erskine. By Clifton P. Fadiman 42
A Welter of Witches. By Lynn Thorndike 43
The Universe Made Familiar. By Daniel Bell Leary 44
Sir Hubert Parry. By Daniel Gregory Mason 44
Books in Brief 45
Interesting Books of 1926. Chosen by Carl Van Doren 46
Drama: An Elegant Comedy. By Joseph Wood Krutch 46

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

A Chart of World Business. By Wesley Mitchell 48
Italian-Albanian Treaty 50

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT
DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

GOVERNOR WALKER OF GEORGIA says that he will declare martial law in Toombs County "if the regular processes of the courts fail to curb these outrages," and the chief Klucker of the Ku Klux Klan in Georgia denounces the flogging of Wimberly E. Brown by a gang of Georgians clad in flour-sacks stamped "K. K. K." Mr. Brown, an attorney, had committed the crime of assisting in the prosecution of alleged members of another hooded gang which, last July, killed one Willie Wilson. Georgia has a right to be proud of Governor Walker and to inquire whether the North does as well. New Jersey does not. Recently a State trooper tried to serve a warrant on a lonely farmer at Jutland. (The farmer was charged with maltreating his cattle, but the charge proved to be unfounded.) The farmer was suspicious and threatened the trooper; the trooper fired at him, then went back for reinforcements. Before the night was over a gang of thirty troopers had smashed every window in the farmer's home, thrown seven stink-bombs into it, killed his sister, and wounded his brother. The Governor is reported to think no investigation necessary, and the commander of the State troopers says he is proud of his men. New Jersey's officials could learn something about civilization and decency from Georgia's.

IF CONGRESS WISHES to decree the death penalty for all persons drinking liquids containing more than one-half of one per cent of alcohol it has the constitutional power to do so. It has not so voted, but the death penalty is being imposed. Not universally, but sufficiently to explain a large part of the hundreds of deaths from Christmas and New Year's drinking in the United States. One need not be an anti-prohibitionist to stand aghast at this policy of poisoning by a Treasury Department which lets millions of gallons of unpoisoned liquor slip out of its grasp and through its blockades. Congress has voted thirty million dollars for enforcement of prohibition; and it is difficult for us to believe that a Secretary of the Treasury with half of Mr. Mellon's brains—one who had not made millions in the distillery business—could not do a little better at enforcement without poisoning. Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler may honestly feel that prohibition is so important an issue that the Government is justified in poisoning those who violate it; few will agree. We believe that the bulk of those who voted for it in the long years of growing prohibition sentiment in this country would have recoiled in horror had they foreseen such a result of their vote.

ON CHRISTMAS EVE American marines were landed at Puerto Cabezas, Nicaragua. Thereafter Mr. Vaca, representative in Washington of the Sacasa Government, was unable to communicate with his chiefs in Nicaragua. Naturally, he suspected and charged that Admiral Latimer was maintaining a censorship. The United Press, informed by the cable companies that messages were being held up, also suspected and charged censorship. But on December 26, again on December 27, again on December 28, and on December 29 the State Department categorically denied the charge, insisting that the United States had imposed no censorship on communications to or from the Sacasa Government. On December 30, however—we quote from the New York Times—"Secretary Kellogg announced that the State Department had learned that Admiral Latimer had for a time imposed a censorship, now withdrawn, on the messages of the Liberal forces in the neutral zones established by the American naval forces." Since then Secretary Kellogg has added another palpable fib to the Department's record, denying that his aide, Mr. Olds, secretly sought to induce the press associations to spread irresponsible anti-Mexican propaganda. Isn't it time for somebody to resign?

MEXICO HAS DELAYED action against the oil companies which took Secretary Kellogg's advice and refused to register in accordance with Mexican law. The State Department, consequently, is marking time, although the dispatches credit Secretary Kellogg with a head full of plans and schemes of reprisal. But why all the pother? The Foreign Policy Association sanely recalls that Article 21 of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848, confirmed in the 1908 convention between the United States and Mexico, reads in part as follows:

> A resort shall not . . . be had, to reprisals, aggression, or hostility of any kind . . . until the government of that [country] which deems itself aggrieved shall have maturely considered in the spirit of peace and good neighborship whether it would not be better that such differences should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side or by that of a friendly nation. And should such course be proposed by either party it shall be acceded to by the other unless deemed by it altogether incompatible with the nature of the differences or the circumstances of the case.

Why not arbitrate instead of growling?

ELIHU ROOT'S BRIEF ADDRESS in accepting the $25,000 award of the Woodrow Wilson Foundation was an impressive plea in behalf of the League of Nations and the World Court.

> These institutions [he said] have been teaching the people of Europe to think in terms of peace rather than in terms of war. They have been teaching them by actual practice, by things done, to think of conference instead of war. . . . The question of war or peace for the next generation is being settled now, today, by the character and habits of thought and feeling, the standards of conduct which the people of the world are learning to guide them in the exigencies of the future. . . . We, the great peace-loving people, what have we done to help in this wonderful new work? No sympathy, no moral support, no brotherhood.

Some of us still believe that the United States does well, while cooperating in conference and discussion, to stand aloof from the political structure of a League which is tied to the Treaty of Versailles, dominated by the colonial Powers of Europe, and excludes Soviet Russia. But there is no place for a holier-than-thou spirit in an America which snarls at Mexico, lands troops in Nicaragua, refuses even to recognize the existence of Soviet Russia, denies independence to the Philippines, and, while sending warships to mount guard, takes no action to remedy the injustices of the Powers' position in China.

MUSSOLINI SHOWS HIMSELF at once a lion and a lamb. He roars that the state is supreme, that Italy must be once more an empire, that Rome must be again the Rome of the Caesars, that "Italy and Germany are the only two great countries in Europe which the peace treaties left without a place in the colony sun." At the same time Italy is making friends—on paper. With Albania, with Greece, with Spain, with Germany, with one neighbor and another treaties are being drawn up, all more or less similar in content to the Italian-Albanian treaty published this week in our International Relations Section. The treaties are made for commerce, to define national boundaries, but more commonly are merely documents to declare and maintain a spirit of amity between two nations. The contracting parties agree to arbitrate questions of difference between them, to "lend each other mutual support and cordial cooperation," even to "refrain from concluding with other Powers any . . . agreements prejudicial to the interests of the other party." What Mussolini expects to gain from this combination of soft words and veiled threats it is impossible to say. So far no such agreements have been concluded with England or France; French troops are still concentrated on the border, and the most important treaty of all, that drawn up with Yemen, bordering on Arabia and the Hejaz, opens up for Rome an important sphere of influence in direct conflict with Great Britain. This last prize, indeed, was snatched from under England's nose; it is directly opposite Italian Northeast Africa and in 1925 the exchanges between the two countries exceeded 60,000,000 lire.

ENGLAND IS LEARNING from America. During the recent coal strike hundreds of workers were imprisoned for union activities under the guise of "unlawful assembly," "advocating mass pickets," "being in possession of a pamphlet advocating mass picketing," and for putting forward a group of proposals adopted by the Miners' Federation of Great Britain which included the calling out of safety men from the mines. All this has a familiar ring; the only differences from similar repressive measures in America are, first, that the workers are heard and sentenced in mass trials, and, second, that the sentences range from thirty days in prison to six months' hard labor. Doubtless England too will soon learn to impose sentences of ten or twenty years in the penitentiary, with solitary confinement, bread and water, and other frills thrown in for good measure. Meanwhile the Labor Press Service, in its yearly summary of labor statistics, reports an increase in unemployment of nearly 40 per cent; a rise in the number of recipients of poor relief from 37 per thousand to 61, a weekly decrease of more than £50,000 in wages and a lowering of British export trade from £657 millions in nine months of 1924 to £646 millions in 1925 and £549 millions in 1926. The Chancellor of the Exchequer optimistically predicted a budget surplus for the year of £4,000,000; instead a deficit of £175,000,000 is now looked for. The struggle in England between capital and labor will doubtless go on, but it costs the country dear.

THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS in San Francisco recently handed down its verdict in favor of S. G. Pandit, a naturalized Hindu, whose papers the State Department attempted to revoke. Prior to the Supreme Court decision in 1923, that Hindus were ineligible to citizenship in this country, the lower courts maintained a contrary position, and a few dozen Hindus were accordingly naturalized. Among them was Mr. Pandit, who in the course of the years was admitted to the bar, married an American woman, and played his part as a useful and public-spirited citizen. Suddenly the State Department—or some crabbed official of the Department—determined to apply the Supreme Court decision retroactively. It refused to recognize as valid citizenship papers obtained in good faith prior to the decision and started proceedings to denaturalize the few Hindus who had been naturalized. Mr. Pandit's has become the test case. Already two federal courts have honorably ruled that it would be inequitable to deprive him of citizenship honestly obtained and properly exercised. If the Government persists, the case will now go to the Supreme Court, but the State Department would do well to cease petty persecution and accept the verdict.

THE FIGHT AGAINST CHILD LABOR is by no means won. The report of the Chief of the Children's Bureau to the Secretary of Labor has some interesting material on legislation proposed or defeated during the past year. The law in Louisiana, for example, which permits a maximum eight-hour day and forty-eight-hour week for children under 16, carries with it no educational requirement for working children, and an attempt to incorporate such regulations failed. In Massachusetts a bill compelling supplementary school attendance for working children between 14 and 16 was defeated; in New Jersey a measure to raise the educational requirement for children between 14 and 16 failed to pass; in New York laws protecting minors in night work and strengthening the law prohibiting children from work in dangerous occupations failed; in Rhode Island, where a nine-hour day and a fifty-four-hour week for children under 16 is now legal, a measure to decrease this requirement to eight and forty-eight hours was defeated. In New York, Virginia, and Massachusetts among others, bills to lengthen hours, to permit night work of minors, to lower the age for required attendance at continuation schools, and to permit employment of 12-year-old boys outside school hours without employment certificates were proposed and discussed.

WHO CAN POSSIBLY DESPAIR of our republic? There are ever alert citizens to keep our institutions intact. Headed by one George Bond Ellison, a commercial promoter, a drive is on in Chicago to endow a $2,000,000 American Citizenship Foundation, to control and supervise speakers at all church and public forums, lecture courses, women's club meetings, etc., etc. These patriots, determined that only the purest gospel shall be promulgated, have established a blacklist both of persons and organizations—such as the League for Industrial Democracy, the League of Women Voters, the Socialist and Farmer-Labor parties, and even the American Association of University Women and the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. Among the individuals, Jane Addams is listed as "the third most dangerous person in America"; the editor of The Nation appears; so do Norman Hapgood, Sherwood Eddy, Kirby Page, Morris Hillquit, Mary McDowell, Robert Morss Lovett. Who would not chip in on a two-million-dollar fund to keep these heretics silent? Just how the fund is to be expended is not made clear—whether they propose to use merely the income or to endow the various speakers on condition that they speak no more. We recommend the latter method as being the most agreeable, practical, and surely effective.

OUR COLLEGES ARE NOT BECOMING more reactionary if the attitude of the students at the Milwaukee conference of college Christian associations may be taken as typical. In spite of an oversupply of dull religious addresses the students displayed the keenest interest in social reconstruction. They probed candidly into their own racial prejudices; they were openly hostile to the R. O. T. C. They expressed advanced ideas on imperialism and industrial injustice; 327 students stood up to declare that they would never support another war. Eight hundred, the great majority of those voting, condemned as morally wrong the present economic system of production for private profit rather than for use; 592 voted for a cooperative economic order in which the workers should share in the control of their industries; only 38 believed that the present economic system conformed even in a rough way to Christian principles. This veering toward the left in economic thought is especially notable in view of the fact that no industrial challenge was presented by the regular speakers. The intensive work of recent years on local campuses by liberal Y. M. C. A. leaders and by the workers for the League for Industrial Democracy is at last bearing fruit.

COLONEL STEPHEN PARK, head of the National Reserve Officers' Association, attended the Milwaukee conference but did not like it. "The speakers who addressed the conference Thursday," he told the Milwaukee Journal, "and others in this country who are purveying similar anti-militaristic doctrine are getting their salaries direct from Moscow." Russia, he seemed to believe, expels Y. M. C. A. secretaries from within its borders but hires them in America. If Colonel Park does not repudiate the charge we suggest that the student departments of the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. attempt, through the courts, to assess a heavy contribution upon him. Peace organizations have been far too generous in letting any man in uniform talk nonsense about them. Occasional persons take the ravings of these military propagandists seriously, and let their blacklists prevail. The Reserve Officers' Association, which represents the bitter-enders of military propaganda, might show a greater inclination toward accuracy if its chief were compelled to pay in the form of damages for libel the salaries of a few Y. M. C. A. secretaries who do not receive a subsidy from Moscow.

ADVOCATES OF THEATRICAL CENSORSHIP are again on the warpath. Mayor Walker and District Attorney Banton both threaten violent measures unless "something is done" and the assumption behind their agitation is that the general public believes itself outraged by current dramatic fare. Yet during the present season the Citizens Play Jury—a body composed of representative citizens which may be called upon to judge any entertainment against which complaints have been received—has not condemned a single play and the only legitimate conclusion to be drawn from its failure to act is that representative citizens do not believe the New York stage needs censoring. The Nation believes that the play jury represents the least objectionable form of censorship so far suggested because it puts the matter in the hands of the public rather than in those of the professional reformer; to call this jury a failure is to admit that the ideals of the agitators are not those of the public at large. To displace it by any form of official censorship would be frankly to violate the democratic principle and to set up the standards of a fanatical class in place of those which the mores of our society maintain.

IN 2100 B. C. Abraham went with his father and his wife from Ur of the Chaldees to seek a new land. Excellently made walls of burnt brick are still standing in Ur, some of them rising twenty feet from the ground, say the members of an expedition into Mesopotamia undertaken jointly by the British Museum and the Museum of the University of Pennsylvania. The houses were comfortable, evidently of two stories, and the ceilings were high. No decorations remain, but we are to believe that they were there in abundance; and the archaeologists have actually succeeded in digging out of the ancient interiors a number of tablets bearing inscriptions more nourishing to the imagination than the receipts, contracts, and business memorandums which hitherto have been the sole fruit of investigation. We await the deciphering of these tablets with interest, for they promise to reveal a people who had human tongues as well as hands. To be sure, some of the inscriptions are nothing more than tables of square and cube roots; but with an effort we might be made to hear Chaldean boys droning their exercises in more or less pure mathematics. And Leonard Woolley, director of the expedition, gives us his word that hymns have been found. The silence of that long-obliterated world may yet be broken by sounds somewhat in the key achieved by the lyrical descendants of Abraham and Sarah.

Wanted—An Opposition

LET no one make any mistake—that government which is without an able opposition is in a bad way. Only the superficial can behold a situation such as we now have in Washington and believe that it is a cause for satisfaction. It is idle to boast of an "era of good-will," of the absence of pressing issues, of the lack of radical political proposals. The truth is that the Government flounders because it is not subjected to the process of forging and defending its policies under the fire of vigorous political criticism in the national legislature. It is not even compelled to develop policies; leaderless, it drifts unsteeled by vigorous parliamentary challenge, with the result that unsolved issues and problems stack up mountain high. The average Wall Street man is delighted because Mr. Coolidge seems to be letting well enough alone. To that he credits the fact that 1926 was for much of the population, including those closest to him, a year of extraordinary material prosperity; and the business man is quite willing to declare a political moratorium if he can only make hay a little while longer—throughout 1927 at least.

Now, this policy of drift, or refusing to face any issue until compelled to, is a symptom of weakness. No strong personality in responsible office consents to play such a role. He teems with suggestions, whether his name be Cleveland or Roosevelt or Wilson. He burns to achieve certain reforms; he compels his fellow-citizens to an examination of the existing conditions; and he brings about that lusty political discussion, that normal political advancement, which alone bespeaks health in the body politic. Marking time, drifting, ignoring vital issues like the present plight of agriculture, or the application of temporary political palliatives, is a sign of unhealth. It is idle to think that there can ever be a time when there will be no need of readjustment, reform, remedial legislation—of change. Our economic structure alters too rapidly to permit our political life to become static. So those citizens who rejoice in political stagnation court a rough awakening; the bill will be presented in due time and it is likely to be larger than now appears.

Meanwhile Mr. Coolidge drifts, drifts, and Congress no longer takes very seriously such proposals as he makes. Run over his messages and note the list of recommendations to which Congress has turned a deaf ear—from the World Court to the Turkish treaty and the treaty outlawing poison gas. Who remembers his message of a year ago, advocating a grant of emergency powers to deal with a coal shortage—although a new soft-coal strike is in the offing; urging us to join the World Court and to transfer Muscle Shoals to private ownership; suggesting a new disarmament conference? He talks and talks and talks; men applaud him but no one heeds him.

Scandals, investigations, inquiries into corruption, the unseating of United States Senators pile up unheeded on every hand, while in international affairs Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Kellogg are, by their policies in Nicaragua and Mexico, solidifying Latin America against us. And there you have the clearest proof of the need of a political opposition and the immediate effect of even slight criticism upon those in charge of our foreign policies. Senator Borah had only to intimate to the correspondents that he was not happy about our Nicaragua procedure, and for three days the doubts of this one man constituted the leading political "story" of the metropolitan press. The State Department and the White House fell into a state of panic at the prospect that one honest man might subject to sane scrutiny our bellicose and bullying interference in Nicaragua. The White House bleated; if there were to be long debates over Nicaragua the appropriation bills could not be passed and a special session would be inevitable—and what could be worse than that? Mr. Kellogg left the State Department, hurried to the Capitol, and laid his secret dispatches before the Senator, who seems, for the moment, to have been mollified thereby—though why we cannot understand.

That was not all. The President, at the close of the year, addressed the usual biweekly gathering of the correspondents with an earnest appeal to the press to stand by the Government's foreign policies. He made it clear enough that he was frightened to find that the dailies of the country were not with the Administration in its procedure in Nicaragua and Mexico. Critical opposition alarmed him. Curiously, it was just after Elihu Root, that veteran Republican leader, had denounced his party's and his country's policies in Europe that Mr. Coolidge sounded the tocsin "Stand by the President." So plaintive was his plea to the correspondents that his policies were truly and consistently American that for once the old lie of the "Presidential Spokesman" was abandoned; the New York Times rightly attributed his remarks to the President himself.

If such is Mr. Coolidge's terror when confronted with Mr. Root's and Mr. Borah's activity and an unorganized press opposition, what would be his plight if he confronted a compact, united opposition in Congress, steeped in principle and determined to subject to the minutest cross-examination that foreign policy which already means hostilities in Nicaragua and may precipitate war in Mexico; which, in China, spells a wabbling incompetency? Is it not plain from these Presidential terrors that Mr. Coolidge and his policies would fairly crumble if they were subjected to searching analysis, to such plain speaking as meets Mr. Baldwin's political conduct in the debates of the House of Commons? The myths of a strong Coolidge, a wise Coolidge, a constructive Coolidge, would collapse overnight were he to face energetic group opposition. But the Democratic Party is more than ever negligible today. It is without direction; it breaches its own principles oftener even than its adversaries—the only thing that lends to it passing interest is the question whether "Al" Smith will get the Presidential nomination or some political nobody. The Congressional opposition is still centered in the little group of Progressive Republicans, and even they fail to coordinate their activities and—perforce, perhaps—let slip important issues. The Cape Cod Canal swindle went through with hardly a peep of protest, and there are rumors that though Illinois's Mr. Smith will be barred from the Senate Pennsylvania's Mr. Vare will be admitted.

Two and a half years ago the country was solemnly warned against the danger to our institutions from a third party. Far greater, far closer to us, is the menace of a one-party government. That is the real danger today.

The Decline of Europe

FOR two centuries Europe has dominated the earth. We ourselves, in the beginning, were a mere outpost of Europe. But times have changed. The power and position of America in the world today are one witness of the fact; statistics compiled for the coming Economic Conference at Geneva tell another part of the story. Comparing 1925 with 1913 these figures show that whereas Europe's production of foodstuffs and raw materials has increased less than 5 per cent, her foreign trade has fallen by 6 per cent, while Asia's production has gained 20 per cent and her trade 36 per cent, and North America has gained 26 per cent in production and 37 per cent in foreign trade. One may say that this is the fault of the war, and think that the world will placidly resume its pre-war ways. Yet perhaps the war was but a chapter in a story which, half-noticed, was writing itself before that cataclysm brought sudden ruin to the old continent.

Why, after all, should Europe dominate the world? What is there in the air and soil or in the population of that stretch of earth that borders the eastern shore of the Atlantic Ocean to give it a right to control the highways and byways of all the rest of the globe? The racial stock has been scattered. Its most enterprising members have gone forth, part to settle the unsettled continents, part to develop trade with the richly settled East. Its mineral resources, if not exhausted, are at least sadly depleted. Whatever special technical capacity it may have it has by now shared with all the rest of the world.

History, looked at in the large, records no lasting predominance of the European peoples. Four or five centuries ago they started voyaging with a zest and persistence such as voyagers had never had before; and accordingly they discovered lost or unknown continents and began the development of the prodigious international trade of today. Within the last two centuries they have spread their political control over the rest of the earth's peoples. But what are two centuries, or even four or five, in the history of the earth—what can they tell of the capacities of a race? China's civilization is four or five millenniums old; and throughout that immense period, century by century, she had a richer civilization to boast of than Western Europe—until the puny fragment of time which has elapsed since the Industrial Revolution gave the West its present driving power. Today the West, having conquered the East, has also given it the weapons with which to reassert its ancient preeminence. Russians, schooled in Germany and America, travel as advisers with Chiang Kai-shek's Cantonese armies; a British general buys in Japan supplies for Chang Tso-lin's Mukden arsenal; Americans direct the technical work of the Kiangnan arsenal; General Wood is giving the youth of the Philippines military training; and Mussolini's gun-laden merchant ships are ready to sell to any buyer. Where we have superiority—in military science, in technical processes—we are selling out to the East as fast as the East can afford to purchase.

A new tide is running. Here in America we have never properly appreciated the historic significance of Turkey's successful struggle for freedom. There are still blind men among us who would refuse to ratify a treaty accepting Turkey's denunciation of the shackling capitulations, not realizing what has happened. Today China is following in Turkey's steps. Great Britain, beaten by Canton's year-long boycott of her goods, has made a sudden reversal of policy, and offered to agree to steps which a year ago she contemptuously refused—and, more significant still, the Chinese today refuse her offers of compromise as too slight. The French, meanwhile, explain their refusal to go along with the British by saying that they cannot afford to be associated with hated England in China! A quarter century ago the Powers, by a short military expedition, brought the old Chinese Empire to its knees. Today they are rightly afraid to try force on chaotic young China—the sturdy child has in the interim learned too much about force.

If China follows Turkey she will not act for herself alone. India, another vast continent-nation with a population more than twice that of the United States, seethed with the reaction from Turkey's awakening, and is not blind or deaf to what is happening in China. All the Eastern people which are tied to the apron-strings of the white West are watching China's struggle with passionate sympathy.

Nor is this battle for freedom confined to the political sphere. England's industrial depression is partly due to the fact that India has learned to manufacture her own cotton. China, too, is struggling toward industrial independence. There are fewer British cotton mills in China today than there were five years ago, and every six years China is doubling the number of her spindles. Despite her civil wars her customs revenues in 1926 were greater than in 1925. Increasingly the economic basis of the white imperial system is breaking down. Men will manufacture closer to the sources of raw materials, instead of cluttering the channels of trade by passing everything through Europe.

Those masses of Americans who turn away from Europe do not, perhaps, think out these things. But theirs may be the truer instinct, after all. Europe is not a dead or even a dying continent, but its great day is passing. Probably never again will it hold such a position in the world's affairs as it did just before it set about cutting its own throat in 1914. A new world is coming into being. The future of Latin America is still uncertain; but in the decades immediately ahead Asia and North America are certain to play roles of growing importance in the world's affairs; and they may do well not to involve themselves too intimately in the struggles of a tired continent to retain an impossible preeminence.

Authors with Lanterns

As Diogenes went about with a lantern to seek an honest man, so does Barukh Jonas, author, inventor, and lecturer, travel on foot with his two-wheeled camping outfit to seek intellectually inclined men and women. He is an independent writer, and his work, although quite simple, can be understood and appreciated only by one person out of ten thousand. And he is making it his business to find that extremely small minority. . . .

While passing through your city Barukh Jonas will permit himself to call on you. He would like to deliver in your locality a lecture entitled The Feast of the Cannibals, which is an exposition of the Intellectualistic Idea. And he wants somebody to make the necessary arrangements.

WHETHER Mr. Jonas has arrived in New York we know not, nor do we know that he intends coming here. But we received this notice a few weeks ago and we have been waiting for news of him. Perhaps there is as little hope of seeing Mr. Jonas's cart as there is of catching a gleam from Diogenes's lantern—though "with that cart," writes Mr. Jonas, "propelled by myself and made conspicuous by a flamboyant sign, I shall pass through every State of the Union and shall bring my despised art and thought directly to the people." Perhaps after all this is only a figure of speech gilding Mr. Jonas's real message, which is that certain ideas of his are going to circulate in spite of every obstacle, including complete indifference, placed before them by a sorry world.

What interests us in Mr. Jonas, with whom we have corresponded, is that his writings are despised by publishers and that he has done something about it. He has published his own books—the latest one, "The Roof of the Palace," having been printed out in his own finely regular hand and then blue-printed (pp. 180: $3). A copy has come to us from Maumee, Ohio, which is the permanent address of Mr. Jonas; and nothing could more forcibly remind us of the stubborn will in human beings to express themselves. With the example of Mr. Jonas before us we can have little use for those thinkers who, when their works have been generally rejected, whine that they are misunderstood and say no more. We remember that Laurence Sterne paid for the printing of the first part of "Tristram Shandy" and that Walt Whitman did likewise for "Leaves of Grass"; we remember, more recently, the first edition of Robinson Jeffers's now famous poems. The roll of the courageous is long and honorable, and Barukh Jonas, we do not doubt, belongs somewhere upon it. His ideas we must leave to the philosophers, who, we hope, will write to Maumee not only for this book but for five which preceded it.

Of late—leaving out of account the stream of poetry always pouring in from private American presses—we have been most frequently favored with irregular books from France. France promises indeed to become for England and America what Holland was for both England and France in the seventeenth century. At one time anything could be printed at Amsterdam in the language of its author; and it begins to look as if any book in English can find a publisher now in France. The supreme example, of course, is Joyce's "Ulysses"; but there are also the books of Gertrude Stein and the volumes issued from the Contact Press. The other day a new exile made himself known to us. W. W. Strickland, British author of some forty-odd volumes, each one of which, apparently, was inspired by a profound hatred of Anglo-Saxon civilization and religion, sent us six of his books that had been reprinted at Marseilles and elsewhere. These six, we are given to understand, along with a number of others cannot enter the British Isles to be read; knowing customs officials as we do, we are not surprised, though we can be sorry for a nation which is not permitted to hear what its most discontented member thinks of it. Mr. Strickland writes that he has voluntarily surrendered his English identity and become a citizen of Czecho-Slovakia. But he writes from Marseilles; and in his highly regular and peppery way he no doubt will go on hating England from everywhere.

We pay our respects to Messrs. Jonas, Strickland, et al., and remind ourselves that it is dangerous business for critics to scoff at ideas because they come in carts, or at books because they do not bear the imprint of regular publishers. These latter come frequently to The Nation, and though we read most of them with disappointment, we are invariably eager as we unwrap them. In one of them some time we may discover not an author but a man, not a book but a lantern.

What Does the War Lord Mean?

DWIGHT F. DAVIS, Secretary of War, has raised more questions than he has answered in his letter to John Nevin Sayre, Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Militarism in Education. Mr. Sayre wrote to the Secretary saying that on a recent speaking trip in opposition to compulsory military training in the colleges he encountered definite interference from Lieutenant Colonel George Chase Lewis, stationed in Oklahoma City with the Ninety-sixth Division of Infantry. Mr. Sayre had promised to address students of the University of Oklahoma at Norman on December 9. Previous to his coming Colonel Lewis wrote to President Bizzell, saying that Mr. Sayre was advocating a Bolshevist program and concluding: "I trust you will be able to curtail pernicious activities at Norman." A group of students which had tried to arrange a meeting for Mr. Sayre under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association of the university were unable to obtain its facilities and so Mr. Sayre spoke in the Presbyterian church, off the campus. Colonel Lewis came to the meeting and denounced Mr. Sayre.

> I should like to know [wrote Mr. Sayre to Secretary Davis] whether you consider it a proper function of an army officer to attempt to shut off free speech for peace in universities, Y. M. C. A.'s, and even churches. . . . Finally, may I ask if the War Department does not take energetic measures to restrain Lieutenant Colonel Lewis and others in activities similar to the case mentioned, will I not be justified in charging that the War Department is responsible for the campaign of defamation of character and attempt to repress free speech for peace, in which its subordinates are engaged?

In reply to Mr. Sayre Secretary Davis wrote:

> It is contrary to the policy of the War Department to make adverse criticism of any individual or organization and no army officer has the right to speak for the War Department contrary to its established policy.
>
> On the other hand, it appears that Colonel Lewis was expressing his individual views as a citizen and that he did not even inferentially imply that he was expressing the views of the War Department.
>
> It is manifestly beyond the power of the War Department and, if possible, it would be obviously opposed to the principle of freedom of speech for the War Department to attempt to control all expressions of opinion that officers of the army may make as private citizens.
>
> I can assure you that the War Department has never attempted, directly or indirectly, to repress free speech on any subject whatsoever, either by those who favor or those who oppose its policies.

If Colonel Lewis was expressing merely "individual views as a citizen," how did he come to sign himself "Lt. Col. U. S. Infantry, Oklahoma City"? And has Mr. Davis never heard of the case of Captain Paxton Hibben of the Officers' Reserve Corps? How did it happen that Captain Hibben, who was not in the active service of the War Department at all at the time and was earning his livelihood as a civilian, was haled before a court of inquiry for advocating the recognition of Russia by the United States?

Mr. Davis may genuinely wish the War Department to be for free speech; we hope so. But the war machine which he only temporarily and partially controls acts otherwise. Its autocratic spirit and tradition is one of the outstanding perils to America.

Drawn by Harry S. Bressler

Poison Gas, 1915-1926

German Atrocity—American Necessity

By H. S. VILLARD

WHEN on April 22, 1915, the Germans introduced poison gas into modern warfare, an outraged world protested indignantly at such utter "ruthlessness." Resentment, we may remember, was unbridled at the use of these "new and terrible vapors" which, as the New York Times hastened to note, caused sufferings "of a severity unparalleled in the annals of conflict."

Though in some few quarters development of the "chemists' battle" was regarded as an inevitable step in the progress of scientific warfare, and therefore to be considered philosophically, the opinion of the press was as a whole denunciatory. Many looked upon poison gas as a reversion to barbarism, a violation of every written or unwritten code of combat. As all the participants in the World War previous to our entry had ratified the Hague agreement of 1899 never to use asphyxiating gases, the sudden employment of chlorine and phosgene against the French lines was bitterly received as merely one more scrap of paper.

In a leading editorial entitled More German Savagery the New York Tribune, in May, 1915, scathingly attacked the new weapon:

> If poisonous gases can be used in warfare the way is opened to a general relapse to ancient methods of savagery. Germany . . . has taken the lead in this war in cutting loose from the salutary restraints which civilization has put on military brutality;

while the Washington Times cried ironically that > apparently every policy of the aggressors in this war is aimed to bring about a situation in which every shred of faith and confidence as among nations will be destroyed.

Chemical warfare in all its abhorrent detail was made vivid for us by artist as well as journalist. Louis Raemaekers, in his famous "Cartoon History of the World War," was responsible for a heartrending picture of poison gas victims in their death agony, which did as much as anything else, perhaps, to stir up the most intense kind of feeling. A Daily Mail dispatch from British Headquarters on May 28, 1915, prominently reprinted here, reported that

> Doctors at this casualty clearing station tell terrible stories of awful scenes. . . . "It would have brought tears to your eyes," a doctor said, "to see those splendid men, great brawny fellows, many of them tearing at their throats, rending their tunics, screaming to us in hoarse, rattling voices to put them out of their misery. Many were in semi-comatose state . . . they slipped from pillows propping them up and began to strangle."

Censure abroad was even more vituperative than here. The London Spectator burst out

> The Germans have not scrupled to resort to a truly diabolical use of chemical science, and to discharge at their opponents weapons which cause . . . agonizing suffering and permanent injury. . . . By the consent of all men who are not savages, the use of poison is ruled out in war, and has been prohibited by custom for centuries. . . . Such deviltry is, of course, a sign of desperation.

Claiming that the Germans had only adopted a device originally invented in England, "and by England rejected as too horrible to be entertained even for use against an enemy," the Candid Quarterly Review of Thomas Gibson Bowles characterized gas as "no lawful warfare."

> No Hague Convention can make it lawful; no honorable soldier can consider it justifiable; nor even if it be the highest triumph of the better chemist that can make it excusable.

With such widespread indictment of poison gas only eleven years ago, the almost complete reversal of world attitude today is well-nigh incredible. Before the end of the war, gas had become accepted as an adjunct of all the armies; recent utterances show a proclivity not only to condone but to encourage this form of armament.

At Germany's suggestion the Geneva Arms Traffic Conference, ending June 17, 1925, voted to outlaw gas in future warfare. The protocol which the United States signed at that time will come up for ratification in the next Senate. But even a year ago the Chicago Evening Post said > [abolishing poison gas] . . . is urged, probably, because of the prevalent popular opinion that [it] is a barbarous method of warfare, fraught with extraordinary horror. As a matter of fact, it is no more barbarous than bayonets, machine-guns, grenades, and high explosives, and not half so deadly.

>
> Nor would prohibition of the use of poison gas—to our way of thinking an absurdity as long as every form of explosive is countenanced and war itself is recognized—prove of any practical value. Methods of warfare will never be controlled by international agreement.

And the Chicago Tribune asserted that "Contrasted with other weapons . . . gas is eminently humane . . . far less horrible both in immediate and ultimate consequence," and maintained that opposition was "founded . . . upon a sentimental fallacy as to the inhumanity of gas."

That chemical interests in this country are afraid of limitations on their product, which would interfere with the commercial aspects of the industry, is a possible contribution to the new anxiety to belittle the effects of gas. In an address at the Institute of Politics at Williamstown last August, James F. Norris, president of the American Chemical Society, deprecated the "sentiment and not knowledge" which was behind the women's organizations opposed to chemical warfare. Dr. Charles H. Hertz, president of the Synthetic Organic Chemical Manufacturers' Association, agreed that the public had been led astray in this regard.

Colonel C. F. Brigham, of the Chemical Warfare Service, before the American Chemical Society at Philadelphia in September, asserted that the "fear of chemical warfare weapons" was "unfounded." "Mustard gas in the late war produced only twenty-nine casualties for each ton used, and of these only one death was caused for every ton and a half used." "And why," asked the Independent on September 4, 1926, "should gas be so maligned a weapon?" Most of its partisans take for granted that we are to have other wars. W. Lee Lewis, inventor of the deadly Lewisite, adopts the view that chemical preparedness is the most economical of all and therefore a road to lower taxation. In a previous number of the Independent he quotes official figures to show that less than 2 per cent of the American gas casualties died, that only twenty-nine of our men were actually blinded, and that the prophesied after-dangers of being gassed have not been borne out.

Chemical Warfare, a New Industry

By ROBERT S. ALLEN

BEFORE the World War the Krupps, the United States Steel Corporation, and the steel magnates of other nations directed and controlled the business of national defense. Armament was a matter of tonnage, of gun and shell-weight and numbers. To a considerable extent, that still holds true today. But a change is coming; and the recent shelving, in the Senate, of the innocuous poison-gas treaty was an unmistakable demonstration of the rise, power, and growth of the new bosses of war—the chemists.

Not more than three years ago, the Senate without a dissenting voice approved the Washington disarmament treaty, wherein was contained a protocol, exactly similar to the Geneva pact it sent back to committee on December 13, condemning the use of poison gas in warfare. The reason for the change of views was the National Chemical Defense Association, with the following members on its board of directors:

> Howard Coonley, a manufacturer of Boston, who was vice-president of the United States Shipping Board during the war; George B. Dryden, president of the Dryden Rubber Company, of Chicago, vice-president; Waldemar Kops, New York manufacturer, vice-president; J. F. Norris, president of the American Chemical Society and professor of chemistry at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, vice-president; Perry W. Weidner, Los Angeles, vice-president; directors, J. H. Matthews, chairman of the department of chemistry at the University of Wisconsin; J. E. Zanetti, professor of chemistry at Columbia University and during the war a colonel in the chemical warfare service and now a reserve officer in that branch; William J. Hale, head of the chemical branch of the National Research Council and formerly connected with the Dow Chemical Company, of Midland, Michigan; W. Lee Lewis, director of scientific research of the Institute of American Meat Packers, Chicago; Marsten T. Bogert, professor of chemistry at Columbia University; Wilder D. Bancroft, consulting chemist and professor of chemistry at Cornell University; R. T. Haslam, consulting chemist and professor of chemistry at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; A. S. Loevenhart, consulting chemist and professor of pharmacology and toxicology at the University of Wisconsin; and Washington Platt, manager of the Merrell Soule Company, of Syracuse, New York.

All of the foregoing are members of the American Chemical Society.

The National Chemical Defense Association was organized for the immediate purpose of defeating the Geneva protocol. Its permanent task will be to further the interests of chemicals as war weapons. It will lend civilian aid and financial succor to that super-military agitator, Major General Amos A. Fries, chief of the chemical warfare service. Its founders, according to its secretary, Colonel John Thomas Taylor, reserve officer of the chemical warfare service, were Messrs. Dryden and Kops. Colonel Taylor is the authority for the statement that these two men were actuated solely by patriotic motives in founding the Chemical Defense Association.

According to his account they appealed to him to suggest something they could do in these days of peace to prepare for future wars, and he being a reserve officer in the chemical service as well as vice-chairman of the national legislative committee of the American Legion, and thus being acquainted on all sides, earnestly advised them to raise the necessary money to bring about a chemical defense group. This was done and Colonel Taylor became treasurer and spokesman for the lobby of the chemical manufacturers. He associated with himself as secretary of the organization Colonel E. B. Clark, a former newspaperman, and member of the National Press Club Post of the American Legion. The services of Thomas R. Shipp, Inc., a Washington publicity firm, were secured and the outfit was ready and anxious to do business.

Authoritative stories written by Colonel Clark and quoting Colonel Taylor were released, declaring that the American Legion at its forthcoming annual convention in Philadelphia was going to enact a resolution condemning the poison-gas treaty. Later when the resolution, without real debate, was shoved through at a business session of the convention when the great mass of Legionnaires were away, it was the Shipp company which broadcast copies of the resolution accompanied by a press release recounting its importance. Later, it was this same company which, under the caption "Authorized, and distribution requested by Colonel John Thomas Taylor, legislative committee of the American Legion," sent out releases making known the fact that the military surgeons and various military orders were against the treaty.

Publicity was not the only activity of the Chemical Defense Association. It was responsible for the utter silence of the War and Navy departments, both parties to the treaty, a silence which one leading Republican Senator characterized as "double-crossing the President." This Senator declared that had these two departments been loyal to their commander, the President, and supported him instead of secretly opposing him, his wishes as expressed in his annual message to Congress that the treaty be ratified would have been realized, instead of being brusquely disregarded.

The Chemical Association used the American Legion in other ways as a smoke-screen for its propaganda. Senator Borah and other Senators declared they received hundreds of protesting communications, practically all from American Legion posts and from Legionnaires, and all patently inspired. Personal interviews and pressure were also resorted to, with the result that although the Senate three years before had unanimously approved a similar pact, that the President and leader of his party had a few days previous voiced the desire that it be ratified, and lastly that the protocol was made a part of the Geneva treaty at the initiative of Representative Theodore Burton, chief American delegate to the conference, the treaty, innocuous though it was, was rejected.

Two things stand out clear in this episode: the shame of the American Legion and the rising power and domination of the chemical interests. Of the latter there have been of late many demonstrations; and of the former, well may Representative Hamilton Fish, Jr., himself a Legionnair the chairman of the committee of three which drew preamble to the Legion's constitution, say—

> I deplore the fact that the last American Leg have permitted itself to be rushed int hasty and ill-considered resolution in favor of the use of poison gas weapon in time of war. . . ganization composed of v might and to "prom was not or

[illegible] arry [illegible] copy of [illegible] wearing [illegible] chief in the breast [illegible] that the Becco Giallo does [illegible] shops. [illegible] must not forward it from [illegible]

* The word "college" is here used in the same sense as in the College of Cardinals."

Mussolini Chokes the Press

By GAETANO SALVEMINI

FREEDOM of the press was guaranteed in Italy by the constitution of 1848, to which the present King, like his three predecessors, took the oath of allegiance on his accession in 1900. In the first years of Fascist domination (1921-1923) the press underwent the rigors of "revolutionary" treatment: printing works and offices of opposition papers were looted or set on fire; editors and correspondents were beaten, wounded, banished, killed; whole issues were set on fire as they left the press, or in the railway stations; news agents were threatened and beaten and their kiosks burned.

On July 15, 1923, "normalization" began. The King, "prisoner of war," signed a decree under which the prefect of a province may warn a newspaper to change its attitude, if, in his opinion, the paper

> (a) By means of false or tendencious news may hamper the diplomatic action of the Government in its foreign relations, or damage the national credit at home or abroad, or arouse baseless alarm among the people, or incite to any breach of the peace;
>
> (b) By articles, comments, notes, titles, illustrations, or vignettes instigates to crimes, or excites class hatred or disobedience of the laws or of the authorities, or undermines the discipline in the public services, or serves the interests of foreign states, authorities, or individuals to the detriment of Italian interests, or disparages the country, the King, the Royal Family, the High Pontiff, the religion of the state, the institutions and the powers of the state and friendly Powers.

If the paper is warned twice in one year the prefect may forbid the editor to continue in office, even if there has never been a conviction against him, and may refuse to authorize any new editor. If the prefect approves none of the editors proposed the paper is not suppressed, but it cannot be published. This decree was signed by the King in defiance of the constitution, Article 28 of which reads as follows: "The press shall be free, but the law may suppress abuses of this freedom"; and Article 3 of which decrees that the legislative power shall be exercised collectively by the King and the two chambers, the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies. To this first irregularity a second was added: Mussolini kept the royal decree in his desk for a year before publishing it. Thus the King initiated a new practice, that of issuing a lettre de cachet against the constitution to be used by the Prime Minister when he thinks fit.

After the Matteotti murder Mussolini judged that the moment had arrived to make use of the lettre de cachet obtained a year previously. But he found that it was not ough. And so the King meekly signed another decree on [illegible], 1924, empowering the prefects to confiscate any [illegible] paper, without bringing any charge before the [illegible]. The Lond[illegible]

> The German[illegible] much more serious matter than cen[illegible] diabolical use of chem[illegible] suppresses an article before it is [illegible] opponents weapons wh[illegible]lace when the paper has already [illegible] and permanent injury. . . . [illegible]f material, labor, and capital. [illegible] are not savages, the use of poiso[illegible] in the case of the big [illegible] has been prohibited by custom fo[illegible] confiscation. even [illegible] deviltry is, of course, a sign of desperation.

Claiming that the Germans had only adopted a device originally invented in England, "and by England rejected as [illegible]."

confiscated. On September 5, 1925, the liberal Subalpino of Cuneo was confiscated. After the confiscation the paper brought out a second, expurgated edition. The prefect confiscated this edition also. A third edition was then published, completely blank except for the advertisements; and this again the prefect confiscated. An issue passed by a prefect in one province may be confiscated by the prefect in another province. The Avanti was confiscated 100 times during 1925—every third day. The Government thus ruins the opposition papers. It is not open suppression; it is silent, stealthy suffocation.

But a newspaper, even though crippled, is still a newspaper. The Italian reader is able to read between the lines, to interpret silences, to grasp the slightest allusions. An opposition paper continues to be effective as such even if it says nothing at all. Therefore the first two decrees showed themselves powerless to stifle opposition.

On December 30, 1924, the Home Secretary, Signor Federzoni, discovered in the text of the old law of local government a certain Paragraph 3 which authorizes the prefects of the provinces to "take emergency measures when necessary to maintain public peace." This clause had never in seventy years been interpreted as including the control of the press. The freedom of the press was regulated by other laws which were regarded as an essential part of the constitution, and was only under the jurisdiction of the magistracy. In December, 1924, it was discovered that the press might disturb the public peace, and the prefects were authorized to take any measures they thought fit to muzzle it. As soon as any paper tried to publish news that could endanger public peace the prefects might confiscate the issue and even forbid the printing of the paper.

At Bergamo in February, 1925, a paper was confiscated on account of a certain article. A second edition was brought out with a blank space where the article had been. This edition was confiscated because this blank space might have "aroused excitement among the readers by giving the impression that the freedom of the press did not exist in Italy." A circular of the Home Secretary sent to the prefects on January 7, 1926, explains that in ordering the confiscation of a newspaper issue they need not trouble whether a news item is false or true:

> It is absurd to be obliged to investigate whether the news which might disturb the public peace is correct or not before taking the necessary steps to maintain order. The preservation of order is an elementary and primary duty of every government, and is independent of any opinion that may be held as to the bad faith of the person who endangers order.

After this last discovery there could be no need for further measures; but the "new Fascist state" always needs new measures. When the "normalizing" powers of the prefects did not suffice, the "revolutionary" activities of the Fascists came into play. On September 25, 1925, the delegate of the Fascist Central Executive in Piedmont sent the following ukase to the editor of the liberal Progresso, of Dronero, in the province of Cuneo:

[illegible]

> There have fallen into my hands certain numbers of your libelous paper containing articles which do not please me at all. They do not please me because they are false and malevolent. Accordingly as a Fascist I warn you to put an end to your stupid campaign. Do not imagine that because you live or rather vegetate some distance from the center you will enjoy immunity. Your turn will come.

On October 2, 1925, the executive of the Parma Fascio, learning that the Piccolo, a newspaper which had been suppressed, was about to reappear under another name, published the following ukase:

> The executive of the Parma Fascio, learning that the ill-famed paper which was the organ of the Freemasons and Bolshevists of Parma is about to appear under another name, interprets this attempt as a challenge, and gives notice that the challenge will be taken up by all the Fascists of the province of Parma.

In November, 1925, after the discovery of the so-called Zaniboni plot, a new wave of revolutionary Fascism arose and "normalization" was even more severely imposed. Four newspapers were officially suspended for twenty days—Giustizia, Avanti, Voce Republicana, and Unità; four other papers were not officially suspended, because they were so prudent that there was no pretext for striking at them; but the police did not allow them to appear. These were the Genoa Lavoro and the Rome Mondo, Popolo, and Risorgimento. As this was the time when subscriptions are collected and advertising contracts renewed, these suspensions meant certain death for the weaker papers. The Popolo (Christian Democrat) and Giustizia (Reformist Socialist) succumbed to the crisis. One of the subeditors of the Lavoro, Giovanni Ansaldo, a most cultivated and brilliant journalist who had already been beaten several times, had to resign before the paper was allowed to reappear. The Mondo and Risorgimento were confiscated for sixty-six days in succession, though they printed nothing but telegrams from the official agencies and articles reproduced from other newspapers.

Meanwhile a strategic operation on a large scale was carried out against the two greatest Italian newspapers, the Stampa and the Corriere della Sera. The Stampa, which had been officially suspended since the end of September, was allowed to resume publication only after dismissing its editorial staff. It ceased to be an opposition paper; it revealed its opposition character only by its colorlessness. Senator Albertini, editor of the Corriere della Sera, remained at his post notwithstanding a furious campaign of insults and threats launched against him. But the brothers Crespi, the largest shareholders in the paper, who were Fascists, discovered in their contract with Signor Albertini a technical flaw which enabled them to cancel it, so that on November 21, 1925, Signor Albertini had to go. Since then the Corriere della Sera, with an almost entirely new editorial staff, has been "fascistized," though it is not quite so wild as the other Fascist newspapers. At the same time, a large number of minor newspapers whose editors and staffs were accused of being anti-Fascist or too lukewarm in their Fascism were suspended, that is, in the circumstances, driven out of existence.

During this journalistic earthquake the Chamber and Senate were gravely discussing a new press law as if the preceding measures were not enough. The new law of December 31, 1925, provides that not only the prefects of the provinces, but the public prosecutor may prohibit the appearance of any paper which has been twice condemned for press offenses. Moreover, the printers are made liable for all fines incurred by the papers which they print. The printer thus becomes the censor of the editor. Finally, the law decrees that in every province there shall be a college of journalists*: "The editor of a paper shall be enrolled in the register of the college"; "the exercise of the journalist's profession is permitted only to those who are enrolled in the registers." This measure is linked up with the Trade Union Act, which accords legal recognition only to Fascist unions. On January 16, 1926, the secretary of the College of Journalists in Lombardy made the following promises:

> At the door of our college there will be a sentry who will say: "You are worthy"; "You are not worthy." I intend to carry through the revision of the register. The old register begins with two names which stand for a shameful past—the names of the brothers Albertini. We will begin by striking these out. No new papers shall be permitted to appear, nor shall the profession of journalism be farther carried on by certain persons whom only the generosity of our revolution refrained from nailing to the first gate-post.

In a word, not only may the prefect, not only may the public prosecutor, forbid any person to edit a newspaper, but the president or secretary of the college, by expunging a journalist's name from the register of his "college," may forbid him to exercise his profession.

In addition to these three official watch-dogs there is a whole kennel of lesser "revolutionary" dogs. For instance, on November 18, 1925, the chief of police of the province of Turin notified Piero Gobetti, a Turin publisher, of the following order from the prefect:

> In consideration of the relentlessly anti-national activity of Dr. Piero Gobetti, will you please warn him to give up all publishing.

This order of the prefect was not based upon any law, old or new, of the "Liberal state" or of the "Fascist state"; if it is an indication of the mentality of the provincial prefects it may be imagined what local Fascist leaders will do.

On January 16, 1926, the weekly Roma Fascista ordered a boycott of the satirical weekly Becco Giallo (Yellow Beak) and the plays of its editor, Signor Giannini:

> Angelo Musco (the manager of the theatrical company) is courteously but emphatically requested to give no more performances at the Teatro Nazionale of the works—imbecile stuff, at that—of that buccaneer Giannini or others of his band, or else the applause which he always gets will change into hissing.
>
> Fascists must not buy a single copy of the criminal paper. They must in every way prevent its circulation, especially by advice and persuasion.
>
> News agents, if they are Fascists, must refuse to sell it. If they are not Fascists, they must not display the paper: to show it may be regarded as provocative.
>
> Citizens must no longer read the Becco Giallo or carry it about ostentatiously with them. To display a copy of this infamous libel will be regarded as equivalent to wearing a red necktie or carrying a red handkerchief in the breast pocket.
>
> Fascist workers must watch that the Becco Giallo does not find its way into their workshops.
>
> Railway employees must not forward it from Rome station.

* The word "college" is here used in the same sense as in the "College of Cardinals."

> We know that on the morning on which the paper is issued there are persons (not news agents) who take copies about 5 or 6 a.m. into the working-class districts, where they are sold to subversive elements before confiscation has been carried out. These persons are warned that there are Roman Fascists who are also ready to get up at 4 a.m. A word to the wise is sufficient.

The Becco Giallo put up a further month's resistance. Then it ceased publication.

In the Genoa Lavoro there appeared on February 12, 1926, a ukase of the Fascist Federation of Imperia, warning the non-Fascist paper Eco della Riviera of San Remo, "on no account to touch on matters affecting Fascism on pain of suppression."

The following is a ukase from the Secretary of the Fascist Federation of the province of Ravenna:

> Ravenna, 10 (September, 1926)
>
> Confidential, personal, urgent.
>
> From the Voce Republicana we learn that in certain localities some persons are agreeing to the proposal of contributing a day's wages in support of the paper. The utmost vigilance and the most vigorous measures are needed to prevent the paper from realizing its object. These instructions are equivalent to a definite order to all members of our organizations, from the highest to the lowest.
>
> PASSARETTI, Federal Secretary

It goes without saying that the "new Fascist state" is not content to take all measures, both "revolutionary" and "normalizing," in defense of its existence. It also concocts a whole body of doctrine to bolster up its practices. The Tevere, a Fascist paper of Rome, writes on December 7, 1925:

> The state controls schools so that these may always be patriotic. The newspapers are also schools of character, lecture rooms of daily teaching, pulpits for preaching. It is necessary, therefore, for the state to control the work of the newspapers and assure to itself a body of journalists worthy of the tremendous task intrusted to them, namely, that of directing public opinion "nationally." The schools and the press are the two forges in which the new Italy must be tempered.

The Roma Fascista, October 1, 1926, remarked that Il Mondo of September 30 had refrained from commenting on the meeting between Sir Austen Chamberlain and Mussolini at Leghorn:

> The eyes of the whole world were concentrated yesterday on the yacht anchored in Leghorn harbor—of all the world except Il Mondo. It ought to have been confiscated. There is a silence more damaging than outspoken criticism. The newspaper purchaser who spends his penny must not be cheated by the reticences of the journalist, or what is worse, artfully kept in the dark or insidiously poisoned with suspicions, insinuations, half hints. We demand measures against the silence of the press.

Under this hail of prohibitions, threats, and political "new thoughts," the papers held in suspicion by the Fascists were by October, 1926, reduced to twenty-seven for the whole of Italy; sixteen of these were dailies of which six were Liberal, six Christian Democrat, two Socialist, one Communist, and one Republican. After Anteo Zamboni's attempt on Mussolini's life (October 31, 1926) these last relics of non-official press have disappeared. All twenty-seven have been "suspended for an indefinite period." "Solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant."

The propagandist of the Fascist Government in England, Signor Villari, assures us that "these measures must be regarded as temporary, and intended to tide over a period of an exceptional nature. No doubt when more normal conditions return the Government will find it possible to abrogate or attenuate these restrictions." But in the Senate on December 16, 1925, Senator Tamassia, speaking on the Press Bill before the Chamber, said:

> If the Government had asked for preventive censorship to be applied for six months, for a year or two years, I could have recognized that we are living at a time when the country is and feels itself in travail. But what we are asked to vote for today is a permanent measure which separates us from the rest of Europe. [Murmurs.]
>
> MUSSOLINI: No, no!
>
> TAMASSIA: There is only one country in Europe like Italy in this respect, and that is Russia.
>
> MUSSOLINI: You make a mistake, there is also England.

Signor Grandi, Under Secretary at the Foreign Office, also declared, in an interview with the correspondent of the Morning Post, January 24, 1926, that the new Fascist press laws are the same as in England. Both the correspondent and the editor of the Morning Post reproduced this assertion in all seriousness. Who knows how many of the British Fascists, who read the Morning Post, are convinced that in Fascist Italy the press is no less free than it is in England?

Two Blocks from Broadway

By HARBOR ALLEN

THE conservative portion of the public likes to explain the increasing violence of the police during recent industrial disturbances by the "revolutionary" character of the strikes and by the assertion that the strikers are foreigners with "subversive and un-American" ideas. The police, they assert, are justified in protecting, by violence if necessary, American property and institutions against these dangerous immigrants.

Unfortunately for this argument the situation in the paper box makers' strike in New York City is reversed. Most of the 3,000 workers on strike are American born, while most of the employers are foreign. Yet, in no recent strike outside of Passaic have the police been more aggressive in wielding clubs and fists, more blatant in supporting the side of the employer.

To protest against this campaign of violence by the police the American Civil Liberties Union recently submitted to Mayor James J. Walker a brief urging an investigation of the charges made by strikers in fourteen affidavits. One striker says that his front teeth were knocked out by a blow from a policeman. A girl swears that she was badly bruised when an officer struck her with a chair. Two men assert that they were arrested and fined on trumped-up charges. A policeman is accused by witnesses of chasing children from the street by brandishing his pistol. A picket states that he was dragged into a shop and there pummeled by a policeman. The writer himself saw police within two blocks of Broadway swinging their clubs to break up an orderly line of picketers, mostly girls of high-school age. One of them was severely beaten on the shoulders. Police ride on all the delivery trucks and have gone so far as to load and unload boxes and drive cars carrying strikebreakers. The organ of the National Paper Box Manufacturers was evidently not indulging its fancy when it announced, before the strike was actually called:

> The union met with entirely new conditions this year when they called members on strike, for the box manufacturers in the Greater New York territory have become organized and the Greater New York Paper Box Manufacturers' Association formed for the purpose of treating labor difficulties. The association has the full cooperation of the Police Department and is making a strong front against the striking workers.

The action of the Civil Liberties Union, followed some weeks later by a vigorous reprimand from Judge Simpson in the Magistrate's Court, has lessened for the time being at least the more violent manifestations of police sympathy with the employers.

The paper box makers' union is four years old. This is their first general strike. Through the pressure of the union, agreements were signed with 150 shops whereby wages were somewhat stabilized and work during the slack summer months was divided among all the workers. Last July the union and the manufacturers' association quarreled over the question of pay for the Fourth of July holiday. In ten of the shops the girls walked out and the employers were forced to yield. The rift, however, led to a long series of negotiations during which the manufacturers' association, taking advantage of the slack season when non-union labor is easy to hire, attempted to force the union to a new agreement less rigid than the old. This the union rejected. When the union sent its demands in September, the manufacturers' association declined to answer. On October 5 a general walkout was declared.

Conditions in the paper-box factories are primitive as in few other industries in New York. Many of the shops are in cellars innocent of sun or light. Poor ventilation keeps paper dust from the boxes filtering into the lungs of the workers. Cutting machines whirl knives which have no guards to protect the fingers of the operators. "There are few setter-ups who have their fingers whole," said one of them, showing his hand with a finger and a half missing. Ponderous presses clatter up and down, an open threat to unwary hands and feet. Glue drying on the hands of the girls results in severe cuts and blood poisoning. In none of the shops, most of which employ only 25 or 30 workers, is first aid or medical attention thought of. Subjected to a merciless speed-up system, the girls are in some shops docked for fifteen minutes if they leave their machines for even a moment during the day. Wages range from $8 to $25 a week, with the average at $16 to $18. Of the girls in the industry 53 per cent receive less than $16 a week.

The seven demands of the union are: Recognition of the organization; a 44-hour week; time and a half for overtime and double pay for Sunday; pay for five legal holidays; no discharge without just cause, justness of cause to be decided by a committee comprising the manufacturer, a union representative, and an impartial chairman; no raise of less than $5 a week; and a minimum scale running from $25 a week for helpers to $60 a week for mechanics. Twenty-two shops have already agreed to a 44-hour week and a five-dollar-a-week increase to all workers, with a pledge to accept whatever agreement is made with the remaining 120 shops.

During the ninth week of the strike a group of five ministers and a social worker offered to act as mediators. The union accepted. The Paper Box Manufacturers' Association of Greater New York, however, met the offer with a curt rebuff, declaring that they were not interested in anything but maintaining open shops. Since then one large shop has signed an agreement with the union. The rest are holding out through the slack season hoping that by February, when the trade is again in full swing, the workers will have been starved and pummeled and discouraged into submission. The most difficult problem the union must face is the relief of 3,000 men and girls whose wages have never been high enough to make it possible for them to save. More than 300 arrests with heavy fines and bail early in the struggle exhausted the treasury of the union, which otherwise would have been sufficient for a ten-weeks' strike; and the funds of other sympathetic unions are low owing to heavy strike expenses of their own. The courageous tenacity of the box makers has held their ranks together through fourteen weeks without work in the face of police brutality and judicial severity and an almost solid determination on the part of the employers to break both the strike and the union. Only physical collapse can prevent them from carrying the fight through the slack season to a final settlement; the union wants funds for relief and will receive them at its office at 701 Broadway.

The American God in Russia

By MARIAN TYLER

Archangelskoye, October 1, 1926

ROB a mystic of the object of his worship and he will find a new one. After the church had failed to prevent the war or the revolution or the famine Vassily Ivanovich bought a Fordson. But he was doomed to be unlucky in his gods. The Fordson broke down.

"What is the matter with your American machines?" he asked bitterly. "When my ox died my wife told me to buy another ox. I said no, I would get an American tractor that could not die. That was only three months ago, and now it is dead too."

The machinist from the American farm made an autopsy. Three connecting rods had broken, and several vital parts were replaced with bent nails.

"Why do you treat your tractor so badly?" he asked. "You would never let an ox get so sick."

"They told me machines don't get sick, but they lied to me. My wife was right. You can beat an ox and he will go. And it doesn't take five years to pay for him."

It was no easy task to mend Vassily's Fordson. It was in bad shape, and spare parts were not obtainable, but had to be cut new in the American machine shop. At last the tractor was repaired and returned to its owner. His faith was not restored, but it was corrected.

Machinery is not entirely new to Russian peasants. At seeding time and harvest old-fashioned machines appear in the fields. A local cooperative group has a huge, wooden, infinitely complex structure of pipes and wheels and belts that looks as if it might be used to make music in a circus. With it, fifty-seven workers can thresh a thousand poods of grain in a day. The Americans have a neat little machine which eight people can run, threshing two thousand poods a day. They have another with which three operators can cut and thresh a thousand poods, and skip the binding process altogether. This almost qualifies as a miracle.

When there is more mechanized production in Russia the people will lose their superstitious emotion about it. Propinquity is fatal to gods. Gods live in heaven, and machines, as every one knows, live in America. Of course America is not considered heaven, politically almost the opposite, in fact; but there is an impression that when the god is transferred to Russia, heaven on earth will be accomplished. Meanwhile any American who appears is greeted as a prophet of machinery and technical efficiency.

To sustain this reputation, there is the rather self-centered American group in Moscow; there are the Kuzbas community, some religious farmers from Seattle, several technical groups sent over by the Society for Technical Aid, and this colony of twenty Americans in the north Caucasus, who for a year and a half have been running one of the large government farms with equipment bought through their New York organization, the Russian Reconstruction Farms. They have contended with pioneer conditions, the severest plague of locusts in fifty years, homesickness and disaffection among the less sturdy members, delayed salaries for the Americans, debts for equipment, and versts and versts of red tape.

The local officials are always glad to put obstacles in the way. On one side they are disappointed to find the articles of their mechanistic religion so natural and prosaic. On the other it probably hurts their pride to see these good-natured, energetic people doing more work and better work than they themselves. The Russian staff of the farms strut a little. They are thrilled when they can drive a shiny motor truck down the road and honk the two-wheeled carts of their neighbors imperiously out of the way. So the nearby villages feel a decided satisfaction in catching the Americans on a technicality, and the Americans frequently have to go to a higher authority. The last time there was a threat to put the selling agent in jail because a year before he had overstepped some rule which had since been changed. The situation was explained to the district judge, who sent his subordinate a somewhat unusual order to withdraw the charge and deliver all papers to the accused.

But if village officials are jealous, the higher-ups are more than friendly. A series of functionaries have made the painful journey on the Maxim Gorki, the local third-class train that bumps from village to village (getting its nickname from its wandering habits and its interior resemblance to a stage set for "The Lower Depths"), and reaches the farm at 4:30 a. m. After an inspection of the great fields, the mills and buildings, the shop, the harvesting machinery, and the records, the general verdict has been that the Americans' farm, though far from the largest of the government or concession sovhozes, is the best equipped and managed. Now that the first all-American crop has been harvested, results are beginning to show. The manager and machine experts have been called as consultants to other sovhozes that do not make expenses. The farm is an experiment station for testing seed and recommending procedure. Its shop is to be made one of the official service stations for farm machinery, supplied with plenty of spare parts for Vassily Ivanovich's tractor. Last summer it trained a class of twenty boys from community farms and agricultural schools, who will go back as experts to a dozen different provinces. Ten of the little "hooligans," the homeless boys with criminal records who are terrorizing Moscow, have been given jobs on the farm. With occasional minor lapses they are behaving like honest citizens. There has been too much farming and milling, rebuilding and pioneering so far, and too little money, to let the colony begin its model workers' quarters, or its ambitious social program for the village; but with its left hand, so to speak, it has already improved roads, extended its electric system to several village centers, and conducted a clinic.

The American enterprise includes two farms. One of them the peasants still call Plakseika, the Place of Tears. Its old owner was noted for his cruelty in a country of cruel landlords; he made his serfs stand in icy water to dig his canal in the dead of winter. But the old name only emphasizes the different present. Five minutes from Plakseika by motor or half an hour on foot is the village square, a wide trampled space among the sprawling mud huts, where in summer evenings the young people dance to an accordeon, and where the boys play a strange game that they call football. On one side of the space is the huge wooden church, a mass of little green domes bristling with slender brass crosses like lightning rods. Across the square is the American machine shop, along with the office, the living quarters, the clinic, and other buildings connected with the farms. Cars dart in and out, tractors shoulder their way home from the fields, and the machine shop hums steadily all day and half the night.

The sexton ostentatiously rings the church bell as often and as long as possible. He begins summoning the faithful to the Sunday service before daylight Saturday morning. But it is a losing battle.

In the Driftway

THE returns from the questionnaire on religion, recently printed by newspapers in nearly 200 cities, are being used, as statistics always are, to prove almost anything that anybody wants to demonstrate. Unfortunately the Drifter hasn't anything in that connection that he wants to demonstrate, but he notes that 77 per cent of those who answered the questionnaire stated themselves to be active members of some church, while, according to Charles Stelzle, who directed the test in behalf of the Church Advertising Department of the International Advertising Association, church members constitute only 43 per cent of the population of the United States. In other words, the proportion of church members who answered the questionnaire was almost double the ratio that such persons bear to the entire community and helps to explain why the returns showed so high a percentage of religious belief. Mr. Stelzle offsets this by saying that the questionnaire was answered chiefly in the cities and that church membership in the latter is much stronger than in the rural regions, where it amounts to only 20 per cent of the population. Doubtless there is something in this, but Mr. Stelzle will have to marshal more detail in order to make his point in the face of his own statistics.

* * * * *

BUT for fear that he will be accused of trying, after all, to demonstrate something from the questionnaire, the Drifter hastens to say that what most interests him is how the churches are going to use the returns to further their work—the announced purpose of the test. It is to be hoped, for instance, that the result will not lead to an extension of the method of attracting church advertising used by the Elizabeth (New Jersey) Daily Journal and tacitly sponsored by all the religious organizations whose notices appear on the page. A recent copy of the newspaper carries the following little sermon in large type at the head of its Saturday page of church advertising:

> Roger Babson made a most interesting study of the success of the sons of ministers of the gospel, in connection with the stock from which millionaires come. He found that the son of a preacher—and this is from a man who deals in statistics constantly—is 275 times as likely to become a millionaire as a person of the average parentage.
>
> Or, if you wish, obtain a copy of "Who's Who," and check up on the number of illustrious men in all walks of life who are the sons of preachers. He there shows success 16 times more than the sons of any other profession.
>
> Why is this?
>
> Isn't it because character is the foundation of success, and because religious training is a wonderfully good foundation in the building of character?
>
> No doubt there are other factors that contribute to the success of the sons of preachers, but none of us would doubt, surely, that a thorough religious training—which produces an ability to understand other people through the habit of sympathizing with them—is one of the most important contributing causes.
>
> Are your children in Church, in Sunday School? Do you have a religious atmosphere in your home?
>
> If not, you are not giving your children the chance they should have. You are leaving something out of their lives which they will need.
>
> Lead the way to Church. Take the children. See that they are in Sunday School.

* * * * *

IF this is the religion of those who answered the recent questionnaire, then their belief is not so much in Jehovah as in the Great God Prosperity. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

These Modern Husbands

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For these many years I have listened, sympathetically, to the addresses, remarks, ideas, and emotional expressions of my women friends upon the theme of a better life for their sex. But along with this sympathy I have developed a growing annoyance at certain of their assumptions. They seem to say something like this: Persons of the female sex reach maturity with longings for high adventure, with ideals for social service, with dreams of noble marriage and motherhood, but, by peculiar conventions of society which apply only to them, they are hindered from attaining such goals. To the overwhelming majority of women careers involving adventure and real human service are closed. Marriage falls far below its reputed position; indeed, it involves such drudgery as wilts the flower of womanhood. Child-bearing adds an additional strain on the physical and mental life, altering the entire personality. Thus the female of the species finds life more deadly than the male. To men, on the contrary, are open careers of romance, adventure, and large contribution to social progress. Marriage and fatherhood rest lightly upon their shoulders, without producing any serious handicaps. No wonder that every woman wishes she had been born a man!

But a youth, as well as a maiden, may enter upon matrimony with romantic ideals, only to have them shattered by experience. I came up to my mating-time with ideals concerning the place of religion in the home, concerning child discipline and education, and other intangibles of daily relationship. Just how it happened I cannot say, but these ideals have not blossomed into family habits. Marriage for me has been far from a failure, but also far from the success I dreamed.

Then there is the reflex of the effect of our marriage and of motherhood on my wife. I have seen coming over her many of the changes of which the feminists write: the loss of vitality, the slavery to household tasks, a tendency to chronic irritation and suspicion, a dangerous illness.

Thus as the years slip by, I see my life falling far short of the mark set for it, and my wife's life loaded beyond its capacity with responsibility and nerve strain and unhappiness. I see my children growing up wholesome, yet without certain finer influences that were exerted by my own father and mother. Whatever the future may offer, it will never again give me back the last decade and a half. Who shall say that a man's grief may not be as poignant as a woman's?

My work, congenial as work goes, has involved a large element of drudgery. It is a mistake for women to assume that men have no share of this. Even if it has been a kind master, the job has enslaved me. For the sake of those economically dependent upon me, independence, desires, and sometimes ideals must be put in the discard. I find my enthusiasms dimming, my objectives disappearing, my interests dying.

In youth and early manhood I took life seriously; now in midchannel it rests on me more lightly. I am infected by the spirit that is in modern youth, but I am no longer young, and the conventions and duties of marriage do not permit one to behave too frivolously. For the first time, and far too late in life, I long to sow a (carefully selected) crop of wild oats. I should like to have one (or more) passionate love affairs. But every intimation of forbidden romance must be regarded as a danger signal. I should like to embark upon some voyage of adventure to the South Seas. Instead I commute daily to the city. I should like to stop earning a living and engage in scientific research with an old pal of mine. Actually the field of research is limited to the discovery of a way to secure a more adequate income for the growing family.

I am not arguing that life is harder on men than on women. I merely assert that life, from a masculine standpoint, is not necessarily that unending round of Sunday dinners without dishwashing, that ever verdant series of love affairs without responsibility, that continuous vaudeville of adventure and daring which literary ladies sometimes imply it to be. Many of the problems which your modern women assume to be peculiar to their sex confront all human beings—problems of inner conflict, of attempted adjustment, of advancing age. There is no salvation in being born a male.

San Francisco, California, December 28 A HUSBAND

In Grandmother's Name

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I rise in protest! That a "feminist" should consider it necessary to write an article explaining Why I Earn My Own Living is ridiculous. How else could a feminist obtain a living? And that The Nation should publish articles so pointless, so self-centered, so visionless, and so absurd makes one wonder if you are engaging in a campaign to make feminism ridiculous.

In the name of our gray-haired grandmothers, let us have done with this nonsense! Are women who stand on their own feet such curiosities and anomalies that we must be forever explaining their why and wherefore?

Berkeley, California, December 20 GRACE MAUL

Modern Standards in Crime

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Should not the penal laws be rewritten so that the written laws conform to the code as practiced? I suggest:

The payment of $100,000 or more to members of the Cabinet to induce such members to give away government property without consideration is illegal. Penalty: Indictment, trial, publicity, and acquittal (Doheny, Fall).

The payment of substantial sums to members of the Cabinet or Alien Property Custodians to restrain them from performing their duty is illegal. Penalty: Indictment, trial, publicity, and freedom (Daugherty, Miller).

The kissing of girls without their consent by privates of the United States Infantry is illegal. Penalty: Dishonorable discharge and ten years' imprisonment.

O'Dell Malone and Olin Shafer, privates of the 17th Infantry, Fort Crook, Nebraska, charged with drunkenness, disorderly conduct, and bringing disgrace on the service for forcibly kissing girls, were sentenced to dishonorable discharge and ten years' imprisonment.

Brooklyn, December 24 MAX HERZFELD

He Stays in Wall Street's America

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you please publish the following as one answer to Mr. Moorehead's question appearing in the November 25 issue of The Nation? Please do not publish my name, but use only my initials. I am a government clerk.

Chicago, December 18 R. P. F.

MR. W. K. MOOREHEAD,
Andover, Massachusetts.

SIR: In answer to your question as to whether or not "any reader of The Nation is willing to renounce citizenship in our 'capitalistic state,' go to Russia, and reside there permanently":

If by "Russian regime" is meant communism and the establishment of a temporary proletariat's dictatorship, my answer is that I, as an advocate of communism and an admirer of the Russian regime, am not willing and see no necessity for renouncing my citizenship in Wall Street's America, but rather, I shall stay here and use what little effort I have, in cooperation with other American communists, in an endeavor to transform this capitalistic state into a socialistic state.

Chicago, December 18 R. P. F.

A Challenge to Russia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Before the war liberals could cite the gradual weakening of the power of the Czar's government as proof of the inefficacy of political terrorism, but the spectacular success of the Russian Communists in quelling all serious opposition seems to have demonstrated that terrorism is completely effective, provided that it is efficiently applied. Naturally this is the conclusion of capitalistic groups who favor repressive methods, and liberals now have no effective argument with which to oppose this conclusion. Consequently, those who believe in liberalism will continue to be severely handicapped in their fight against political intolerance until the Russian Communists are either ousted by a successful counter-revolution, or prove to the world that their continuance in power is not dependent upon their system of political terrorism.

Oak Park, Illinois, December 24 BENJAMIN P. NORTON

"By and Large"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Through forty years of reading The Nation I have come to hold in high estimation its feeling for language. So I am coming to you for light. Three letters came to my desk today containing the phrase "By and large." It has come to my attention many times before, but three times in one mail is going strong. The phrase is most offensive to my ear—and conveys no clear idea to my mind. I have a faint idea of what it intends to convey, though it is not sharply defined apparently in usage; but I am utterly at a loss to justify or defend the locution. Do you know anything of its history? Is it idiomatic in any sense? Is there any authority for it outside of Babbittry?

Baltimore, Maryland, December 22

OSCAR WOODWARD ZEIGLER

[The phrase is older than Babbitt. The New English Dictionary runs it back to 1669, when it was used, as it has since been used on the sea, to mean "into the wind and off it"—or, in landsman's language, "from all angles," "from all points of view," "first and last." Just when the phrase came on land as a metaphor the dictionary does not say, nor do we know. Does any reader?—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Mr. Stieglitz and Mr. Pach

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I believe The Nation is interested in the truth. My attention has been called to an article on Brancusi, signed by Walter Pach, in The Nation, December 1, 1926. Mr. Pach's opening sentence reads:

> In 1913, when the Armory Show gave to America its first sight of the post-impressionist schools, etc.

Matisse was introduced to America at 291 Fifth Avenue in 1908; the post-impressionists Maurer, John Marin, Marsden Hartley, Marius De Zayas in 1909; Max Weber, Arthur G. Dove, Cézanne lithographs, Henri Rousseau's paintings and drawings in 1910; Cézanne's water-colors and Picasso in 1911; sculpture of Matisse in 1912, etc., etc.

The history of these shows, attended by more than 60,000 people before the Armory Show, is recorded in Camera Work, to be found in the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

"Cubists, Post-Impressionism," by Arthur Jerome Eddy, published by A. C. McClurg, 1914, states:

> During a number of years prior to 1913 Alfred Stieglitz gave exhibitions of extreme modern work in his Small Photo-Secession Gallery, 291 Fifth Avenue, New York, and the International was the outcome, the logical culmination of these earlier efforts.

Royal Cortissoz, "Personalities in Art," page 419, says he saw at 291 "pioneering exhibitions of Matisse, John Marin, Marius De Zayas, Max Weber, Picabia, Brancusi, Picasso, Gino Severini and so on."

Sheldon Cheney, "A Primer of Modern Art," page 232, calls 291 "an oasis in New York for many years. . . . Cézanne, Matisse, Picasso . . . were introduced to America . . . like . . . Henri Rousseau, De Zayas," etc.

New York, December 23, 1926 ALFRED STIEGLITZ

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Alfred Stieglitz's "tiny laboratory," as he calls it, could not and did not give the country as a whole a sight of the post-impressionist schools, although important work in forming a nucleus of appreciation for them was done at 291. Mr. Stieglitz's very valuable exhibitions at 291 were visited principally by a public already familiar with the modern men, as were the artists who gave the Armory Show. "America," to repeat the word which justifies my sentence, was unaware of the existence of the later schools, and it was at the Armory Show in New York, Chicago, and Boston that America, as distinguished from the frequenters of the laboratory, got its first sight of works like Brancusi's Mlle Pogany and Duchamp's Nude Descending a Staircase. Had the title of my article been The History of the Development of Knowledge of Modern Art in America it would have been a pleasure to record Mr. Stieglitz's share in the matter.

New York, December 25 WALTER PACH

Books and Plays

Self

By WITTER BYNNER

If you were beside me now
  With the setting sun!—
And yet there is room in the evening
  For only one,
And for only one when the dawn
  Is turning white,
And for only one in the day,
  And in the night.

First Glance

PADRAIC COLUM as a writer about contemporary Ireland has certain qualities which, since they do not correspond to the conventional notion of what a poet's writing about Ireland should be, probably do not make this portion of his work widely popular. Yet they are sterling qualities, and so far as I know they are unique. They are —to name only two of them, and to take for granted the warm, sensitive mind which Mr. Colum's pages always reveal—honesty and completeness within the limits of his observation. Mr. Colum's prose plays, three of which have recently been reprinted in this country, contain, I imagine, as much essential Ireland as any three plays by Yeats or Synge; and this in spite of the fact that there is no Celtic business in them. They are sober studies, and the characters all speak as if they were the inhabitants of a material land—speak to the imagination, however, and to the emotions, quite as directly as anybody's Deirdre in these days has done.

It is, of course, the oldest and the newest Ireland—"the historic Irish people"—that Mr. Colum is describing in "The Road Round Ireland" (Macmillan: $4). But while he gives as rich a sense as anyone could give of the depth of legend lying back of the race, it is the people over there now that he has his eye on. He begins, it is true, after an enumeration of the things he saw from a certain road in the Midlands, with a bit of vision: "It was, of course, a chance lighting that made all of these significant, that blent them so that they appeared to form, not merely an Irish landscape but a cycle of Irish history—the lighting gave them that timeless aspect that is in the scenes left by the great painters." But as one goes on with the journey one knows that Mr. Colum has never succumbed to illusion any more than he has refused to acknowledge its power. Other marvelously lighted landscapes come along; tinkers are met, and blind poets, and simple fiddlers. None of these things, however, is more interesting to Mr. Colum than the showing so far made by the cooperative stores in Donegal. We get, alongside of charming chapters on Ryan the fiddler and Raftery the poet, equally charming chapters —though the effect is not the same—on the economics of the Congested Districts and on the sociology of the American quota law. Instead of ecstasies about the Irish language we get figures on the comparative vocabularies of Irish and English countrypeople—the Irish have perhaps 5,000 words, the English perhaps 500. We become convinced, in short, of the reality of Mr. Colum's people; and all the while we lose no portion of our conviction, built up for us by older and mistier authors, that these people have more than their share of the mind's gifts. I have not spoken of Mr. Colum's brilliant sections on individuals like Padraic Pearse and Roger Casement. There is too much to speak of in so generous and patient a book.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Beginning and End of Marriage

The Outline of Marriage. By Floyd Dell. The American Birth Control League. 25 cents.

AS MIGHT be expected, an "Outline of Marriage," published by a society for the propaganda of birth control, makes its first and best point in connection with the extra-reproductive as well as the reproductive uses of marriage. As could also be anticipated, an "Outline of Marriage" by Floyd Dell is cleverly written, and written with all Mr. Dell's known capacity for posing his problem in its most effective perspective for his own generation. Having produced an average member of that generation to state the immediate case for marriage, Mr. Dell proceeds to evoke witnesses such as the biologist, the biochemist, and others to elucidate the origin and evolution of what is generally known as the sex impulse.

What the author sets out to do, and succeeds in doing simply and convincingly, is to rid that impulse of its gathered overtones of propriety and traditionalism, and to restate it in that impersonal light in which all biologic impulses must be stated before they can be effectually used as guides to behavior. Mr. Dell makes so excellent a case for the reproductive instinct in primary life forms, and for its relation to what later can be described as "sex-behavior," that it would be an esteemed service to our time if he could be persuaded to put the first part of his thesis into permanent shape, somewhat extended for the sake of those who need what he has to say and who cannot yet take it in the concentrated scientific form of many of his arguments.

But no sooner has Mr. Dell arrived at the insect stage of life and reproductive evolution than he jumps a little matter of twenty million years or so to the Borneo boy, from which point he proceeds without once returning on his track to cover the missing interval. And yet it is within this overlooked period that the most significant features of our human sexual life took their rise. Here began the specialization of sex-behavior as the species mark, and the whole scale of psychological reactions which are differentiated under the general term "love" and its by-product, jealousy. At no point does Mr. Dell attempt to describe the species-sex-behavior for homo sapiens, nor to locate its point of departure from that of other mammalia. Nor can one accept his anthropologist as an entirely competent witness to the tribal phase of the evolution of marriage. He is not even an up-to-date anthropologist, and he accepts too many of Mr. Dell's own prepossessions about the part played by psychology in the evolution of marriage custom.

Mr. Dell's anthropologist accepts Freud's "Totem and Taboo" at fourth hand; for Dr. Freud himself collected it at second and third hand from books some of which have been superseded and practically all of which were compiled from anthropological data collected before any of our modern psychological science had been applied to such study. It is, in fact, only since Freud's "Totem and Taboo" appeared that any really revealing and sociologically reliable study of totemism has been made. Much the same sort of thing can be said of Westermarck's work on human marriage. Monumental for its time, it must be borne in mind that since Westermarck's time the tremendous bulk of data drawn from intensive studies of the American tribes has profoundly altered many of our anthropological concepts in regard to the origin of human institutions. Another item overlooked by the anthropologist who assists Mr. Dell's "Outline" is that practically all of the available data have been collected by men, and that nowhere is there to be found a scientifically compiled Women's Lore of Love which goes further back than the Ghost of Queen Elinor raised by Mr. Dell for his purpose. For the Greek ladies whom he cites had nothing to say publicly on the subject. The best item in this part of the "Outline" is the delineation of the part played in modern marriage by the historic enslavement of women.

If one feels, then, that the second half of Mr. Dell's "Outline" is a little thin—I have just explained that there isn't any middle—it can scarcely be called Mr. Dell's fault. Very much work remains to be done covering the interval between the specialization of mating habits as a species mark—or should one say, near-mark?—and the modern situation before anything like a considered outline can be offered. Mr. Dell has neatly, and one suspects correctly, closed his sketch of marriage on the modern triumph over the reproductive instinct by the discovery of birth control. The contraceptive device is probably the weapon with which the human race will free itself from the nearly insupportable pressure of instincts that have outlived their biologic function. But it by no means closes the adventure of mating, nor does it cover more than a small arc of the range of problems both social and personal which spring in the nature of things from the married relation. Nevertheless, Mr. Dell's pamphlet takes us competently over the first stage of the evolutionary process, and evokes confident anticipation of a final and structurally sustained complete outline.

MARY AUSTIN

The Scandal of the Sects

Twelve Modern Apostles and Their Creeds. Duffield and Company. $2.50.

THE original apostles were interested in telling why they were Christians. Modern apostles seem to be interested in telling why they are something else. Twelve such apostles here set forth and vindicate their differences one from another, and all from Christ. Gilbert K. Chesterton proclaims "that Catholicism is true"; others say or suggest the same for Episcopalianism, Lutheranism, Congregationalism, Unitarianism, Christian Science, Mormonism, etc. The Nazarene would hardly know what any of them are talking about except, possibly, the "unbeliever," Carl Van Doren, who seems concerned with such curiously untheological matters as honesty, truth, and a better world.

It is interesting to note that the majority of these sectarians are what they are because they were born that way. Chesterton, to be sure, speaks of his "conversion"; Dr. Jefferson "decided to become a Congregationalist"; Dr. Crothers "ceased to be a Presbyterian—uniting with the Unitarian church"; Clifford Smith "read the New Testament—[and] then became interested in Christian Science"; Carl Van Doren cries out, "Let us be honest." But all the rest, seven of the twelve, are of the same breed with "the true-born Englishman," Ralph Rackstraw, in "Pinafore," who > —might have been a Roosian,

> A French, or Turk, or Proosian,
> Or perhaps Italian!
> But in spite of all temptations
> To belong to other nations,
> He remains an Englishman!
> Hurrah!

"I was born in the Episcopal church," says Bishop Slattery; "I am a Presbyterian by inheritance," says Dr. Coffin; "I was born one," says Reed Smoot, the Mormon. Which suggests to the true Gilbertian that, if these eminent religionists had been "exchanged in childhood's happy hour," like Ralph Rackstraw and Captain Corcoran of H. M. S. Pinafore, Senator Smoot would now be President of the Union Theological Seminary, Dr. Coffin Bishop-coadjutor of Massachusetts, and Dr. Slattery one of the Mormon elders.

But suppose that churches were exchanged, rather than men! Would it make any difference? Not much, apparently, except in the extreme cases. Chesterton (Catholic), Smith (Christian Scientist), Smoot (Mormon), and one or two others say distinctive things. But—Dr. Coffin hails Presbyterianism because it represents "a combination of local freedom with a unifying organization"; Dr. Mullins defends the Baptist church because it "conserves the freedom of faith"; Dr. North is well content with the Methodist church because "within [its] organization there is freedom"; Dr. Jefferson was won to Congregationalism because of "the freedom which [it] offers." They all seem to agree pretty much, even on the matter of sectarianism, of which many of them are heartily ashamed, and church unity, which most of them ardently desire. Thus, Bishop Slattery prays for "the single fellowship of the one Church of the Living God"; Dr. Coffin says that "it is not easy to discover the distinctive characteristics of our existing Protestant communions," and is "resolved to seek to end barriers"; Dr. Söderblom would have all men overcome sectarianism, and unite "around the Cross"; Dr. Crothers wants to belong to "the Holy Catholic Church," and longs for "the organization of the religious life in a more inclusive way." With such unanimity of sentiment among the divided churches, one may well ask, Why not stay where you are born? But one may equally well ask, Why have such divisions at all? Why not get together? Dr. Coffin, who seems more sensitive to the scandal of denominationalism than most of the others, says that he hopes to live to see a "more inclusive organic union among the churches of the United States," and vows that he is "ready to do [his] utmost for its accomplishment." "I am a Presbyterian only temporarily," is his word. But "temporarily" has thus far meant, and seems yet to mean, "eternally" for him! Why delay? What does "the utmost" for the accomplishment of "union among the churches" mean, if not active leadership in casting aside sectarian bonds?

As an exhibition of the state of Christendom today, this book is pretty pathetic. Tradition, inheritance, habit, inertia, conformity, content stalk like ghosts through its pages. I am no unbeliever; I have a religion that Mr. Van Doren knows nothing of. But as between his confession and the apologies of the churchmen, I would choose the former every time. Fortunately, no such choice is necessary!

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

The Process of John Erskine

Galahad. By John Erskine. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

THE critical assurances about "Galahad" and "Helen" have been numerous, easy, and irrelevant. We have been told, for instance, that Mr. Erskine's novels are witty, that they are daring even to the point of offending rabbis, that they cast an oblique light on cherished conventions, that they bring mythic figures up to date. Some of these things are true; some are false; none are important.

Essentially it is quite insignificant whether Mr. Erskine's ideas are old or new, good or bad, daring or conventional. The point is that he actually has them, that he really has nothing else. And therewith he bucks the entire tradition of the American novel, which from "The Scarlet Letter" to "An American Tragedy" has based itself on feeling. (Even Melville, the most intellectual of them all, shrank from the open play of ideas and shrouded a metaphysical passion in a cloud of symbolism.) This emotional-sentimental convention is a necessary accompaniment of a frontier community like America; heretofore it has been violated only by those who have definitely reacted against the pioneer spirit—witness Henry James. But now, with "Galahad," we seem to hear the accents of a new declaration of independence. Here, in this book, is one of the first examples of an American roman cérébrale; and more than the mere label links Mr. Erskine with those French practitioners, such as André Gide, who are endeavoring to reduce the novel to a new aesthetic pattern whose form shall be as adequate for the expression of pure ideas as was the Platonic dialogue.

One thing will strike the critical reader of "Galahad" immediately—it is a book stripped clean of emotion. For anyone seeking passion and sentiment, great moments, drama, it will prove about as exciting as a well-played game of chess. A romantic myth, originally full of color and heart-burning, is presented with an ironical quietness. This is no easy thing to do. It amounts to a simple and curt refusal to dramatize any dramatic situation, such as that in which the first Elaine falls in love with Lancelot and conceives the idea of bearing a child by him. But the reader must not deceive himself: there has been dramatization and emotionalization. The point is that the reader is not assistant at the process. All of it has already gone on in the mind of the author. By a curious and ingenious reversal of the Aristotelian formula, the pity and terror which are the components of drama are preliminarily experienced by Mr. Erskine himself. Availing himself of the ordinary mechanism of the sympathetic artist, he lives through the emotions of his characters, purges himself of the attendant excitements; but only when the catharsis is completed does he sit down to write. What is the result? The end-product is a calm and low-toned conversation, in which human relationships are purified of everything but an intellectual residuum. Nevertheless, this residuum is not utterly pure, for it is tinctured, not with emotion but with its twin brother, misunderstanding. The characters in "Galahad" cannot properly be said to feel—but they are so far reminiscent of a precreational state of emotional bewilderment as to be incapable of comprehending each other immediately.

With this problem facing him, the author is compelled to construct a new aesthetic form to serve as an adequate vehicle of expression. The pattern of the story is determined by a graduated series of intellectual clarifications which are analogous to the successive crises of the usual romantic novel. For example, Guinevere terminates a conversation with Lancelot as follows: "Ordinarily this would have been a quarrel, Lancelot. Instead it has been an exchange of ideas." Now, whether they are conscious of it or not, all the characters are striving to attain to the state in which Guinevere and Lancelot find themselves. The culmination of any relationship is "an exchange of ideas." Some reach this point sooner, some later. Galahad, for example, reaches it last of all, and so he becomes a sort of suffering protagonist, except that his agony is entirely mental and his problem is purely a problem of comprehension. Because of the unique position he thus occupies in the story the book is named after him rather than after Guinevere or Lancelot. It will be understood, as a corollary to the foregoing analysis, that in "Galahad" there can be no such thing as "dramatic restraint," a favorite tag of literary reviewers. There is no dramatic restraint because there is no drama and because there is no restraint. On the contrary there is the diametrically opposed quality of intelligent expression.

Our interpretation can now help us to understand why Mr. Erskine should select his material from myth rather than from the contemporary world. It should be made clear at the outset that he is not the cheap vulgarian his admirers would make him out to be. Though "Helen of Troy" seems at first blush to belie the statement, he is not primarily interested in anything so facile as making his characters "talk like modern men and women." Any fool can modernize a myth; it takes an artist to universalize it by making it the basis of a purely ideational realm. Why then do we have ancient Greece and misty Camelot, and, it is rumored, the Garden of Eden? Assuredly not that we may rediscover our contemporaries in an antique mirror. That is a child's game and it is not the game Mr. Erskine would have us play. On the contrary, he chooses his remote backgrounds in order that both he and his readers may be thereby assisted to the necessary intellectual detachment. By placing his characters in a mythical context he hopes to destroy any incursion of contemporaneity, to alienate us from anything but an abstract environment capable of engendering abstract ideas. That is why his people have absolutely no mannerisms of speech. Like the characters in Euripides, they all talk the same language.

From this viewpoint, "Galahad" stands out as a much finer because formally purer book than its predecessor. The story itself has less romantic glamor about it; there is no glorious Helen to enmesh our sympathies and thus confuse the clarity of our perceptions. The legend unfolds in a clear dry light. Its charm consists in the enjoyable apprehension we have of a form which is actually based on a continuous mental process. Our delight consists in the eagerness with which we follow each character in his progress from misunderstanding to lucid cerebration.

At present it looks as though Mr. Erskine were the only intelligible practicing aesthetician in the field of the American novel. He is one of those rare artists who can pose a new problem and invent a new form to resolve that problem. That he should be read by 100,000 good citizens of the republic is a masterpiece of irony which the author, more than anyone else, is in a good position to appreciate.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

A Welter of Witches

The History of Witchcraft and Demonology. By Montague Summers. The History of Civilization Series. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

"IT IS quite impossible to appreciate and understand the true lives of men and women in Elizabethan and Stuart England, in the France of Louis XIII and his son, in the Italy of the Renaissance and the Catholic Reaction—to name but three countries and a few definite periods—unless we have some realization of the part that witchcraft played in those ages amid the affairs of these kingdoms." With this attitude of the author one may essentially agree, as also with his view that the Elizabethan dramatists were believers in the reality of witchcraft and magic. Overdrawn, but containing a certain amount of truth, is his identification of persons accused of witchcraft with social pests and parasites, poisoners, blackmailers, charlatans, bawds, abortionists, and other ministers to vice. One could wish that he had presented more specific evidence in support of this view.

But the Reverend Montague Summers goes much farther. He believes that among the persons who were burned as witches—or who should have been, in his opinion, but escaped detection or punishment—were "devotees of a loathly and obscene creed . . . members of a powerful secret organization inimical to church and state." He holds that "satanists yet celebrate the black mass in London, Brighton, Paris, Lyons, Bruges, Berlin, Milan, and alas! in Rome itself. Both South America and Canada are thus polluted." Although admitting the existence of manifold deception and imposture, he nevertheless finds a large element of truth in the evidence that was accumulated during the period of the witchcraft delusion. He is willing to grant that women did not actually fly to the witches' sabbats on broomsticks, but he believes in the possibility of levitation. He maintains the existence, both past and present, of witches, sabbats, contracts with Satan, and cases of diabolic possession. "Keen intelligences and shrewd investigators," he says, "such as Gregory XV, Bodin, Guazzo, De Lancre, D'Espagnet, La Reynie, Boyle, Sir Matthew Hale, Glanvill, were neither deceivers nor deceived." Yet we know that such men were deceived and that they misled others in matters such as astrology and alchemy, in their notions concerning nature and occult properties, and in many another error and superstition. For example, "Salt never appeared at the witches' table. Bodin gives as the reason that it is an emblem of eternity." "Cum grano salis" would not be bad seasoning for the perusal of Mr. Summers's work.

"Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" appears to be the attitude of this book, with its mention in the dedication of "all the Italian and French madonnas at whose shrines we have worshiped." It would restore the days of the witchcraft delusion and put us back into the mental attitude of the church fathers. And like them it is determined not to be "culpably prudish" in detailing the abominations of witches, "the filth and foulest passions of the age." The author further gives us to understand, although he may be ill-advised in this, that his position is that of the Roman Catholic church today. He translates from the Roman Ritual the actual Form of Exorcising the Possessed in present use, and describes the medals of St. Benedict employed against evil spirits and "first authoritatively approved by Benedict XIV in his briefs of 23 December, 1741, and 12 March, 1742."

The book is not a history in the sense of connected chronological narrative. Rather the following topics are treated: The witch as a heretic and anarchist, worship of the witch, demons and familiars, the sabbat, the witch in Holy Writ, diabolic possession and modern spiritism, and the witch in dramatic literature. Even within the chapters the discussion is discursive and confusing. The author has a fairly readable style but lacks constructive ability in the development of a theme and jumps from one period or thing to another in a most disconcerting manner. And he keeps arguing in season and out of season for the reality of witchcraft. "The lady protests too much, methinks."

At first glance the book gives the impression of considerable erudition, with its equipment of footnotes and long bibliography. But my experience in reading it has been that whenever I came to an interesting assertion of fact or a doubtful asseveration and looked for a means of verification or a reference to the original source, none was given. Moreover, such references as these from page 78 are entirely inadequate, giving no page or even no title:

> 33. Philip Schaff, "History of the Christian Church."
> 34. Matthew Paris, "Chronica Minora."
> 35. J. P. Kirsch.

A protest must be uttered against the relegating of the notes to the close of each chapter, thereby wasting the reader's time and giving him endless trouble and annoyance, especially since the name of the author of a work cited is often not given in the note, making it the more difficult to connect it with the text. Little evidence is given of new research by the author or of new ideas on his part, and it is hard to see how the volume adds anything to the previous works in the field. The views of Manicheans, Waldensians, and Albigensians are grossly misrepresented. It is asserted that the charge against the Templars of celebrating a blasphemous mass was "established beyond any question or doubt"! In short, except for a few useful titles in the bibliography, it does not appear that any serious historical use can be made of this farrago from the literature of witchcraft, while it is to be hoped that it may not come to prurient and superstitious ears, though they, too, would probably be disappointed in it. Finally, surprise and regret must be expressed that such a work should appear in a series on the history of civilization and under the consulting editorship, if not the aegis, of a student of intellectual history.

LYNN THORNDIKE

The Universe Made Familiar

The Nature of the World and Man. By Sixteen Members of the Faculty of the University of Chicago. University of Chicago Press. $4.

THE stated purpose of this collaborative book is "to present an outline of our knowledge of the physical and biological world, and to show the position of man in the universe in which he lives." Again, "it aims to assist the individual in the very important problem of forming well-defined conceptions of the cosmos and of his relation to it." There is no question that we need to democratize and humanize the newer knowledge of man and the world he lives in; for modern society, in its political and social organization, does not encourage despotisms founded on scientific knowledge. If we are to make use of our knowledge it must be through a spreading of that knowledge as widely as possible and, perhaps, as soon as possible.

The present volume, which will be followed by a similar one on the social sciences, covers that vast program of evolution which Spencer attempted to survey somewhat speculatively—from astronomy to the origin and early stages of the earth; from geology, the forms of energy, and chemistry to the nature and origin of life. Then the forms of life—from bacteria to plants, invertebrates, vertebrates, and finally man. Man is treated from several angles, both anthropological and historical.

Granted the interest of the student, all that might be hoped for will probably follow. And, granted lively teachers in the course for which the book is designed, that necessary interest will be forthcoming. For the story is well told, well illustrated, and well colored with human significance. Certainly the volume is accurate; the names of the various contributors guarantee that. Certainly it is interesting and readable, and popular without being diluted. There are few paragraphs or few arguments which require any great effort, provided the reader has once been caught by the fascination of the theme as a whole.

I have already indicated the one criticism which it is fair to make: the book does suppose something of a preexistent interest. Is it asking too much that such a book as this contain some appeal to the needs and the fundamental drives of the human animal? The opening pages of the first essay, that on astronomy, written by Professor Moulton, do to some extent make more than academic appeal, but this note is not carried out in the whole essay or repeated by the rest. In a word, the book has a certain austerity. If we are to humanize and democratize knowledge, then we must use the technique needed for that purpose. The laws of learning are the laws of learning, and must be taken into account quite as much as the laws of gravitation or the dynamics of living matter.

DANIEL BELL LEARY

Sir Hubert Parry

Hubert Parry, His Life and Works. By Charles L. Graves. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $12.50.

SIR HUBERT PARRY will be long remembered, not only as one of the leaders of Victorian English music and the Director of the Royal College of Music, London, not only as one of the most truly English of composers, especially in choral works, not only even as author of perhaps the best introduction to music in the English language ("The Evolution of the Art of Music"), but, as the present book abundantly illustrates, as a human being of rare and fine quality: honest, fearless, magnanimous, wholly free from snobbery, and endearingly subject to prejudice though always seeking the truth with the full devotion of his candid, thorough, and often boldly original mind.

He was of impulsive, almost violent temperament, a reckless motorist and yachtsman, intense in his admirations (as for example for Bach, about whom he has written one of his best books), and, what does not always follow but is in the best English tradition, fearless in the exposure and denunciation of what he considered evil (compare, for instance, the chapters on the Influence of Audiences on Taste in his "Style in Musical Art"). Few musicians have ever been as intensely in earnest as Parry, and it is not too much to say that his earnestness has, directly and indirectly, raised the whole tone of the musical profession. Born of the upper circle, he was early revolted by its idleness and snobbery. Artistic pretense he disliked as much as social; he called a well-known essayist "the most foul-mouthed, conceited, toadying little snob" he had ever met. The same honesty of mind forced him out of conventional church connections, even at the risk of the loss of his inheritance through the shock given his father; he said it "made him squirm to hear all these people complacently call themselves 'miserable sinners.'"

Parry's love of children reminds one of Brahms. "I once saw him arrive unexpectedly," records Sir William Richmond, "in the middle of a very dull children's party. The whole atmosphere changed; he ran round the room on all fours; all the children seemed suddenly to come alive, yelled and shrieked with laughter, and the awful failure of the party was turned into a tremendous success." He was wholly free from highbrowism, the artistic analogue of snobbery, whatever those may think who have carelessly read his merciless attacks on cheap, pretentious, or sensational music. His daughter tells of his delight in some mandolin players at the hotel in Taormina. "In the same hotel," she says, "was a well-known artist full of learned and pedantic talk about music, who had neither the courage nor the flair to recognize it outside an orthodox tradition. He would run away affectedly holding his ears when the orchestra began, and was much provoked when my father said they were 'astonishing,' or 'wonderful,' and praised their 'jolly tone.'" On a first hearing of Boris Godounov he notes in his diary: "A glimpse from a new region altogether. I enjoyed it thoroughly throughout. Music mostly barbaric with its constant reiteration of short figures—wonderfully effective." Yet of Strauss's "Legend of Joseph" his verdict is "Quite disgusted—vulgar, stupid, and lascivious, without any spring in it."

The growth in grasp, reach, and sweetness of Parry's mind as he matured is exhibited in the summary of "Instinct and Character," a work, still unpublished, to which he devoted his last years. Few artists of any sort, and fewer musicians, are capable of the tolerance this intolerant youth at last attained. Mr. Graves thus summarizes his analysis of ultra-modern excesses: "The lesson of the age of inventions was to discredit all feeling and sentiment. . . . Excessive preoccupation with special activities fosters the predominance of the self-against-all-else instinct, especially among the undeveloped masses. Hence raucous self-assertion, obscene gestures, contempt for lovely things and noble creations of art, and the desire to abolish them." "Hubert Parry," adds Graves, "excuses this attitude. The offenders never had the chance to understand this beauty. They know no better; the fault is not theirs; they had been trodden down, and signalize their emancipation by an orgy of earthly pleasures and crude excitements." Parry remarks in this work: "The mind that has the widest range tries to see into the mind that has the least." The generosity and the humanity of the sentiment is not more characteristic than the reticence and almost studied freedom from "big talk" with which it is expressed.

DANIEL GREGORY MASON

Books in Brief

Read 'Em and Weep. The Songs You Forgot to Remember. By Sigmund Spaeth. Doubleday, Page and Company. $4.

A valuable collection, with both words and music, of the most grotesque of our fathers' and grandfathers' favorites at the piano or in the music hall. The first is Yankee Doodle and the last is The Curse of an Aching Heart, and in between come many songs which one supposed one would never see in print. Mr. Spaeth's remarks as he goes along date quite as definitely as his material does. His only advantage—now—is that he dates from 1926.

Amy Lowell: A Critical Study. By Clement Wood. Harold Vinal. $2.50.

Many shrewd and wicked things are very well said in this first study to be made of the late Miss Lowell. Mr. Wood is so totally without sympathy for his subject that he has not always understanding; but he has made a good beginning in that process of reduction which will be necessary before we know what of Miss Lowell is worth preserving.

Lee: A Dramatic Poem. By Edgar Lee Masters. The Macmillan Company. $2.

A study in verse not so much of Lee as of liberty. Mr. Masters has taken the leader of the Confederacy as a symbol of the free soul battling vainly to retain the conditions of its freedom. The Civil War becomes here an issue between an old way of life and a new technique of tyranny—the technique we have now come to know as industrialism. If Lee and his fellows know more of the future in this poem than in reality they did, it does not matter. Mr. Masters has added a philosophical poem of genuine depth and power to American literature.

Letters of a Roman Gentleman. Selected from the Correspondence of Cicero and translated by Arthur Patch McKinlay. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

There could be no more agreeable introduction than this to a Roman author who, after several decades of being discounted for his unoriginality, seems to be coming into his own on other counts.

The Tailor of Mount Holly: John Woolman. By F. V. Morley. London: Friends Book Center. 6d.

A pleasant introduction, through quotation and comment, to one of the best of eighteenth-century American writers.

Stories and Dramas. By Leo N. Tolstoy. Translated from the Russian by Mrs. Lydia Turin, Mrs. H. M. Lucas, and C. J. Hogarth. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

These twelve unpublished stories and sketches and this full-length play ("The Contaminated Family") come to America from Moscow through Paris. Dating all the way from 1851 to 1910, they are an important addition to Tolstoy literature, though their intrinsic value is uneven.

The Story of the Inns of Court. By Sir D. Plunkett Barton, Charles Benham and Francis Watt. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $5.

A notably readable account of the slow growth of London's most baffling institution. It is the second to appear within a year.

The Life and Times of Martha Hepplethwaite. By Frank Sullivan. Boni and Liveright. $2.

The outlandish non-sequiturs of Mr. Sullivan, who regales the readers of the New York World, have at last attained the dignity of book form. Mr. Sullivan, like all violent fun-makers, falls very far when he misses the mark, though at his best he is gorgeous.

Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1926 and Yearbook of American Poetry. Sesquicentennial Edition. Edited by William Stanley Braithwaite. Boston: B. J. Brimmer Company. $4.

The fattest of these annual volumes to date. The introductory matter, consisting of fourteen essays by various hands surveying the American output today, fills almost 200 pages; and at the end, after the usual tabulations, is a "Who's Who" of living American poets.

Johnny Appleseed. The True Story of Jonathan Chapman, 1775-1846. By the grandson of one who knew him well, James Lattimore Himrod. Chicago: Chicago Historical Society. 25 cents.

An interesting contribution to the literature of an interesting American legend. Chapman, the Middle Western St. Francis, here is given, in addition to a narrative and critical account of very slight proportions, a bibliography which will be of real value in the further development of his legend.

Interesting Books of 1926

CHOSEN BY CARL VAN DOREN

Abraham Lincoln. By Carl Sandburg. Harcourt, Brace.
Jefferson. By Albert Jay Nock. Harcourt, Brace.
George Washington. By W. E. Woodward. Boni and Liveright.
The Intimate Papers of Colonel House. By Charles Seymour. Houghton Mifflin.
Edgar Allan Poe. By Joseph Wood Krutch. Knopf.
Israfel. By Hervey Allen. Doran.
You Can't Win. By Jack Black. Macmillan.
Guy de Maupassant. By Ernest Boyd. Knopf.
New England in the Republic. By James Truslow Adams. Little, Brown.
The Mauve Decade. By Thomas Beer. Knopf.
Our Times. By Mark Sullivan. Scribner.
International Anarchy. By G. Lowes Dickinson. Century.
Virgin Spain. By Waldo Frank. Boni and Liveright.
Today and Tomorrow. By Henry Ford. Doubleday, Page.
The Art of Being Ruled. By Wyndham Lewis. Harper.
Notes on Democracy. By H. L. Mencken. Knopf.
Prejudices: Fifth Series. By H. L. Mencken. Knopf.
The Heart of Emerson's Journals. By Bliss Perry. Houghton Mifflin.
The Golden Day. By Lewis Mumford. Boni and Liveright.
Microbe Hunters. By Paul de Kruif. Harcourt, Brace.
Psychology and Ethnology. By W. H. R. Rivers. Harcourt, Brace.
The Arcturus Adventure. By William Beebe. Putnam.
Alcohol and Longevity. By Raymond Pearl. Knopf.
Lee. By Edgar Lee Masters. Macmillan.
The Second Book of Negro Spirituals. By James Weldon Johnson and J. Rosamond Johnson. Viking.
Collected Poems. By James Stephens. Macmillan.
William. By E. H. Young. Harcourt, Brace.
The Orphan Angel. By Elinor Wylie. Knopf.
Nigger Heaven. By Carl Van Vechten. Knopf.
The Time of Man. By Elizabeth Madox Roberts. Viking.
The Romantic Comedians. By Ellen Glasgow. Doubleday, Page.
Tar, a Midwest Childhood. By Sherwood Anderson. Boni and Liveright.
Lolly Willowes. By Sylvia Townsend Warner. Viking.
The Silver Stallion. By James Branch Cabell. McBride.
The Love Nest and Other Stories. By Ring Lardner. Scribner.
The Life and Times of Martha Hepplethwaite. By Frank Sullivan. Boni and Liveright.

Drama

An Elegant Comedy

THE much-heralded Guitrys have arrived and begun their season at Chanin's Forty-sixth Street Theater. Thousands of tourists, returning from the now obligatory holiday in Paris, have acted as advance agents without salary and, thanks to them, the atmosphere of welcome has been prepared. Moreover, by virtue of that process which affects all imported goods, a pair of agreeable boulevard actors and a suave boulevard farce—"Mozart"—have become, on this side of the water, two distinguished Dramatic Artists appearing in a play which, if not exactly a dramatic masterpiece, is at least excruciatingly "je ne sais quoi." To admire it and them adequately is to give proof of an international culture. The very least that one can do is to admit that they really do order these things better in France; anything less than that is like to arouse the grave suspicion that one has never taken an apéritif at the Café de la Paix or an ice at the Napolitain, for what Guillaume Apollinaire is (or at least was) to the serious visitors on the left bank, the Guitrys are to the more worldly and yet discriminating denizens of the right. Even those who learned years ago that an enthusiasm for the Folies Bergère is a bit naive would no more miss seeing their latest success than they would fail to pay a visit to the establishment of Jeanne Lanvin or Jenny. Yet the cruel fact remains that the Guitrys are no more than the established favorites of a Parisian Broadway, as clever and as hollow in their particular way as our own popular entertainers are in theirs. If we had them constantly with us we would think of the one no more than we think of, let us say, Avery Hopwood, and we should not elevate the other above her due position as a graceful ingenue. But because the faux bon is always likely to appear for a time as the vrai bon if only it be in an unfamiliar tradition, we take them both with something approaching solemnity. They are, you know, so French.

But just what, after all, does this phrase mean when applied to things which are inevitably trivial, and why should it cause them to be considered important when they are merely a little exotic? The present play is a polite musical farce about an amorous young man who is labeled Mozart merely to give to the piece an air of significance which it does not have, and we may readily grant that we do not do this sort of thing quite so well here. It is more fluent, more subdued, and more "literary" than our farces are accustomed to be. It is quiet where ours would be raucous, it is well-bred where ours would be rowdy, and it is sedulously elegant. Without ever ceasing to be shallow and conventional it has a superficial air of being cultivated, and it is obviously sophisticated. One searches for an adjective which will just describe its air of smart refinement and one discovers that the adjective is "chic," while one is, at the same time, reminded that that is not a word which one applies to art of even the lighter kind—that it is, indeed, worse than mere vulgarity because while vulgarity may refine itself the merely chic is forever incapable of becoming anything else. Such a play as "Mozart" has, indeed, about the same relation to the drama as those elaborate perfume flasks which one sees in the best shops have to sculpture. Its virtues, that is to say, are the virtues which belong to the world of fashion, not the world of art, and the touch of distinction which it has is the distinction of a modish hat or a lip-stick. It is elegant as an evening wrap is elegant, charming as a piece of lingerie is charming; it is as refined as a powder puff. One admires it as one admires the appointments of a toilet table, and one yawns as one would yawn in an art gallery arranged to suit the taste of a couturière. Undoubtedly they order all these things better in France, but the question, so far as art is concerned, is the question whether or not it is worth while to order them at all.

Ziegfeld's "Betsy" (New Amsterdam Theater) is an elaborate, standardized revue, starring Belle Baker and enlivened with one scene—that devoted to the Harmonica Orchestra—which persistently stops the show. "Peggy Ann" (Vanderbilt Theater) is a musical comedy made from the old farce "Tillie's Nightmare," and not more than sporadically amusing. At the Lyceum E. H. Sothern is appearing in a rather ponderous comedy called "What Never Dies," and at the Booth Otis Skinner is reviving "The Honor of the Family," an old-fashioned play made interesting by his extraordinarily vigorous and ingratiating performance. But perhaps, after all, the best theatrical entertainment of the holiday week was that of "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves," given by Tony Sarg's unusually agile marionettes (Edith Totten Theater).

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

What Made These Women "Modern"?

The sixth article in the series of personal revelations by well-known women will appear next week. If you have missed the first five, mail this announcement and sixty cents. John B. Watson, behaviorist, and Beatrice M. Hinkle, psychoanalyst, will point out in The Nation the significance of these anonymous articles.

ESSAYS IN POPULAR SCIENCE

By JULIAN HUXLEY

Professor of Zoölogy in the University of London

These essays, written by one of the world's leading biologists, discuss each an aspect of the problem of heredity. The book clarifies for the general reader what is known of the chromosomes—the cellular agents of heredity and evolution—to explain the mechanism by which characteristics are transmitted.

THE CHAPTERS

Heredity
The Inheritance of Acquired Characters
The Determination of Sex
Why Do More Boy Babies Die Than Girls?
The Dominant Sex
Biology in Utopia
The Control of the Life-Cycle
The Meaning of Death
Elixir Vitae
Birth Control
Thomas Henry Huxley and Religion
On the History of Science
Birds and the Territorial System
An Hour's Psychology
Evolution and Purpose
The Frog and Biology
The Tadpole

Biology's Latest Answer to the Problems of Evolution and Life

ILLUSTRATED

$4.00 net At All Bookstores

Alfred A. Knopf, 730 Fifth Ave., New York

BORZOI BOOKS

A splendid novel of Napoleon's triumphal days

by LEONIE AMINOFF author of "Triumph"
$2.50
E. P. DUTTON & CO.
NEW YORK

CREATIVE EXPRESSION THROUGH MUSIC

A dozen authoritative articles by leaders of musical opinion on the relation of Childhood and Music, presenting creative methods of developing each through the other.

Sixty Cents a copy Two Dollars per year

Progressive Education Association
10 Jackson Place Washington, D. C.

YOUR LEISURE A PLEASURE YOUR PLEASURE A PROFIT

You can ensure yourself one evening's pleasant reading a week during the coming winter by devoting it to

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

You will like its freshness of viewpoint coupled with the accuracy of its facts.

It is a store-house of information on international politics, European trends of thought, current English literature, and cultural developments the world over.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings and on new trends of thought in various countries.

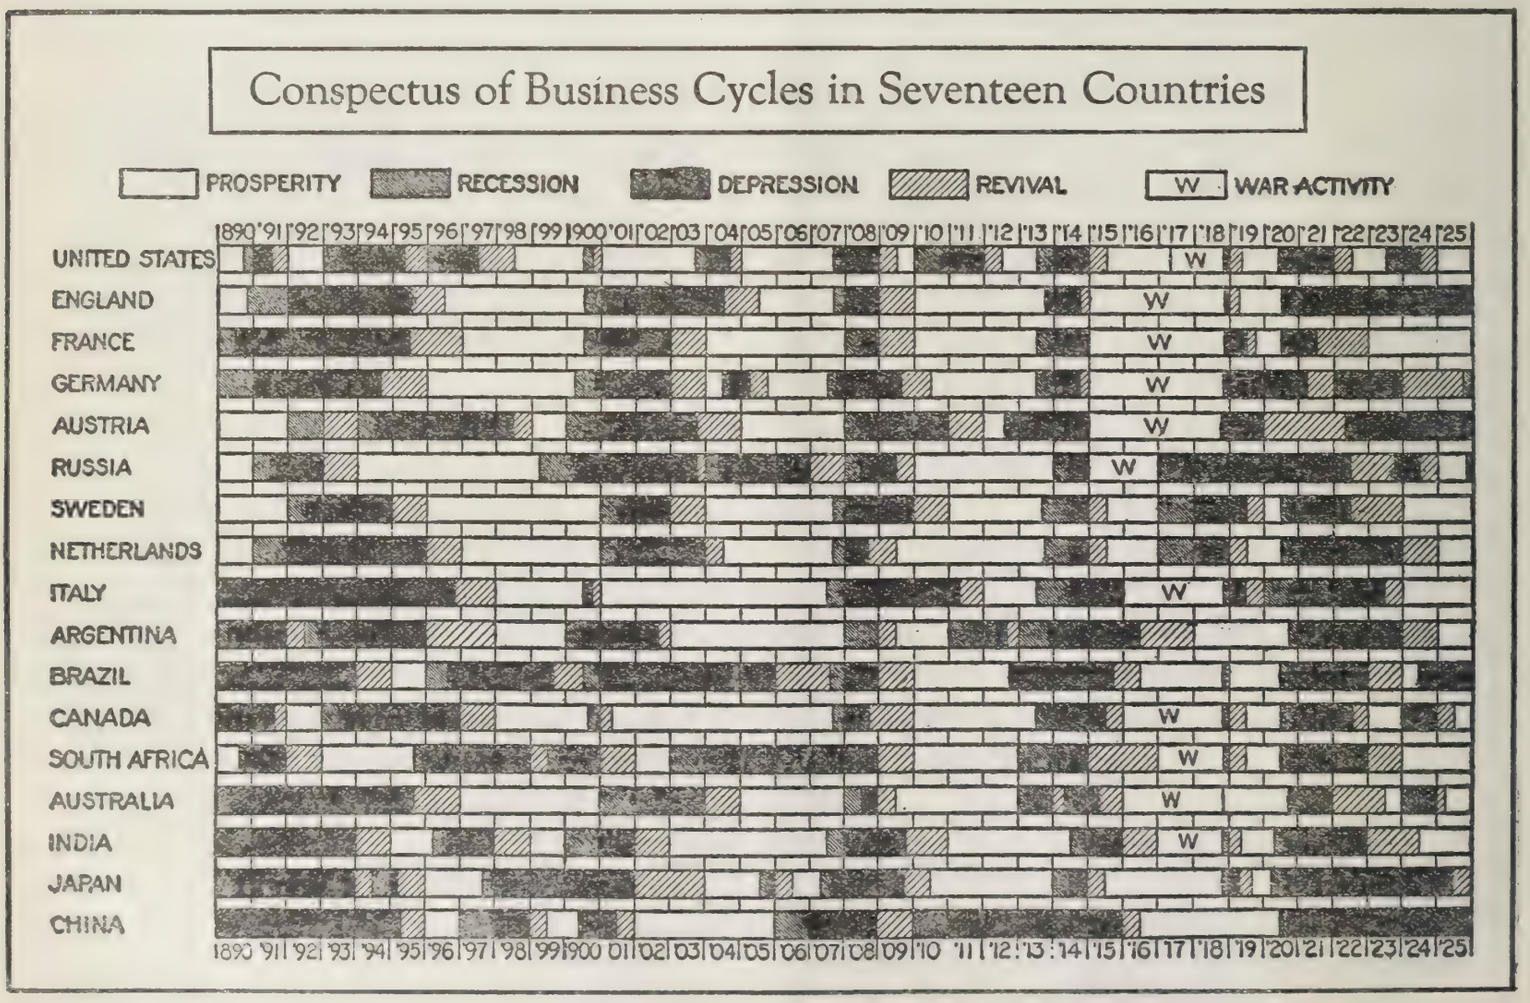
----------MAIL THIS COUPON----------

To The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
220 West 42nd Street,
New York City.
I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed direct from Manchester, England, to:

Name .....

Address .....

International Relations Section



A Chart of World Business

By WESLEY MITCHELL

THE chart printed below shows how the fluctuating business fortunes of different nations are related to each other in the modern world. Seventeen countries from the four quarters of the globe are included. For each country there is a horizontal line picturing schematically the alternations of good and bad trade revealed by its business annals from 1890 to 1925. When these lines are put one above the other, the black spaces representing depression, and the white spaces representing prosperity, they form irregular vertical bands which run down the chart. The business fortunes of the seventeen countries seem to form an international pattern.

The early 1890's brought depression to the business world; the middle nineties brought recovery, the late nineties prosperity. In 1900-1901 there was a world-wide recession (least severe in the United States, Canada, and Italy), followed in 1901-1907 by depression, revival, boom, and a crisis. After a brief period of hard times in 1908-1909, world business recovered in 1909-1910, prospered in 1911-1912, and passed through the recession of 1913 into what promised to be a mild depression. The outbreak of war created enormous confusion in finance, and intensified the depression of business in general. But in most countries the insatiable demands of the war led to quick recovery. Then came the hectic period labeled on the chart "war activity"—a period which ended in 1917 among the European neutrals, and at the armistice among the belligerents. The post-war cycle was uncommonly short and uncommonly intense. The only countries which escaped the crisis of 1920 and the depression of 1921 were countries which had enjoyed no revival in 1919. In the last three or four years, business fortunes have diverged from each other more than for a generation previous. Presumably that divergence will prove to be short lived.

While the international pattern can be traced in the record of every country, even in China and Brazil, no country, not even England or the Netherlands, followed it without variation. Between the recessions which sweep over the globe, most countries now and then breed a domestic recession. American business has been most prolific of such home-made checks. Examples appear in 1893, 1896, 1903, 1910, and 1923. But the record shows that despite our continental spread, the variety of our resources, the richness of our home markets, and the aloofness of our foreign policy, the United States suffers a business reaction, slight or severe, every time that world business feels the shock either of good or bad times. Our isolation is less economic than geographic. Our periods of depression are usually periods when world business languishes, and our periods of prosperity are usually periods when world business flourishes.

Reprinted by permission of the National Bureau of Economic Research, from Business Annals by Willard Long Thorp.

□ LECTURES □ DEBATES □ SCHOOLS □ DINNERS

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.
The course is open to graduates of colleges and universities of recognized standing.
Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.
Special courses will be arranged for social workers in accordance with their needs.
For information, address the Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL for JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)
210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

The MODERN QUARTERLY announces a

DEBATE

"Have the Mechanical Aspects of Civilization benefited Humanity?"

Affirmative WILLIAM B. GUTHRIE Professor of Government, C. C. N. Y.

Negative LEON SAMSON Well known lecturer

Chairman:* ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

SUNDAY, JANUARY 9th, 1927, at 2 P. M.

MANHATTAN LYCEUM, 66 East 4th Street

TICKETS 75 CENTS

For Sale at Jimmy Higgins Bookshop, 127 University Place, Rand School, 7 East 15th Street, New Masses, 39 West 8th Street.

DEBATE

CLARENCE S. DARROW Famous Debater and Lawyer

VERSUS

WILL DURANT Author of "Story of Philosophy"

SUBJECT

IS MAN A MACHINE?

DARROW says YES! DURANT *says NO!

Chairman Dr. JOHN B. WATSON (Author of "Behaviorism")

THIS SATURDAY, JANUARY 8th, 8:30 P. M.

CARNEGIE HALL

Tickets: $1.10, $1.65, $2.20, $2.75, $3.30, including tax.
ON SALE at Box Office or by mail or at offices of
LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION 500 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK Telephone Longacre 4447

N. B.—Out-of-towners can reserve a printed ad verbatim report of this debate by remitting $1 now.
Mr. Darrow is open for a few lecture and debating dates in the South during the months of January, February and March. Address communications to The League.

BRONX FREE FELLOWSHIP
1301 BOSTON ROAD NEAR 169TH ST., BRONX, NEW YORK CITY.
JOSEPH M. OSMAN
(OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY AND RAND SCHOOL)
Thursday evenings at 8:30 o'clock
"DANGER TRENDS IN PERSONALITY"
January 6, 13, 20, 27, February 3, 10.
Course ticket $1.00 Single admission $0.25

ARTHUR PONSONBY, M. P.
(FIRST APPEARANCE IN AMERICA) head of the movement to obtain a million pledges not to support any future declaration of war by Great Britain, WILL BE GUEST OF HONOR AT A DINNER OF THE
WOMEN'S PEACE SOCIETY
Hotel Astor, New York, January 25, 1927, 7 P. M.
For reservations, at $3.50 a plate, write at once to Women's Peace Society, 20 Vesey Street, New York

LABOR TEMPLE, 14th St. and Second Ave., New York
EDMUND B. CHAFFEE, Director

Winter Program—1927

American International Church

Sunday Evenings at 7:15

ADDRESSES BY EDMUND B. CHAFFEE

DATE		SUBJECT
Jan.	2	"Resolutions for Radicals"
	9	"The Protestant Church and the American Labor Movement"
	16	Address by Dr. Doychert
	23	Address by J. I. Lauffer
	30	"What and Where Is God?"
Feb.	6	To be Announced
	13	"Where Would Lincoln Stand Today?"
	20	"The Ethics of Propaganda"
	27	"The Religious Sanctions of the Doctrine of Free Speech"
Mar.	6	"Why Man? The Divine Problem as Seen by the Christian Theist"
	13	"The Search for the Answer—The Drama of Evolution"
	20	"The Answer—Man and Beyond"
	27	To be Announced
Apr.	3	Address by J. I. Lauffer
	10	"Tired Radicals"
	17	"The Doctrine of the Cross"
	24	To be Announced
May	1	Labor Temple Night with Special Program

These addresses will be preceded by a brief Organ Recital by Stanley A. Day, Labor Temple Organist. ADMISSION FREE

Labor Temple Forum

Sunday Evenings at 8:30

DATE		SPEAKER	SUBJECT
Jan.	2	Norman Thomas	"American Students and the American Labor Movement"
	9	Urbain LeDoux	"Unemployment, a National Crime"
	16	Joseph Lorraine	"Poe, the American Literary Genius"
	23	Rabbi Alex Lyons / Dr. John C. Herring	"Jew and Christian"
	30	Dr. Charles Fama	"Religion and the Fascisti"
Feb.	6	Morris Hillquit	"American Socialism Today"
	13	Hubert C. Herring	"The United States and Mexico"
	20	Marcial P. Lichauco	"The United States and the Philippines"
	27	Lewis Gannett	"The United States and China"
Mar.	6	Henry Sloane Coffin	"The Church and Human Progress"
	13	Judge Florence Allen	"Our Heritage"
	20	Fiorello H. LaGuardia	"Special Privilege, the Government and the People"
	27	Scott Nearing	"Where Is Civilization Going?"
Apr.	3	To be Announced	To be Announced
	10	To be Announced	To be Announced
	17	Harry F. Ward	"Economics and Religion"—1
	24	Harry F. Ward	"Economics and Religion"—2
May	1	Will Durant / Edmund B. Chaffee	Labor Temple Night

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL DR. WILL DURANT, Director
For Schedule of Courses, write
LABOR TEMPLE OFFICE, 244 E. 14th St., New York

Every Thursday evening, at 8:30, Mr. Chaffee conducts a Forum on "The Events of the Week". Admission is Free. All are Welcome.

KEEP THIS FOR REFERENCE

Italian-Albanian Treaty

THE text of this treaty appeared in Il Lavoro d'Italia (Rome), December 2, 1926. It was signed at Tirana on November 27 by representatives of the two countries.

Italy and Albania, wishing, in consideration of their geographical position, to strengthen the reciprocal relations of friendship and security, and to contribute to the firmer establishment of peace;

Motivated by the desire of maintaining the political status quo of Albania, both judicially and territorially, within the limits of the treaties to which both are signatory, and in conformity with the Covenant of the League of Nations;

Have convened to draw up the present pact of friendship and security;

And have appointed for this purpose their plenipotentaries . . . who after having taken into consideration their full powers, which have been found to be in good and due form, have decreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1. Italy and Albania recognize that any direct disturbance whatsoever of the political, judicial, or territorial status quo of Albania is contrary to their mutual political interests.

ART. 2. With a view to protecting the aforesaid interests, the High Contracting Parties pledge themselves to lend each other mutual support and cordial cooperation; they likewise pledge themselves to refrain from concluding with other Powers any political or military agreements prejudicial to the interests of the other party, which are also defined in the present agreement.

ART. 3. The High Contracting Parties pledge themselves to submit to a special procedure of conciliation or arbitration any questions which may arise to divide them, and which may have failed of solution through the ordinary diplomatic channels. The methods of procedure for this peaceful settlement shall be the object of a special convention which shall be drawn up within a brief period.

ART. 4. The present pact shall be binding for five years, and may be canceled or renewed one year before its termination.

ART. 5. The present pact shall be ratified and subsequently registered with the League of Nations. The ratifications shall be exchanged at Rome.

[Signed] POMPEO ALOISI, H. VRIONI

Contributors to This Issue

H. S. VILLARD is a young journalist of the third generation of his name.

ROBERT S. ALLEN is in the Washington news office of the Christian Science Monitor.

GAETANO SALVEMINI, the chief intellectual opponent of Mussolini, is lecturing in the United States.

HARBOR ALLEN is publicity director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

MARIAN TYLER is spending the winter in Russia.

WITTER BYNNER is author of many volumes of poetry.

MARY AUSTIN, poet, dramatist, novelist, philosopher, and historian, now lives at Santa Fe, New Mexico.

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES is pastor of the Community Church of New York.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN is on the teaching staff of the Ethical Culture School.

LYNN THORNDIKE is the author of "A History of Magic and Experimental Science."

DANIEL BELL LEARY is head of the department of psychology at the University of Buffalo.

DANIEL GREGORY MASON is professor of music at Columbia University and author of "Contemporary Composers."

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

A LUNCHEON RESORT FOR THE DISCRIMINATING CLIENTELE—THOSE APPRECIATING UNEXCELLED CUISINE AND SERVICE.

EVENINGS—SPECIAL PARTIES ONLY. ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS, SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.

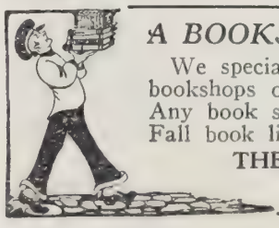
OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management
by THEODORE KEMM



GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

ATTRACTIVE POSITION
for man combining abilities of
SCIENTIST, EDUCATOR and WRITER

An established company, engaged in electrical engineering work, desires a writer who can accurately express the results of its scientific work in good literary form for educational and publicity purposes. This is not a position for a hack writer whether of text books or of radio articles for newspaper supplements. It requires a sound training in physics and exceptional ability as an expositor. Opportunities exist for promotion, and the starting salary will be commensurate to the ability and experience of the successful applicant. Apply in writing, Box 600, care The Nation.

Want someone for a position? Want a position?
The responsive employer and the intelligent applicant for employment read The Nation. Write for rates. Dept. W, The Nation.

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

A BOOKSHOP BROUGHT TO YOU
We specialize in service to those far away from bookshops or too busy to do their own browsing. Any book sent anywhere post free. Send for our Fall book list and particulars.
THE POST-BOX BOOK SERVICE
15 West 44th Street, New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1927 No. 3211

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 51
EDITORIALS:
China's War of Independence 54
War or Peace? 55
The Poet of Georgia 55
Meals While You Wait 56
AMERICA IN EUROPE. By Hendrik van Loon 57
MR. COOLIDGE, HERE'S A COURT! By William Hard 58
THE NATIONAL RAILWAY OF HAITI: A STUDY IN TROPICAL FINANCE. By Paul H. Douglas 59
PILSUDSKI'S MILITARISM. By Louis Fischer 61
POET OUT OF PIONEER. Anonymous 63
SMITH IN 1928? By Frank R. Kent 65
IN THE DRIFTWAY 66
CORRESPONDENCE 67
BOOKS, MUSIC, PLAYS:
Poems: Come Tired Young Women and The Arms of Grief. By Clinch Calkins 68
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 68
A Compendium of Imperialism. By J. A. Hobson 68
The Fame of Anatole France. By Joseph Wood Krutch 69
Quixotic Platonism. By Alice Beal Parsons 69
Ask the Whale: He Knows. By Arthur Warner 70
The Metaphysics of Mussolini. By Woodbridge Riley 71
Interesting Books of 1926. Chosen by Joseph Wood Krutch 71
Books in Brief 71
Music: Music and Common Sense—II. By B. H. Haggin 72
Drama: On Dramatizations. By Joseph Wood Krutch 72
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Chinese Revolution 74
The Sino-Belgian Treaty 75

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

"I AM ANTI-WHISKERS," says Italy's Duce. "Fascism is anti-whiskers. Whiskers are a sign of decadence." Whether or not this is a fact, it is certainly true that whiskers cover defects in the physiognomy that might otherwise rise to damn their owner. But Signor Mussolini scorns subterfuges like these; in a burst of confidence he confided to the United Press the secrets of his toilet, and the opinion on whiskers quoted above heads the list. This modern Napoleon sleeps exactly seven hours, from midnight on; he arises the instant he is called—or maybe he doesn't need to be called; he takes a few simple daily dozens before the open window—thereby proving his superiority to the majority of his countrymen; his bath is not cold but tepid; he massages himself. And then his shave! There is a whole poem on that subject.

> My shave comes before I put on my collar. I have become rather skilful in the use of an American safety razor . . . though my beard is thick and stiff. . . . I have to use a new blade every time I shave, for there are no blades made that can stand more than one shave on my beard. And I must shave every day.

Lion-hearted, leather-skinned, dauntless, resolute, firm in resisting the comfort of his warm bed—no wonder this man holds Italy in the palm of his hand. He is the Babbitt of the Mediterranean. Work is his gospel; no more all-night jazz in Italian cabarets, no more drinking to excess; only three holidays in 1927. How long will the sloping hillsides of Italy, bathed in abundant sun, hung with grape and olive, warm, volatile, light-hearted, endure this philosophy?

WE HEARTILY CONGRATULATE THE PRESIDENT upon his defeat of the pestiferous House big-navy bloc. Although he vacillated, he finally stood firm, and the effort to appropriate $450,000 in addition to the budget for beginning work on the three cruisers authorized in 1924 was soundly defeated by 183 to 161. This is a gratifying outcome. It is now incumbent upon the President to take the lead in a further move for reduction of the five navies left in the world, by limiting the number of cruisers and abolishing submarines and the use of airplanes in naval warfare. American public opinion will stand squarely behind him on this. Indeed, the defeat of the militarists in the House is the clearest proof that Congress as a whole does not feel that the American people are shaking in their shoes because some "experts" say we are falling behind in the 5-5-3 ratio of the Washington Conference. Admirable was the support given in this fight to Mr. Coolidge by fifty religious and educational leaders who declared that if we were losing in the ratio the remedy was not more ships but another disarmament congress. The more-ship policy, they truly said, could only "create among the nations of the world the mood of suspicion, uneasiness, and fear which gradually breeds the fatalistic thought that wars are inevitable." Among the signers were Henry Sloane Coffin, Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, Samuel A. Eliot, Roger W. Babson, Dr. W. P. Merrill, and President Mary E. Woolley.

THE PRESIDENT'S LATEST APPOINTEE to the Interstate Commerce Commission seems destined to fail of confirmation before the Senate. Indeed there is a question at this writing whether the President will not be asked by Republican leaders to withdraw the nomination. Mr. Cyrus E. Woods made an excellent record as ambassador to Spain and to Japan. It has appeared from his examination, however, that he has fully a quarter of a million dollars invested in railroad securities (which he has offered to sell if confirmed), that he has long been connected with the Pittsburgh Coal Company, which has a deep interest in a rehearing now asked of the commission. Mr. Woods has promised not to sit in this case if he is confirmed, but the question remains whether one who has long been connected with a coal company, as he has been, should be put in a position where sooner or later he must pass upon relations of coal companies to the railroads and to the public. More than that, Mr. Woods denied that he had contributed to the recent Pennsylvania primary campaign, only to have it come out that he had given $5,000; he had forgotten this. He also insisted that he was not the dictator of that primary campaign with its orgy of spending, and did not know of the corruption which should result in the non-seating of Senator-elect Vare. Others declare he was the boss of that campaign. But the worst feature of all is that Mr. Woods was originally chosen by the President because Senator Reed last year forced a promise from Mr. Coolidge that a Pennsylvanian should be appointed to the next vacancy. If the principle of sectionalism is to control appointments to this commission, it is bound to wreck that body in the long run.

GOVERNOR SMITH'S ANNUAL MESSAGE contains nothing new or startling, but it is another excellent business statement of a remarkable administrator. In it he reiterates his position on the State's water-power undeterred by the cries of socialism with which his recent outlining of his position at the dinner of the Survey Associates has been greeted. He insists again that "the State must itself retain ownership and control of water-power at its source, if the people, and not private interests, are to be the real beneficiaries by its development," and repeats his demand for a new Water Power Authority which will be no more radical or novel a proposition than the "Port Authorities" which are developing the harbors of New York and Albany with complete popular approval. "To attempt to protect the consumer only through the regulatory power of the State," the Governor adds, "is to hold out to him a promise which we know cannot be fulfilled. . . . Public-utility regulation by public-service commissions or interstate commerce commissions involves long-drawn-out battles in which experts disagree over capital accounts. The place to protect the consumer is at the bus bar, where we make the contract for the sale of the power." This fearless frankness in defense of popular rights, together with his consummate mastery of the State's business, is largely responsible for the confidence of all classes of New Yorkers in their Governor.

LYNCHINGS FOR 1926 almost doubled those of 1925—34 and 18 are the official figures given out by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The association traces this disheartening increase in mob violence to the defeat of the federal anti-lynching bill; until punishment for lynching is taken out of the hands of irresponsible local authorities we seem doomed to suffer the humiliation of being the only country in the world in which the account of a mob murder is hardly news. At the same time there are bright spots in the process of adjusting race differences: for example, there were 33 cases last year of officers of the law who prevented lynching, and 29 of them were in the South. These instances further discredit the myth of the sheriff who is "overpowered" by the mob. Again, in Natitoches, Louisiana, even white public sentiment is being aroused against a statue which was recently erected to "do honor" to the Negro; it is inscribed, "The Good Darky of Louisiana. Erected by the City of Natitoches, in grateful recognition of the arduous and faithful service of the good darkies of Louisiana." The figure is of a typical "Uncle Tom," the bent, shuffling, subservient old Negro who was so dear to the heart of the old South. South and North a change is coming—a Southern white lady was recently fined $50 in a Chicago court for calling a Pullman porter a "Nigger."

NOT IN OUR MEMORY has a college executive, not even President Lowell of Harvard, spoken out as bravely, as vigorously, as unqualifiedly on the right of a college teacher to his opinions and his conscience as has Glenn Frank, head of the University of Wisconsin. Here is what happened: Governor J. J. Blaine, United States Senator-elect, recently attacked as a "hodge-podge of lies, half-truths, and misrepresentation" the tax catechism issued by Professor H. MacGregor of the university. President Frank interpreted this action of the Governor as giving Professor MacGregor a choice of two courses—retraction or resignation—and in addition felt that the Governor implied that "the duty of the president of the university was positive." Accepting that challenge and interpretation, Mr. Frank stated to the press: "As long as I am president of the university complete and unqualified academic freedom will not only be accorded to members of faculties but will be vigorously defended, regardless of the pressure, the power, or the prestige that may accompany any challenge of this inalienable right of scholarship." We believe that every self-respecting teacher the country over will call President Frank blessed for that.

FRENCH SENATORIAL ELECTIONS always lag behind popular sentiment, for the senators are elected by mayors and local councilors who have been chosen at previous ballotings. In a sense the recent vote for a third of the Senate registered the same shift to the Left as marked the elections to the Chamber in 1924. For the first time Communists won seats in the upper chamber; the Socialists increased their representation; and several famous Conservatives dropped out of the political scene—among them Poincaré's friend, De Selves; former President Millerand; Clemenceau's lieutenant, Klotz; and, apparently, M. Dariac, author of a famous project to annex the Rhineland. The shift to the Left is a blow to M. Poincaré's prestige, but it will not threaten his control of the Senate, and his success in stabilizing the franc probably leaves him politically secure for the present.

BY THE RESIGNATION of Theodor Wolff, the editor of the Berliner Tageblatt, the German Democratic Party has lost its founder. A stronger blow could not be aimed at it by a single individual, but the party has swung so far from its original ideas and purposes that Herr Wolff's retirement need surprise no one. The immediate cause was his party's adherence to the amazing censorship laws recently passed by the Reichstag. No liberal Democratic Party could consent to such a handcuffing of press and theater and of the independent writer and contend that it was in any degree consistent with its announced purposes. Yet the Democratic Party made this blunder, emphasizing again the compromising character which it has assumed for several years. The pity of this is great. Theodor Wolff deserves an honorable place in the history of his time because throughout the war he refused to accept the doctrines of the reactionary government or the belief that the mass of Germans were similarly reactionary in purpose and in ideals, and because he insisted that a stronger and more courageous opposition could be built up against the madness of the rulers of Germany among the bourgeois liberals than in the camp of the socialists. It looked as if he had forged a most useful weapon in the Democratic Party, and now he has been compelled to turn upon it and, perhaps, to destroy his own creation.

A FORMER SAILOR in the American navy gives some probably hitherto unrecorded history of our attack upon Vera Cruz in 1916 in a letter printed in Heywood

Broun's column in the New York World. The correspondent writes in amiable protest against the praise and publicity accorded to the Marine Corps when, in his opinion, it is more deserved by the bluejackets. On shipboard, the writer says, the marines handle the three-inch and five-inch guns, whereas

> The gobs man the twelve, fourteen, and sixteen-inch play toys. Ask the lads with the flat hats who it was that took the head off the statue of the Liberator of Mexico in the public square in Vera Cruz. A marine? Marine, me eye! It was a gob. Yep, on the scout cruiser Chester, and I think his name was Casey.

Somehow this apparently veracious anecdote of the wanton destruction of an artistic and historic monument by American forces has never been stressed in the official publicity from Washington. Perhaps it is because we were so busy at the time denouncing the destruction of artistic and historic monuments by the German army in Belgium. Of course that was different. Germany was at war, and so her acts were war atrocities. But we bombarded Vera Cruz without anything so ungentlemanly as a declaration of war, and so could not commit war atrocities. The writer in the World may be confused. Perhaps the shot was a salute and the head of the Liberator, bowing low with typical Latin courtesy, lost its balance and rolled upon the pavement.

FROM THE LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS has come a pamphlet describing some notable possessions of the Library and giving examples of others which it still needs. One of Mr. Herbert Putnam's notable achievements is his widening of the conception of this library. It is no longer merely the Library of Congress; it is the library of the nation, the repository of innumerable books and documents essential to the record and history of our government. Mr. Putnam has gone even beyond that. He and his associates have made possible the pecuniary endowment of the library by private individuals and have brought about the creation of "a Library of Congress Trust Fund Board" which is now prepared to receive and administer sums willed or given to it. Of this latter development the most notable act was the creation of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation and Chamber Music Auditorium, a gift of more than $500,000, in addition to her collection of holograph music and her correspondence with many musicians—records which are beyond price. Mr. Putnam calls attention to the fact that only a few remarkable collections of musical source material are still obtainable abroad. He hopes that private generosity may acquire one or more of these for the library, which cannot hope for sufficient money from the government to purchase them. In the fields of literature and history, and Americana of all kinds, the needs of the library remain great.

EARS, THIS TIME, not hands across the sea. Wireless telephony across the Atlantic is a forecast no longer, but an accomplished fact. All honor to the men whose scientific skill, integrity, and devotion have made it possible. They will, we fear, not receive the individual recognition which is their due—partly because every such development nowadays is less the work of an individual than of a great laboratory containing, as in the case of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, a thousand trained workers. This generation is so accustomed to scientific marvels as to take new ones with a calmness impossible in their fathers who witnessed the coming of the first electric lamp, the first trolley, the first telephone, the first gasoline automobile, the first airplane. The first commercial talks across the Atlantic were hardly inspiring—the usual banalities passed from mayor to mayor and press magnate to press magnate. Yet the profound significance is there. It is only a few years since the prophecy was made by a great expert that in a short time people in New York would be telephoning to the remotest farms in Australia. We are plainly half way to that goal. The truth is that scientific advance is no longer a matter of waiting for the individual genius to appear and to discover. Goals are now definitely set and attained by a host of minds utilizing the unlimited sums that great corporations set aside for experimentation.

"MOTOR VEHICLES IN UNITED STATES: 22,330,000; world registration of motor vehicles: 27,500,000; per cent of world registration in United States: 81." No wonder Europe envies us—one automobile for every five heads in the United States; one for every five hundred in the rest of the world. This country produced nearly four and a half million cars last year—more than ever before—and it exported more than half a million. American motor cars are helping to transform the East: a regular route now connects Bagdad with the Mediterranean, once a perilous month's journey, in a single day; the thirty-two stages of the ancient caravan route from Bagdad to the capital of Persia have been cut to four days; American automobiles shoot in all directions across the vast Gobi Desert in Mongolia; Canton and Calcutta have American bus service. There seems to be no limit to this mushroom child of industry—unless it be the world's supply of oil fuel. Pessimists each year see the market exhausted; it goes on expanding. A few years ago the automobile was a summer vehicle; it is stretching its season. Two years ago barely half the cars made were closed; in 1926 three-quarters were closed. Once the statisticians, calculating the market, figured on one car per family; today 40 per cent of the American cars belong to two-car families. Instalment buying has expanded the market; nearly two-thirds of the cars bought in America last year were sold on that plan. The roads are jammed; accidents increase, although not so fast as the number of cars; drivers are forced to higher and higher speeds. The New York Times tells of a Northerner crossing the causeway at Miami at what he thought a good speed. A motorcycle policeman stopped him and asked why he held up the procession. "But I was going thirty-five," said the motorist. "Go sixty!" came the command.

STILL THEY GROW! Incomplete figures of this year's registration show the great universities breaking all records for enrolment. California's two branches have 17,101 full-time students; Columbia, Illinois, and Minnesota also top the 10,000-mark. Including part-time and summer students Columbia has 30,526; California 24,756; New York University 20,504, and the College of the City of New York, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Chicago, Michigan, Wisconsin, Ohio State, Harvard, Boston, and Northwestern all more than 10,000. Colossal figures! Never in history has a nation shown such a passion for education; never have such multitudes had the opportunity for education. But are we sure that we really know in what education consists? Do the mass universities produce men who think, or just mass minds?

China's War of Independence

THE tide has turned.

In 1857 Chinese troops seized an opium-smuggling boat that flew the British flag, and the British in retaliation declared war on China. They bombarded and occupied Canton; Lord Elgin, on the steam frigate Furious, accompanied by four other warships, steamed up the forbidden Yangtze River to Hankow, bombarding Nanking and Anking on the way. He selected the ports which he thought would be most convenient for British trade; and in the Treaty of Tientsin in 1858 Hankow was nominally opened to foreign trade. The next year hostilities broke out again. A British and French expeditionary force fought its way to Peking, burning the Summer Palace with all its rich store of art treasures; and a new treaty, confirming the opening of Hankow and legalizing the sale of opium, was forced on China. In 1861 by local agreements the British took from China convenient port locations at Canton, Chinkiang, Kiukiang, Tientsin, Newchang, and Hankow, nominally as perpetual leaseholds, with an annual ground rent of 1,500 cash per mow—about $9 per acre—subleases to be made in the name of the British Crown. And that is the origin of the little British principalities in the great cities of China, and of that "British Concession" at Hankow from which the frightened British withdrew, faced by an overwhelming Chinese mob, on January 5, 1927.

The Cantonese government officials, the very men whom the British in China have been denouncing as Reds, have offered their apologies for the violence of the mob and promised to maintain order with their soldiers. On that "Red" army, indeed, the lives of the foreigners depend. Two facts stand out in this crisis: First, the American consulate and the American business firms, flying American flags in Chinese territory close to the British Concession, and the missionaries across the river in Chinese Wuchang went unharmed while mobs raged through the British territory, tearing down the Union Jack and defacing the British war memorial. The American policy of refusing territorial concessions proved itself wise in a stormy time. Second, it was the coolie-mass which swept the British out of Hankow, not Russian-trained soldiers from Canton. The spirit behind that mob is no product of one government's ukases; it is a reaction to a century of foreign domineering; it cannot be stopped; it may be silenced for a moment at one spot or another, but it will sweep on across China. Canton was the storm-center a year ago; Hankow is feeling the earthquake today; Shanghai uneasily sees its turn coming; and Peking and Tientsin may follow Shanghai. The Peking Government, puppet as it is of the Japanese, acts in sympathy with the Nationalist program of the Southerners; a significant dispatch reports that, since the Cantonese spirit has driven the British out of the concessions in Hankow and Kiukiang, Peking feels that unless it can arrange a similar result at Tientsin its prestige is doomed.

Thus far in this crisis the British, bearing the brunt of the Chinese attack, have acted with discretion. On January 3 British marines and armed volunteers guarding the Hankow Concession stood off a surging Chinese mob with the butts of their guns, obeying a London order not to fire. Furthermore, the Cantonese had warned them that if they did fire not a foreigner would be left alive in Hankow. The press dispatches, almost all of British origin (the Associated Press unfortunately depends upon Reuter, a British news agency, for its Chinese news, and the United Press service is inadequate), report that the British soldiers were singularly restrained; the dispatches, however, mention a Chinese demand for apology for the brutality of the marines, while omitting to tell in what the brutality consisted. On January 4 the foreign soldiers were withdrawn, protection being left to the British-trained Chinese police and to an outside cordon of Cantonese troops. The mobs broke through these lines and hoisted the red flag of South China in place of the Union Jack over the British official buildings. The Union Jack Club temporarily became headquarters of a labor union. British women were evacuated; British men were concentrated in the buildings of the Asiatic Petroleum Company. (Meanwhile, American business houses a few blocks away in the old Russian Concession which is now Chinese territory remained open for business.) On January 6, fortunately, it rained; the spirit of the mob was dampened; and order was restored. Regular Cantonese troops took over control of the British Concession, and an agreement was negotiated to return it to the British. At Kiukiang, 130 miles downstream, the British Concession has also fallen into Chinese hands.

China acts volcanically; she may rest long quiescent, but when she breaks out she erupts with force. Observers on the spot are like villagers who live close to a silent volcano; they refuse to believe the warnings of the scientists. The "old China hands" have refused to believe that the new Nationalism in China was more than a passing effervescence, and they and the Powers which trusted their judgment are reaping the harvest of their blindness. Had the Powers acted more liberally at Versailles and at Washington; had they even enforced the gentle treaty revisions of Washington; had they taken bold action when they met in Peking a year ago, the storm might have blown over. They did nothing; the present trouble is the result of their own inaction; and more trouble lies ahead.

Great Britain recently circulated a memorandum highly praised in the West. It did indeed indicate a new wisdom in Downing Street. It proclaimed the futility of military force to maintain a bad treaty; but its concrete proposals for reform simmered down to acquiescence in the higher customs rates which, in violation of the treaties, were already being enforced in two-thirds of the ports of China. That is not enough. It belongs to the same Canute-like school of diplomacy as the Strawn report upon extraterritoriality; it is as ineffective as building a dam of pebbles against an inrushing tide.

Measures which a generation ago, or even a decade ago, were successful are futile today. The Western nations have equipped China with their arms and artillery and taught her to use them. They have taught her something of their own nationalism, and her masses have absorbed the lesson. Her officials may talk in terms of customs autonomy and extraterritoriality, but the masses see things simply. They resent the foreign gunboats and the foreign principalities which dominate their great cities. The vast armadas which we Western nations are concentrating in Chinese waters may hold those cities for a time; in the long run they will lose. White domination of the East is doomed; we of this generation are watching another of those great uprisings of humanity which dot the endless struggle toward human freedom. If we are wise we will realize from the start that, like the American War of Independence, the French or the Russian revolution, it will follow no charted course of legalistic treaty regulations.

War or Peace?

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE, in his message to Congress justifying his private war in Nicaragua, uses all the assorted excuses which he, his Spokesman, and Mr. Kellogg have used on previous occasions. For the first time, however, he has assembled them, and they must make impressive reading for Latin Americans and Europeans.

Recall, first, what Mr. Coolidge is seeking to excuse. We have landed marines in the capital of the Sacasa Government of Nicaragua, ordered the Sacasa army to disarm or get out, censored its communications, blockaded its ports, ordered business firms in its territory not to pay customs duties or internal taxes to its agents. On the other hand, we have landed troops in the rival capital to protect the rival President, and announced that we will give him every facility to buy munitions in the United States and elsewhere. A score of American warships now watch the Nicaraguan coast; thousands of marines stand on guard; American fliers in American airplanes, in the service of the Nicaraguan Government, patrol the Nicaraguan air. At last Mr. Coolidge admits that it is intervention, and offers his complete assortment of excuses.

First, he insists that his favorite President is the constitutional President. His own account of Don Adolfo Diaz's election is enough to deny his argument. Don Adolfo was elected by a rump and illegal Congress, after Emiliano Chamorro had driven the constitutional government, in which Sacasa was Vice-President, out by force of arms.

Second, Mr. Coolidge suggests that it is his duty to aid Diaz because some Mexicans have aided Sacasa. After the interference of which the United States had already been guilty in Nicaragua; in view of the long record of would-be Mexican revolutions fitted out and equipped in the United States, Mr. Coolidge's moral indignation at Mexican friendship for Nicaraguan revolutionaries is ridiculous. Mexico has the same right to ship arms as we.

Next, Mr. Coolidge says that American investments in Nicaragua need protection. Can he name one estate that has been endangered? Does he intend to enunciate the doctrine that American marines must be landed anywhere in the world where revolution, civil war, or rioting suggests the possibility that maybe, some time, somewhere, somehow, American property may be endangered?

Mr. Coolidge's fourth excuse is the canal. There is no Nicaraguan canal as yet, but ten years ago we bought a right to build a canal. Mr. Coolidge does not say that it has been threatened; it has not been threatened. What has it to do with our intervention?

Fifth, Mr. Coolidge fears that if the revolution continues the Nicaraguan currency will be inflated, thereby menacing American business interests. The logic of his argument would imply that the United States must intervene wherever in the world the stability of a currency is threatened. Soldiers and marines will be busy indeed!

And after this the man has the audacity to conclude: "I am sure that it is not the desire of the United States to intervene in the internal affairs of Nicaragua or of any other Central American republic"! What is his message but the most ferocious doctrine of universal intervention which any statesman has ever propounded? What but a principle of universal war? And what is his intervention but an indirect threat to induce Mexico to yield to the oil magnates?

This is doing us infinite harm wherever men can read from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn. Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Kellogg may achieve a distinction which they never meant to acquire—they may become the real founders of a complete Pan-American union of offense and defense against the United States. Already the faint hope of settling Tacna and Arica has faded. The whole world is appalled at our bullying self-righteousness. What may not happen if we continue? Had anyone predicted three years ago that the unorganized masses of China would within three years be sweeping the foreigners into the sea and hauling down the British flag from places where it had flown for sixty-five years he would have been written down a madman. From an American friend in Guatemala we hear that "the prestige of the United States in Central America has never been so low since Roosevelt stole Panama." The worm will turn; when the South American republics realize, as this is teaching them to realize, that they must unite against the Colossus of the North, they, like the Chinese, may realize what a weapon lies in their hands in the economic boycott. Already Mr. Coolidge has done enormous harm to American business in the Southern Hemisphere.

If any spark of decency remains in the Administration it will accept President Calles's offer to arbitrate the difficulties with Mexico, and withdraw the marines from Nicaragua.

The Poet of Georgia

THE fame of Frank Lebby Stanton, author of "Mighty Lak a Rose," dead in his seventieth year at Atlanta, Georgia, is a reminder that poetry for most people is now, as it always has been, a matter of song. It means something that the conventional synonym for "poet" is "singer"—not "philosopher," "psychologist," "critic of life," "prophet," or "craftsman." To the literary layman a poem is a collection of words through which a clear and simple tune makes itself immediately heard. The melody must be as readily apprehended as the sentiment, and the best poem by this definition is the one which can bear the most repetition, the one whose tune and whose teaching can be oftenest laid next to the heart. The spirit of the thing may be martial, as in the case of patriotic pieces, or melancholy, as in the case of many ballads, or merry, as in the case of parodies and convivial lyrics. Or, as oftenest in America during the past hundred years, it may strike into the domestic affections; it may treat of children, the home, the old town by the river, mother, father, and Aunt Mary. In any event the poem will function as an agent reducing us to a simple, almost childlike state of mind and heart. And this will be true even when, as now is the case, sophisticated poetry is almost entirely an affair of the intellect. The poetry about which we write criticism today tends more and more to be involved and ingenious; it is based upon an intricate metaphysic, and the moral of its untunefulness is supposed to be that the modern mind, in so far as it takes in the complex modern world, must be incapable of song.

Mr. Stanton, who was declared in 1925 poet laureate of Georgia, was equally removed from the poetry of sophistication and the poetry of jazz. He is to be identified with the sentiments of mid-century America, particularly as they were accentuated in the South. A columnist on the Atlanta Constitution and other Georgia papers for forty years, a friend and protege of Joel Chandler Harris, a singer always of wholesome and tender sentiments, he reached an audience almost as wide as the English-speaking world. This was eventually due to the good fortune of several of his poems in being set to music by composers of great popular reputation; Ethelbert Nevin gave currency in unnumbered concert rooms to "Mighty Lak a Rose," and Carrie Jacobs Bond insured the success of "Just A-Wearyin' for You." One of his specialties was Negro dialect with an ante-bellum flavor, and he achieved indubitable excellence there. A suitable specimen is "A Plantation Ditty":

De gray owl sing fum de chimbly top:
"Who—who—is—you-oo?"
En I say: "Good Lawd, hit's des po' me,
En I ain't quite ready fer de Jasper Sea;
I'm po' en sinful, en you 'lowed I'd be,
Oh wait, good Lawd, 'twell termorror!"

De gray owl sing fum de cypress tree:
"Who—who—is—you-oo?"
En I say: "Good Lawd, ef you look you'll see
Hit ain't nobody but des po' me,
En I like ter stay 'twell my time is free;
Oh wait, good Lawd, 'twell termorror!"

Whether Mr. Stanton in his generation was really the poet of Georgia only time will tell. Time has already brought a number of investigators who, adventuring into cabins and taking a position within hearing-distance of labor gangs, have produced evidence that the Negro people themselves are notable secular poets; perhaps the Negro race has been the poet of Georgia. But Mr. Stanton represented the sentiments of his own race, both in the South where he sang and elsewhere among that large population which likes to be reminded at a distance of the plantation and the pickaninny, with remarkable fidelity. That, too, is to be a poet. Folk-lore we have always with us, and though folk-lore in America is a thing of the printed word, it is nevertheless genuine. Mr. Stanton knew perfectly how to pluck some of the strings of which the American heart is woven; he knew how to make hundreds of thousands of business men and club women melt into sighs and gentle laughter; and he has had his reward. Some day an interesting book will be written, giving in perspective the whole portrait of nineteenth-century American man. Mr. Stanton, along with Stephen Foster and Joel Chandler Harris, will furnish important materials for the picture. Others will undoubtedly be taken out of the great body of Northern song from which Sigmund Spaeth has recently selected the pieces composing his volume "Read 'Em and Weep." Our great-grandchildren will weep to see such quantities of sentiment. Occasionally, however, they will be genuinely touched; and most of the time they will be amused. What they will have will be an impression of human nature very near its uneducated, its uneducable center.

Meals While You Wait

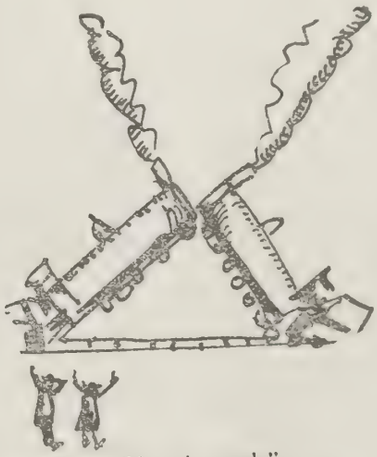
PATRIOTIC publicists and prosperity-puffers are fond of telling Americans that they are the best-fed people in the world. We wonder if they do not mean the most-fed. It is a nice question what people are the best-fed, but certainly we are the most-fed people of our planet. Food is fairly thrust upon us at every turn. There used to be a time when eating, like dressing, was regarded as a function to be performed somewhat privately. One did not eat in the streets, one did not eat standing in a packed line with fifty others, one did not eat even sitting down except in some quiet and privacy. Now the city dweller eats everywhere and all the time; before meals, at meals, and after meals; on the street, in the subways, and at office desks. It is the great American habit.

The demand has called for new sources of supply. At the outset soda-water counters sold only drinks. In time ice cream was added. Now soda-water counters carry food ranging all the way from cocoanut wafers to Boston baked beans and at noon serve a surging crowd which elbows its way for the opportunity to snatch a nondescript lunch while standing up. Even at the highest-priced restaurants one is jostled and crowded and hurried through by racing waiters to whom one can hardly make his order heard for the din. Soda-water counters, once a part only of drug or confectionery stores, have now blossomed everywhere in the crowded business sections. Aristocratic office buildings that once would have barred any but the most discreet and retiring restaurants now welcome glaring soda fountains, odoriferous lunch counters, and at their very portals news stands carrying as a side line—but a considerable one—rows of confectionery in five-cent packages, to be grabbed on the run and eaten ditto. The Grand Central station in New York City, supposedly a railway terminal, is in fact a bustling city by itself, filled with shops of all sorts and offering opportunities for eating ranging all the way from the exclusive restaurants of the Commodore, Belmont, Biltmore, and Roosevelt hotels—connected by underground passageways—to interminable stand-up soda-water counters.

It is largely the skyscraper, packing ten, a hundred, or a thousand persons into a ground area once occupied by one, that has brought these makeshift facilities for food and these bizarre habits of eating. The inhabitants of the business sections of our great cities do almost none of what may be called their serious eating in those quarters. In spite of the amazing multiplication of eating places, the old-time chop houses and oyster bars are disappearing. Present patrons want only a hasty lunch and a pick-me-up at odd hours throughout the day. The increase in women workers, too, has brought striking changes in popular tastes. The eating places cannot be blamed too greatly for crowded conditions and poor food at high prices. They have to pay a tremendous overhead in rent and otherwise out of a trade which lasts about three hours a day. With additional skyscrapers building every day it becomes increasingly hard to keep up with the demands for food, new both in amount and in character. The Equitable Building in New York City, the largest office structure, houses 12,000 to 15,000 workers, while 25,000 are estimated to pass in and out of its doors daily. When do they eat; where do they eat; how can they eat? They can't and they don't. In the old phrase, they gobble, gabble, git.

America in Europe

"Catching anything?"
"Not a thing."
"Well, I suppose America is to blame."



"Stromboli is again reported to be very active. It is supposed that America is at the bottom of this new eruption."—Press Item.

"My new play was a terrible failure."
"It's doubtless the fault of those stingy, blood-sucking Americans."

"What is the matter, little boy?"
"I bit my tongue—boohoo . . ."
"Never mind, little boy. Blame it on nasty old America."

"Look at the terrible train wreck."
"I am sure it is due to the American debt."

"Here it is beginning to rain just when we left our umbrellas at home."
"Que veux-tu? C'est la faute de l'Amerique."

"Waiter, this steak is burned."
"Tell it to Coolidge."

"This is the fifth time this week you are late. What have you got to say for yourself?"
"It was those Americans, Sir."

"They predict a very severe winter."
"Of course. In a world dominated by the Americans. . . ."

Mr. Coolidge, Here's a Court!

By WILLIAM HARD

Washington, January 10

OF course, if we were in the Permanent Court of International Justice, we would take our Nicaraguan dispute to it and get it judicially settled. Would we not? I hope all good pro-Courters will respond heartily in the affirmative.

The trouble now is that a malign fate has deprived those good pro-Courters, Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Kellogg, of the engine through which they could express their passion for international judicial settlement.

So I now come forward with a rescue party. I found it in a musty volume dated 1923.

That is a very important year—1923. It plunged us into our present Nicaraguan troubles.

In that year, under the pro-Court auspices of Secretary of State Hughes, the Central American Powers met in Washington and signed a treaty under which they promised, among other things, that they "will not recognize any other government which may come into power in any of the five republics through a coup d'etat or a revolution against a recognized government, so long as the freely elected representatives of the people thereof have not constitutionally reorganized the country."

We did not sign this treaty, but we are so profoundly sensitive to the sanctity of treaties that since we watched this one while it was being signed we insist upon obeying it. We therefore, when Chamorro came into power in Nicaragua and when in our opinion he did it through a coup d'etat, refused to recognize him. Note that Chamorro was perfectly "anti-Bolshevik." Note that he was perfectly anti-Calles. Our refusal to recognize him could not have been based on any thought of striking a blow at "subversive" influences percolating so transparently—as transparently as empty air—through Mexico City from Moscow and Leningrad. Chamorro was as much opposed to those influences as Mr. Kellogg ever was or could be. No! The State Department is absolutely correct in its announcements of its reason for refusing to recognize Chamorro. It refused to recognize him because it wished to live up to the lofty spirit of the treaty of 1923.

But, good pro-Courters of the United States, there is also another treaty of 1923. It was signed under the same auspices. It was signed by the same parties. And—isn't this nice?—it constituted an international court for the judicial settlement of international disputes.

The splendid name of this court is the International Central American Tribunal. The five Central American Powers agreed to refer to it "all controversies or questions which now exist between them or which may hereafter arise, whatever their nature or origin, in the event that they have failed to reach an understanding through diplomatic channels or have not accepted some other form of arbitration."

What a triumph for peace!

And observe! Certain of the jurists to be seated in this tribunal are to be nominated by the United States. Hurrah! We are now taking part in international peaceful justice.

Of course, we always are. Good pro-Courters will not fail to remember that it was under our auspices, when Mr. Root was Secretary of State, in 1907, that the Central American Court of Justice was brought into being.

Have then the Central Americans two international courts, the court of 1907 and the court of 1923? Dear me, no. Don't we all remember? That court of 1907 was a wretched and rotten court. It handed down two decisions adverse to our treaty of 1916 with Nicaragua. It held, for instance, that "the government of Nicaragua has violated, to the detriment of Costa Rica, the rights granted to the latter by the Canas-Jerez boundary treaty of April 15, 1858; the Cleveland Award of March 22, 1888; and the Central American Treaty of Peace and Friendship of September 20, 1907." So Mr. Woodrow Wilson, being a friend of international right, and Mr. Bryan, being even more so, and having inflamed the American populace into so regarding them, were perfectly safe in paying no attention to this Central American declaration of justice. The safe course for any American President, for any American Secretary of State, is to get a great reputation for peacefulness; and then do as you like.

The Central American Court of Justice, being thus snubbed by the world's greatest historic pacifiers, naturally curled up and died, thus accomplishing a great and noble purpose and result; because it gave us at Washington a chance to work for peace again and to further and forward another and new and presumably better Central American organ for peace and international judicial exact determination.

So here we are! The time, the place, and the girl are all together.

There is a dispute. Some Central American states, backed by us, claim that Diaz is the proper lawful President of Nicaragua. Other Central American states claim that the proper lawful President of Nicaragua is Sacasa. This dispute grows out of a legal controversy regarding the meaning of a treaty and regarding the meaning of the Nicaraguan constitution. All the troubles in Nicaragua flow from this legal controversy.

Next, there is a court. How can troubles continue when there is a court? The United States Government has nominated its members of the panel of the court. It is committed beyond recall to the judicial settlement of legal controversies in Central America.

Finally, there are all the women's clubs in the United States who are going to make the United States peaceful by having it join a court at a town called the Hague in a foreign country. Will these dear ladies now step forward and persuade those strong and determined pro-Courters, Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Kellogg, to send the Nicaraguan legal controversy to the new improved perfected International Central American Tribunal, of which we were sponsor?

I suppose they will. And, for the first time in my life, I wish them luck. Let us now see them make good. They have a dispute. They have a court. Let them step forward and be the girl in the case. Let them descend upon Washington and find out whether or not our pro-Courters have been buying them chocolates, with no intentions of marriage.

The National Railway of Haiti

A Study in Tropical Finance

By PAUL H. DOUGLAS

THERE are few more striking cases of financial imperialism than that of the National Railway of Haiti. A concession for the construction of a railway between Cape Haitien in the north and Port au Prince in the south was obtained as far back as 1905, but this was used by the Philadelphia group which secured it for the purpose of fleecing investors in the United States rather than for the construction of any line. In 1910 an American adventurer named James P. McDonald came to Haiti, apparently without backing from any large financial interests, and, bribing the members of the Haitian Congress, succeeded in getting a bill passed which turned over to him the prior concessions and guaranteed the company which he was to form, namely, the National Railway of Haiti, 6 per cent interest on bonds issued to finance the construction of the road, up to a total of $33,000 per mile. This was in effect a guaranty of $2,000 per mile per year. He also secured another concession granting him exclusive control over twenty kilometers of land on either side of the railroad for the growing of tropical fruits, for certain of which he was given an export monopoly. This amounted to nearly half of the total land in the country. McDonald had had the foresight to bribe the President, Antoine Simon, but for some reason the latter delayed his approval of the act. After this delay had gone on for some time, McDonald went to the President's daughter, Celestine Simon, a voodoo priestess with a great deal of influence over her father. The conversation, which has been widely reported as having occurred between them, has become one of the Haitian classics. "All the crown princesses of Europe have costly jewels," McDonald is said to have declared, adding: "Where are yours?" It is stated that Celestine replied that she had none and that McDonald then reached into his pocket, took out a box, opened it, and held up a string of pearls. He told Celestine that the pearls were hers if and when her father signed the railway concessions. Antoine Simon signed the act that afternoon and the pearls are said to have been delivered to his daughter that evening. They had cost five dollars! Thus a string of paste baubles launched Haiti into a financial venture which will in the end cost her people more than $8,000,000, and which was one of the causes for the American intervention in 1915.[1]

Bonds for the construction of the company were floated in France by the W. R. Grace Co., and the Caribbean Construction Company was formed to serve as a subcontractor in the building of the road. The British Ethelburga syndicate of somewhat malodorous reputation took a share in this company. Whether or not the insiders in the company made a considerable profit is still an object of dispute. The company went bankrupt, and the National City Bank states that it did not repay a loan which the bank had made to it. In 1914 Haiti found that only three disconnected sections of the railroad had been finished. The first paralleled the seacoast for 60 miles from Port au Prince to St. Marc. There was then a gap of 40 miles to Gonaives, whence a spur ran 20 miles to Ennery. The mountainous regions between Ennery and Cape Haitien were also untouched, but another short line of 28 miles ran directly south from Cape Haitien into the logwood country. In all 108 miles of road were built and $3,545,000 of bonds issued. After meeting two quarterly interest charges of $54,000 each, the Haitian Government in 1914 refused to make further payments—on the ground that it had contracted for a completed road, not for three disconnected segments. Through traffic was of course impossible, and three separate sets of rolling-stock had to be maintained.

The company, meanwhile, came under the control of interests which were at least closely affiliated with the National City Bank. There is no evidence that the National City Bank was a party to the original bribery of the Haitian Government or that it knew McDonald until after he had received his concession. McDonald had by this time not only been eliminated from the company but his banana concession had also lapsed because of failure to develop it. Roger L. Farnham, then in the employ of the National City Bank and later one of its vice-presidents, has been president of the railroad[2] from 1911 on.

Mr. Farnham replied to the Haitian contention by declaring that the company had made an effort in good faith to build a completed railroad, but that frequent revolutions —force majeure—had prevented the construction of the line. He insisted that the terms of the concession provided that the interest should be recognized as each section of the road was built and that payments were not contingent upon the construction of the completed line. Possibly he interpreted the concession correctly, but probably none save those directly concerned know definitely why the road was not finished. Revolutions during late 1913 and early 1914 may have hindered the work somewhat. Antoine Simon had been driven out of Haiti in 1911 by groups which charged that he had sold out the country to the foreigners; his successor, President Leconte, was blown up in the presidential palace, and President Auguste died mysteriously after eating food which did not agree with him. It is difficult to see how these assassinations impeded the construction of the road. Most of the later revolutions occurred after construction had been abandoned rather than before. The year from April, 1914, to April, 1915, did indeed break all records, there being no fewer than three Presidents during the twelve months; but these changes occurred after railroad-building had stopped. The sections constructed were those which ran through level country and the full $33,000 a mile was claimed as cost. Most of the sections not constructed were in the mountains, and would probably have cost more than $33,000 a mile.

Despite the frequent changes in government during 1914-1915, all of the Presidents refused to recognize the validity of the railway's claim. The matter was brought to the attention of Mr. Bryan, then United States Secretary of State, and in one of his dispatches to the American Minister to Haiti he urged that the Haitian Government should come to an agreement with the National Railway of Haiti. But no agreement was reached.

[1] For the text of the concessions see E. Mathon, "Annuaire de Législation Haitienne" (1910), pp. 52-66.

[2] Mr. Farnham is not now in the employ of the National City Bank.

There can be little doubt that the Banque Nationale de la République d'Haïti, in which the National City Bank owned a small interest, desired American control. A cable from Minister Smith to our State Department in July, 1914, stated that if the bank refused to renew the budgetary convention of 1910, whereby it advanced the current government receipts, and if, instead, it held all "moneys intact until the end of the fiscal year" [September 30, 1915] then "the Government will find itself without funds of any sort, and with no income, and undoubtedly will find it most difficult to operate." Minister Smith continued:[2a] "It is just this condition that the bank desires, for it is the belief of the bank that the Government when confronted by such a crisis would be forced to ask the assistance of the United States in adjusting its financial tangle and that American supervision of the customs would result."

This attempt to impound the Haitian receipts for a year in order to obtain American control over the customs, together with the pressure which the Haitian Government was exercising in order to secure control of the reserve for the redemption of the paper money held by the bank, accounts for some of the influence thrown in favor of American intervention. Mr. Farnham in his capacity as president of the railroad would also have been helped by American intervention.

In July 27, 1915, the revolution in Port au Prince drove President Sam to the French Legation and while he was there, his commander of the National Prison shot 164 of Sam's imprisoned political opponents. This massacre inflamed the city; a mob broke into the French Legation and murdered Sam, and crowds paraded the streets with Sam's remains. American marines were landed the next day, and our occupation of Haiti began. With the help of American diplomatic and naval influence Sudre Dartiguenave, who was favorable to our interests, was elected President, and a treaty which gave the United States economic and military control of Haiti was drafted and, after some opposition, was ratified. One of the clauses of this treaty[3] provided that "Haiti would execute a protocol for the settlement by arbitration or otherwise of all pending pecuniary claims of foreign corporations, companies, citizens, or subjects against Haiti."

It was not until 1919, more than three years later, that a protocol was negotiated providing for the establishment of a Claims Commission.[4] This protocol specified that the interest upon the bonds of the National Railway of Haiti should be admitted as a charge upon the Haitian treasury without being submitted to the Claims Commission.[5]

No interest was paid on the bonds, however, until 1923, when the arrearages amounting to over $1,900,000 were paid. During this entire period the railroad had been a complete financial failure. The gross annual revenues from 1914 to 1922 averaged less than $90,000 a year, while the operating costs alone, including depreciation, amounted annually to nearly $170,000. Since the yearly interest charges were $216,000, the income of the road amounted to approximately one-half of the operating costs, and to only 22 per cent of the total annual charges. The remainder came from the Haitian peasant, who ultimately paid the taxes, and from the roadbed and rolling stock, which was allowed to depreciate.

In 1920 the road was thrown into a friendly receivership and Judge Julius Mayer appointed Mr. Farnham as receiver. This receivership lasted for four years. Mr. Farnham charged $25,000 a year for his services and gave $20,000 a year to Sullivan and Cromwell for legal advice.[6] Other costly counsel fees were also paid. Thus the receivership fees paid to men in New York who spent but a small fraction of their time in Haiti amounted to approximately one-half the total annual receipts. These fees absorbed virtually all of the funds that had been accumulated at the rate of 1 per cent per year for the purposes of amortization. Judge Mayer nevertheless praised the receivership in a statement issued to the press on the eve of his retirement as a federal judge by declaring: "The fortunate results of this receivership refute the contention sometimes advanced, that the courts are incapable of dealing successfully with administrative as well as legal problems." He asserted that there had "been a complete rehabilitation to the great advantage of the many investors both here and abroad."[7] It is known that Mr. Farnham, who is now no longer connected with the National City Bank, is at present receiving $18,000 a year as president of the railroad[8] although he spends but little time in Haiti. He has been an expensive luxury for the Haitian peasants.

In 1924 an agreement was negotiated between Mr. Farnham and the American Financial Adviser to Haiti, whereby the bonds of the National Railway of Haiti were exchanged at a discount of 25 per cent for Series C bonds of the Republic of Haiti. The total amount of the bonds was reduced to $2,660,000 at 6 per cent and a thirty-year amortization period was provided.[9] Of the paid-in interest $600,000 was recaptured to extend the road into territory which it was hoped would bring in more revenue. These Series C bonds, as is the case with all the other issues authorized under the protocol of 1919, are guaranteed by American control of the customs until they are paid off. American collection of the customs is thus authorized beyond the expiration of the treaty in 1936.

First and last, therefore, this railroad will cost the Haitians well over $8,000,000. One of the interesting features of the situation is that had the American Financial Adviser acted promptly, the Government might have retired the issue for less than a million. In 1920 the bonds of the railway had fallen to around 55—in francs—on the Paris Bourse. Due to the depreciation of the franc, it would have been possible to buy up some of these bonds for as low as 27, and the value of the entire issue at this rate would have been a little more than $700,000. When it is remembered that the accrued interest alone was by that time approximately twice this figure, the possible saving in interest and in principal is evident. But the opportunity was neglected.

Who then did buy the bonds? It is generally understood that the National City Bank now owns from two-thirds to three-quarters of the issue. The bank, however, [2a] For the text of this cable see Foreign Relations, 1914, p. 346.

[3] Article XI, "Treaty Between the United States and Haiti. Finances, Economic Development and Tranquillity of Haiti. Treaty Series No. 623" (Washington).

[4] "Protocol Between the United States and Haiti. Establishment of a Claims Commission. Washington (1919). Treaty Series No. 643."

[5] Ibid., Article III.

[6] For the records of the receivership see files of Federal Court in New York City. De Acosta v. Compagnie Nationale des Chemins de Fer d'Haïti. In Equity No E—18—196. See especially amended order July 7, 1924.

[7] New York Times, July 20, 1924.

[8] Ibid., p. 13.

[9] For the details of this agreement see "Annual Report of the Financial Adviser—General Receiver of Haiti for the Fiscal Year October, 1923-September, 1924," pp. 85-89.

declares that it did not buy such bonds as it holds directly in the Paris market but instead obtained them as collateral for a debt due to them but unpaid. From whom the bonds were taken and what they cost the National City Bank I do not know. It is certain, however, that someone made a large profit upon the transaction. The cost of the bonds, assuming that they constitute 70 per cent of the issue, could scarcely have been more than $600,000 or $700,000, even allowing for an increase in price resulting from bidding them in. The accrued back interest permanently retained would amount to not less than $950,000, while the exchange for Haitian bonds at $75 would mean an added capital gain of $1,850,000. Unknown individuals or the National City Bank, or both, seem to have made more than $2,000,000 on the series of transactions.

The American occupation of Haiti has performed some real services in building roads, reducing disease, collecting the revenues honestly, and in putting down robber bands. But this use of military power to force the Haitians to accept a contract conceived in sin and begotten in iniquity, the ultimate effect of which has been to give a large profit to American interests, cannot be excused. The Haitians can hardly be blamed if they are somewhat cynical when our Government talks about the "sanctity of contracts."

Pilsudski's Militarism

By LOUIS FISCHER

Warsaw, December 1, 1926

PILSUDSKI does things by halves. He is a dictator in fact but not by nature, and after the bloody events of the May putsch—which some Poles delight in calling a "revolution"—he failed to follow up the advantages which his control of the army and his popularity as the symbol of Polish independence gave him. As in the 1920 war with the Bolsheviks his initial success was brilliant and spectacular. The total, however, is zero. Pilsudski's role in history was finished when he and his adherents achieved Polish republican independence. He is no politician and less of an economist; most of the Marshal's activities since 1919 may be marked on the debit side of the ledger; disillusionment, dashed hopes, loss of prestige.

Three hundred men dead on the streets of Warsaw. What has Poland got for it? Even Pilsudski's ardent disciples find it hard to answer this question. To be sure, the Marshal was born under a lucky star, and this time the British coal strike has saved his regime from dismal bankruptcy. Heavy exports of coal to England and to England's customers have temporarily fortified the zloty. The severe economic crisis which from December, 1925, to last May paved the way for Pilsudski's coup has been sugar-coated—not liquidated by sackfuls of pounds in payment for shipfuls of coal. Nevertheless, the so-called Radical Peasant Party, the Polish Party of Socialists (less socialistic even than the German Social Democrats), the Jews, and the Germans, all of whom supported him in May, are disgusted with him for what he has and has not done. His return from voluntary exile to active politics raised high hopes in practically the entire nation. Now, after six months, many persons realize that their hopes are forlorn.

Today Pilsudski is coquetting with the monarchists. Will he take the crown? It is doubtful. He does not go the whole way. Yet he is so temperamental and unaccountable that no one would venture a prophecy. The leading royalist publicist in Poland said to me, "Now we have what we have not had hitherto—a candidate." He meant Pilsudski. It was a day after the celebrated monarchist conclave in Nieswiec, the family seat of the Radziwills, where the premier met four hundred of the richest, most influential landowners of the country. They offered their support and Pilsudski accepted it. He is convinced that he needs such aid to combat the National Democratic industrialists, his staunchest foes. To the extent that it will weaken this bold, quasi-Fascist Opposition, the Pact of Nieswiec was a clever move, yet it may ultimately force him to create and fill the post of Regent and to become a Horthy-like seat-warmer for a future king. It may, moreover, alienate completely the peasants and socialists who are growing more distrustful and disgruntled daily but who are, notwithstanding, his faithful following still.

Pilsudski has no program. His present policy is to ride as many horses as possible, and his cabinet is therefore a queer menagerie of monarchists, socialists, peasant exploiters, and exploited peasants all held together by personal allegiance to the Marshal. He could, by a concession or even a mere gesture, regain the confidence of the Left, which he is fast losing. The workers, like the Socialists, are more nationalistic than socialistic, and Pilsudski is their idol. Every hour, however, makes the prospect of a Left orientation less likely. Pilsudski is heading straight toward reaction, and already the Socialist Party is demanding the resignation of one of its members from the cabinet.

Pilsudski has robbed the Seym of even apparent power. He has browbeaten and humiliated it, and held up a mirror to show it its anemia. Had he offered a substitute for this hollow parliamentary form he might have been allowed to murder the Diet with impunity. Nobody considers it really important. As it is, his methods have only aroused resentment. He has dragged parliament in the dust. Yet he does not dare dissolve it. He stops half-way.

Pilsudski, above all, is a soldier and the army is his pet. The other afternoon I went into a stationery shop on the Marshalkovska to buy some picture post cards. In a mixture of German and Russian I made the salesman understand my question as to whether conditions were any better since Pilsudski. "No," was the decided reply. "All the money," he said pointing to his cash register, "to army. The Marshal has an idée fixe," he continued, tapping his temple. "Military, military, like Wilhelm." The 1927 budget provides for an expenditure of 622,000,000 zlotys by the Ministry of War, exclusive of pensions, out of a total fiscal outlay of 1,896,000,000 zlotys. But in reality the Government spends more than 33 per cent of the annual budget for military preparations. An extremely pro-Polish member of the diplomatic corps put it at 40 per cent, and a minister in Warsaw of a Western European Power estimated between 40 and 45 per cent. An official in the Polish Foreign Office admitted that certain army expenses were often debited to other departments, and it is an open secret that the frontier guard of 19,000 men is maintained by the Ministry of Interior, while the Ministry of Communications pays many troop transport bills and the Ministry of Education for a few officers' training schools. A poor peasant country, Poland must bear the burden of from 250,000 to 315,000 unproductive citizens in the army.

When I complained to Poles—and to the American Minister—about the huge costs of armaments, they resorted to a map and showed the long, unnatural border with Russia on the one hand and with Germany on the other. Under these circumstances, one hears from every mouth, we must maintain a large standing army and be ever on the qui vive. This military force, however, is bleeding the nation white. When invited by the Warsaw Government several years ago to advise it on financial problems, Hilton Young declared that Poland had to choose between defenselessness against Russia and Germany and bankruptcy. Pilsudski apparently prefers the latter alternative.

There is a third possibility which did not occur to the British expert: an agreement with Russia and Germany. But until recently, at least, Poland could pursue no independent foreign policy. With respect to Germany she was a vassal of France; with respect to Russia she was a buffer against Bolshevism. Locarno, and more especially Thoiry, changed the factors in the situation. If Warsaw had had its way there would have been no Locarno without a German guaranty of the Polish-German frontier. Stresemann flatly refused, Briand was conciliatory, and Poland received a sop in the form of a promise of League Council membership. Thoiry deepened Poland's disappointment over the French attitude, and the wires between London and Warsaw grew busier.

There was no money to be borrowed in Paris. But negotiations for a Polish loan were opened in the British capital. One of the Polish financiers who took a leading part in them tells me that the English demanded a veto over all Polish expenditures and a commissioner to control all Polish fiscal affairs. In view of the tendency of the Poles to sink half their funds in armaments, in view, moreover, of the officially admitted corruption of the Polish state apparatus, the men in the City can scarcely be censured for insisting on such guaranties. On the other hand, however, it must be clear that though the Polish bankers and economists favored the acceptance of these onerous terms, no politician who cared for his career could afford to sign his name to them.

After the failure of these loan negotiations, Poland stabilized her currency without foreign aid, and she accordingly supposed that with such a recommendation the door to Wall Street would be wide open. But America was not to be persuaded. In the first place, the $35,000,000 loan floated in 1924 by Dillon, Reed and Company, the Polish Government's banker, is now selling below the original market price, and that despite the very strenuous efforts of the issuing house to keep the bonds from falling. A further issue would weaken the first. In the second place, England and Germany are opposed to direct United States financial assistance for Poland, and England is Uncle Sam's intermediary for a great deal of banking business in Europe, while American money magnates are inclined to listen to German opinion because they have sunk so many hundreds of millions in Germany. The visits of Professor Kemmerer of Princeton and of Harding of the Boston Federal Reserve Bank notwithstanding, therefore—and these trips were frankly engineered with an eye to borrowing—Polish foreign loans, if there are to be any, must come from London or, incredible though it sounds, from Berlin.

Poland must import capital if she does not wish to remain an undeveloped agricultural country with a low standard of living. "Poland," mourns the official English-language monthly, the Polish Economist, "has been given the task to defend the capitalist structure [against Russia] without herself having capital with which to work." Too true. But the conditions under which outside aid can be obtained are too exacting. Pilsudski consequently seems disposed to reject foreign control, to pursue a foreign policy which is neither French-dictated nor English-dictated, and to depend on his army in the expectation that sooner or later London or New York will be persuaded to make greater concessions.

Meanwhile the feeling against Germany is even more bitter than the hatred for the Soviet Union. Germany is blamed for interfering with the loan. There are serious territorial differences with Germany but none with Russia. And then Poland and Germany have, since June, 1925, been engaged in commercial war which has been doing far more harm to the Poles than to the Germans. Negotiations looking to the cessation of hostilities and the conclusion of a trade agreement have been in progress for many months but little has been achieved. Yet the matter is of extreme importance because as long as the trade relations between the two countries are in their present inchoate state, Polish economic affairs and Poland's foreign policy defy satisfactory regulation. To complicate things still further Poincaré now insists on a German guaranty of the Polish-German boundary as a condition of the Franco-German rapprochement.

A new element contributing toward a German commercial settlement is Pilsudski's league with the royalist landowners. They are heavy exporters to Germany and have always been pro-German. The Marshal's announced intention of confiding three prominent diplomatic posts—Bucharest, Berlin, and Washington—to titled leaders of the monarchist movement indicates that he has promised to pay in foreign policy currency for their support at home, and increases the likelihood of an early settlement of the Polish-German trade dispute. But since the Germans are ready neither to renounce the Corridor—though they allow that Posen is predominantly Polish—nor to antagonize Moscow, a political peace still appears far off. In the West, then, natural causes, German foreign policy, German internal politics, and the Polish fear psychosis militate against the elimination of friction between the two countries. And this difficulty, together with that of the German railway obligations, may postpone Franco-German friendship. Briand at Thoiry was reconciled to throwing Poland to the dogs or to the British; Poincaré wants a satellite and a guard in the East against Germany. But he must pay for it and cannot. The situation, in other words, is in flux and depends, to some extent, on Poland's relations with Soviet Russia.

The Baltic countries and England have hitherto kept Russia and Poland apart. Now there is another factor: Pilsudski's enmity for the National Democratic industrialists and his consequent disinclination to strengthen his worst opponents by finding a market for their goods in Russia. The Premier, moreover, is a rabid anti-Bolshevik besides being an advocate of a peasant Poland. Everything, it would seem, contributes to make an agreement with Moscow quite remote, yet a pact is under discussion at this moment. These discussions were forced upon Warsaw by the Soviet-Lithuanian non-aggression treaty. It is a fact that this innocent accord between the largest and the weakest state in Europe, signed in September, is probably Chicherin's greatest diplomatic triumph in the last two years.

The Poles, egged on by Britain, and wishing to become the big Eastern Power, a year ago proposed a Baltic Locarno to Russia in which Poland would figure as the protector of Finland, Esthonia, Latvia, and perhaps Lithuania. The purpose was obvious—an iron ring around the Soviet Union which Rumania, as the ally of Poland, would complete. German diplomats have explained to me that this bloc was aimed as much against them as against Russia, and certainly the mutual desire to break it created a warm field of sympathy between Berlin and Moscow. The Lithuanian treaty, which a Polish statesman attributed to the pen of Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, the German Ambassador in Moscow, drives a wedge between Poland and the other Baltic states, and it is significant but not surprising that its immediate result has been suggestions from Latvia and Finland to Russia to commence pourparlers for separate treaties. This is one of the worst defeats which England's and Poland's anti-Russian policy has suffered. Poland, too, is now forced to accept as a basis for discussion a draft pact submitted to Foreign Minister Zalesky by Voikov, the Soviet Minister in Warsaw. The draft was given to Zalesky before the Lithuanian treaty was signed. Then he pigeonholed it, and announced the fact to the press. Now he has had to resurrect it.

The proposed pact contains one significant article which provides, in effect, that if Poland is attacked by a third party Russia remains neutral, and, vice versa, Poland remains neutral if Russia is attacked. In conversation with me Zalesky admitted that by implication Poland was free under this paragraph to march to the assistance of the Baltic states should the Soviet Union attack them, which is all that Poland can demand if she is really interested only in the welfare of her tiny neighbors.

Poland needs this treaty with Russia. Polish industries were designed for the Russian market and they are languishing because it is closed to them. Russia is the keynote to Poland's rehabilitation. "The moment Russia gets foreign capital," Felix Mlynarsky, vice-president of the Bank of Poland, said to me a fortnight ago, "and can buy more goods, Poland's problem is solved." This much is beyond a doubt: the passive trade balance inevitably resulting from a Polish commercial agreement with Germany can only be made active by large exports of manufactured goods to Russia. Yet everywhere in Warsaw one finds people saying, "We have the Riga peace treaty of 1921 with Russia. Why write another?" These men, refusing to recognize that business is impossible before political obstructions are removed, advocate nothing more than a trade agreement. And then Dolozal, Assistant-Minister of Industry and Trade, argues that Poland can deal with Russia as heretofore, that is, without even a trade agreement, a moment after he had drawn from his desk statistics proving that Poland's trade with Russia totaled 19,000,000 gold francs last year as against 1,500,000,000 gold francs before the war.

Time and an improvement in Anglo-Russian relations may help to beat down such resistance to an understanding with the Soviets. Meanwhile it is becoming increasingly clear to a large number of Poles that a country so weak economically as Poland and so much rent by internal political dissensions and by recalcitrant minorities must stop quarreling with its neighbors before foreign investors will feel justified in putting their money into it; and the outstanding obstacle is Pilsudski's militarism.

These Modern Women

Poet Out of Pioneer

ANONYMOUS

[This is the sixth of a series of anonymous articles, giving the personal backgrounds of women with a modern point of view. The next will appear in The Nation for February 2. Later, psychologists will analyze the modern woman's rebellion disclosed in this series.]

MY mother and father were the two most remarkable young people in a very small Western town: my mother, a pioneer extravert, a hard-working, high-handed, generous, and handsome girl. She never set limits to what she could do. She believed in miracles made by her own hands. When my father came, she was in rebellion against small-town sterility, determined to go to college and become, not a raw country girl with the limit of grammar-school learning but a cultured Christian gentlewoman, who could paint, sing, write, and testify to God's glory. My father had come West from Missouri for his health. He looked like Abraham Lincoln, but delicate and Quixotic. My mother's strength fascinated him and, I suppose, scared him to death. Church and school linked them—he, the principal of the grammar school; in a crude community, a man of learning (six months in a church college); the superintendent of the Sunday school and leader of Christian Endeavor. She was his first-grade teacher and a very good one. Not for nothing had she been mother to eleven brothers and sisters on the old ranch. She ran her schoolroom with an energy that was electric. Children were happy with her. She furnished them a firm foundation.

My father, of course, felt the charge of vitality. They married and for two years lived in a state of enforced chastity, I suppose, determined to save money and go to college. They saved $2,000 and were departing for a higher life when my uncle, my father's brother, came penniless from the East and married a shrew. My father loved my uncle with an unnatural simplicity. Brother John and the shrew wanted the two thousand to buy an apple-farm. My mother saw an older love in my tender father about to swamp her ambitions. In this emotional tangle I was conceived and it was I, finally, not my father or my uncle, who defeated my mother. The money went of course to John, college plunged into inaccessibility, and my mother was in the usual trap and, I am sure, as bitter as any modern woman about it.

Suddenly came a chance to go to a tropic country—another way out. Romanticists they both were, although they called themselves missionaries. And so when I was still a baby my mother gave the rest of her possessions to my uncle, packed up me and her baffled desires, and set off with her Shelleyesque husband to the heathen. The story is a complicated one; I shall follow only the trends of the two temperaments. My mother, with ultimately three children and a passive husband, still had her old ambitions in this new land. But with us she did not encourage the freedom she gave her little school-children. At home she was a major domo. The family became a highly efficient organization—it had to be, when she gave most of her day to teaching. Although she took care of us all, there was never any ease or leisure; we were not permitted happiness. In the public school and the missionary chapel these two labored, giving their crowded time free for Jesus. My father was the principal, a flexible glove on my mother's strong, stubby hand. She was still his "primary" teacher, his wife, cook, housekeeper, refuge, and intelligence. And so complete was her domination over her man that she expected to mold and use me as she had used him.

But I, of course, began before I can remember silently and consistently to oppose her; to defend my father and to rebel at her steam-roller tactics. I was lonely and excitable. Fairy-tales were denied me—no reading but the Bible—so I made Bible stories into fairy-tales and she found me very difficult about them. She believed in authority. I would not submit to it. She drove me to music lessons and housework—all done to the moral precept: there is only one right way. I should have been a musician or a composer; but she blocked the path, hemmed in with her vigilance all creation. Music, made hideous in the guise of duty, I abandoned and took another way out—with words, where no one could give me orders. I dreamed and made fantasies, and soon I lied habitually, to escape her, and went underground in all my desires. I was my father again, but a girl this time, and enough like herself to match her mettle. I had a good childhood in spite of the fact that we lived in a state of nervous tension at home and, as missionaries and school people, in a superior and controlled fashion in public, upholding the just, the good, the true. That was easy because we had the advantage of our less educated native neighbors. My father, as the years went by, became a vague sort of scientist, fleeing away from my mother's pressure. She, passionate and unfulfilled, lived in her three children.

Her objective was this cultural life she had never reached herself, and toward it our faces were always directed. But there was a division in my mother's own mind which she had never faced. Our religion was the religion of the small town, based on a fear of the big world, on a fear of the rational, the progressive, and the huge bugaboo of "Darwinism" and Higher Criticism. And yet however my mother fought against the liberal Congregationalists and the damned Unitarians, and however fanatical was her matter-of-fact mysticism, she wanted her children to live in that intellectual world and, I suppose, to solve, in a Christian fashion, its problem for her.

Twice my father collapsed and was told to his immense relief that he had tuberculosis and that he need no longer inhabit our world. His ailment was undoubtedly psychological. Twice we starved, and adored our mother for her gorgeous strength, and pitied and averted our faces from our father. And then the old theme reentered.

My mother demanded of my now wealthy Uncle John the $2,000 that had made him a comfortable apple-grower, and had kept her in bondage. We lived on canned salmon and rice and wild tomatoes for several months, in a shack where the tropic rains poured on our beds; and John wrote evasively with no inclosures. My father loved him still and would do nothing about it. My mother went as nearly insane with rage as she could permit herself, but only on Saturday mornings, when she could safely compute compound interest on an outlawed loan. The story spins out and out. We returned to the small town in an attempt to collect the two thousand, after a letter from my uncle offering us an old farmhouse near him. There, used as my uncle's hired help and wearing his family's cast-off clothing, we integrated ourselves into the single struggle to exist—without him. At length we returned to our tropics, penniless still, but to decent poverty and our own way of life. And my mother and father took up their teaching where they had begun fourteen years before, in a three-room school on a sugar plantation. This was a little too ironic for my frail father who had just managed to complete before his return to the States a twelve-room modern school for his beloved natives. He fell ill again and again we existed—I teaching in his place to get the $25 a month allotted a substitute.

I was ready for college. On two hundred borrowed dollars we came to a Western university town and there as servants in a boarding-house began again the struggle that included our whole story.

Am I the Christian gentlewoman my mother slaved to make me? No indeed. I am a poet, a wine-bibber, a radical; a non-churchgoer who will no longer sing in the choir or lead prayer-meeting with a testimonial. (Although I will write anonymous confessions for The Nation.) That is her story—and her second defeat. She thinks I owed her a Christian gentlewoman, for all she did for me. We quarrel. After I escaped, she snapped shut the iron trap around my brother and sister. That is their story. I do not know if they will ever be free of her. She keeps Eddie Guest on the parlor table beside the books I have written—a silent protest against me. She is not pleased.

I cannot pretend to be entirely frank in telling the story that results from this story; or to apply to it any such perspective. Let my daughter tell it later on. She will see outlines I cannot.

I think I have not been as wasted as my mother was—or as wasteful. I have made worse mistakes, which might have been more fatal than hers and yet have not been, at least for me. My chief improvement on her past was the man I chose to marry. I did not want a one-way street of a marriage, like hers. I married a poet and novelist, gifted and difficult, who refused defeat as often as I did. Hard as it is to live with an equal, it is at least not degrading. We have starved, too; struggled as hard as ever my folks did. But the struggle has not been empty; I have no grudges. Intellectually as well as emotionally my husband had as much to give that was new and strange as I had. In marriage I learned, rather tardily, the profound truth that contradicts Jesus when he said, "Bear ye one another's burdens." I am a better person when I bear my own burdens. I am happiest with people who can bear their own, too. I remember my mother's weariness and contempt for a man who could never take up her challenges. Seven years with a real person is better than her thirty with a helpless, newspaper-reading gentleman.

The pioneer woman was a dynamo—and her man nearly always ran out on her. From the bitterness in such women many of us were born. Where was her mate? Did she destroy him? Did he hate her for her strength? Was he weaker because she was strong? Where is the equilibrium, anyway? I do not know, for sure, although I spend much time wondering.

Marriage is the only profound human experience; all other human angles are its mere rehearsal. Like every one else I have wanted it. And yet having it, it is not all I want. It is more often, I think, a final experience than a way of life. But I am a poet—love and mutual living are not nearly enough. It is better to work hard than to be married hard. If, at the beginning of middle age, we have not learned some of the perils of the soul, in this double-selved life, we are pure fools. Self-sufficiency is a myth, of course, but after thirty, if one is a serious-minded egoist (i.e., artist) it becomes more and more necessary. And I think it can be approximated.

Lucinda Matlock, in the "Spoon River Anthology," says:

We were married and lived together for seventy years,
Enjoying, working, raising the twelve children,
Eight of whom we lost,
Ere I had reached the age of sixty.
I spun, I wove, I kept the house, I nursed the sick,
Rambling over the fields where sang the larks,
And by Spoon River gathering many a shell,
And many a flower and medicinal weed,
Shouting to the wooded hills, singing to the green valleys.
At ninety-six I had lived enough, that is all,
And passed to a sweet repose.
What is this I hear of sorrow and weariness,
Anger, discontent, and drooping hopes?
Degenerate sons and daughters,
Life is too strong for you—
It takes life to love Life.

My mother was not this woman, nor am I, but we are both some way kin to her.

Smith in 1928?

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, January 8

IT is generally predicted that the Democratic Party is headed in 1928 for another convention battle that will make that of 1924 look like a tea party. There may be a way of averting it, but no one in Washington can tell you what it is. Of course it is almost incredible that the minority party, broke, in debt, destitute of leadership, devoid of issues, and still dazed from its last and worst defeat, should be all set for another fierce internal conflict certain to leave it unarmed and impotent before its ancient enemy, whose smug and pudgy personality ought to provide a shining mark. Yet such seems to be the fact.

All the rules of politics, the dictates of common sense, the pressure of the workers for the jobs, the lessons of the past—these things ought to be enough to compel unity, but they are not enough. The history of the past seventy years shows that whenever there appears in the stream of politics a large, jagged rock the Democratic Party hits it harder, more enthusiastically, and more directly than any other, splitting so widely that the well-known adage about the lust for power being stronger than the pull of principle apparently ceases to apply. Outside the breastworks the factions fight with a fury that to those whose eyes are not filled with blood is obviously destructive of election chances. It was that way on the slavery issue, again on the silver issue, and now on the liquor issue. After each split the party suffers a long series of electoral disasters that make its actual survival as a national agency more or less miraculous. In 1920 the great adverse majority was due to the reaction against Wilson and other things, but in 1924 it was due to the convention feud between the Dry forces of the West and South and the Wet forces of the East, with considerable religious feeling between Protestant and Catholic thrown in to increase the bitterness. The nomination of a compromise candidate of the highest character did not avert the disaster. On the contrary, it seemed to increase its size.

And now, looking toward 1928, there is not a single clear-headed Democrat in Congress or in the country who sees anything save another bruising contest between irreconcilable factions. Every sign confirms this view. No one sees any way to avoid it. Many think it will be worse than the last. The outstanding and logical candidate is a Wet, the bulk of the States will be Dry. The two-thirds rule cannot be waived or abrogated. On the other hand, while there is among the Republicans certain disaffection and trouble, the indications are that in the next convention, as in the past, they will be successful in soft-pedaling the dangerous issue, taking as usual the Dry side without driving the wild Wets away.

Of course what enables them to play that game successfully is the inevitable and increasingly bitter Democratic split plus the Dry strength that has so far prevented the logical and natural division between the parties on the liquor issue. In view of these conceded facts, together with recent party leadership and history, it would be ridiculous to call the Democratic outlook for the next national campaign bright. Yet there is no lack of candidates among the Democrats; no lack of men who believe, in spite of the prospects, the nomination is worth having and want it.

It is strange, but it is so. Of course, as the well-known Munyon was wont to say, there is always hope. The Republican candidate might go crazy, or the Republican convention develop courage, or some new note be struck that would swing the pendulum back toward the Democracy. But it will be conceded that all of these are remote contingencies. The one thing that keeps interest and discussion of the Democratic situation from being purely academic on the outside and extremely comic on the inside of that party is the candidacy of Governor Smith. Should he—a Catholic and a Wet, four times Governor of New York, and concededly the outstanding Democrat in the country—should he be nominated, then all the basis for political prophecy and calculation disappears. It would be an utterly new sort of campaign. It might easily be one of tremendous and unprecedented bitterness, ending in final and irretrievable disaster. On the other hand, the remarkable personality, character, and record of this man, the saltiness of his language, his gift for trenchant expression, his knowledge of the way to the hearts of the people, plus the growing sentiment against the Volstead Act might conceivably upset all the political dope, confound the bigots, and sweep him and his party into power. It is possible to find in Washington so-called Democratic leaders to support both of these views with equal emphasis. Two things, however, stand out here in connection with this Democratic situation. One is that the most astute Republican politicians are unanimously convinced of Smith's nomination notwithstanding the plausible statistical arguments of certain professional political analysists that no Wet can be named and of the raucous cries of Mr. McAdoo's newspaper friends in one or two Southern States. The other is the number of Dry Democrats from the South in Congress who, while publicly compelled to oppose Smith or any Wet, at heart want to see him win and privately say so. Two years ago these men were against him privately as well as publicly.

It may be interesting to note that recently on an inside page and in a most inconspicuous way the fact was mentioned in the New York Times that Thomas L. Chadbourne and Bernard M. Baruch would not be with Mr. McAdoo in the next fight. Chadbourne, it was said, is definitely for Smith. The article did not locate Baruch beyond saying that he is not with McAdoo. This will be interesting to a number of Democratic Senators who seem not to have seen it. So far as Chadbourne is concerned it will not mean much to them except as indicating that Mr. McAdoo has lost an angel. The only way Mr. Chadbourne figures in politics is as an intermittent and not over-liberal contributor. What he does is of small concern. But with Mr. Baruch it is different. What he does is of considerable concern to quite a few minority Senators. They like to keep in sympathetic touch and pleasant accord with him. To most of these it will be a relief to know that he is not going down the line with Mr. McAdoo again. It will be a greater relief when they know with whom he is really going to play. Probably he doesn't yet know himself.

In the Driftway

THE only concern which the Drifter has in regard to the telephone service to London at $75 a call is a fear that he may return from lunch some day to find a memorandum on his desk which reads: "The Duke of Eastumberland phoned you—says you're to call him back." The Drifter will call him more than that.

* * * * *

ONE hundred American clergymen have issued a manifesto in which they describe our civilization as "the best the world has ever known." Yes—it always has been.

* * * * *

MUCH as the Drifter regrets to find himself indifferent to any worthy cause, he has been unable to work up any passion thus far against "poisoned alcohol" or in behalf of the downtrodden proprietors of New York City's night clubs, who, according to a new edict, must close their doors just as business is fairly beginning, at 3 a. m. So far as the Volstead act goes, the Drifter can either break it or leave it alone. He has no quarrel with any little group of serious drinkers that wants to go on stowing away the best that it can get hold of. He suspects that law is merely faulty human opinion, that none of it has been handed down from heaven on tablets of stone, and that it is far from the most sacred thing in the world. Yet at the same time it seems like straining a point for anybody to ask a government to guarantee him against unfortunate consequences from violating its statutes. It would be almost as reasonable if murderers were to insist that the government hang them with a noose so soft and elastic that it could by no possibility break their necks or spoil their appetite for lunch.

* * * * *

AS to night clubs, the Drifter has not recently been able to get up early enough to visit one, although when a boy on a farm he might have run in for a moment just before milking time had there been such a resort handy. He doesn't recall that there was. In general, the Drifter has scant sympathy with anyone who isn't ready to go home to bed at 3 a. m. Everybody ought to get up sometime, and it is hard to see how it can be done if one never goes to bed. Anyhow, for those who have no home, or for married men who are afraid to go to theirs at 3 a. m., there are the all-night lunch rooms and the six-day bicycle race.

* * * * *

IN fact the Drifter would like to see this curfew idea carried further. He would advocate an ordinance requiring that all after-the-theater supper parties be held before 8 p. m. Upon emerging from a theater where the play has put one almost completely to sleep there are few more unpleasant sensations than to have the Life of the Party shout boisterously to the stilly night: "What say we go some place and have a bite to eat?" And there's always some liar and idiot to respond: "Why how nice that would be!" Besides, when the Drifter has invited guests to attend the theater in the hope of squaring social accounts for the next six months, it is annoying to be put again on the debit side by having them lug him off and fill him with food and drink he doesn't want. In the days before prohibition, when one was invited in a saloon to take a drink which he didn't care for, it used to be possible to reply: "Thank you, I'll take a cigar instead." Often the Drifter, when urged to go to an after-the-theater supper party, is tempted to respond: "If it's all the same to you, Old Man, I'll take a bed."

* * * * *

NOR would the Drifter stop there. He would extend the curfew law to compel all private parties to adjourn at midnight. This would be welcomed by most of the guests and all of the hosts. The trouble now is that no guest wants to make the first move for fear he'll be thought a sissie or a killjoy, and no host can turn out the lights and go to bed without seeming inhospitable. These views may be disputed by a few die-hards falling to sleep in each other's arms at the fag end of a late party, but they are the unanimous verdict of all whom the Drifter has ever encountered, yawning and red-eyed, on the morning after. But the morning after is an engagement which the Drifter, with all his subterfuges, has never been able to escape. Possibly he is in its grip now. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The New Generation: Better than the Old?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Dr. Abbott, in The Nation for December 8, stated the exact truth as I see it and experience it in my contacts with the boys of today. In a recent article on the liquor situation in our schools and colleges published in Harper's I suggested some of my own personal convictions as to the reasons why there is less drinking among our school and college boys than formerly. I had in mind their idealism, which is seemingly so much higher than that of the older generation. Mr. Martin in Life rather sneeringly refers to this as "dry declamation." But any headmaster can relate numerous experiences to support this contention, and, so far as I know, all my personal friends in this profession share the views which Dr. Abbott and I hold.

One point I think should be emphasized as supplementary to what Dr. Abbott has said in this article. While we are confident of the high idealism of the boys of today and of their effort to find a better life and attain a higher goal, the everlasting and selfish hammering of an older generation with distinctly lower ideals upon their impressionable minds may eventually thwart them in the attainment of the desired end. I have seen this happen in individual cases, and I am fearful lest the influence may spread. If the older group, which seeks so noisily to support an untenable position and, with a strange and almost gloating selfishness, seems to exult in the mistakes of the youngsters, would leave our boys and girls alone I should have no fears for the future. It is rather significant, and a bit tragic, that high-minded boys today will tell you frankly that they dread far more the temptations which beset them in the vacation periods on their return to their homes than they do those, which used to be considered hard enough, in the swirl of school and college life.

Andover, Mass., December 9 Alfred E. Stearns, Principal, Phillips Academy

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Dr. Abbott's article is good, timely, and he is right in his estimate of modern boyhood.

Hightstown, N. J., December 14 R. W. Swetland,
Headmaster, Peddie School

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: To every statement and belief of Mr. Abbott I most respectfully sign my approval and belief. The life of this school expresses, or tries to, something more of the intimate and family relationship between boys and older people than is possible in a school of larger numbers. It is my personal feeling that the growth of larger schools, or the growth of small schools to larger under the demand of the present time, does not offset the impersonal element that would seem to be developing in certain sections of the country because of the breaking down of the intimate everyday life of the home. If boys "need very careful handling, need all the love and affection that a man can give them," then I feel that there is an increasing need for schools where each boy may be known and may be considered as an individual. This, however, is purely a personal opinion based upon a heritage of an old school which began when family life was vital, simple, and more intimate than it would seem to be at the present day.

Washington, Conn., December 12 Hamilton Gibson,
Headmaster, Gunnery School

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I read with great interest Dr. Abbott's address in regard to the present generation of boys. I am in accord with his conclusions and his estimate of the modern boy, though in reaching my own conclusions I might not have followed the same lines. There is an apparent inconsistency between actions and ideals, but this may be explained by the basic reality which I believe characterizes the present generation.

Southborough, Mass., December 13 W. G. Thayer,
Headmaster, St. Mark's School

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have read with keenest interest and appreciation Dr. Mather Abbott's address before the Rotary Club of Trenton, New Jersey, entitled The New Generation. I wish it might reach the hands, and the minds as well, of everybody.

Pomfret, Conn., December 9 Wm. Beach Olmsted,
Headmaster, Pomfret School

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I think Mr. Abbott has stated the case of the boys of the present era very fairly. They are direct and straightforward, and, on the whole, clean and wholesome. Of course there are exceptions, and there always will be. My observations of boys over a period of twenty-nine years at Morristown encouraged me very much as to their general dependability. The boys who have graduated at Morristown during that period are almost without exception making a creditable contribution to the life and work of their generation; and what more can be asked?

It was my fundamental principle to be simple and direct with boys and to expect the same from them, and I was seldom disappointed. At Morristown they shared directly the responsibility in many phases of the school life, and in this way gained valuable experience for adjusting to the changed conditions of life about them—which they accepted as normal and natural, having known nothing else. And as I have seen the girls, I feel much the same about them. I am entirely an optimist for the future.

Jamaica Plain, Mass., December 15 Arthur P. Butler,
Former Headmaster, Morristown School

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I don't believe the boys of today are any worse than we were; perhaps they are better; but to call them five times as decent, truthful, and manly is, to my thinking, absurd. The difficulty is that they need to be five times as decent, truthful, and manly. The fact that I stayed at home and did a good deal of reading when I was sixteen, did not go to the movies or the theater, or on automobile parties was nothing to my credit, because I had no such temptation. The boy of today needs vastly more character and self-control than we did a generation ago.

The old police regulations of religion have gone but I believe that the boy of today is as religious in a true sense as the boy of the last generation. His reasoning is both good and bad. He goes deeper in his questionings and analyses, but he is also able to find reasons for unworthy actions more readily than we could. We discussed things in a way that was wholly unwholesome. Now the girls and boys discuss such things in the open, together. This requires more self-control; and, while it brings disaster in some cases, it has its healthy side.

Of course the boys in my day did not drink while they were at home; but when they went away to school and college they drank many times more than the boys do today. I tremble to think what would have happened to us if we had had the automobile. On the other hand, when a boy drinks today he does it with a new defiance, which has its own results.

The long and short of it is that I regard the modern boy as rather better than the boy of my day, but I am greatly concerned for him because he needs to be many times better than we needed to be. Another Headmaster

Somewhere in New England, December 8

Books, Music, Plays

Poems

By CLINCH CALKINS

Come Tired Young Women

Come tired young women,
The first snow is falling,
This is the enfolding season.
Wrap yourselves away from the exhausting earth.

In spring earth must sow,
And small rest in spring's passionate sleeping,
And in summer she tills and in fall pays her wages in weeping.

Come tired young women,
The first snow is falling.
In the first falling snow wrap yourselves away.

The Arms of Grief

The arms of Grief are very strong,
His vigor swift, his passion long.
A woman tired in heart and limb
Should not lie down to rest with him.

First Glance

WHEN Frank Moore Colby died not long ago I was one of many who were told by his friends that I should have been better acquainted with his essays than I was. Having now read "The Colby Essays," two volumes which by their editor, Clarence Day, Jr. (Harper: $7.50), are said to contain the best of Colby, I am acutely aware how much I missed; and indeed it is difficult to understand how anyone who cared for good writing could have missed these things. But I understand why it was that Colby never achieved popularity. Though he liked to defend the people against highbrows and reformers, he meant by "the people" himself and a few other persons whom he knew well; he was not given to expressing opinions about things he could study only at second hand. And anyhow it was the highbrows and reformers he talked about—arguing from the way they wrote that they could hardly possess more information than they showed sense. Could the man on the street, either, have got much satisfaction out of this typical conclusion to an essay called The Reading Public? "Taking people as they are, considering whom they marry, and what they eat and how they live and what they say and how they say it, we must in common sense conclude that their literary taste is the least thing that is the matter with them."

Colby seems not to have cared a rap how many readers he got, or whether they agreed with him. "It is pleasant to argue," he said, "but hideous to convince." He retired with his wit into a cool, private corner where he quietly amused himself by annotating the bosh that others wrote. Like his junior Mr. Mencken, whom evidently he liked, he had "something of a collector's mania" for specimens of editorial asininity. He regularly clipped and preserved the solemn paragraphs he found in British journals of opinion, and he was not without occupation, of course, as he went through periodicals nearer home. It is hard to determine whether he despised a certain kind of editor, and a certain kind of writer on "big" themes having to do with Women and Morals and the Public Taste, less or more than he despised senators and college presidents. But at any rate it was the utterances of these scribes that gave him his cues; he might never have written had not his contemporaries written badly. He saved his wrath particularly—and yet wrath is not the word for this man whose tongue cut so coldly—for "collapsible opinions, that is to say, those large, ownerless public thoughts which almost any one will display on a public occasion, but which deflate instantly in solitude or in the comparative candor of private conversation." He always found the right word for those responsible journalists who handle human society as if it were "the tenderest of little potted flowers, watered by weekly or monthly tears, surviving by a miracle during the intervals of magazine publication." He was far from denying the imperfections of the world, but these were summed up for him in the cheapness which he found to be characteristic of human nature generally. So he will not be popular. Though he never said an untrue thing, and though he always expressed himself with a forthright felicity, he never hoped for what can never happen. He never hoped, for instance, that most of the magazines in the world would see that they had nothing to talk about and cease tomorrow.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Compendium of Imperialism

Imperialism and World Politics. By Parker Thomas Moon. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

SO much has been talked and written about imperialism in recent years that it is strange to find in the English language no adequate and comprehensive treatment of the subject until the appearance of this work by Professor Moon. The competitive acquisition, through force, diplomacy, peaceful penetration, purchase, and other methods, of colonies, protectorates, and other landed properties, by most of the Great Powers, and some little ones, has visibly or secretly underlain the activities of modern nations in all their dealings with one another. On this account Professor Moon has rendered a great, indeed an indispensable service to students of world history and politics.

Though modern imperialism, as a creed or an enthusiasm, may be said to have organized in the fertile breast of Benjamin Disraeli, empire-making in planless detail had long been going on. The fully conscious competitive process began, however, in the eighties, when France and Germany became aware of the huge lead which Great Britain had obtained in all quarters of the globe, and when the economic pressures for foreign trade, investments, and development of backward countries became urgent motives of national economy. The struggle for the exploitation of the Congo Basin and East Africa in the eighties marked more clearly the new consciousness of the meaning of empire and the discords it created among the competing governments. Professor Moon, after some preliminary analysis of origins and motives, takes us on a great world tour, which begins with "the five Africas," proceeds to the Turkish and other provinces of the Near East, then treats of the Anglo-Russian rivalry in the Middle East, and after an illuminating chapter on India under British occupation passes to the struggle of the Western Powers and of Japan for concessions in the Far East. A keen analysis of United States policy in Central and South America follows, and a chapter upon the "Mandates" throws light upon the new professions of what may be called inter-imperialism.

There are three great merits in this book. First, it presents a full and well-documented history of the imperialist processes. Second, it gives a geographical and populational survey of the part played by the several imperialist Powers, accompanied by reliable statistics and maps. Third, it discusses in a keenly appreciative manner the causes and effects of imperialism from the standpoint of the imperialist and the subject peoples. With conspicuous success the author exhibits the close and continuous interplay of business and politics, in particular the submissive way in which governments have used their diplomatic and armed power to promote the profitable schemes of traders and financiers. But Professor Moon well appreciates the complexity of motives which operate in imperialism—disinterested religious and philanthropic enthusiasms hobnobbing with patriotism, profiteering, and buccaneering in a Livingstone, a Rhodes, or a Roosevelt. He rightly assigns the determinant role in most modern instances to the organized national or international groups of exporters, importers, bankers, and shipowners who know what they want and mean to get it. The whole gamut of imperialist tones and undertones from "spheres of interest," "influence," and "hinterlands" to "protectorate" and "colony" is subjected to a nice study. The whole treatment is conducted in a calm, scientific spirit, and forms a most important contribution to a larger understanding of national and international politics. J. A. Hobson

The Fame of Anatole France

Anatole France: The Degeneration of a Great Artist. By Barry Cerf. The Dial Press. $4.

Rambles with Anatole France. By Sandor Kemeri. J. B. Lippincott Company. $5.

THE fame of Anatole France is obviously open to an attack, but hardly to one of the sort which Mr. Cerf launches against him. The unorthodox character of France's moral philosophy was surely patent enough to render unnecessary even the elucidation which it received at the beginning of his career, and at this late date it is scarcely effective to label him a sensualist and a cynic. His fame was the fame of an artist, won in the teeth of moral opposition, and it is not likely that those who were impotent against him then should triumph now. If he failed it was only as an artist that he failed, and it is not as an artist primarily that Mr. Cerf assails him.

He does indeed point out that France was capable of a sentimentality which ill accords with his explicit philosophy and that he never took the trouble to think his way through the monstrous inconsistency involved in combining socialistic enthusiasm with a pessimistic insistence upon the impossibilty of human improvement; but the center of Mr. Cerf's argument is always moral. Anatole France, we are informed, was a skeptic too indolent to seek the truth; a voluptuary "who knew women not as mothers but as instruments to allay sensual passion"; and a writer whose doctrine "withers the stock from which charactor springs." He failed to perceive that stoicism and Christianity are "two of the most adequate approaches to virtue yet devised by man"; he sought knowledge for amusement rather than improvement; and he did nothing to promote "the establishment in the world of sound ethical principles, which every man must abide by, on pain of being ostracized as unsocial." He was, in a word, Anatole France.

Yet surely that is exactly what, as an artist, it was his right—even his duty—to be. Even when the world shall have got a great deal closer than now it is to "the establishment of sound ethical principles" cynicism and sensuality will still be the dominant notes in one possible reaction to life, and hence also in one of the possible moods of art, whose glory it is to be as infinitely varied as mankind. If he failed, he failed not because he was a sensualist and a cynic but because the indolence which accompanied his sensuality and his cynicism kept him aloof from the hurly-burly of his times and forbade him the effort to express his conviction in forms which should have a contemporary validity; because he was content to remain a contemporary of Petronius and of Voltaire, speaking their language and seldom straying far from the world of their ideas, in spite of the fact that the modern world has its forms of cynicism and sensuality which a great cynic and a great sensualist might find. His works too obviously resembled other classics ever to become classics in their turn, and that is the worst than can be said of them.

Nor is misdirection the only flaw in Mr. Cerf's extended study. Whoever would attack Anatole France with any prospect of success must write almost as well in his own way as France does in his, and this the present author fails lamentably to do anywhere in the course of his labored and repetitious analysis. With laudable zeal he undertakes, for example, to prove how pernicious is the dictum (borrowed by France from Montaigne) that "to die for an ideal is to attach a very high price to conjectures"; but here as everywhere one's sympathy goes instinctively out to so gaudy a butterfly upon so ponderous a wheel. "There is a certain impertinence in letting oneself be burned for an opinion," adds Anatole France, and the dazzling effect of the simple statement remains undimmed by all the solemn reproof which follows. Any destructive criticism is foredoomed to failure where the quotations stand out, as here they do, like green oases in an arid desert. Perhaps M. Cerf is righter than Anatole France, but at least he is no match for him.

After "Madame" had died in 1910 Mme George Bölöni, a Hungarian woman who wrote under the name of Sandor Kemeri, came to take the dictation of Anatole France and to act also as his companion. For him she entertained a romantic adoration, and from the conversational crumbs which fell to her lot her book is made. One will not find in it any of the critical insight which has marked several of the somewhat similar volumes of reminiscence which have recently appeared, for the hero-worship of the author is obviously incapable of that; but one will find instead a series of vignettes—France at the Book Shop, France in Rome, and France at lunch with his one-time enemy Rodin—which have a certain charm. At its worst the "Rambles" is inclined to be gushing; at its best it is genuinely entertaining.

Joseph Wood Krutch

Quixotic Platonism

Preface to a Life. By Zona Gale. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

BEAUTY, so stylists used to tell us, is not too rashly to be invoked by name. Instead let the poet describe the beautiful thing. Or better, perhaps, instead of trying to describe the face that launched a thousand ships, let him describe its effect on two old men of Troy, and make a deathless myth of beauty.

But Greece gave us Plato as well as Homer, and the hero of Miss Gale's new novel loves abstractions better than their concrete embodiments. Instead of embracing the woman he loves, he tells her ecstatically that he sees through her—sees The You, just as he sees through flowers: "The lilacs, they're not real. They're cut out, cut out in lilac pattern, and something beautiful that's beyond shows through—it's like a hole in a curtain, and we look through! . . . Alla, you're a pattern, cut out, you know. And just now I saw—but shaped like you—all the beauty beyond. . . . "

Of course his family and neighbors and Alla herself think this sort of thing madness; and it is very foolish of them to think that a man who sees more than they do, who sees through appearances to reality, is mad. We may tarry with Miss Gale to ask what reality is—chiefly multiplicity, I gather from Bernard Mead's visions, since when he looks at the trees in his yard he sees: "The trees—the tree, trillions, sextillions, nonillions, what came next? all standing growing, putting forth leaves, harboring birds. . . . Birds, he grew dizzy with birds—multitudes of wings, folded or flying, multitudes. . . . " We may tarry with Bernard Mead's visions of reality, or we may turn back to the story for illumination.

In an unwary moment Mead had slipped into a tepid engagement with a Paris gown wrapped around a piece of soggy dough, and the next day he fell in love with a charming young woman. There are other things more important than love, he observes, a proposition that is nicely arguable when one is not considering marriage, but it was precisely marriage that Bernard was considering.

"He muttered: 'I don't want to live without you. The point is—what of that?' She cried: 'What's life for if it isn't for love?'" And here perhaps she should have said: "Why do two people live together in sexual intercourse, if not for love?" But she didn't, and so Miss Gale could have her hero answer: "That's the stage where we've all stuck. And yet—'Loved I not honor more'—they'll swallow that stuff. Doesn't it apply anywhere else? Except in going to the 'wars'."

Mead loves honor more. And so he forces the woman he loves, and who loves him, to live lonely all her life so that he can also force himself and the woman he marries to live equally lonely and unloved. He embraces for his life-work the lumber business that he hates, because he has permitted his dying father to extort from him a promise to do so. And about the time he reaches fifty-one he seems to the neighbors to go to pieces. People sometimes do. Decorous old maids have been known to assault defenseless men in the street. And it almost seems as if Bernard Mead, in trying to pierce too abruptly through appearances to reality, assaults the life he has denied.

If what he finds when he breaks through is as unsatisfactory as most of the messages that have thus far come from the spirit world, this is doubtless due to the complete incomprehensibility of a world in which people are born only to grow old and die. For that is the world Mead knows, the world that one usually knows when one reduces things to abstractions. He is filled with pity as he thinks of the futility of the life lived by his aging mother and his aging aunts and his aging wife and his soon-to-be-aging and generally no-account children. One turns from this weeping philosophy to admire the skill with which Miss Gale presents the small foibles of the unloved and unlovely persons of her story, all to be transformed by the mystical eye of Bernard into patterns of some universal beauty.

I have given one interpretation. The reader will see his opportunity for creative reading, a passive but none the less an exciting role, when I confess that I think Miss Gale inclines to another, that she sees Mead's story as a spiritual victory wrested from unhappy circumstances. "He looked up into the hot darkness where there was nothing sinister, but something soft and kind—Himself, perhaps, extending on and up. . . . It was the goddess in whom no one any longer believed, it breathed deeply and it waited, it was carrying its children to some birth."

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Ask the Whale; He Knows

The Yankee Whaler. By Clifford W. Ashley. Houghton Mifflin Company. $20.

A QUARTER of a century ago the sailor was presented to us in print as a round-faced, jolly little man who spent his off moments in hitching up his trousers, doing a hornpipe across the deck, and singing out "Heave ho!" and "Avast there, my hearties!" while into his active hours was crammed pristine and lurid adventure more tightly than sardines are ever packed into the traditional tin. It was a slim year that didn't yield a sailor a mutiny or so, a couple of attacks by pirates, and at least one shipwreck.

When, early in the present century, sociological fiction came into fashion this Gilbert and Sullivan sea was invaded by writers who had less to say of high adventure than of lowly bouts with such prosaic facts as hard work, miserable quarters, bad food, and degrading treatment. It has remained for still more recent writers to give the public an inkling that a sailor's hardships are as much spiritual as material; that one who is looking for thrills should ship in the movies rather than before the mast; that those who follow the sea for a livelihood know it chiefly for its loneliness, its eventlessness, its tedium, its imposition of a routine as inflexible as that of the most Fordized factory ashore. All of which was far more acute fifty and a hundred years ago—America's great era at sea—than it is today.

And now have we reached another fashion in sea books? Apparently so. The striking revival of interest in the almost extinct square-rigger, in the great days of our clipper merchantmen and greasy whalers, is leading to a new romanticism, a tendency to accentuate the poetry, the glamor, the beauty of those days to the exclusion of the brutality, the degradation, and the boredom.

It is worth saying this in connection with Mr. Ashley's beautiful volume not because it is sentimental slush but because it is for the most part a faithful, first-hand pictorial and literary record which will undoubtedly take a place among the few authentic books on a once great American industry. It is fair to the reader, therefore, to point out the writer's tendency toward romanticization, and Mr. Ashley has in a way courted such criticism by his own attack upon the authenticity of the whaling accounts of E. Ross Brown and Frank T. Bullen.

Mr. Ashley is a painter first and a writer secondarily. Of whaling ancestry, he spent some months more than twenty years ago aboard a New Bedford whaling bark off the coast of Africa, taking notes of what he saw in picture and text. Since then he has been almost continuously at work making a pictorial record of the whaling industry of New Bedford, as pleasing artistically as it is valuable from the standpoint of history. "My task came to a close," he says a little sadly, "when the Charles W. Morgan was towed out of the harbor and there were no whalers left to paint." Most of this artistic wealth is reproduced in the present volume, which, besides numerous line drawings in black and white, contains more than a hundred plates, nearly a score of them in color. The book is far and away the fullest and finest pictorial record of the New England whaling industry that has appeared or, it is safe to say, ever will appear. For reasons sad to recall it never can happen again.

It is not unnatural that the text should be somewhat less comprehensive and satisfactory than the pictures. Perhaps the most valuable chapters are those on gear and craft, and on scrimshaw. Here Mr. Ashley's trained artistic eye makes him an unusually good interpreter. Scrimshaw is the old whaleman's word for the useful and curious objects which he wrought during long voyages out of whales' teeth or bones and adorned to suit his fancy. Mr. Ashley calls scrimshaw "the only important indigenous folk art, except that of the Indians, we have ever had in America."

Having accused Mr. Ashley of romanticizing the New England whaling fishery, it is only fair to quote an instance:

"Some day man may fashion a machine more beautiful than a full-rigged ship," he writes in his concluding chapter; "some day a cleaner craft than the Yankee whaleboat may be evolved; but there never will be a braver and sturdier race of men bred in this world than the officers of that vanished fleet. There is one other thing that is certain: if ever there is to be fairer and better hunting than the chase of the sperm whale, man will have to go to other worlds to find it."

One may pass the first sentence as a rhetorical expression of the author's affections, but the second ought not to go by without a referendum to the whales. Man has never engaged in a fair contest with any animal. He would be a fool if he did, and as an evolutionary animal man has never been a fool. His ascendancy over other beasts rests largely on his refusal to fight them except when favored by vastly superior odds. Nor has he scrupled to be as cruel as necessary—often considerably more so—to win. Personally I agree with F. V. Morley, who in a recent book in conjunction with J. S. Hodgson on "Whaling North and South" says, in comparing new methods with old, that the modern capture by exploding a bomb in a whale's lungs "is far less cruel and consequently preferable." Anyhow, I insist that on this point the victim be allowed the deciding word. Ask the whale; he knows.

ARTHUR WARNER

The Metaphysics of Mussolini

Contemporary Thought in Italy. By Angelo Crespi. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

AMONG other interesting things this timely volume explains the metaphysics of Mussolini, the philosophy of Fascism. Il Duce's aggressive nationalism is a form of ego-centered idealism, a reaction against the abstract and intellectual trend of ancient and medieval realism which goes back to Plato and has attained its supreme triumph in Dante's mystical vision. Instead of a supra-mundane paradise the modern leader promises to his countrymen a real paradise on the Peninsula, an immediate Utopia brought about by a "new liberalism which recognizes as a real and free individual only the one in whom the superior interests of the community and the sovereign will of the state are pulsing. This new liberalism is a collective movement; an idea animating a whole mass, an idea which has become a passion, because it is the energetic self-expression of a whole personality."

Here Gentile, the official philosopher of Fascism, sums the matter up as self-realization, not through a plurality of personalities, as in democracy, but through the acts of the transcendental ego as the world's self-consciousness. In such a scheme there is no room for individual liberty and personality, for the true reality and freedom of the individual is that which he gains by losing himself in something else. "My personality is not suppressed, but uplifted, strengthened, enlarged by being merged and restored in that of the family, the state, the spirit."

All this sounds very fine, but Gentile exposed the true inwardness of his "actual" idealism when in his Palermo speech of 1924 he stated that "every force is moral force in so far as capable of influencing the will, whatever be the argument applied, the sermon or the cudgel." The philosophy of Fascism, then, is a philosophy of force. It may be called idealism, but it begins with castor oil and ends with the black-jack. Its early converts were gained by a process of purgation, its later by physical suasion; witness the fate of Senator Matteotti and of the philosopher Amendola, who was reported as dying of "consumption" superinduced by a walk he happened to take with a group of young Fascisti. With these things in mind the author of this book summarizes the matter thus: "Fascism, which through some of its leading mouthpieces claims to be not merely the overcoming and transcending of the liberal and democratic state, such as emerged from 'the stupid nineteenth century', but also a new culture and a new religion, has so far, both in theory and in practice, been merely an orgy of bombastic negations, a chaotic mixture of Asiatic despotism, Renaissance amoralism, and Prussian state worship on the one hand and of the self-intoxicating cult of the passing impulse, of unrestrained violence as the highest form of individual, of party and national self-realization on the other."

Gentile, as has been pointed out, is the manufacturer of many of the high-sounding phrases uttered by Mussolini. But where did Gentile obtain the speculative basis of his thought? The answer is from his teacher, Benedetto Croce, known to us chiefly for his theories of aesthetics, but here the proponent of a form of historical idealism which has for years been seeping into the minds of young Italy. Master and pupil have since split; in fact, Croce's house was recently sacked by a Neapolitan Fascist mob; yet there remains a real connection between the two. Croce's political philosophy contains implicitly the conclusions drawn by Gentile. Admitting that the state is and must be the most useful, efficient, and comprehensive expression of the best life, Croce proceeds to identify it with government and to consider it as identical with society. Now reverse these propositions and see what happens. If society is identical with the state, if the state is identical with the government, and if the government ends with being identical with a dynasty, or an oligarchy, or a party, or a group, or a man, how shall it be possible to differentiate between ethics and politics, between what is moral duty and what is merely desirable?

Signor Crespi has performed a distinct service in presenting both the origins and the implications of that Italian neo-idealism which eventuates in Fascism as the apotheosis of uncriticized and uncriticizable self-assertion. But he goes even further; he points out that the Italian neo-idealism is a variant of that pestilent neo-Hegelianism, that metaphysics of militarism, which bolstered up the claims of Teutonic world dominion.

WOODBRIDGE RILEY

Interesting Books of 1926

CHOSEN BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Israfel. By Hervey Allen. Doran.
George Washington. By W. E. Woodward. Boni and Liveright.
Guy De Maupassant. By Ernest Boyd. Knopf.
The Memoirs of William Hickey. Vol. IV. Knopf.
My Past and Thoughts. By Alexander Herzen. Vol. V. Knopf.
Our Times. By Mark Sullivan. Vol. II. Scribner.
The Mauve Decade. By Thomas Beer. Knopf.
Transition. By Edwin Muir. Viking.
Notes on Democracy. By H. L. Mencken. Knopf.
Prejudices: Fifth Series. By H. L. Mencken. Knopf.
The Art of Being Ruled. By Wyndham Lewis. Harper.
Personality. By R. G. Gordon. Harcourt, Brace.
Three American Plays. By Laurence Stallings and Maxwell Anderson. Harcourt, Brace.
The Dybbuk. By S. Ansky. Boni and Liveright.
The Collected Poems of Ezra Pound. Boni and Liveright.
The Time of Man. By Elizabeth Madox Roberts. Viking.
The Casuarina Tree. By W. Somerset Maugham. Doran.
Tarr. By Wyndham Lewis. Knopf.
The Romantic Comedians. By Ellen Glasgow. Doubleday, Page.
My Mortal Enemy. By Willa Cather. Knopf.
Two or Three Graces. By Aldous Huxley. Doran.
The Ninth Wave. By Carl Van Doren. Harcourt.
Nize Baby. By Milt Gross. Doran.

Books in Brief

Benjamin Franklin, the First Civilized American. By Phillips Russell. Brentano's. $5.

This reviewer does not know who Mr. Russell is, but it is a safe inference that his literary training is the result of newspaper work, for the trail of the newspaper runs right through this ambitious, handsomely illustrated life of Franklin. It is superficial, uncritical, written in journalese that lapses frequently into slang, and fairly dripping with "human interest." One feels, in reading it, that a bright young newspaper man set out to write a good long article about Franklin for one of the popular magazines, and after he had started it turned itself into a 323-page book. In this Sunday-feature-story atmosphere salaciousness is deftly introduced by bringing in grave and naughty productions of Franklin's pen, such as "Advice to a Young Man on the Choice of a Mistress" and "Polly Baker's Defense." Somehow, in the handling of the subject the luminous power of Franklin's mind and his constructive instinct are almost lost sight of—and in the end our impression is that French ladies sat on Franklin's knees and that he had illegitimate children. Yet, despite these shortcomings, Mr. Russell's book is very readable and very entertaining.

Music

Music and Common Sense—II

IN the first part of this article[1] I gave my reasons for believing that even the simplest language could not make the musical relations which it described, or a judgment of these relations, intelligible to one who had not had direct experience of these musical relations. I shall now apply my reasons to an example of such writing.

Our critic[2] is speaking of Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Handel, and he reasons that "For a composer to set down a theme . . . and then solemnly to put it through ten or a dozen little acrobatic tricks seems a little too naive to be even funny." Here the technical term variation is translated into the more accessible acrobatic trick which common sense—the critic's and his lay reader's—can judge to be too naive, etc.

This is, however, quite deceptive. For one thing, by identifying musical variation with acrobatic trick one does not convey to the lay reader the thing the variation is; what he understands is not the musical variation but whatever in ordinary experience is connoted or denoted by the expression "acrobatic trick," as he would realize if he allowed himself to be misled into actually hearing a set of variations, particularly the Brahms set in question, and tried to discover in the proceedings what he had been led to think he was familiar with. And so, in the second place, he cannot question the correctness of the identification; but, having accepted the identification, he must accept the judgment it carries with it.[3] While, therefore, he thinks he is using his own common sense to judge the musical procedure, in fact he is doing nothing of the kind; without knowing it, he is accepting a judgment already made for him by our critic, a judgment, in the third place, which he understands only as it applies to the acrobatic trick to which alone common sense is applicable.

For the conventions that constitute musical procedure are not dictated by common sense or regulated by it. Common sense would perhaps hold that after a theme had acquired a wardrobe in the development section of a sonata-allegro movement (to put it as our critic might) it should not be trotted out naked again; but actually themes are restated in original form without, by that fact alone, spoiling things. What determined the placing of the theme in this context, and what still determines whether or not it shall be so placed, was not logical but purely musical fitness, which is in fact what governs all musical practice—past practice, from which have crystallized the general outlines of the forms as we know them; and present practice, in which even these outlines change in deference to content. A form cannot, then, in the first place, be judged as an abstraction; it must be judged, if at all, in the only form in which it may be said to exist—namely, as it is bodied forth by the actual music for which it provides the occasion; which means that it must be judged anew in each new embodiment. And when, in the second place, such an embodiment is judged, it must be as music, and not, therefore, by common sense. It is—to return to our first example—only the particular set of variations by Brahms that can be judged, and then only as music. At most (and even then at its worst) our critic's reasoning can, properly, only stand for a musical judgment: that Brahms's Variations are in a class with those of Proch for agile sopranos; in other words, that they are so poor in musical substance as to reveal the bare, pitifully absurd formal skeleton which better music would conceal.

I say "properly" because there is also an "improperly" to take note of. For it is possible to take our critic's writing as illustrating the critical process not as it should be but as it is. For one thing, the musical judgment is nearly always deflected and corrupted by irrelevancies; and here, instead of the customary indigestion, we may have common sense in the form of an a priori intellectual prejudice against a particular musical form. Either that, or common sense may be dragged in a posteriori to adorn the victim. For, in general, once the judgment has been arrived at, no matter how, the critic begins to consider his audience. For the Dial he is an artist in prose; for the New York World he is a regular fellow or a lowbrow or hardboiled. And indeed, for the lay readers of the Dial he remains only an artist in prose, for those of the World only a lowbrow or a hardboiled egg. It is the musically experienced person who treats him as a critic of music—who penetrates to the all but total absence of original musical judgment in the bloated prose;[4] to the judgment that could be dispensed with in the condescending cuteness of the regular fellow; to the ignorance of the lowbrow; or to the utter feebleness behind the swagger and bravado of the one who would be hardboiled.

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama

On Dramatizations

NO first-rate novel ever made an equally good play. The very qualities which made it great as a novel—the amplitude of its action and the cumulative effect of its innumerable details—render impossible the task of compressing it within the narrow limits of the stage, for the stage demands a compacter action and a more summary characterization. However skilfully the adapter may select the essence of the action, it seems in its compressed form to move with a disconcerting rapidity; and however surely he may seize upon the most salient details of the characterization, he is compelled to heighten them unnaturally in order to compensate for the innumerable subsidiary strokes with which the novelist built up his effect but which he must leave out. A satisfactory play made from the materials of a novel would have to remold them so completely as to produce an independent work which the maker would be justified in calling his own, for in the arts there is no such thing as a simple transference from one form to another, and a mere dramatization is inevitably either a series of detached illustrations or a synopsis with all the characteristic defects of a synopsis. It is never full-blooded and complete.

To this general rule there is, I think, no single exception, and though the dramatization which Jaques Copeau and Jean Croué made from "The Brothers Karamazov" (Guild Theater) is probably as fine as any possible one, it is no adequate substitute for the great and turbulent novel from which it is taken. It is obvious that these dramatists have aimed high. Their purpose was to produce an independent work, not merely a series of visualized scenes selected from the book, and they have, indeed, achieved a certain continuity; but they cannot

[1] The Nation, December 8.

[2] Mr. Deems Taylor.

[3] There is also Mr. Ernest Newman, who translates the harmonic texture of the "Poem of Ecstasy"—the Scriabine discords without resolution—in combination with its structure, which includes the several climaxes and recessions of any large form, into "a series of harmonic startings that are always checked just on the verge of realization," and this in turn into "a long aphrodisiacal convulsion" which is, inevitably, too obscene to be played.

[4] Mr. Rosenfeld, for the most part, does not judge; he describes. In his descriptions of the older composers there are sometimes judgments as well; but like the descriptions they are the current judgments of these composers—even to the errors these include—which appear to be original because the vividness of the paraphrase causes them to strike us with new force. In dealing with his contemporaries, Mr. Rosenfeld is usually content to give a first work a typically lurid and inflated description, or to find a later work to be less or more this-or-that than the earlier one.

possibly crowd the effect of Dostoevsky's vast action into the brief period of one evening. Too much that is necessary for the complete understanding of the why and the wherefore is inevitably left out—things happen too fast to be adequately prepared for, and events succeed other events too rapidly to allow time for any adequate appreciation of their significance. The vast roar of anguish which echoes through the book sounds here at times like a shrill falsetto, and because the play never succeeds in casting Dostoevsky's magic spell we watch the contortions of the characters without ever entering fully into their souls.

Even the players, admirable as in certain respects the performances of some of them are, fail, I suspect, to feel that passionate conviction of the desperation of their predicament and the inevitability of their acts which the characters of Dostoevsky habitually feel, and to realize how significant is that fact one need only remember that no writer was ever less detached than Dostoevsky or ever permitted less detachment on the part of his readers. He did not so much create his characters from observation as project them out of himself, creating each in the image of one of the multiform personalities which warred within him, and suffering with each because each was himself. It is just the mark of his peculiar power that he not only shows us his world, tortured almost to madness, but that he actually leads us into it; and yet upon the stage this whole effect is altered. Too much which served in the novel to generate the mood that rendered the characters and their creator emotionally comprehensible, that made their scruples and their passions seem significant, is necessarily omitted; judging them as we must by the light of our own common day their conflicts seem often shadowy and the violent alterations of their temper incomprehensible. Dostoevsky's art is essentially romantic in the sense that it is, both for himself and for his readers, an intimate personal experience, and the present dramatization fails of complete success just because it fails to make the play that. We watch it and we strive to comprehend, but it remains alien and, in the deepest sense, incomprehensible. Both "The Brothers Karamazov" and "Crime and Punishment" are complete wholes which cease to have a really valid existence as soon as they cease to have the form which their creator gave them. They have lost their atmosphere, and in losing that they have lost everything.

"In Abraham's Bosom" (Provincetown Theater) is the first full-length play by the young Southerner Paul Green, whose short pieces have won much praise. It is full of rich material and it is acted by a company, composed for the most part of Negroes, with the wholehearted conviction characteristic of the race. Unfortunately, however, its structure is too uncertain to raise it above the level of highly interesting prentice work. Cast in the form of a biography in seven scenes (at best an unsatisfactory dramatic scheme) it fails to have a continuously cumulative interest; in spite of a fine beginning and a fine end it continually suggests the fact that its author has not fully grasped the outline of his hero's drama as distinguished from the chronological outline of his life. "The Devil in the Cheese" (Charles Hopkins Theater) is a dream fantasia with some amusing moments in spite of the fact that the characterization is amateurish and the logic of the play very nearly as flimsy as the logic of the dream.

Neither "The Nightingale" (Jolson Theater) nor the "Vanities" (Earl Carroll Theater) is quite up to the highest standard of such entertainments. The first, an operetta dealing with the life of Jenny Lind, is thinner both in book and score than the best of the other Shubert offerings in the same genre, and the second is neither so lavish nor so fast as it might be. Several performers formerly of Charlot's Revue add some mild humor, and though this is the third successive year that I have heard Moran and Mack discuss the psychology of the early worm and why black horses eat more than white, their dialogue is still by far the most amusing thing in the performance.

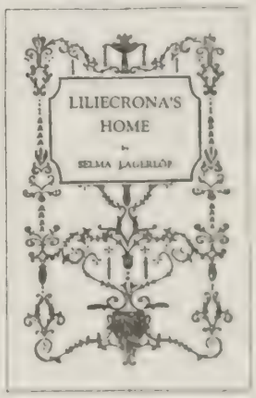
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

The course is open to graduates of colleges and universities of recognized standing.

Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.

Special courses will be arranged for social workers in accordance with their needs.



For information, address the

Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL
For
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)
210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

LILIECRONA'S HOME, by SELMA LAGERLÖF

A charming story of peasant life in Värmland

by the only woman to win the Nobel Prize
$2.00

E. P. DUTTON and COMPANY
681 FIFTH AVE. NEW YORK

EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP IN THE UNITED STATES

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS SECTION
PRINCETON UNIVERSITY.

Published July, 1926. Second Printing, January, 1927.

An authoritative book on a subject of increasing importance to executives, labor leaders and students of industrial relations. In twenty-four companies alone over a half billion of stock has been bought or subscribed for by employees. Prepared by the Industrial Relations Section, a separately endowed part of the Department of Economics and Social Institutions of Princeton University.

Price, Cloth, $2.00. Paper, $1.50. 174 pp.

Industrial Relations Section
Princeton, New Jersey.

International Relations Section

The Chinese Revolution

THE interview with General Chiang Kai-shek, commander-in-chief of the Chinese Nationalist army, from which extracts are printed below, was given to Bruno Schwartz and appeared in the Hankow Herald for November 23, 1926.

"What are your plans with regard to the form of government China will have after the revolution is completed?" I asked General Chiang.

"The new government will be based entirely upon the policy laid down in 'The Three Peoples Principles' by Dr. Sun Yat-sen," he replied. "It will be a committee form of government along the same lines as exists in Russia today."

"What are your intentions with regard to seeking recognition from the Foreign Powers?" I next asked General Chiang.

"Those who are sympathetic with us will extend us recognition without making demands for privileges in return for extending us recognition," he replied. "Such friendly nations will relinquish all their special privileges and concessions without question, and will recognize us as a friendly Power. Those who still desire to maintain their special privileges and their concessions, and those who are not willing to cooperate with us by denouncing all existing treaties with China as unequal and making new treaties upon a basis of entire equality will be considered by us as unfriendly and we do not care whether they recognize us or not. Existing treaties will come to an end, however, in the immediate future, recognition or no recognition. We want to be friendly with all other nations of the world, but we are out to stamp down imperialism, and no unequal treaties will ever be adhered to by us for the sake of securing recognition from Powers with imperialistic ideas." . . .

"What about your courts of law?" I asked General Chiang. "It is common knowledge to Chinese and foreigners alike that what the present courts dispense is something far from justice, that China has no civil or criminal codes which are worthy of the name, and that so-called justice is in accordance with local custom of each individual village in China; that almost all judges in China live on what they can get out of their jobs (which are usually short lived) and not on their salaries (which are usually not paid); that foreigners in the country would be far from willing to submit to the ruling of this inadequate system, and that their governments would probably be unwilling to make them submit to it as it exists at present."

"We are prepared for that," stated General Chiang in reply. "We have our civil and criminal codes drawn up which we are sure will be satisfactory to all. As the revolution progresses these will be instituted, and they will not only guarantee the foreigner in China justice in accordance with our laws, but will guarantee the Chinese people justice from the foreigner, which is more important. The beating of Chinese with impunity by foreigners and the security of the latter in so doing will be a thing of the past. Foreigners who beat Chinese in future will be punished in accordance with our laws, and such acts will not be looked upon with leniency."

"What do you think of Dr. Wellington Koo's action in abrogating the Sino-Belgian Treaty?"

"Dr. Koo was right," was his prompt reply, "and the abrogation of this treaty is but the first of others to come. No new treaty will be made with Belgium which contains special privileges, and no status quo will be maintained. If Belgium wishes to enter into a new treaty, this government is willing to enter into one with her, but upon an entirely new basis. We will execute no treaties such as were signed by former governments, nor will we continue to adhere to any treaties or agreements which were made with other nations by any government in China previous to that of the Nationalist forces. Nor will we at any time recognize any treaties made now, unless they are over the signature of the Nationalist Government."

"What about extraterritoriality and the foreign concessions?"

"If extraterritoriality continues to exist in China, and if foreign Powers continue to exercise special privileges in this country in the form of administering and owning concessions here under their own laws and outside of the jurisdiction of the Chinese Government, then the present revolution will not be complete until these are entirely abolished. It is just as great a part of the revolutionary movement to abolish extraterritoriality and foreign concessions as it is to stamp out the northern militarists, and this revolution will not come to an end until that has been done."

"Don't you think it would be more satisfactory to all concerned if the relinquishing of special privileges in China were accomplished gradually," I asked, "and that it could be done with mutual satisfaction over a period of years as the Chinese government machinery developed a standard of recognized efficiency?"

"This is not an evolutionary movement," replied General Chiang. "It is revolutionary. There will be no period of years, not one, or two, or three years. We shall have equality, and any treaties which do not give us that equality with other nations of the world will cease to exist as far as we are concerned. There will be no probationary period of waiting from the time the revolution has become a success in so far as our military movement is concerned. There will be no years to wait for the abolition of extraterritoriality and the handing back to China of the concessions. This will be done at once, and foreigners who wish to remain in China are cordially welcome to stay here and be governed by our laws. Nations who wish to trade with us may do so in accordance with our laws. But no one can stay in China and no one can trade in China and still be subject to his own laws alone without reference to the laws of the Chinese Government. The idea of waiting for the abolition of these special and unequal privileges over any period of time does not meet with sympathy on our part, and we shall not submit to any such delay under any circumstances."

"What is your attitude toward the United States and Americans in China?" I asked.

"I like America and Americans," he replied, "and we are glad to have nationals of your country living and trading in China."

"Do you think the form of government in the United States of America would be suitable to future China?"

"No. Your government, in spite of its name as a democratic form of government, tends to be imperialist in nature. Our government, as I have said before, will be founded on 'The Three Peoples Principles.' The fact that you tell me that America is ruled by the people and is therefore a democracy does not make it so. A proper democracy does not hold possessions outside of its own territorial limits, and refuse to the people of those possessions the right to freedom and the right to govern themselves. In so doing we cannot consider America a government which respects the rights of the people, and thus it is imperialist in nature."

"Do you refer to the Philippine Islands?" I asked.

"Exactly so. The United States has no right to maintain its hold upon these islands outside of its territory. They are a separate people and are entitled to the right to govern themselves. . . ."

"What do you think of Christianity and missionaries in China?" I questioned. "Will the Nationalist Government continue to sanction missionary activities in China, or will they be banned?"

"I have no quarrel with Christianity, and missionaries will always be welcome as heretofore. The elimination of missions from China is not part of our program, and they may function in this country without interference as always."

"Will the exploitation of China's natural resources be permitted by foreign companies, and will foreign industrial enterprise and factories be permitted, or is it the intention of the Nationalist Government to favor the promotion of native-owned industries?"

"We will not solicit foreign capital for China. It will always be welcome here. If foreign concerns wish to continue their factories in this country, or to open any other form of industrial enterprise, it will be given our hearty support in exactly the same manner as any Chinese enterprise. But it will only be permitted provided it is profitable to the Chinese people who work in these industries. The welfare of the workers comes first in our scheme of things, equally with the welfare of the enterprise itself."

"By giving the laboring masses as much power as your Government is allowing them at present, and stirring them up by means of propaganda which is so ultra-revolutionary in nature, is it not possible that your labor will eventually attain so much control over your movement that it will dominate you completely and possibly impede your movement when it opposes your own plans?"

"This is also extremely unlikely. We have no fear of our laboring classes. We work with them, and teach them and train them. Our system is for the people, not over the people, and if we continue to lead them right and train them right there will be no fear of opposition. . . ."

"Will your revolution be complete," I asked, "when the militarists in China have been downed, when the concessions are returned to Chinese jurisdiction, and when extraterritoriality shall have been abolished in China? In other words, is it the object of this revolution to carry out its plans within the boundaries of China, or is it molded on the principle of Soviet Russia, to extend its propaganda into other countries? Is this revolution in China the beginning of a world movement on your part, or will you be satisfied if you have removed imperialism and militarism from China?"

"This revolution is not the end, but merely the beginning," was the startling reply of General Chiang Kai-shek. "There are other nations in the world today who are burdened under the yoke of imperialism. It is true that this revolution is now taking place in China, but there are other countries where it must take place as well. Such revolutions, the freedom of other oppressed peoples, will have to come about. China is but one country. There are many more in which imperialism must be crushed before the world will be at peace. . . ."

The Sino-Belgian Treaty

THE official statement issued by the Chinese Government in Peking explaining the termination of the Sino-Belgian Treaty of 1865 is printed below.

The Chinese Government have repeatedly sought through diplomatic channels and international conferences to put an end to the unequal clauses contained in China's treaties with the Powers which seriously restrict the free exercise of her legitimate rights in such important matters as customs tariff, jurisdiction over foreign nationals, etc. These provisions create unilateral rights and derogate from China's sovereignty; they impede the development of her international relations and hamper her political and economic life. Consequently, the Chinese Government have, on the one hand, raised the question of revision of China's unequal treaties at Versailles and Washington as well as at the Special Conference on the Chinese Customs Tariff in Peking and, on the other hand, have consistently refrained from concluding new treaties unless they were based on equality, reciprocity, and mutual respect for territorial sovereignty. Treaties on this new basis have been steadily growing in number: they now include those with Austria, Bolivia, Chile, Finland, Germany, Persia, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

In pursuance of this policy, the Chinese Government are endeavoring to revise the existing treaties which are as a rule terminable by notice after a certain period, so that all unequal and obsolete provisions may be omitted from the new treaties to be negotiated upon the expiration of the specified periods. Accordingly, the Chinese Government proceeded to terminate, after having given six months' notice in advance, the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation concluded between China and Belgium on November 2, 1865—a treaty which, it may be remarked, belongs to the category of treaties imposed upon China against her free will in the early years of her foreign intercourse and which restricts her sovereign rights.

By Article 46 the said treaty is revisable at the expiration of each ten-year period beginning from the date of exchange of ratifications. The Chinese Government, therefore, communicated to the Belgian Government on April 16, 1926, their desire to terminate the Sino-Belgian Treaty on October 27, 1926, in its present form, and proposed to commence negotiations at the earliest possible date for the conclusion of a new treaty. The Belgian Government disagreed with the Chinese interpretation of the aforesaid Article 46 and expressed its willingness to negotiate the proposed treaty only after the work of the Customs Conference and the Extraterritoriality Commission had been completed.

After lengthy negotiations, however, the two governments agreed to terminate the Treaty of 1865 and adopt in its stead a provisional modus vivendi; according reciprocally the most favored-nation treatment to the diplomatic and consular agents, citizens, juridical persons, products, and vessels of each country in the territory of the other and agreeing to conclude a new treaty on the basis of equality and mutual respect for territorial sovereignty. It was also agreed that this modus vivendi should continue to be in force until the conclusion and the coming into effect of the new treaty. . . .

Seeing that if the regime of special rights was to be effectively terminated, the new treaty should be brought into existence within a specified time, the Chinese Government suggested that negotiations should be completed within six months from October 27, 1926, and that if upon the expiration of the said period the new treaty was not concluded, each party should be free to reconsider the modus vivendi. In proposing a definite period the Chinese Government believed that the Belgian Government would have no objection thereto, as they understood that Belgium was equally solicitous to put the mutual relations on the basis of a new treaty as promptly as possible. Indeed the Chinese Government felt the more confident of its acceptance, inasmuch as they had given an assurance to the Belgian Government that if substantial progress on the new treaty should have been made by the end of six months, it would be a simple matter for arrangement at the proper time to extend the period so as to insure the completion of the new treaty.

To the disappointment of the Chinese Government this proved unacceptable to the Belgian Government, which proposed instead that if, after the expiration of the six-month period, the new treaty was not concluded or could not be put into force, the aforementioned modus vivendi was to be extended for another six months upon the request of one of the parties three months in advance, "and so on from six months to six months until the coming into force of the new treaty."

Believing that such an arrangement would merely encourage the indefinite prolongation of the modus vivendi rather than hasten the conclusion of a new treaty, the Chinese Government could not see their way to accepting it. But animated by the spirit of conciliation, they made an additional concession by proposing to the effect that on the expiration of the six months' period the modus vivendi could be extended by mutual agreement and might be terminated by three months' notice in advance. This was designed to prevent a situation which the Belgian Government apprehended might arise but which the Chinese Government believed could not arise if Belgium was as desirous as China to conclude the proposed new treaty, a situation wherein the relations between China and Belgium would be left at the end of six months without a treaty and without the modus vivendi. It was hoped that this proffered compromise would meet with a frank acceptance. To their disappointment, however, the Belgian Government in its reply of November 5, 1926, definitely rejected it and, repudiating the results of negotiations thus far attained, proposed to bring the question of the interpretation of Article 46 of the Treaty of 1865 before the Permanent Court of International Justice at the Hague.

In the same reply the Belgian Government engaged itself to the effect that as soon as the United States of America, Great Britain, France, and Japan should have concluded a new treaty with China in the matter of jurisdiction, Belgian would accept the same dispositions as might be agreed upon between China and any of these Powers. The Chinese Government while taking note of this expression did not feel justified in accepting it in place of a definite period for the conclusion of the proposed new treaty. . . .

Since the point actually in dispute between the two governments is not the question of terminability of the treaty on October 27, on which the Belgian Government had already accepted the Chinese point of view in the more recent stage of the negotiations, but merely that of fixing a definite period for the conclusion of the new treaty, the Chinese Government cannot see the usefulness or necessity of such a course of action. Besides, the basic motive of the Chinese Government in insisting upon having such a period is to be able, in obedience to the unanimous wish of the Chinese people, to free China from the state of inequality to which she is at present subjected by the Treaty of 1865 in her relations with Belgium. It is founded upon China's national aspiration for equality in her intercourse with foreign Powers, and national aspirations are scarcely suitable subjects for adjudication.

Having exhausted all means of arriving at an amicable settlement with the Belgian Government, which by its memorandum of yesterday's date put an end to further negotiations, the Chinese Government had no alternative but to conform to the notice which they had given to Belgium in April last and declare the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation between Belgium and China of November 2, 1865, as terminated on October 27, 1926. . . .

Contributors to This Issue

WILLIAM HARD, formerly The Nation's Washington correspondent and still a frequent contributor, will speak on Calvin Coolidge at the fifth Nation dinner, April 12.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS, professor of Industrial Relations at the University of Chicago, recently visited Haiti.

LOUIS FISCHER is shortly to lecture in the United States.

FRANK R. KENT, vice-president of the Baltimore Sun, writes regularly from Washington to The Nation. He will speak on Calvin Coolidge at the fifth Nation dinner.

CLINCH CALKINS is a member of the department of fine arts at the University of Wisconsin.

J. A. HOBSON, British economist and author of many books, is a contributing editor of The Nation.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is Dramatic Editor of The Nation.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS, author of "Woman's Dilemma," is soon to publish a novel.

ARTHUR WARNER, Associate Editor of The Nation, sailed before the mast for several years.

WOODBRIDGE RILEY'S latest book is "From Myth to Reason."

B. H. HAGGIN is contributing a series of articles on musical criticism to The Nation.

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

A LUNCHEON RESORT FOR THE DISCRIMINATING CLIENTELE—THOSE APPRECIATING UNEXCELLED CUISINE AND SERVICE.

EVENINGS—SPECIAL PARTIES ONLY. ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS, SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.

OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management
by THEODORE KEMM

GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

ATTRACTIVE POSITION
for man combining abilities of
SCIENTIST, EDUCATOR and WRITER

An established company, engaged in electrical engineering work, desires a writer who can accurately express the results of its scientific work in good literary form for educational and publicity purposes. This is not a position for a hack writer whether of text books or of radio articles for newspaper supplements. It requires a sound training in physics and exceptional ability as an expositor. Opportunities exist for promotion, and the starting salary will be commensurate to the ability and experience of the successful applicant. Apply in writing, Box 600, care The Nation.

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

True food is the foundation of Good health
Fresh Vegetables
Whole Wheat Products
Satisfying Diet for Diabetics
No animal fat used
Trufood VEGETARIAN RESTAURANT
153 W. 44th St., East of Broadway

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1927 No. 3212

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 77

EDITORIALS:

No, Mr. Coolidge—No! 80

What About the Catholics? 81

Art and Revolution 81

The Ship Subsidy Again 82

NO WAR WITH MEXICO: Cartoons from the American Press 83

MY FIRST PRESS CONFERENCE AS SECRETARY OF STATE. By William Hard 84

MEXICO'S BLOODLESS VICTORY. By Carleton Beals 85

THE EAGLE AND THE RED BIRD: A FABLE. By Arthur Warner 86

WHAT THE WORLD THINKS OF AMERICA 88

DOLLARS AND BULLETS: A HISTORY. By Lewis S. Gannett 89

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 91

CORRESPONDENCE 91

BOOKS AND PLAYS:

Death and Dancing. By Donald Kirkley 93

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 93

Secretary Houston Recalls. Oscar T. Crosby 93

The World's Disillusion. By Donald Douglas 94

Oil Intrigues. By Louis Fischer 95

A La Viennese. By Alter Brody 95

When Quakers Turned Adventurers. By Edward Thomas 96

Books in Brief 96

Drama: Who's Afraid? By Joseph Wood Krutch 97

Interesting Books of 1926. Chosen by Oswald Garrison Villard 97

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The Cause of the Conflict with Mexico 98

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

WE urge every reader of The Nation who believes in peace to write or telegraph a protest against the Administration's Mexican policy and a demand for the removal of our marines from Nicaragua to President Coolidge, Secretary Kellogg, and to his or her Senators. The crisis is not over; it remains grave.

JUST AT THE PSYCHOLOGICAL MOMENT, Mr. William Floyd, editor of the Arbitrator, has issued a call to all peace-lovers to take part in an American arbitration crusade. His aim is simple and unquestionable. He seeks to induce our government to outlaw war by negotiating treaties with every nation, these treaties to provide for obligatory arbitration or adjudication of all disputes. The Bryan treaties were not obligatory; the Root treaties are vitiated by those damnable old-fashioned provisions excepting questions of vital interest and national honor—as if nations were like silly coffee-house duelists of the seventeenth century. No sincere advocate of peace can decline to support this proposal. Every army officer who declares that he urges preparedness for the sake of peace should be for it since it may save his life and those of multitudes of his countrymen. To further this crusade, which we unqualifiedly approve and indorse, Mr. Floyd is offering $500 in prizes, the details of which he sets forth in a letter on the correspondence page of this issue of The Nation.

IT MUST BE an astounding experience for a boy of seventeen years, hitherto acclimated only to a modest reputation as a long-distance champion swimmer in Canada, to clamber up a rocky shore in California, after fifteen hours, forty-five minutes in the water, and find himself famous wherever newspapers are printed throughout this somewhat spacious earth. George Young found himself standing in the dark on a lonely beach at 3.06 a. m. on a chill morning, yet surrounded by newspaper correspondents and photographers while a crowd of vaudeville agents were pressing in to offer him highly paid engagements in addition to the $25,000 prize he had already won as the only one of 102 contestants to finish the race from Catalina Island to the mainland. George covered some thirty miles against baffling tides in water of fifty-seven degrees, succeeding where three conquerors of the English Channel failed. Two women, Martha Steger and Margaret Hauser, remained in the water four hours longer than George, but could not finish. What, we wonder, will George do with the $25,000 and the easier money to follow it? That will be a sterner test than the Catalina Island Channel, but a boy who beat his way from Toronto to Little Rock on a second-hand motorcycle, hitch-hiked the rest of the way to Los Angeles, and pledged his prize money to save his mother from work in the kitchen, should weather it.

THE SURGING TIDES of Chinese national feeling sweep higher and higher. The foreign-trained leaders of the Cantonese Government are powerless to check the outbreaks of resentment which have been piling up for decades. The British Concession at Hankow has not been returned to the English; and the French and Japanese there are questioning the desirability of clinging to their footholds. Ten foreign gunboats guard the tiny foreign island of Shameen, a quarter mile long, lest Chinese mobs cross the two bridges which separate it from Canton—an amazing example of the panic in which the foreign territory-grabbers find themselves today. The Peking Government, hitherto regarded as pro-foreign, is demanding that the territorial concessions which foreign Powers have appropriated in Tientsin be returned to China. At Foochow angry mobs have raided foreign mission buildings. Thus Nationalist ideas spread, even at a moment when the Nationalist armies are temporarily checked. Meanwhile the Belgian Government has sagely canceled its protests and decided to negotiate a new treaty with China on a basis of reciprocal equality; it is even reported ready to return its Tientsin Concession. Representative Stephen G. Porter, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of our House of Representatives, has presented a resolution proposing a similar policy for America. The adoption of this resolution would do much to restore that prestige which the United States, by her timid hesitations and waiting upon the British, is losing in the East.

FASCISM HAS BECOME A RELIGION. Little boys are being inoculated with it in their early childhood; at eighteen they are solemnly and formally initiated into the Fascist militia. The very words of the Ten Commandments have been paraphrased to make a Fascist creed: "I am Italy, thy mother, thy sovereign, thy goddess. Thou shalt have no other mother, sovereign, or goddess above me. Thou shalt honor the Government, keep festivals. . . ." With all due respect to the leaders of the Fascist movement, we prefer the ringing, noble words of the original commandments as issued to Moses. The terms "mother," "sovereign," and "goddess" used interchangeably are confusing and misleading. They put the burden of Fascist domination on the shoulders of a vague female figure labeled "Italy" when as a matter of fact the instigator, head, guiding spirit, the leader, author, founder, inventor of Fascism, who had the idea all by himself and is carrying it through almost single-handed, is none other than our exclusively male and unmotherly friend Mussolini. Meanwhile, the Pope expresses his fears for the religion of Italy's young men. An impartial judge would say that the Fascists are substituting one intolerant religion for another. But there are no impartial judges; which is one reason why we find ourselves on the side of the Pope.

CONGRESS, SAYS THE SUPREME COURT, has the right to compel witnesses to attend its hearings, and recreant witnesses may be haled before it for citation for contempt. It was in the case of Mal Daugherty, Harry's banker brother, that this decision was handed down; but the decision also affects the whole group of gentlemen who sought to cloak their actions behind a pretense that Senate committees were invading judicial functions—Samuel Insull, the public-utility millionaire who financed Mr. Smith's fight to become Illinois's Senator; Thomas F. Cunningham, one of Mr. Vare's Philadelphia backers; and other campaign "angels" and oil men. We hail this decision as a victory for common sense and justice. In recent years Senate committees have become the greatest bulwark of decency in the nation. When the executive departments stank with corruption a group of fearless Senators plowed into the stinking mess and exposed the rottenness of officialdom. Their work should have been done by the Department of Justice, but that, under Harry Daugherty, was rather a Department of Injustice. And without the power of the Senate to compel the attendance of witnesses the nation might, in a similar crisis, find itself gagged and bound by technicalities of the law, unable to free itself or even to expose its enemies. We hope the decision will encourage "Jim" Reed to probe further into the buying of elections.

IT IS TO BE HOPED that George R. Dale, editor of the Muncie (Indiana) Democrat, will not drop his effort to have his condemnation for contempt reviewed by the United States Supreme Court merely because that tribunal has declined to consider the case upon its first presentation. The action of the tribunal was due to a failure to present a sufficiently complete record of the proceeding in the lower court, and does not prevent another application in the required manner. The case, discussed in our issue of August 18, 1926, page 142, is important because it sets a new mark in the absurdity and autocracy of the courts in the suppression of freedom of the press by means of the contempt process. Mr. Dale, who had long been fighting political corruption and the Ku Klux Klan, was arrested on some probably trumped-up charges. He called these charges a frame-up in his newspapers, and was sentenced to a fine and imprisonment for contempt of court. He then offered to prove the charges and was punished again. The Supreme Court of Indiana reversed the second sentence but upheld the first on the ground that a plea of truth was no defense in a case of contempt. This ridiculous ruling should be challenged before our highest tribunal.

IF THE LINEN-WASHING now going on in the labor unions were likely to result in fresh, clean leadership friends of labor might be happier. But apparently we are witnessing a war in which the old leaders are seeking to smash all opposition by using the Communist bogy. There can be no doubt that the Communists and near-Communists were disastrously ineffective in the recent strike of the ladies' garment workers; there can be no question, either, it seems to us, that Communist discipline makes free cooperation in union meetings on a give-and-take basis extremely difficult, and that Communist principles allow scant leeway for negotiated settlements. But to leap from these premises to the conclusion that all Communists must be ousted from the unions and all Communist-controlled locals reorganized is a long and unwarranted jump. The Communists are not responsible for the worst evils of the trade-union movement. Whether the charges that the Communist leaders of the fur workers used union funds to buy police protection for their gangsters be true or not we probably shall never know; but it is certain that gangsterism in the unions antedates the advent on these shores of the word "Communist." The San Francisco building workers who have made slugging a business are no radicals; the conservative leaders of the garment trades today know all too well the gangsters in their industry; the recent exposure of graft in the New York machinists' union was among good old-fashioned anti-Reds. Where the Communists have won power they have done so by calling attention to the weaknesses of the old leadership; and that leadership must do more than expel Communists to regain its prestige. It is significant of the weakness of American labor that the prosperity of 1926 did not prevent a continued decline in the membership of the American Federation of Labor.

AFTER DELIBERATING for more than a year upon the Scopes anti-evolution trial the Supreme Court of Tennessee has arrived at the decision which any plain citizen familiar with conditions in the State could have predicted after five seconds of reflection. By a three-to-two decision it upholds the constitutionality of the law; by a unanimous decision it sets aside the verdict of the lower court in this particular case on the ground that the fine (one hundred dollars) was fixed by the judge instead of the jury; and it unanimously recommends that the case be not retried. Nothing could be more inconclusive or less satisfactory, for it leaves the whole question exactly where it was when the famous trial began. The pretext seized upon for setting aside the verdict is the most insignificant one that could be found and while the recommendation not to retry may not make an appeal to the United States Supreme Court impossible it certainly renders it more difficult. When the original trial was in progress The Nation's correspondent quoted as the composite comment of leading Tennessee citizens: "It's a damn-fool law, but I won't be quoted." The court's decision amounts to just about that. In effect it refuses to condemn the law but it recommends that no attempt be made to enforce it.

"I DON'T BELIEVE IN GOD; I don't believe in Heaven or Hell; I don't believe in the Bible as the inspired work of a god." In these forthright terms Ernest V. Sterry of the Toronto Christian Inquirer admits his unbelief. Because of it he has been arrested under a blasphemy statute which has been invoked only two other times in English history. The charge reads: "blasphemous, indecent, and profane libel of and concerning the Holy Scriptures and the Christian religion." Among other things Sterry referred to the "God of the Bible" as an "irate old party who thunders imprecations from the mountain, or mutters and grouches in the tabernacle." It is the frivolous character of his remarks that evidently made them offensive in the eyes of the law. To attack the Christian religion is permissible but to poke fun at it is unlawful. "Publications which in an indecent spirit asperse Christianity . . . in a language calculated and intended to shock the feelings and outrage the belief of mankind are held to be liable to persecution under the act," is the opinion of Crown Attorney Eric Armour. If this point of view should become popular in the United States, which has about every other sort of censorship in some form or other, many publications would suffer. Many writers and artists have dared to laugh at certain aspects of the Christian religion; and laughter at established institutions is the most deadly and penetrating sort of criticism.

IT WAS HEYWOOD BROUN who in a moment of anger at an ill-mannered audience wrote that he wished New York theatergoers might be punished for their lack of manners by waking up some morning and finding that every theater in the city was giving only "Abie's Irish Rose." It was the worst penalty that he could think of. But "Abie's Irish Rose" has passed its two thousandth Broadway performance. The profits of the author, Miss Anne Nichols, have been estimated at five million dollars or more. She has now signed a contract for the production of the play in the movies, which is expected to bring her several million dollars more. There are seven companies now on the road or in New York and an eighth company will produce the play in London next April. For four years and eight months the play has run in New York. No play has had such a success either in America or in Great Britain —unless "Uncle Tom's Cabin" has surpassed it through the decades. And the amazing fact remains that Miss Nichols had to produce it herself as no manager would take it, and that the bulk of the critics dismissed it as trivial and contemptible—the dramatic critic of The Nation did not think it worth a notice. To most people this record stands as a dreadful indictment of the taste and standards of American audiences. That, however, is only a narrow view. Despite its lapses of taste and its juvenility, the play has touched the emotions of enormous numbers of people—1,750,000 are believed to have attended its performances in New York City alone—and it has somehow affected them deeply. It has been so faithful a representation of certain phases of our American life that it has struck home. It has had, moreover, the saving merit of humor, which ought not to be overlooked by Miss Elisabeth Marbury, who at the recent dinner of some of The Nation's New York readers made an eloquent plea for more laughter and humor on the stage.

THOSE WHO DO NOT TRUST THE CENSOR at that delicate crisis in his career when he must distinguish between decent and indecent literature, between art with a good purpose and art with a bad purpose will be confirmed in their distrust by the recent action of two women investigators from the Illinois Vigilance Association. In Chicago, as in New York, there has been agitation to suppress the "art and sex magazines" so plentifully found these days on news-stands; the New York World has made the agitation the basis of its newest campaign. What more inevitable, once persons have been empowered to act in the matter, than that action should be taken against art the purpose of which no one knows. That the editors of "sex magazines" have a certain purpose there can be no doubt. But the two women in question marched into the galleries of Marshall Field and Company, saw seven nudes of which they disapproved, and complained to the police—who ordered the paintings taken down. What was the purpose of the painters of these nudes? They were good painters, say members of the Chicago Art Institute. Surely it is impertinent to ask their purpose—or at least to proceed upon the assumption that one knows. The two vigilantes should have known better. But so should metropolitan newspapers know better than to yell for the creation of public offices which in the very nature of the case can never be filled by educated citizens.

HU SHIH has returned to the United States. Nearly ten years ago he left us—an unassuming Chinese student who had attracted slight attention by winning a student essay prize and editing a Chinese students' magazine. Two years later word came back from China that a magazine referendum had voted him one of the twelve greatest living Chinese—along with a group of men twice or three times his age. Boldly advocating use of a despised vernacular tongue, he did for Chinese what Dante and Petrarch had done for Italian: he opened the doors of literacy to millions who could never have mastered the intricacies of the involved classic tongue. He urged his countrymen to write as they spoke, and he discovered an unsuspected dignity in vernacular works which had been despised by the literati. In the course of centuries the written language had lost contact with life, but life refused to be excluded from literature. The scholars of China despised the novel; Hu Shih picked up scores of wretchedly printed vernacular novels of the last two centuries, found among them masterly honest revelations of market-place life, remote from the studied artificiality of the classical scholars; these he republished, with scholarly introductions—and although the novels were available in cheap editions at a few cents each the more expensive editions sold out at once. The first volume of his unfinished "History of Chinese Philosophy" was the best seller of China for two successive years. He produced prodigiously—poems, dramas, essays —all in the language of the people. It was this literary revolution which made the "mass-education" movement possible. Those who are privileged to hear this professor of philosophy from the National University of Peking lecture will find in him a sensitive artist, a genial philosopher with an intuitive understanding of mass movements.

No, Mr. Coolidge—No!

SO it is not Nicaragua after all, nor even Mexico, but Moscow that Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Kellogg have been gunning for! Once more the American people are asked to believe that the Bolshevists are after us and that we are saving our homes, our firesides, our women, by establishing a front in Nicaragua and letting the "Bolshevist Government" of Mexico know that we shall dominate in Central America and that anyone who gets in our way will be crushed and broken. There it is in its stark nakedness, this new policy to which his followers are giving the name of "the Coolidge doctrine"!

In all our experience American statesmanship has never touched such a low level. Mr. Kellogg's Bolshevist outburst is an insult to the intelligence of every sane American. His quotation of Chicherin's desire to use Mexico as a base for Communist anti-American activity, with his suppression of President Calles's ringing reply telling the Russians to keep their hands off, is proof of a deliberate duplicity which alone ought to compel his retirement from office. No wonder that the Cleveland Plain Dealer calls his effort a "dud," that many Republican newspapers say that neither he nor the President made out a case. The truth is that in this emergency the lives of thousands of Americans, the honor of the United States, and the peace of a continent are in the hands of the two most incompetent politicians this country has ever intrusted with its highest offices. Every step the Administration has taken has proved the absence of a clear-cut policy. It has blundered, blundered from one position to another, advanced one excuse after the other. It began by saying that it was merely protecting American property in Nicaragua and then moved on and on until the Bolshevist bogy was trotted out. It is impossible, after reading the documents, to believe that either the President or his Secretary of State really knows or understands the case. What is happening is that they are being led into one position after another by the machinations of subordinates hidden away in minor positions.

Let no one be misled by the apparent improvement in the situation as this issue of The Nation goes to press. There can be no safety in the situation as long as our marines are in Nicaragua and as long as we have a Secretary of State filled with fury and hatred toward Mexico. True, the fine and outspoken position of such papers as the Springfield Republican, the Baltimore Sun, the New York World, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and many others is cause for great satisfaction, and so is the outpouring of private protests directed to the White House. Many preachers like Henry Sloane Coffin, S. Parkes Cadman, and Harry Emerson Fosdick have spoken admirably. The Methodists and the Masons are making their great influence felt. The united Southern press is whipping the recreant Democratic Senators into line against the Coolidge policy. Many Catholics are dissenting from the anti-Mexican crusade of the Knights of Columbus. But although the forces for peace have gone into action quicker than ever before, the need for them to continue in action is tremendous. The Administration is quite willing that the impression shall go abroad that things are quieting down. But the danger remains. A few shots in Nicaragua, a mob outburst in Mexico against Americans in official or unofficial life, and the fat may be in the fire. If there are attacks upon American property in Tampico—and renegades can easily be hired for that—the fleet and its guns will appear at once. If a pistol-shot in Bosnia could plunge a world into war what may not a shot in Nicaragua or Mexico do?

No, there must be no relaxing of the efforts of every humane and decent American to bring pressure to bear on Washington and let the President know that neither now nor hereafter will this country stand for a policy of force and that the public desires a new Secretary of State, not one who, for physical reasons alone, is unfit for the position he seeks to fill. Above all else Congress should be called in extra session—the new Congress will be far less in favor of the "Coolidge doctrine" than is the present one. It is openly stated in those misguided business and religious circles which seek a conflict with Mexico that action will come as soon as Congress is out of the way. True, there can be no formal declaration of war until Congress votes it, but any Administration can make war, as Woodrow Wilson, to his shame, twice made war in Mexico and once in Haiti—something that profoundly embarrasses the Democrats in the present crisis.

Already the most insidious argument to combat in Congress is the one which says: "Well, we made a mistake in going in but now we are in we must stay in; our prestige demands it"—with the variation that if we should retreat now our actions would be regarded as a sign of weakness by the Latin Americans who "understand no argument except that of force," as one news agency puts it. That is just the way reckless or incompetent statesmen take to insure to themselves support for acts which cannot stand the light of reason. Once the almost inevitable incident occurs, it is "Stand by the flag and the President"—last week a Representative stated that he was for the American President as against the Mexican whatever the former's stand or acts might be. Passion, a misguided patriotism, unreasoning national prejudices—these come into play at once. Already we have the atrocity story. On January 14 the New York Times printed on its first page the account of a Mexican boy's tongue being cut out, and the killing of five boys under twenty. Next will come the cutting off of children's hands and women's breasts, and then the crucifixions on barn doors.

Against these things only a steadfast and lasting opposition on the part of every peace-loving person can prevail. The program is simple: The marines must come out of Nicaragua; any dispute with Mexico must be arbitrated. Since Calles has offered to arbitrate even a domestic law, the United States, for so many years the chief advocate of international arbitration, must accept or write itself down a complete hypocrite. The imperialists, the advocates of war are unceasingly at work. Those who believe in international morality and decency must likewise be unceasing in serving notice upon President Coolidge that the American people do not propose to be betrayed into bloodshed in Nicaragua or Mexico, that they still believe in the right of small nations to self-determination, and that they scorn the doctrine that war-might gives us the right to say how people shall live or think or act in any weaker country.

What About the Catholics?

THE uprising of the American people against the attempt of the Administration to plunge this country into the sea of imperialist war has been inspiring. Press, pulpit, and lay platform have rung—after a period of hesitating doubt of the facts—with appeals for peaceful arbitration. The most discouraging feature has been the silence of the Catholics.

A Catholic, in this crisis, has been torn by two allegiances. His church is being persecuted in Mexico. The present Mexican Government, convinced that the power of the church is an obstacle to progress, has deliberately sought to destroy its power and subject it to the temporal authority. In that effort it has trampled on old church liberties. Naturally Catholics in the United States have been aroused to protest. A liberal may believe that Mexico's war upon the church is a natural outgrowth of the latter's history, but he cannot expect a Catholic to agree with him.

The Nation is not with those who would establish frontiers for protests. We believe in international public opinion. We have made our protests against outrages in Ireland and India, against French brutality in Syria, against Polish pogroms and Italian despotism as well as against American imperialism. We regard ourselves as citizens of the world, and think it a healthy thing for men in one country to resent the sufferings of their fellowmen in another. And the example of Ireland is evidence that a world public opinion can be made effective.

To protest, however, is one thing; to demand—or even tolerate—armed intervention in support of a protest is another and a more dangerous thing. The United States has been and is perilously close to war in Mexico; it has, in its anti-Mexican campaign, landed its military forces in Nicaragua. Against the use of brute force by the United States to impose its will upon a lesser nation, it seems to us, even good Catholics should protest. A more patently un-Christian course could not be imagined.

Yet in the shout of protest against the Coolidge-Kellogg policy of war we have failed to detect more than a very few Catholic voices. We understand that Senator Walsh of Montana is personally opposed to the war policy; he has not said a public word. Of Governor Smith's attitude in this crisis which involves his church and his country, we have had no hint—despite Norman Thomas's effort to force him into the open. In Boston, while the usually regular Republican Herald has bravely questioned the Coolidge policy, the Democratic Post, commonly regarded as a mouthpiece of the hierarchy, has shrieked its support of military intervention.

The equivocal position of the Knights of Columbus is well known. On July 26, last, its New York chapter demanded that our Government "take action . . . to terminate the present intolerable situation in Mexico." On August 5, its Supreme Council announced that "the period of watchful waiting or any other such procedure is over" and demanded "action." It authorized assessment of its members to raise a million-dollar fund to fight the Mexican Government's position. Despite widespread criticism of this as a policy of war it was not until seventeen days later that the Supreme Knight questioned the interpretation, and then he merely stated that the manifesto "did not specify the manner or form which governmental action should take." A recent circular issued by Columbus Council of the K. of C. carried this ambiguous plea:

> We must succeed and will—if—everyone carries his share of the burden. Your contribution to the K. of C. Mexican fund, no matter what it is, will be welcomed—doubly welcome if sent immediately . . . Remember: The Red must die or dye us red.

It is charged that this K. of C. fund has been used to finance such armed revolts in Mexico as that led by the Archbishop of Guadalajara. Has it?

Meanwhile, Judge Talley, Representative Boylan, and other prominent Catholics have been violently bellicose. Their readiness to plunge the country into war, largely in behalf of their church, is the more alarming because of the possibility that a Catholic will be in 1928 one of the leading contenders for the Presidency. The Nation has always insisted that membership in the Catholic church should never be considered a bar to holding public office in this country; it would like to see more evidence to support its belief that Catholic Americans put their country first. It is heartening to find in the Commonweal, a Catholic publication, for January 19, these words:

> Should we intervene in Mexico? In Nicaragua? By no means. . . . We have something at stake in these countries; and as soon as you begin to protect that something by force of arms, you are sure to sponsor imperialistic methods and purposes. The simplest definition of imperialism is government of weakness by might. To what such a policy will ultimately lead is indicated to some extent in the mirror of Latin American public opinion, but is demonstrated fulsomely in the present Chinese debacle.

That is good; but it is not enough. Where do the Catholics of the United States stand?

Revolution and Art

THE artists' replies to the New Masses questionnaire are not of a sort to bring great comfort to those who would make art the handmaiden of revolution. Fourteen writers replied to a series of carefully formulated queries, and though all, with one exception, belong more or less vaguely to the left wing rather than to the right, not even Upton Sinclair answered with a direct affirmative to the crucial question "May society properly demand of the artist . . . the transvaluation of values?" Three of the ten who answered another specific question called American culture "decadent"; several confessed a marked bias in favor of the revolutionary labor movement; and several expressed an interest in "the machine age"; but one and all revealed the immemorial tendency of the artist to shy at the "demands of society." "This is too esoteric for me," comments Stuart Chase; "I do not think it will do society any good to demand," replies Joseph Krutch; "It would have its nerve," says Heywood Broun; "Hell!" exclaims Genevieve Taggard; and most of the rest—Robinson Jeffers, Babette Deutsch, Van Wyck Brooks, and Waldo Frank—reply in similar fashion. At any particular period they might, so their answers imply, find themselves in sympathy with the "ins" or with the "outs," but they ask to be excused from specific sociological accountability and they pray to be saved from their reformer-friends.

Yet none of these writers can be impatiently swept aside as an aesthete or a dilettante. Not one confesses to any longing for the ivory tower; not one is concerned with an "escape"; and not one asks to be allowed to remain dreamy over the past. Nothing in their attitude is mincing or precious. Without exception they think of art as a function of life, as of something which draws its materials from contemporary existence and in turn modifies the form which that existence takes; without exception their ideal implies revolution and change. Yet they will not and cannot define their conception of their function in any terms satisfactory to those whose concern with social reform is more immediate and direct. As one reads their responses one is led to suspect that triumphant revolution will be as distrustful of the artists produced under it as other societies have generally been of their own stepchildren and one is reminded of the fact that though the radical is fond of charging that the artist of the past has persistently truckled to capitalism and reaction, at least the capitalist and the reactionary have not usually thought so.

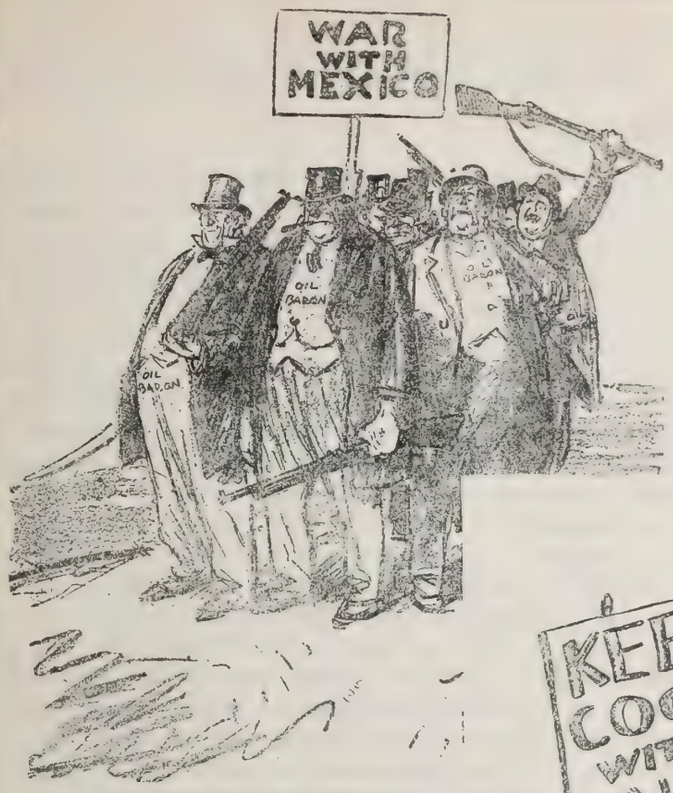
At bottom, perhaps, the cause of the quarrel lies in the fact that the artist has always demanded more freedom and more thoroughness than the reformer thinks either necessary or advisable. The fear of practical consequences is not so immediately before his eyes and he is not so impatient. He loves to reopen questions which the reformer thinks closed and to dwell upon the little ironies which the reformer would rather keep hidden. Interested in perfection rather than workable compromise, sacrificing even loyalty to insight, he is distrustful of all orthodoxies and he loves to express the protest or the aspiration which can hardly be got into the form of an argument. In his heart he never believes that any philosophy contains the whole truth, and his dearest concern is always with the things which official propositions leave out. Always feeling himself justified, he would, nevertheless, rather thumb his nose at Serious People and call his trade useless than be called upon to justify himself before any court, and he always pleads for a change of venue. At his feeblest he is a useful safety-valve affording a harmless outlet for unregenerate impulses which, if totally suppressed, might blow us all up; at his best he perceives truths still too nebulous to be defined or defended.

Back in the Middle Ages, when all the world was as orthodox as any reformer can ever hope to make it again, the artist used his freedom to keep alive, for example, that faith in the worth of the world and the flesh which both scholarship and authority would have utterly crushed, and he was able to do it because even when he gave his allegiance to the church he somehow managed not to comply with the spirit of its demands. And the chances are that when that day, near or distant, shall come when the revolution is complete and all that the reformer now hopes for has been obtained, the artist will still be found occupying himself with things which are as undreamed of in the Revolutionist Handbook as romantic love was in the Summa Theologia.



Reform rough-hews society, and art is always more or less contemptuous of its summary though useful labors. "You do your work," it says, "let me do mine. On the whole I prefer an avowed enemy to the friend who would demand of me what I have not to give. Despise me if you must; but remember that I can bear no fruits at all except those after my own kind."

The Ship Subsidy Again

As was to have been expected, the Shipping Board has come out in favor of ship subsidies; in fact, of government aid of every description, in order that we may have a merchant-marine reserve in case of war and "a merchant marine adequate for the needs of the greater part of our foreign commerce." It states that at its hearings, held in various cities, there was a virtually unanimous sentiment in favor of this program. That is not surprising; at hearings such as the Shipping Board held few but interested people appear. The fact that most of the arguments the board heard were in favor of the government support of a merchant marine does not, of course, by itself mean that the policy is wise, or economically sound, or that it will be accepted by Congress. Indeed, there is no evidence at all that Congress, which refused to act in response to a special subsidy message sent to it by President Harding in 1922, will reverse that refusal in 1927.

Now The Nation would like to see a merchant marine under the American flag as much as anybody living. It has always held, however, that the only sound way to get such a fleet is by private initiative and private enterprise in response to a genuine business opportunity. No artificially stimulated fleet will be worth having. The only way we know in which this Government can legitimately aid in the development of a merchant marine is by taking all possible handicaps off American ships, bringing the navigation and port laws up to date, protecting the sailor-man, and by granting liberal payments for carrying the mails. The payments now made are inadequate and can perfectly properly be increased in such a way as to stimulate the building of faster and up-to-date ships. A subsidy paid on tonnage, or miles covered, would inevitably corrode the very industry it is meant to help. We have found striking confirmation of this in an article by Mr. John C. Seager, a veteran shipping man with experience all over the world. In the Nautical Gazette he quotes one of the most successful British shipping men, Frederick R. Leyland, founder of the Leyland Line, as saying: "I would not accept a government subsidy if offered to me." When asked why, his reply was: "The profit would go up the chimney and in brass buttons and extravagance, for the government gives you a subsidy on one hand and obliges you to do many things that take the profit away." Where the government does not take the profit, extravagance and inefficiency are bound to enter.

At bottom the fundamental principle remains vicious; no such industry ought to be built up if there is no economic reason for it, if it cannot maintain itself on its own feet—in this case on its own bottoms. The Shipping Board and those who believe with it seem to think that if we do not pour money into subsidies and have our own merchant marine our crops will not be moved. As a matter of fact our export trade grew steadily during the long years when we had no fleet and was never hampered or injured by the lack of American-flag vessels. Again, the argument for a reserve in time of war ought to be negligible if President Coolidge persists in his avowed intention to bring about a further reduction of the fleets. The effort should be not to build up a fleet reserve but to muster out the fleet that we have and what remains of the fighting navies of the world. Let us have a fleet under the American flag, but let it come normally and naturally because of a genuine need.

From the New York World

Mobilized

From the New York Evening Post

Hardly Enough Light

From the Baltimore Sun

A Word to the All Highest

From the Cleveland News

Cross Purposes

From the Cleveland Plain Dealer

Who's the Policeman on This Beat?

No War with Mexico!—Cartoons from the American Press

My First Press Conference as Secretary of State

By WILLIAM HARD

Washington, January 17

"OF course, now I'm Secretary, you boys will want to know my policies. Well, first place, I'm in favor of spreading American institutions. Unless a country has elections like ours, I won't recognize it. So I've surprised Bill Borah by adopting his suggestion of having me and the Marine Corps supervise this next election that's to take place in Nicaragua.

"I'm doing it right. I'm sending Bill Vare of Pennsylvania down to raise the campaign fund for Sacasa and I'm sending Frank Smith of Illinois down to raise the campaign fund for Diaz. Then I'm sending Jim Reed of Missouri down three boats later to find out what they did. This Administration's idea of a fine career for him, Reed, I may tell you in confidence, is to have him spend all his time investigating American elections in foreign countries. Next, I'm sending the whole town of Herrin, Illinois, down to Nicaragua, so that if there's any violence in the election, it will be real violence. But I haven't told you my masterpiece. I'm sending the Chicago election officials and their friends down there to count the ballots. This is where I get even with Bill Borah. If any of Bill's Sacasa voters get by the bandits that my Chicago vote-counters will take down there with them, well, the vote-counters will do the rest. But you see my point. We've got to teach American institutions to these foreign birds—and especially to the Latin ones. If any institution looks good to us, it's got to look good to them. That's my first principle. Unless a guy gets into office in any foreign country through an election, American-style, I'll have nothing to do with him.

"I'm going to try this on with some big Latin country, like Italy, as soon as Congress passes the necessary appropriations for the Marine Corps. I've got the nerve if they've got the money.

"Well, next—next, I'm in favor of recognizing our responsibilities abroad. That's the solemnest word in diplomacy. Responsibilities. I hope you gentlemen realize what an international responsibility is. It's like this: I go and interfere in some foreign country and commit my country to interfering there, and then my country must keep on interfering because I started interfering. That's a responsibility. And I may confide to you that I'm going to be the greatest Secretary of State that ever lived, because I'm going to give the United States more responsibilities than any of my predecessors ever did. Let me illustrate my point. After I've counted Diaz into office in Nicaragua, if Sacasa goes and counts the rifles in Nicaragua and counts himself in that way, it will be my responsibility to send the Fifth Infantry and throw him out. But then if Diaz unconstitutionally dissolves the Nicaraguan Congress it will be my responsibility to send the Ninth Cavalry to restore them to their seats. Grasp the principle—if once we are in and do something, it would be an irreparable blow to our prestige and importance and self-respect and face if we got out and let it be undone.

"Now you have the first two steps in my policy. First, interference. Then, responsibility. The third step is the protection of the interests which we have acquired through our interference and our responsibility. Let me illustrate again. We had to get the Panama Canal in order to protect the Pacific slope. Now, I'm patrolling the canal route in Nicaragua in order to protect the Panama Canal. Very well—that's as far as my predecessors went. I'm following in their footprints and going ahead of them. You mustn't quote me on this, but I'm going to take the canal route across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec in Mexico in order to protect the canal route in Nicaragua. What do you think the writers of history will say to that? That will place me somewhere, won't it? And I've got other ideas on that line, too. We have to have Hawaii to protect San Francisco. We have to have Guam to protect Hawaii. We have to have the Philippines to protect Guam. But what have we got to have to protect the Philippines? I'm thinking of Tibet. Keep that dark. Don't print it. I never tell the Senate or the American people anything, but I want you newspaper fellows to plug for me if you will. And I think you will if I tell you enough things you can't print and you want to learn some more. So I'm telling you now. I'm looking for something we can get to protect the Philippines.

"I ask you to be sure to memorize a fundamental principle of diplomacy. The more interests we get to protect, and the farther away from home they are, and the more difficult to defend they are, the safer we shall be. Get that? Master it, and you will be good correspondents on foreign affairs.

"Well, how far have we gone? Oh, yes. First, interference. Then, responsibility. Then, protection of interests.

"All that remains is bogies. Every good Secretary of State must have bogies. Otherwise how can he scare the American people into doing what he wants? My predecessors merely scared the American people with Bolsheviks. Watch me, boys. I want to tell you everybody is plotting. The Pan-Slavs are plotting. The Pan-Moslems are plotting. The Pan-Asiatics are plotting. The Kluxers are plotting. The Pan-Latin-Hispanic-Rio-Grande-to-Tierra-del-Fuego Confederation is plotting. What will be my answer? I will occupy Honduras. Some bang, what? That's me. That's what I'm going to do to carry on the recent traditions of American diplomatic policy. Interference, responsibility, protection of interests, bogies. Let me plead with you. Do grasp that quartet of principles. They are the four legs of the great chair in which I sit.

"Oh, I forgot. I'm in favor of joining the Permanent Court of International Justice if the League will let us. I'm in favor of peace. I'm sorry I forgot to mention it. I mention it now. Please put it in the leads of your stories. The principal thing I have in mind as Secretary of State is to forward international peace. The undeviating record of the United States is to be in favor of peace. Make that plain. Peace is my main object.

"Well, I guess that's all. Any questions? No? Well, I don't blame you. I think I made it all perfectly clear. Good afternoon, gentlemen. Thank you."

Mexico's Bloodless Victory

(Special Cable Dispatch to The Nation)

By CARLETON BEALS

Mexico City, January 15

WITH the United States Government's attack on Nicaraguan sovereignty; its overthrow of constitutionalism in that country; its violation of the Washington treaties of 1923; its support of Diaz, the puppet of dollar diplomacy since 1919; its attack on Sacasa, the liberal legal successor to Nicaragua's presidency; with its Panama treaty, creating a new protectorate, in Central America; and with its smoke-screen of charges of Bolshevism and threats of force against Mexico, scurrilous attacks against a friendly government endangering the peace of two continents, the moral leadership of the Western Hemisphere definitely passes from the United States to Mexico.

Calles emerges as a continental figure with a moral courage unparalleled since the death of Sun Yat-sen—Calles, the one government executive in all the world supporting international justice. Sacasa is momentarily annihilated as the result of Mexican recognition; but Mexico emerges the leader of Latin America, pictured in the press as a David fighting the Goliath of the North. Coolidge has set two continents aflame, aroused eighty million people to resistance, solidified Latin-American culture, and revived the old fear and hate of the Yankee.

The National Congress of Students, meeting at Oaxaca, has cabled to all the students of Latin America its support of Calles against the United States. The Honduras students in Mexico have cabled their home government, opposing the action of the United States. The Guatemalan students have held enthusiastic demonstrations in front of the Mexican Embassy, and sent cables to students and governments of other countries. Students are protesting in Cuba and Peru, in all Latin America. Coolidge is sowing the dragon's teeth of future antagonism, creating hundreds of Ugartes, Fombonas, and Fabelas pledged to dedicate their lives to the fight against American aggression. The editors of Salvador have unitedly protested against the American overthrow of constitutionalism in Nicaragua and have sent a memorial to the Pan-American Union. Chile is on the eve of a revolt in favor of conciliation with Peru, settling the Tacna-Arica controversy and solidifying Latin-American resistance. Messages pour in from all Latin America pledging support to Calles. The Latin-American Union is actively cabling the facts to the European newspapers, governments, and liberal and labor organizations. Argentina has already instituted a boycott against United States goods, and American imports have dropped.

The Latin-American Union of Mexico is attempting to inaugurate a continent-wide boycott, advocating the application to the Americas of Gandhi's Indian tactics. It has issued a manifesto reciting the aggressions of the United States, both economic and political, since 1847, adding: "But Latin America is at last reacting against this encroachment: Argentina is establishing a boycott; Nicaragua stands arms in hand; Mexico is nationalizing its wealth despite the protests of the usurper." The union presents a far-reaching program for the liberation of Porto Rico, Santo Domingo, and Nicaragua; for equalization treaties; for the abolition of the Platt Amendment in Cuba, of the 1916 Bryan-Chamorro treaty in Nicaragua, and of the present Panama treaty; for the end of all special privileges granted to the United States; for the promotion of native industries and the development of inter-Latin-American commerce.

The official Mexican reaction is this: Mexico has enemies within and without, but, despite the economic, political, church, and international crises, the present regime has never been more strongly solidified. There have been no examples of army treachery, as in the days of Carranza and Obregon. The story of plots by Arnulfo Gomez, commander of Vera Cruz, apparently are utterly unfounded. The Government will weather all difficulties unless it is undermined by the machinations and propaganda of the State Department of the United States. Present State Department tactics are more disintegrating than overt acts, but Calles is unflinchingly proceeding with his program, publicly unrepentant regarding his Nicaraguan attitude, which he declares is founded on the rights of nations, and unshaken by Kellogg's bullying.

The United States Government looks toward Mexico while it kicks Nicaragua; Mexico looks toward the United States while it kicks the Catholic church. But the latter has been definitely proved an internal plotter; during the last two months the Mexican Government has broken up ten rebel groups with such slogans as these: "The Rights of Religion" and "Viva Christ, the King!" The first rebellion in mountainous Guanajuato, led by two priests, Ignacio and Pedro Gonzales, was driven toward Jalisco and dispersed. The most recent rebellion in the Federal District, including Catholics of the aristocratic families of the capital, headed by the former Zapatista officers, Reyes and Castro, has been broken up; documents have been seized implicating Rene Capistran Garza, head of the Mexican League for the Defense of Religion, who is now in the United States. Capistran Garza has announced himself as provisional president, promising arms and funds from the United States. The Government charges that other documents implicated the Episcopate, which explains the arrest of Bishop Diaz, secretary of the Episcopate, and his deportation to Guatemala. The Government accuses the church of traitorously seeking outside aid at a moment of international crisis, as it has repeatedly done in Mexican history—witness the imposition of the Hapsburg Maximilian. Yet the Catholic church is helpless from a military point of view unless the army should turn traitor or elements in the United States give substantial aid.

The Calles program has four facets: first, Latin-American solidarity; second, economic independence; third, financial retrenchment; fourth, legal enforcement of the 1917 constitution. Since the time of Carranza and the Plan de Monzon, all Mexican governments have been consistently, legitimately, and far-sightedly promoting a program of cultural and economic union in Latin America. The Mexican revolution aims at economic independence; it represents a reaction against the pro-foreign policy of Porfirio Diaz.

As Calles said at last year's convention of the Regional Confederation of Mexican Labor: "Mexico cannot hope to achieve political without economic independence." He declared that the Government aimed to build up native industry and to safeguard the country against wild-cat exploitation of its natural resources, this being the reason for the land and petroleum laws. Calles's financial record includes elimination of graft, rigid economy, and a regularity of payment on its foreign debt which might be envied by European Powers. But Mexico gets no credit for this. Calles has been systematically enforcing the 1917 constitution, his last two years representing the most brilliant period of codification since the fifties of the last century.

Regarding his difficulties with the United States Calles declares that although the Hague Court is dominated by imperialist Powers Mexico is willing, as the lesser of two evils, to submit even her internal legislation to international arbitration. This is a sharp contrast to Kellogg's continued bitter propaganda tending, as it does, toward armed conflict. Foreign Minister Saenz reiterates Mexico's intention to safeguard foreign rights legitimately acquired and to fulfil her international obligations. The Claims Commission is evidence of Mexico's willingness to create conciliatory machinery for the settlement of legitimate claims against her. "Mexico's aims and aspirations are simply to dwell peacefully with all peoples, solving her own problems by her own efforts. Mexico does not close her doors to any understanding or settlement based on justice." Regarding bolshevism, Mr. Saenz repeats Calles's reply to Chicherin's declaration that Mexico might be used as a Communist base: "Mexico extended the hand of friendship to Soviet Russia, but she expects absolute respect for her independence and sovereignty. Mexico's program of political and social reform sprang out of Mexico's needs, and is developing in conformity with Mexico's needs, unshaped by exotic factors."

The labor situation is this: The railroad workers, who have been threatening a general strike for nearly a year, have repeatedly been staved off by domestic and international crises, but their plans are again maturing. The indications are that Calles will insist on arbitration. The Regional Confederation of Mexican Labor, the largest organization in the country, has reaffirmed its unqualified support of Calles. General Secretary Trevino declares that the organization always combats Communist tendencies. The Mexican masses and the Mexican Government are not influenced by Bolshevist theories or activities. The Mexican revolution crystallized its constitution in February, 1917, while the Bolshevist revolution did not occur until November of that year. The little Communist propaganda which has been carried on in Mexico has been directed against the Government by American citizens who have since been deported. Russian Communists in the United States have been actively opposed to the Labor governments of Obregon and Calles.

Trevino spoke the truth: but 300,000 peasants, composing the National Peasants League, who are not connected with the Government and who may ultimately determine the fate of Mexico, are far more radical. No Mexican Government on the Kellogg pattern could possibly sustain itself, unless with the aid of United States bayonets. If Calles should be overthrown by a break in diplomatic relations, by lifting the embargo on shipments of arms, or merely by continued hostility, he might be followed, after a period of new violence, by the most radical government in Mexican history. A church government or a landlord government could not exist three months. If Calles falls, the State Department will face a semi-Bolshevist and bitterly anti-American government. Will Kellogg's work in inciting revolution in Mexico benefit American property and commerce, and promote peace and security—or merely aid a few oil properties with doubtful titles?

The Eagle and the Red Bird: A Fable

By ARTHUR WARNER

AN Eagle was winging his way above Washington One Day in December (the 27th to be exact) when he heard a Great Commotion in a Building at Seventeenth and G Streets. He swooped down and, perching on the sill of an open window, saw a great multitude of men called Newspaper Boys bustling into a room where stood Somebody whom the Newspaper Boys called Mr. Secretary to his face but among themselves Nervous Nellie. The Newspaper Boys were Hot on the Trail because only three days before United States marines had been landed at Puerto Cabezas, on the east coast of Nicaragua. The Newspaper Boys wanted to know Why.

"It is solely to protect the lives and property of our citizens," declared Mr. Secretary solemnly. "Admiral Latimer has been instructed to preserve the Strictest Neutrality as between the Diaz and Sacasa forces. If the Diaz forces enter the Neutral Zone they will be disarmed as quickly as the troops of Sacasa."

"But," said one of the Newspaper Boys who was Wise, "Puerto Cabezas is the military headquarters of Sacasa. His troops have just licked the Tar out of the army of Diaz so that it is Running Yet. There's a Fat Chance that the forces of Diaz will Come Monkeying around there again. Mr. Secretary, what do you mean, Neutrality?"

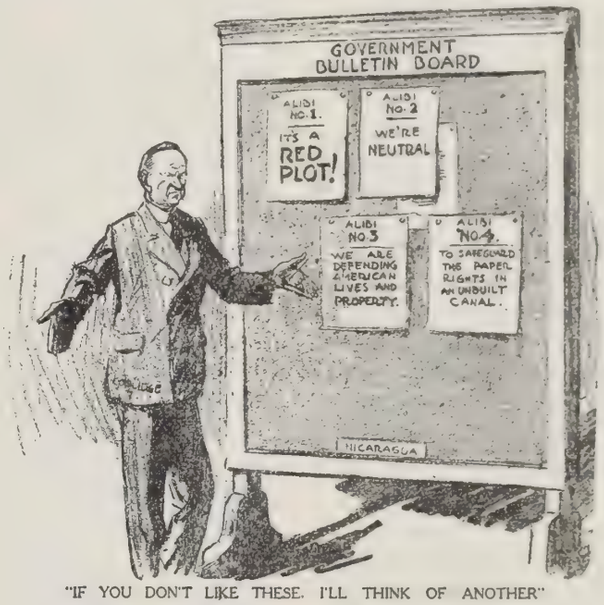
"I can't answer that question," said Mr. Secretary.

"Mr. Secretary," said another Wise Guy, "will you give us the names of the lives and property that our marines are protecting?"

"I never was good at remembering names," replied Nervous Nellie, "though I never forget a Face. As to that I would say we were protecting Our Own."

Thereupon the interview ended and the Eagle flew away to Potomac Park for a Much Needed Rest. But he was back again three days later. Unfortunately he was a Bit Late. The interview was over and the Newspaper Boys had left the room. There was a Parrot there, though, and of him the Eagle inquired What Had Been Said.

"Same old Bologna," squawked the Parrot; "we're still neutral."



This time the Eagle took a Longer Rest, but on January 4 he heard a Great Silence over a building called the White House. He flew down to learn what it was All About and saw a man that looked like Cautious Cal but was called the Official Spokesman. This man had found a New One.

He told the Newspaper Boys that Uncle Sam was in Nicaragua to protect his Rights in a Canal which he hadn't yet started but might want to build Some Day.

So the Eagle flew away to Rock Creek Park and cogitated on This Bluff. He concluded that in building trenches the army of Sacasa might shovel some Loose Dirt off the line of the Canal and thus prevent a future Deserving Republican contractor from charging it up as excavation through Solid Rock.

On January 6 there was a Terrible Commotion at Seventeenth and G Streets and the Eagle hopped on the window-sill As Before. He learned that American troops had been sent to Managua, the headquarters of Diaz, but the troops of the latter had not been compelled to disarm nor had the city been declared a Neutral Zone. In fact our embargo against the shipment of arms into Nicaragua had been lifted in so far as Diaz Was Concerned. It was explained officially that Our Troops were in Managua at the request of British and Italian officials, but the Eagle heard On the Side that they were there to keep the Naughty Boys of Sacasa from Crashing the Gate and Knocking the Block off Diaz, the Angel Child of Nervous Nellie and Cautious Cal. The Eagle also heard that Two Senators, a Mr. Robinson and a Mr. Swanson, had been assured by Cautious Cal that we were in Nicaragua to uphold our Prestige in Latin America against that of Mexico. This was Something that the Eagle, who was No Fool, had Already Suspected.

From the New York World

"IF YOU DON'T LIKE THESE, I'LL THINK OF ANOTHER"

The Eagle flew away thinking it was Pretty Soft for Diaz, but the next day the Newspaper Boys got Another Earful. This time it was Officially Stated that we were in Nicaragua because of the Evarts Doctrine, a poor relation of the Monroe Doctrine but capable of raising Some Hell on its own account. The Evarts Doctrine was promulgated by William M. Evarts, Secretary of State, in a letter to our Minister to Mexico in 1878. In true He-Man Style Mr. Evarts wrote that the United States was out to protect the lives and property of its citizens and was "not solicitous about the methods to accomplish this protection of its imperiled nationals." The Eagle also overheard Nervous Nellie declare that for Mexico to allow arms to be shipped to Sacasa after we had hailed Diaz as our Angel Child was an Unfriendly Act.

The Eagle spent three days trying to digest this Mess, but on January 10 he spied some Typewritten Sheets that an Unappreciative Page had dropped out of one of the Capitol windows. The Stuff proved to be a Message to Congress from Cautious Cal giving five reasons why we were in Nicaragua, all bad and all old except One. That is to say, one wasn't old. It was that we were in Nicaragua to prevent an Inflation of the Currency.

"Well, well!" said the Eagle when he read that. "Can you beat it?" Evidently you could, for two days later Nervous Nellie let the Cat out of the Bag or rather the Bird out of the Cage. The Bird, he said, was Red; its habitat was Mexico. It lived on Food imported from Moscow and unless it was promptly chloroformed there would be the Devil to Pay all over Latin America, not to speak of the Nordic U. S. A.

The Eagle thought this was Slush. He had met this Bird occasionally when flying along the Rio Grande and had found him to be a Reg'lar Feller who minded His Business as long as you Minded Yours. So the Eagle went next day for a Personal Chat with the Secretary of State. Hopping on the Window-sill he sang "Nellie Was a Lady" until the Secretary looked up. Then the Eagle cleared his throat and began.

"Mr. Secretary," he said, remembering the formula of the Newspaper Boys, "in the last two weeks I've heard a Dozen Reasons why we are in Nicaragua. Snatch me Baldheaded if I know which to believe. None of them Sounds Good."

"Dear me! Dear me!" mourned Nervous Nellie. "I thought that with So Many Shots I'd be sure to hit the Bull's-Eye with one. But I've got four clerks in the next room working on New Ones. Come in tomorrow morning and I think I can Fit You out."

"I don't want more reasons but better ones," replied the Eagle. "I'm getting especially sick of the Stuff about that Red Bird. In the first place he's a friend of mine, and in the second he is only a nice quiet sort of red."

"But," said Nervous Nellie, "he will destroy your Nests and nationalize your Eggs."

"Twaddle!" responded the Eagle, forgetting the formula of the Newspaper Boys. "I'm not afraid of your Red Bird. In fact he reminds me of myself when I was Young and Idealistic and not so Fat and Bald-headed an Eagle as I am today. I can't see anything in trying to chloroform the Bird—neither Kudos nor Kale."

"The Kudos," replied Nervous Nellie, less nervously, "will go to me and Cautious Cal—who may need it in 1928. The Kale will go to Wall Street."

"But where do I come in?" asked the Eagle, stroking his Polished Dome with his Fore Talon.

"You," answered the Secretary not unkindly, "you will Get Yours all right, all right, first in the Trenches and later in the Taxes."

Moral—What's Sauce for the Goose is Sauce for the Gander, but there is Some Bilgewater in Washington too thick for Any Bird to Swallow.

What Made These Women "Modern"?

The seventh article in the series of personal revelations by well-known women will appear next week. If you have missed the first six, mail this announcement and seventy cents. John B. Watson, behaviorist, and Beatrice M. Hinkle, psychoanalyst, will point out in The Nation the significance of the anonymous articles.

What the World Thinks of America

England

LONDON Daily News (January 11). "So barren of argument is the American war policy in defending the indefensible Nicaraguan adventure that Senator Willis has asserted that if the United States had kept out, England, to protect Englishmen in Nicaragua, would have sent the British navy to take charge . . . a glaring example of the hypocrisy of American moral philosophy."

London Outlook (January 1). ". . . most Latin-American states are watching Washington with considerable apprehension. In place of the Pan-American spirit which Mr. Hughes fostered with considerable success when he was Secretary of State, there is now definite hostility, mingled with fear as to what may come next. There is a feeling abroad that under Mr. Kellogg official Washington has undertaken a definitely aggressive policy toward Latin America. . . . there is a strong war party in the United States, and the antagonism between Mexico and the States has been of such long standing that the situation has become dangerous in the extreme. If some moral pretext can be found it will not be difficult to set America aflame with the war spirit."

London Spectator (January 8). "The whole of Central and South America will be further excited against the Monroe Doctrine. The shield will be regarded as a dagger."

London New Statesman (January 1). "The economic interests of the United States in Nicaragua are very large, and it is undoubtedly the representatives of those interests who are most actively spreading from Washington the grotesque story about Mexico's design for a Bolshevist hegemony in Central America."

London Nation and Athenaeum (January 1). "The [Nicaraguan] affair has created a sensation throughout Latin America, and President Coolidge is called upon to defend his policy. . . . Such action is inevitable in the present circumstances [he explains], but the United States 'never takes sides.' This statement has a singular sound in the face of the fact that the State Department has recognized Señor Diaz, while Dr. Sacasa has been accorded recognition by Mexico."

London Sunday Worker (January 2). "The setback to the 'conservative' forces in Nicaragua, followed by the skilful move of the United States in declaring the main zones occupied or threatened by the 'liberals' neutral, has made it more difficult than ever for President Coolidge to disguise the fact that the struggle between President Diaz and Dr. Sacasa—between the 'conservatives' and the 'liberals'—is the struggle—perhaps the final one—of Nicaragua itself to resist complete absorption into the imperialist system of the United States.

"For the government of the U. S. A. it is a stage toward the complete conquest of power in Central America and the Caribbean Sea."

Manchester Guardian (January 11). "Before the crisis Mr. Coolidge plainly was on the side of the peacemakers, but since the intervention of Rear Admiral Latimer it would seem that his assent has been obtained both to the definite taking of sides in Nicaragua and to the adoption by the State Department of a minatory tone toward Mexico."

France

Echo de Paris (Pertinax, semi-official political writer). "The absorption of Panama proves, no matter what one says, that American imperialism exists. It differs from European efforts at hegemony only by the weakness of the obstacles it meets. . . . After the conquest of the Spanish colonies in 1898 there came the subjugation of Panama in 1904, the Dominican Republic in 1907, Haiti in 1915, Nicaragua in 1916, and Honduras in 1924."

La Liberté (Conservative). "The star-spangled banner is fast becoming the symbol of a nation of prey for the descendants of Bolivar. America is assuming a position similar to that of Germany before the war."

L'Humanité (Communist). "The American imperialism of 1927 is more dangerous than Germany's was in 1914."

Le Temps (Semi-official). "The Monroe Doctrine, transformed from an American principle of defense against the Europe of the Holy Alliance, has now became the postulate of the United States protectorate over the South American republics. . . . Alternately, under various forms and combinations of seductive dollar diplomacy and the coercive policy of the 'big stick,' the doctrine openly serves the objects of those two so closely allied forces, the State Department in Washington and the bankers in New York."

Le Temps (January 10). "It is difficult to admit that the principles and methods which characterize America's attitude in Nicaragua and Mexico do not reveal an imperialistic policy. One understands perfectly why the republics of Latin America look toward the future with serious apprehension."

Germany

Berlin Lokal-Anzeiger (Nationalist). "The policy of North America now shows itself in its true colors as a policy of might against the independence of small countries, which are weak both in respect to their economic position and military establishment."

Berlin Vorwärts (Socialist) of January 12. "With unparalleled cynicism the Coolidge Government continues its intervention in the activities of Nicaragua for the benefit of the defeated usurper Diaz, despite protests from Americans as well as warnings from Latin America. The United States believes it cannot permit any neighboring states to use violence, since the past showed all such undertakings successful. In reality the history of the expansion of North American influence in Central America is merely a long chain of brutal oppression."

Italy

Giornale d'Italia (Rome) of January 11. "The United States today is one of the leading imperial Powers of the world, cultivating an unswerving imperial policy supported by dollars and commerce, but when necessary by cannon and armed intervention."

Lavoro d'Italia (Rome) of December 29. "These tendencies in American policy have no need for comment; they all converge in one point, the assertion of American domination everywhere and by every method . . . traditions, ideals, rights, justice, all are set aside when the interests of the state demand it. Like all the imperialisms of history, even American imperialism in its relations with other states recognizes but one law—that of force."

SPAIN

El Debate (Madrid) of December 30. "The economic advance of the United States disturbs this paper, which sees new evidence in the treatment of Nicaragua of a chain forged by the Northern republic to bind South American countries, which can only end in the complete subjugation of free nations."

El Sol (Madrid) of January 13. "It is the Spanish Government's duty to give an expression of sympathy with South America without violating the international protocol. Certainly Spain can do more by creating genuine Hispano-American ties than all the Columbus Day celebrations in many centuries."

CUBA

Diario de Cuba (Havana) of December 31 scores both the "policy of imperialism of the United States in Latin America" and the "cowardice" of the Latin-American republics in failing to rally to the defense of a small sister nation.

ARGENTINA

La Nacion (Buenos Aires) of January 12. "No acts against Americans justified military intervention without first exhausting all diplomatic measures and resources, which the United States would have applied in the case of any other nation not so weak as Nicaragua. . . . A new conception of imperialism, crudely materialistic, has supplanted the sentiments of high idealism which the great leaders of the United States had established."

BRAZIL

Jornal do Brazil (Rio de Janeiro) of January 13. Warning Brazil against increasing its national financial obligations to the United States, it describes such a step as "becoming caught in a dangerous web of gold."

PARAGUAY

La Tribuna (Asuncion) of January 12. "North American intervention makes it known to the world that 'might makes right' in America."

PERU

Diario Comercio (Lima). "It is strange that war vessels should be sent to an independent country under the pretext of defending Yankee interests."

COSTA RICA

Diario de Costa Rica (San Jose) of January 7. "Since the interests and lives of Americans and other foreigners were respected in Nicaragua, the attitude of the American State Department fails to explain but rather hurts the Pan-American sentiments voiced by Mr. Kellogg in his speeches. It also takes away from the prestige of the Monroe Doctrine."

[Those excerpts not quoted directly from foreign papers are taken from dispatches of the Associated Press or the New York Times.]

Dollars and Bullets: A History

Compiled, Mainly from State Department Records

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

1907

Central American Court of Justice created under joint auspices of United States and Mexico.

1909

October 7. American consul at Bluefields, Nicaragua, wires State Department that "a revolution will start in Bluefields on the 8th," that the revolutionaries "propose to protect the property of foreigners," and that General Emiliano Chamorro (who, with J. J. Estrada and Adolfo Diaz, secretary—at $1,000 per year—of an American mining company, was to lead the revolution) has just landed secretly from Costa Rica.

October 12. Consul wires State Department that revolution occurred on 10th; that "foreign business interests are enthusiastic," that "immediate reduction of tariff is assured; also the annulment of all concessions not owned by foreigners."

December 1. Secretary Knox withdraws recognition of Nicaraguan Government, stating that "the Government of the United States is convinced that the revolution represents the ideals and the will of a majority of the Nicaraguan people more faithfully than does the Government of President Zelaya."

December 16. Zelaya resigns, naming Madriz, also of Liberal Party, to succeed him.

1910

May 16. Madriz forces, having swept all Nicaragua, call upon Estrada to surrender his last stronghold at Bluefields.

May 16. U. S. S. Paducah declares Bluefields a neutral zone.

May 31. United States prohibits interference with American ships carrying arms to Estrada in Bluefields; insists that customs duties be paid to Estrada faction, not to Madriz.

August 20. Madriz resigns; Estrada enters capital and declares himself President; his first official act is to telegraph Secretary Knox that the victorious party "entertains warm regard for American people."

September 12. Estrada promises to ask for American loan.

October 11. Department of State offers aid in securing loan from American bankers, suggests foreign control of customs, and offers service of "confidential financial expert."

October 18. Thomas C. Dawson arrives as special Agent of the United States.

October 27. "Dawson Pact" signed on board United States battleship by Nicaraguan leaders, promising loan, American customs control, and a Claims Commission—one member to be appointed by Nicaragua, two by United States—to settle American claims against Nicaragua; and agreeing upon election of Estrada and Diaz as President and Vice-President.

December 31. General election; Estrada and Diaz unanimously elected.

1911

March 27. American Minister cables "President Estrada is being sustained solely by the moral effect of our support and the belief that he would unquestionably have that support in case of trouble."

March 29. Estrada by presidential decree ratifies Dawson plan for Claims Commission.

April 4. President Estrada dissolves Assembly; revolution threatens.

Late April. New Assembly, subordinate to Estrada, elected.

May 6. New Assembly authorizes President to negotiate loan with American bankers.

May 9. Estrada resigns in favor of Diaz.

May 14. Department of State approves recognition of Diaz; revolution still threatens.

June 5. American Minister reports informing Diaz that "I had communicated to my Government his pledge not to resign and that I was instructed to say that my Government considered the pledge as given to it through me and appreciated it very much."

June 6. Knox-Castrillo treaty signed, United States offering to aid Nicaragua to get $15,000,000 loan from American bankers, customs to be put under American control as security. (This treaty was never ratified, either by the American Senate or the Nicaraguan Assembly.)

July 30. American Minister reports that Diaz is a mere figurehead, but has "repeated his promise not to resign until the loan matter had been settled."

September 1. Brown Brothers and Company, and J. and W. Seligman and Company, New York bankers, sign contract for $15,000,000 loan if and when treaty is ratified; meanwhile lend Diaz Government $1,500,000, also guaranteed on customs, which they are to control; bankers also take option for 51 per cent of stock of National Bank of Nicaragua, and railway rights.

November 20. State Department wires to hold Assembly in session until American fiscal experts arrive, as supplementary legislation may be needed.

December 2. Diaz orders Assembly held in session.

December 21. Diaz confidentially suggests treaty "permitting the United States to intervene in our internal affairs."

December 23. Secretary Knox expresses "intense gratification."

1912

March 26. Same bankers give Nicaragua further loan of $500,000 taking lien on government steamship and railway lines.

July 29. Anti-Diaz revolution breaks out; Diaz appoints Chamorro his general-in-chief.

August 3. Revolution spreading; Diaz asks "that the Government of the United States guarantee with its forces security for the property of American citizens in Nicaragua and that it extend its protection to all the inhabitants of the republic."

August 4. 100 men from U. S. S. Annapolis arrive in Nicaraguan capital. United States Minister orders revolutionaries to return engine and two box cars to American corporation operating railroad.

August 11-15. Nicaraguan capital bombarded by revolutionaries.

August 12. American manager of Bank of Nicaragua wires James Brown of Brown Brothers for protection. Brown consults State Department.

August 15. Major Smedley D. Butler with 350 United States marines arrives in capital.

August 20 (about). American Minister declares capital a neutral zone.

September 4. State Department announces its policy is "to take the necessary measures for an adequate legation guard at Managua, to keep open communications, and to protect American life and property." Also states that "the American bankers who have made investments . ... have applied for protection."

September 5. Admiral Southerland arrives with reinforcements.

September 15. Expeditionary force under Butler starts north.

October 6. Marines complete campaign by capture of Leon, last revolutionary stronghold; 4 marines, 3,000 (estimated) Nicaraguans killed in course of campaign.

November 2. With American marines guarding the polls, Diaz is unanimously reelected for four-year term.

November 4. New $500,000 loan by bankers, secured by American collection of tobacco and liquor taxes, and option for purchase by bankers of remaining 49 per cent of railroad stock.

November 14. Admiral Southerland, Major Butler, and bulk of United States expeditionary force leave Nicaragua.

December 13. All marines except 100 men at capital and a ship at Corinto recommended withdrawn.

1913

October 8. Bankers buy majority stock of railroad for $1,000,000 and of bank for $153,000 and make $1,000,000 loan; of this $2,153,000 all but $772,000 is held to repay previous loans.

November. Chamorro is unanimously elected to succeed Diaz.

1916

February 18. Bryan-Chamorro treaty signed; United States pays $3,000,000 for right to build canal across Nicaragua, and for 99-year lease of naval bases on Nicaraguan territory. Money is used to repay American creditors of Nicaragua. (Costa Rica and Salvador protested that this treaty violated their treaty rights, and appealed to the Central American Court of Justice, which ruled that the treaty was invalid. Nicaragua, encouraged by United States, refused to accept the verdict; and in 1918, accordingly, the court dissolved.)

1924

July 12. Nicaragua pays off last of her debts to Brown Brothers and J. and W. Seligman and Company. Railway and National Bank are returned to Nicaragua, although Americans are retained as members of directorates.

October. First free elections in Nicaraguan history held under new election law. Carlos Solorzano, Liberal, defeats Emiliano Chamorro two to one for Presidency; Juan Sacasa is elected Vice-President.

1925

August 3. American marines are withdrawn from Nicaragua, leaving native constabulary in charge of American officer.

October 25. Chamorro and Diaz seize power by coup d'etat.

1926

January 16. Chamorro, after expelling opposition members of Assembly, has Assembly elect him President. Solorzano is forced to resign, Sacasa to flee.

January 22. State Department refuses to recognize Chamorro because he gained office by use of force.

Early May. Liberal revolution to reinstate constitutional regime begins.

October 30. Chamorro, discouraged by State Department hostility, resigns.

November 10. Adolfo Diaz elected President by Chamorro's Assembly.

November 15. Diaz asks for American aid and support.

November 17. State Department recognizes Diaz.

November 18. New loan agreement negotiated by Diaz with New York bankers.

December 7. Mexico recognizes Sacasa as constitutional President of Nicaragua.

December 24. Admiral Latimer lands troops at Bluefields.

December 25. Sacasa is ordered to disarm or get out.

In the Driftway

A GOOD friend of the Drifter's has a morbid curiosity to see himself as others see him, which invariably leads to chagrin. He should have known better than to eavesdrop on the theaters of Moscow, where in two entirely different plays he saw the same portrait of himself, in fact, of all Americans. This is what Russians think an American is like: He wears loud plaid knickerbockers and if he were a woman he would also wear a lorgnette. He talks with a drawl, and carries a light stick. He is forever snapping pictures with a pocket kodak, especially when he has the rare good fortune to see a suicide or an execution. He fox-trots incessantly, and interrupts his ungraceful seesawing only to gulp a tumbler of champagne. When in Mr. Meyerhold's famous play, "Rechi Kitai"—Roar, China!—an American answering to this description was quietly tumbled into the Yangtze, it was impossible not to experience an unforgettable thrill of satisfaction.

* * * * *

IT rather surprised the Drifter to learn what a seditious activity the fox-trot is. He has been known to try it himself, but not as ardently as the printers, movie stars, ice men, and taxi drivers of his acquaintance. Is he to understand that these persons are all deep-dyed imperialists, plotting the destruction of the proletariat? His friend declares he is reconciled to the anti-fox-trot law in Russia, since it increased his chance to see the ballet and the peasant dances. "The best thing in the Moscow version of 'Desire under the Elms' was the admirable lancers of the wedding party; though the set seemed better and the land-greedy people rather more convincing in Russia than in Mr. O'Neill's imitation New England." He continues:

> It does not take much revising to turn Russian dances into pure gymnastics. This is Meyerhold's way of avoiding the bourgeois taint, and adding another color to his orchestration, even if it has no special part in the action of the play. In "Rechi Kitai," for instance, you see a row of large drums on a dark stage, beaten by crouching drummers, and behind each one a wheel of red legs and arms. It might symbolize the execution of two boatmen in the next act, or the revolution to come when China does roar, or the Saturday night of a sampan man, or it might be simply a sinister Eastern dance, to heighten the color and the feeling; but its effect was of the most vital significance.
>
> It is fashionable for a stage setting to consist of a framework of lath and a set of screens instead of painted backdrops of trembling pillars and wrinkled trees. This removes all restraint on the dramatist's imagination as to multiplying scenes, which in the modern Russian play he does with reckless abandon. Russian art in general is not simple, probably due to the influence of the language.

* * * * *

ALL of which is interesting and greatly strengthens the Drifter's resolve to leave for the Soviet Union on the next boat. He makes this resolve every morning before breakfast. A day will surely come when he will not be forced to break it before lunch. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Brutus: Enough About His Life to Blast His Reputation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When Cicero went out to Asia Minor as governor of Cilicia and adjacent territory he carried with him the government's mandate to reseat a certain Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, upon his wabbly throne. Now this legislation had been put through the Roman senate by Pompey and Brutus, with the help of the sanctified Cato, because they had both gambled huge sums of money on loans to the king and if anyone more acceptable to the people should get his crown they never would be paid. Cicero bolstered up the tottering dynasty and Brutus got his pound of flesh.

More serious was the case of the city of Salamis on the island of Cyprus. Cicero found an obscure Roman man of business, Scaptius by name, trying to collect from the Salaminians a large sum of money, with interest at 4 per cent per month. When the impoverished citizens could not pay, Scaptius obtained cavalry from the previous governor and besieged the city fathers in the senate house until five of them died of starvation.

Cicero, hearing of this twentieth-century strong-arm method of treating subject peoples, withdrew the cavalry entirely from Cyprus and made an astounding rule for those days—that no Roman engaged in business in the province should hold government office or use any troops for the collecting of investments. Scaptius, blocked, denied troops or office, became truculent. The governor was obdurate—12 per cent compounded annually was all that he would permit on this debt, and no military to collect. At this point Brutus disclosed his friendship for Scaptius, seeking to induce Cicero to wink at his methods. When the man of letters turned politician did not yield, Brutus became highly offended and Cicero, to his amazement, learned that Scaptius was only a man of straw and that the person whose money was at stake and who was trying to collect a debt with interest at 4 per cent per month was none other than Brutus himself, the "noblest Roman of them all."

Hanover, N. H., December 29 ERLE WILSON MESSER

Beware the "Larger Issue"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Now is the time to beware of a "larger issue." The aggressive attitude of the Coolidge Administration toward Nicaragua and Mexico is so plainly inspired by the financial interests operating in these countries that war would be exceedingly unpopular. Hence Secretary Kellogg's efforts to "sell" a capitalist war to the American people by asserting that Latin America is hanging over a Red abyss. But his assertion fell dead flat. Doubtless the American imperialists will make other attempts to distract attention from their real objects. That is their business.

The Boer War is of especial interest in this connection. It originated in a conspiracy to overthrow the Boer Republic entered into by the South African mine owners and the Colonial Secretary, Joseph Chamberlain. But the war party in England cleverly shifted the issue to that of preserving the British Empire. The trick succeeded, and the Boer War received the enthusiastic support of the British people. England repudiated her liberal traditions as the friend of oppressed peoples, and there followed a debauch of imperialism which ran to such wild extremes that it disgusted even that stout old Tory, G. K. Chesterton.

Undoubtedly the Monroe Doctrine originated in a genuine desire of the United States to save the New World from autocracy. However, as a result of the investments of American capital in Latin America and of the Panama Canal the doctrine underwent a subtle change. It is no longer the means of preventing European aggression but of cloaking American aggression. In effect Latin America is now a gigantic protectorate of the United States.

Perhaps the future has in store a cosmic satire. The Monroe Doctrine may become the means used by the United States to destroy democracy in Latin America.

New York, January 15 J. Salwyn Schapiro

Arbitration in 1848

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: You remind your readers that our Treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo made with Mexico in 1848 contained a recommendation that in case of future disputes the country deeming itself aggrieved should consider arbitration.

Research in the manuscript papers of Nicholas Trist, recently acquired by the Library of Congress, shows that during the negotiations the Mexicans from the first insisted on arbitration. The proposal to arbitrate was not even considered by Trist, who says in his report to President Polk: "They propose arbitration as the just mode of settling this question. . . . I decline to enter into this question, or to consider the proposal. . . . We must proceed to business at once."

The Mexicans then proposed a clause providing for compulsory arbitration, in the future. This the prudent Trist would have none of, but he finally consented to the present mild Article 21, which merely suggests that in case of future disputes arbitration be "maturely considered," and not refused by either party unless deemed incompatible with the circumstances of the case. Such a clause, Trist assured the administration, could "do no harm." Apparently it has not!

Northampton, Mass., January 15 M. and M. Curti

The American Arbitration Crusade

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Nation may be glad to place before its readers a practical substitute for war, be it never so radical. The proposal to negotiate compulsory arbitration treaties with all countries is extremely radical. Instead of pledging individuals to refuse to fight—a program deemed Bolshevistic and unpatriotic—the American Arbitration Crusade is endeavoring to pledge the entire nation to refuse to fight any country for any cause at any time. And yet this program should win the support of the officer of the military training camp who urges preparedness to prevent war, for no action is demanded of the United States that is not reciprocal on the part of other nations.

The United States has made no such treaty. The Bryan treaties were for conciliation, the disputants remaining free to reject the recommendation of the commission. The Root treaties excepted questions of vital interest or national honor. War is not outlawed under any of them.

To arouse popular interest the American Arbitration Crusade, 114 East Thirty-first Street, New York City, offers the following prizes: $100 for the best letter, editorial, or article on the subject of arbitration appearing in any paper of at least 5,000 circulation; $100 for the best public demonstration or concerted endeavor for obligatory arbitration; $100 for the best cartoon; $100 for the best slogan; $100 for the best sermon. All contests close July 4, 1927.

New York, January 11 William Floyd

Guns for Victims

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I regret your dictum that "a federal law limiting drastically the importation and transportation of revolvers would [help] end gunmen and banditry." It may be delicately suggested that the present federal control of hard liquor is a parallel of how the proposed law would work in practice. Such a law would surely tend to raise the now scandalously high price of good firearms. I would venture that in periods of high-pressure banditry there exists a class molded by economic environment and training which comes to believe that to rob and kill is a good life. On this I have no statistics, but have the impression that such periods generally follow after times of war. In other words, illegal robbery survives after the lawful form is temporarily suspended.

It may be rash to propose the arming of the victim class, not the vain attempt to disarm the predatory poor. But I know from personal experience and some observation that even a mob recruited from the American Legion and the Knights of Columbus will prefer for its victim the unskilled in arms, and will only growl at those who are ready, able, and willing to make a two-sided affair of the armed raid. From among many inept acts of government we must except the order for military patrols of the mails. It seems to work.

The only effective alternative to arming the victim class would be the continental system of registration, passports, and police espionage of citizens, immensely more irksome than the cheerful duty of target practice.

Anyway, I'll say this: If all my guns were taken away by some government snooper, I would exercise diligence in getting others, with all needful accessories.

Butte, Montana, January 1 Harlow Pease

Endow Men

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your plea for the "endowment of men," as well as the endowment of "chairs," needs to be emphasized. We all know that men, especially young men, if they could be freed from economic pressure, would make outstanding leaders in liberal movements. There is no man who deserves our sympathy more than a young man of promise, full of ideals and decision of character, who must repress his zeal because of the necessity of making a living. When middle life is reached and sufficient income provided, the urge to carry on for a more liberal economic order has often been lost.

It is because of the economic problem that we have so few "genuinely independent individuals capable of taking intelligent charge of their own lives," as is urged by Harry Emerson Fosdick. If some such men could be "endowed," the world would greatly gain thereby.

Denver, Colorado, January 8 William E. Sweet

Books and Plays

Death and Dancing

By DONALD KIRKLEY

Dancing, they talked of the dead girl Anna.
They were sad, thinking of Anna.
Dancing lightly, dancing gracefully, they were sad, thinking of Anna.
Saxophone, violin, drum
Droned out a sweet waltz, a soft waltz, a slow waltz.
One two three, one two three, one two three, one.
The dead girl Anna had roses in her hair,
The dead girl Anna, God but she was fair.
One two three, one two three, one two three, one.
"Your hair is sweet, your body is fair,
Anna's body tonight is where?"
One two three, one two three, one two three, one two three.
She was Anna's friend,
He was Anna's lover:
Will the dancing never end?
The earth is cold above her.
One two three, one two three, one two three, one two three.
Lithe in his arms, warm in his arms,
She dances gracefully, thinking of death.
Strong in her arms, solid in her arms,
He dances lightly, thinking of death.
One two three, one two three, one two three, one two three.
Death and dancing, dancing and death.
Death has taken Anna, Anna was a dancer,
Anna was a dancer and danced with death.
One two three, one two three, one two three, one two three.
Pirouette sadly, fair friend of Anna,
Whirl around lightly, man who loved Anna,
Pirouette, whirl around, thinking of Anna,
Thinking of Anna, dancing, dancing, thinking of Anna, thinking of death.
One two three, one two three, one two three, one two three,
One two three, one two three, one two three, one.

First Glance

"NOW and then he would start and exclaim: 'Oh, that I were young again! I would go to America, too. Hey! what a country it will be, Mr. Audubon.' I retorted by exclaiming, 'Hey! what a country it is already, Mr. Bewick!' " Thus the author of "The Birds of America" to the author of "British Birds," as the two sat over their hot brandy toddy in Newcastle in April, 1827. It was very nearly a hundred years ago, and the enthusiasm of the younger man may be explained either by that fact or by the nature of his genius, which was first to adore birds and after that to adore America. Lewis Mumford has recently written of the golden day when America had men like Emerson, Thoreau, Hawthorne, Whitman, and Melville. He might have touched the brow of John James Audubon as he went along; the radiance of a golden age was there, too, and it is still there for anyone who will open any of the five volumes of "Ornithological Biography" and read. Such a reader may well be interested in what is said there about birds; he is sure to be captivated by the occasional episodes which tell of more general things seen and done by Audubon as he tramped through his beloved Ohio and Mississippi river valleys. These now, it is pleasant to know, are collected and for the first time separately printed under their original title, "Delineations of American Scenery and Character," by the biographer of Audubon, Francis Hobart Herrick (G. A. Baker and Company: $4.50).

Born in Haiti in 1785, the natural son of a French lieutenant and a Creole woman, Audubon lived as a boy in France. But as soon as occasion offered he sailed swiftly back to the hemisphere which was to be his hunting-ground. "I gazed with rapture upon its noble forests, and no sooner had I landed than I set myself to mark every object that presented itself, and became imbued with an anxious desire to discover the purpose and import of that nature which lay spread around me in luxuriant profusion." In his youth he had read of the golden age. Here now he thought he had found it; and nothing ever disillusioned him. On he plunged into the forests, on he trudged along the trails, on he went past river towns and hidden settlements; and all of the people, like all of the trees, were heroes in his eyes. He gives an account that would have been pleasing to Homer of a night spent in the lonely cabin of young Willy and Eliza; the pair are as hospitable to him as Baucis and Philemon—though they were old—once were to Jupiter and Mercury among the Phrygian hills. The fugitive slave, living with his wife and three children in a cane-brake which the separate owners of the five would never penetrate, rises to classic stature when Audubon discovers him and talks to him. The youth of Kentucky advancing to a barbecue resemble "a procession of nymphs and disguised divinities." Audubon has heard the squatters along the lower Mississippi dismissed as "a sallow, sickly-looking sort of miserable beings," and he goes to inspect them. "See the joyous mother and daughters as they stand on the bank!" They are expecting their joyous husband and father home from New Orleans whither he has floated a raft of saw-logs. "A store of vegetables lies around them, a large tub of fresh milk is at their feet, and in their hands are plates filled with rolls of butter." What difference if our glorious bird-painter was deceived? At all events he could write endlessly in this rapturous strain without growing tiresome, so great and so pure was his energy. Perhaps he was not deceived.

MARK VAN DOREN

Secretary Houston Recalls

Eight Years with Wilson's Cabinet—1913 to 1920. By David F. Houston. Doubleday, Page and Company. Two volumes. $10.

THE publishers make surprising claims for this work. They say that "no other living man knows as much about Woodrow Wilson as David F. Houston," and further that "Houston opens the first true complete record of Wilson and his conduct of the government at home." I do not find justification for these statements in the 457,000 words before me. And a very different story is told in the author's modest foreword. Speaking of himself in the third person, he says:

> The record is a partial one only, and it is necessarily partial because he made no attempt except incidentally or occasionally even to indicate the views or deal with the activities of other members of the Cabinet. He offers it not as a complete or balanced account of the events, but as a contemporaneous record which may help to fill in the picture of eight important years and be of value to the historian.

Bearing strictly in mind these limitations, it may be said that the author fulfils his undertaking.

Secretary Houston so carefully observes the rule of silence with respect to his Cabinet associates that we must look elsewhere even for the names of some of them. Those for whom the rule is relaxed will not all be grateful for the attention given them. Bryan is the only colleague to be given a "close up" in the picture; and his friends will regret this distinction. Houston's rigorous mind admitted no sympathy for Bryan's enthusiasms and personal devotions. They did not seem to be logical. His break with the President has been so thoroughly ventilated by friends and foes of both men that we have only repetition, not revelation, in these volumes. From the author's lump-sum estimate of Wilson's Cabinet we learn that at least a third of its members must be taken as "liabilities." Wilson's consultations with his advisers, as reported by Houston, were not illuminating. They were rarely (if ever) determinative of important matters. Many Presidential decisions seem to have been made without reference to Cabinet opinions.

Much detail is given concerning the Federal Reserve Act and concerning our naval and military establishments. Full account appears of the operations of the Department of Agriculture; but there will not be universal agreement with the author's estimate of the importance of this Department's efforts toward increase of crop production. Many will suspect that high prices were sufficient to account for the results actually attained. In a chapter on Inter-Allied war debts the case, developed up to 1920, is well presented. The extreme cancelationists offer some considerations, political and sentimental, which are not touched upon by our author; but we have from him the official foundations of this controversy.

Many readers will turn to the long chapter called An Estimate of Woodrow Wilson, hoping there to find leading and light. Concerning these pages the author himself expresses a view which may well be adopted by the reader. "It is not even satisfactory to me, and I shall doubtless revise it as I get sidelights from his other friends, from his critics, and from new materials." It is pleasant to read Houston's tribute to Wilson's unselfishness. He comments upon the directness and lucidity of the President's intellectual processes, while emphasizing the fact that, as described by himself, his was "a single-track mind."

Wilson's treatment of the Mexican situation remains where other records have left it. Insistence upon the wrong of interference with a people struggling toward true democracy, followed by sudden determination to use force in the suppression of Mexican revolutions—that is the picture. We know from other sources that the tragic order to seize the Vera Cruz custom house was sleepily made by the President at half-past two in the morning. Admiral Mayo's aggressive demand for a salute to our flag had little to do with the decision. Our rulers decided that an expected cargo of arms should not be received in Vera Cruz harbor. A number of lives—American and Mexican—were sacrificed. The resulting good, if any, is to be found among the imponderables. The arms were duly landed a few miles down the coast. The sending of an army and banners into the heart of Mexico to avenge a bandit raid is not discussed by Houston. Indeed he leaves the "mess," as he calls it, where Mohammed's coffin was left.

As to the World War, Page, House, Tumulty, Daniels, Ray Stannard Baker, and many others—officials and intimates of the Administration—have preceded our author in the field. We learn from him of his own positive condemnation of all things German. Indeed it appears from these memoirs that, with the exception of Bryan, practically no member of the original Cabinet heeded the President's early injunction to "think neutrally." From Tumulty we have learned that Wilson himself rejected such an attitude in 1914 as in 1917. Houston emphasizes his own hearty acceptance of the extreme views that became Wilson's orthodoxy when the President finally unbosomed himself to the world. The record before us was made by a belligerent. It is not disturbed by recent disclosures of historians on both sides of the Atlantic. Nor is it affected by President Wilson's violent denunciation of French post-war policies. It reveals the state of mind out of which wars are made in Berlin, London, Paris, and Washington.

OSCAR T. CROSBY

The World's Disillusion

Wedlock. By Jacob Wassermann. Translated by Ludwig Lewisohn. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

WHEN a novelist stops being an artist and for some reason decides to turn himself into a priest he thereby sets his powers to the doing of bloody-minded work. He is no longer content to let his characters play their own lives and bring about their own doom. Once upon a time he would let them speak from their own hearts and go their ways. He never showed in his own person. He was a god invisible. Now that he has become a priest he drags his men and women up the steps of the temple and lays them on the altar. Haloed and garmented in a sacrificial zeal he cuts out the heart and examines the entrails and makes speeches to the crowd in the temple and prays to his god. He slays his own inventions for the sake of an idea or to explain a system of thought or for the good of society or to appease a wrathful divinity. As his victims lie with their hearts torn out and their mouths stopped with blood he discourses on their souls and informs the worshipful crowd that these victims are types and symbols of society (not men and women by their own nature) and that by their example the ills of life may be cured.

Since "Christian Wahnschaffe" (mysteriously translated as "The World's Illusion") Wassermann has somehow learned the vows and duties of priesthood. In almost all of "Gold" and "Oberlin's Three Stages" he did give us the drama of life rather than ideas and symbols of life; but even in those books one could see the mantle of prophecy and revelation gather like a cloud round his shoulders. The characters were not all men and women. They were something else: like a woman ceasing to be a woman and becoming das Ewig-Weibliche. Now in "Laudin und die Seinen" (mysteriously translated as "Wedlock") Wassermann has taken the last initiation of modern priesthood. In other words he has been reading psychology. Instead of letting the world of life go by in haunting and unforgettable pictures as he does in "Christian Wahnschaffe" he invents Laudin and his wife Pia and most of the other characters only that he may pull down the pillars of society and show the gray rats gnawing at the timbers. He has all his old impressive magnificence. The only difference is that he has renounced the world and taken up the study of sociology. In so doing he has ceased being the only near fellow we have had in these times to Dostoevski and joined H. G. Wells and all other lecturers to whom humanity seems of much less importance than a system of ideas.

Fortunately Wassermann cannot altogether escape his own powers. His books still stand like cities cut from basalt and hued with the cloudy light of a somber sun. Rivers flood from obscene cellars and bear a ghastly freight of men and women drowned in muddy waters of sin and their souls white like leprosy. Tender and brave hearts are racked with pain and thrown into sulphurous pits of betrayal and crime and wrong. All the agony and idealism and heroic futility of life crowd into pages ribbed with an adamantine austerity. Yet there remains the fatal difference from most of the earlier works. The men and women cease talking. Long essays in indirect discourse and letters written from one character to another and endless pages of analysis drag their slow length like wise pythons and crush the bones of action and swallow every semblance of living life. It is very much as if at every performance of the "Ring" operas it was made customary for a lecturer to get up in a box and chant Wagner's system of metaphysics through the rolling groundswell of the music.

Laudin is a lawyer of distinguished eminence. More and more with the years he goes down and down into the muddy cellars which rot under the base of the majestic temple of justice. He stands appalled by the impotence of the law to bring any happiness or ease of pain or relief from obscure misery to the men and women who come to his office for advice and counsel. The profound and obscure springs of human emotion and conduct lie so rooted in the immense dark woods of life that he feels like a man trying to exterminate the fungus on a dying tree by the simple process of reading from a musty book or making a clever speech in court where he is opposed by advocates without scruples or honesty. He is a fly caught in the complex web of society and he cannot find the spider. His wife Pia is a sweet and wholly fleshless hausfrau who ministers to his every need. The son of his best friend commits suicide on account of an affair with an actress. He meets the actress and comes near to being meshed in her toils. Case after case of divorce he studies with a growing sense of his utter helplessness to cure the infinite tangle of human maladjustments or to find any one sure way whereby men and women may live in peace. At the last he breaks down and Pia nurses him to health. By some kind of sudden revelation they decide to begin all over again, and loving each other they embark on a new path for some remote ineluctable goal.

The whole book resounds dully from an endless heavy beat of speeches and analysis and introspection. Time after time one lays the thing aside and goes back to "Christian Wahnschaffe" and all its linked scenes of terrible beauty. It looks very much as if Wassermann had set himself to the revelation of all present society. Of course the task is monumental and impressive; and I don't know any other living novelist who can do what Wassermann can do. None the less, ideas perish and take on a green mold of age. Philosophy after philosophy gibbers like a spent ghost. Life remains.

DONALD DOUGLAS

Oil Intrigues

The Oil War. By Anton Mohr. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE world's oil resources are divided almost evenly among British and American companies and the Soviet Union. Lack of capital makes Russia's role, for the time being, a passive one, and Dr. Mohr is therefore right in seeing the international petrol conflict first and foremost as a bitter struggle between Great Britain and the United States for sources of supply. The author is persuaded that in this fracas England will win and that in a few years—when Uncle Sam's gas tank begins to run low—the United States will be forced to pay Great Britain $1,000,000,000 per annum for oil products without which her autos, industries, and navy would languish.

Meanwhile, however—and the talk of substitutes has changed nothing—the battle for the control of old and new fields continues unabated. Officially, the line-up is Royal Dutch-Shell and Anglo-Persian versus Standard Oil. Actually, "the struggle for oil has developed into a quarrel among the Great Powers comparable to the struggle for colonies in the preceding century."

Dr. Mohr, who is lecturer in political geography at the University of Oslo, is at his best not, as one might expect, when he treats of Europe, but rather in dealing with oil intrigues in Latin America. How the violent and peaceful political developments in Mexico, Central America, and the cap of South America are affected by oil intrigues is a dark if fascinating page of twentieth-century history, and Dr. Mohr does the subject justice. Charles A. Beard and H. K. Norton have suggested that I lay these crimes at the door of malicious capitalists seeking only profits and of corrupt officials interested only in bribes. God forbid! One does well to remember that it is the business of government to insure a future supply of the all-important liquid for the millions of its nationals who ride the bus, drive the car, and turn the lathe. But must the United States defy the Mexican constitution, enthrone and dethrone presidents, and foment revolutions in the states south of us in order to achieve this end? There are decent and legal ways of doing business which cost more dollars but fewer lives and which are more in harmony with the lofty principles diplomats so readily invoke.

Dr. Mohr, however, apparently places little faith in the moral effect of marines and machine-guns, for he believes that despite our geographical proximity, our wealth, and the readiness with which our navy backs up the oil companies England will carry off the victory even in the Monroe Doctrine domain. Her diplomats are more clever. Where the State Department refuses to accept the new Mexican land laws British firms have bowed to the inevitable, and Downing Street must be chuckling over the resentment we have been reaping in Latin America as a result of recent affairs in Nicaragua. We play the bully in Latin America and the liberal in China. Britain plays the liberal in Latin America and the bully in China. In the long run, the bully always gets it in the neck, yet diplomacy remains as inconsistent as ever.

Dr. Mohr's treatment of the Lausanne Conference and of the entire Mosul complex is equally good. But with the exception of these chapters—The Near East and Central America—this volume is disappointing. There are the same old tales about Admiral Fisher and about the use of oil in pre-modern times, the same old anecdotes about the Royal Dutch and the Standard which almost every book in the growing oil library furnishes. The volume seems to have been written in 1922 and faultily brought up to date by means of a few footnotes and added paragraphs. There is no mention of Albania, North Persia, the Genoa and Hague conferences, Sinclair's adventures into international petrol politics, the Teapot Dome, and numerous other important items of oil history. The treatment of Russian oil is extremely inadequate and full of misstatements. The chapters on the Royal Dutch and Standard Oil contain no reference beyond 1922.

"The Oil War" is not a book for the man who has even only a rudimentary knowledge of the petrol problem. But it fills the beginner's need of an introductory study. The truly comprehensive work on the role of oil in international affairs is yet to be written.

LOUIS FISCHER

A La Viennese

The City Without Jews. By Hugo Bettauer. Translated from the German by Salomea Neumark Brainin. Bloch Publishing Company. $2.

HERE, in the guise of a problem novel, is a delightful Viennese operetta which should commend itself for American adaptation to Herr Florenz Ziegfeld, himself a Viennese. Bettauer starts with the fanciful proposition: Can a city do without Jews? The anti-Semitic majority of the Austrian Parliament decide to find out. What happens any New Yorker could have told them in advance. The entire business life of Vienna, from the general merchandising in the department stores to the specialized trade of the gay young things of the demi-monde, withers for the lack of Semitic stimulation. The theaters at one fell stroke lose producers, playwrights, and audiences; the aristocratic patisseries are turned into frankfurter stands; and hobnailed shoes and cotton petticoats are the latest style in the exclusive shop-windows. The great summer resorts, "where formerly the sight of anyone who might be suspected of being a Gentile would have created a sensation," are forced to close down (the author omits the plight of those who thrived on excluding Jews); the newspapers, robbed of their most brilliant feuilletonists, become dull and unreadable; politics become even duller, for the Christian-Socialist Party loses its only political issue; and, lastly, Leo Strakosch, brilliant young Jewish etcher, is separated from Lotte, his beloved little blonde beast. Vienna, sighing for its lost Jews, is about to slump into a village of a million and a half peasants when there appears on the scene one Henry Dufresne, who is none other than Leo Strakosch disguised as a Frenchman. At the kiss of this Jewish prince the sleeping princess, Vienna, awakens from her Nordic nightmare and, doffing her flannel nightgown, springs gaily into silk step-ins and the latest spike-heeled slippers.

Not very original satire, but fairly entertaining, and on the whole with very little sting to it—particularly as its author was not Jewish but of aristocratic Teutonic stock. So that the tragic fact that on the publication of the book Bettauer was shot down by a twenty-year-old Nordic strikes an unexpected alien note in its high comedy. One rereads it in vain for an explanation, until one comes across the following paragraph:

> It is possible, and even probable, that one cause for the profound and fanatic anti-Semitism among the male inhabitants of Vienna during the last few decades was the fact that the youth with the Hakenkreuz could not stomach the sight of his Jewish rivals snatching away all the pretty girls.

Which perhaps throws some light on the matter. It is pertinent to remark that the young murderer collapsed when he was told that Bettauer was a Christian himself.

Though professing to have no propagandist bias, "A City Without Jews" bears a moral for Hakenkreuzers and Zionists alike, namely, that without Jews Vienna would be less Viennese, Paris less Parisian, Moscow less Muscovite, New York less New Yorkese, and Tel-Aviv (Palestine) decidedly less American.

ALTER BRODY

When Quakers Turned Adventurers

A Quaker Adventure. By A. Ruth Fry. London: Nisbet and Company. 10/6.

NO FUTURE historian of Europe can ignore the picture of devastation, disease, starvation, and suffering which forms the background of Miss Fry's story of Quaker relief work in Europe. And no picture of practical Christianity of the last quarter century will be complete unless it includes many details of the achievements related in her book.

Miss Fry tells how a group of thirty-three pioneers, believing that any direct participation in the war itself was wrong, went out and devoted themselves to alleviating the suffering brought by the war to civilian populations. She sketches the growth of this group in many countries, until in France alone, in 1918-19, there were more than 500 English and American men and women ministering to the extraordinarily varied needs of a population which had lost practically everything by war. In France over 1,000 of these workers altogether served under the red and black star of the Quaker relief.

The book has chapters on the work in France, Holland and Belgium, Serbia, Russia, Austria, Hungary, Poland, and Germany, with incidental references to other countries. The bare recital of dramatic and often heartrending problems and of equally dramatic achievements in each country is so briefly given that one longs for a full story of the whole enterprise. Those familiar with the events may be amazed at the accuracy of the details which the author has woven into her narrative.

Entire chapters of the book would have to be cited for adequate illustration of the many forms the relief work took. In Germany the main task was the organization and supervision of child-feeding. In Austria an important element was the organizing of farmers and distributors for the restoration of a large and cheap-milk supply to Vienna. In Poland much of the work was fighting disease; but fields in Poland were plowed with Polish war-horses, and tilled with German trench spades bought for four cents each. Agricultural relief was made efficient by a process of pyramiding for usefulness, not for profit. Thus in Poland grain was sold at a nominal price or at a low price on time to peasants. With the proceeds sheep were bought and sold in the same way. The proceeds of the latter transaction were used to purchase fertilizer, which in turn was sold. And so the enterprise went on.

The book should stand on the shelves of every college and every public library as a dispassionate account of a great constructive adventure of unarmed workers, written by one who was both a pioneer in the adventure and a director and leader during its most strenuous period.

EDWARD THOMAS

Books in Brief

The Outlook for American Prose. By Joseph Warren Beach. University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

Mr. Beach writes clearly, with insight, good humor, and—that rarest of American characteristics—temperateness. His general criticism of American prose is summed up in his statement that "what American prose most lacks is flavor . . . we do not seem to love words as the English and French love them, and we do not pick them with jealous affection and arrange them with fastidious care." Few will disagree with this statement. Superficial culture is the most apparent cause, but economic pressure is unquestionably a factor. Naturally, there are a few exceptions. But these are not as numerous as is generally thought. Mr. Beach finds tarnish on several literary halos. Mr. Hergesheimer, sometimes praised for his style, is proved guilty of extremely bad English and incoherency. Mr. Van Vechten, "the Baedeker of the intelligentsia," is charged with unpardonable solecisms and, in fact, the writing of downright nonsense. On the other hand, there are signs of hope, as in the case of Sherwood Anderson.

William Blake. By Osburt Burdett. English Men of Letters. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

Mr. Burdett has steered a lucid path through the maze of Blake's poems and designs. He has kept the twofold aspect of Blake's genius always clearly in mind, and he never absents himself from the question how much harm—and how much good—Blake's lack of education did him. His decision in favor of the first seems to be arrived at a little too easily, so that we get not even an attempt to evaluate the Prophetic Books in their own terms. While the essay is on the whole a useful one, it has the failing common to most of the volumes in the new series of the English Men of Letters—it brightly evades all the difficult problems.

Step Child of the Moon. By Fulton Oursler. Harper and Brothers. $2.

The idea behind Mr. Oursler's novel is good, and were it developed to even one-half of its possibilities we should have an interesting book. But the author has given us stock melodrama—absurd situations and tricky avoidances of solutions to definite problems. Platitudes, ragtag erudition, and stupid local color parade the pages in full panoply, and the whole affair degenerates into one of those novels which make one wonder why Bertha Clay was so harshly criticized.

Demosthenes. By Georges Clemenceau. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

"Demosthenes" is well worth reading. One may take it as a lively biography of the Athenian orator or as the spiritual biography of the "Tiger." From either angle it has interest. Its future significance will depend upon the extent of Clemenceau's posthumous fame. Otherwise it is not important.

Dymer. By Clive Hamilton. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

An interesting narrative, in uninteresting verse, of a spiritual experience.

Primitives: Poems and Woodcuts. By Max Weber. The Spiral Press. $7.50.

The woodcuts are worthy of some of the attention now being given to Negro sculpture; the medium is new, and the execution is impressive. The poems are negligible.

The Candle in the Cabin. A Weaving Together of Script and Singing. By Vachel Lindsay. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

The third volume, indistinguishable from the others, in Mr. Lindsay's series of thin books of pictures and verse.

The Singing Crow and Other Poems. By Nathalia Crane. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

Nathalia Crane continues to promise; but there still is doubt where she will end. Her strong point, of course, is her language—and the reckless use she makes of it. Often fresh and savoring of strength, it is too often at present insignificantly bizarre. There would be no harm in her resting now until she finds out what words mean—even to poets.

Drama

Who's Afraid?

A SOMEWHAT forlorn troupe of actors, hopefully calling itself a "permanent company," has set up shop in the little Grove Street Theater and promises a series of playlets from the Grand Guignol in Paris. When Holbrook Blinn failed in a similar enterprise a number of years ago it was currently reported that the American public was not sufficiently sophisticated to support such an institution, but if it fails now—and I suspect that even a more competent company would fail—an opposite reason may be alleged with at least equal show of truth. If ten or a dozen years ago the American public was too unsophisticated to value a bill of mere shockers, it is too sophisticated for them now.

Perhaps there was a certain phase in the development of the modern theater when obvious and mechanical little plays which have nothing to recommend them except labored impropriety and crude horror had a certain function. Given a theater dripping with sweetness and drenched in light like that which was once ours, and almost anything is a relief. After a prolonged diet composed exclusively of "clean comedy," "optimistic sentiment," and "wholesome drama," mere blood and mere obscenity are healthful and invigorating. In the absence of any genuine drama, at a time when everything is merely tepid and innocuous, it is something to be reminded even inadequately that life can be obscene or ghastly, and indeed certain of the one-act pieces with which the Washington Square Players inaugurated the modern theater in New York did little more than that. But an audience which has in its memory, for example, "What Price Glory?" and half a dozen of O'Neill's plays, is not likely to relish the barren violence of the Grand Guignol. It knows what real drama is. It has seen plays in which real characters suffered real tortures, and it will find the pasteboard horrors of the cheap French shocker merely absurd. Properly to appreciate such pieces one must be in the mood either of the child who wants a ghost story to frighten it or of the adolescent whom the clumsiest impropriety will suffice.

In one respect love and death are much alike—the fundamental processes by which each is accomplished are simple and monotonous—and it is only when we know who is dying or who is making love that either becomes interesting. The mere fact that two members of opposite sex are coupling is not in itself any more comic that the mere fact that someone or other is being killed is tragic; it is just this that the writer of the shocker overlooks. He tortures his brain to find some new and fantastic way in which a murder may be done or an adultery committed; in his search for novelty he may even resort to such desperate expedients as those employed by the respective authors of two of the plays upon the present bill, in one of which the lovers are Lesbian and in the other of which the heroine is seized from behind by a supposedly incurable paralytic who suddenly resumes sufficient control of his projicient apparatus to strangle her; but he neglects to create characters individual enough or credible enough to make us care which are to be buried and which are to be bedded. The result in the present case is two "daring" farces which have nothing except their bad intentions to recommend them and two "thrillers" which are not much more than merely temporarily annoying to the nerves. And, as it is hardly necessary to add, inadequate acting does not improve their effectiveness. In one, it is true, George Renavent (director of the company) gives a vivid performance, and in the same piece Mary Blair is fairly good; but the playing of all the other roles varies only between the pretty bad and the unspeakable.

Frankly, the production of "Ghosts" (Mansfield Theater) in which Mrs. Fiske is appearing is not much better. One has, of course, a respect for this woman who was once a distinguished comedienne, but here she is only a failing woman appearing in a part totally unsuited to her and surrounded by a completely inadequate company. I had always thought of "Ghosts" as a play whose power no performance could hide, but this company, aided apparently by incompetent directors, has achieved the impossible. It has made one of the most moving tragedies of modern times seem thin and feeble. At the Mansfield even Ibsen looks like a bungling playwright.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Interesting Books of 1926

CHOSEN BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Abraham Lincoln. By Carl Sandburg. Harcourt, Brace.
The Memoirs of William Hickey. Vol. IV. Knopf.
The Political Education of Woodrow Wilson. By James Kerney. Century.
Fathers of the Revolution. By Philip Guedalla. Putnam.
Edgar Allan Poe. By Joseph Wood Krutch. Knopf.
The Intimate Papers of Colonel House. By Charles Seymour. Houghton Mifflin.
My Apprenticeship. By Beatrice Webb. Longmans, Green.
Cortes the Conqueror. By Henry Dwight Sedgwick. Bobbs-Merrill.
George Washington. By W. E. Woodward. Boni and Liveright.
Portraits and Portents. By A. G. Gardiner. Harper.
The Conquest of the Philippines by the United States. By Moorfield Storey and Marcial Lichauco. Putnam.
The Decline of the West. By Oswald Spengler. Knopf.
The New Leadership in Industry. By Sam A. Lewisohn. Dutton.
The Art of Thought. By Graham Wallas. Harcourt, Brace.
Education and the Good Life. By Bertrand Russell. Boni and Liveright.
The Story of Philosophy. By Will Durant. Simon and Schuster.
From Goethe to Hauptmann. By Camillo von Klenze. Viking.
Critical Woodcuts. By Stuart P. Sherman. Scribner.
Microbe Hunters. By Paul de Kruif. Harcourt, Brace.
The Arcturus Adventure. By William Beebe. Putnam.
On the Trail of Ancient Man. By Roy Chapman Andrews. Putnam.
Impressions of Old New Orleans. By Arnold Genthe. Doran.
The Romantic Comedians. By Ellen Glasgow. Doubleday, Page.
Show Boat. By Edna Ferber. Doubleday, Page.
Her Son's Wife. By Dorothy Canfield. Harcourt, Brace.
The Kays. By Margaret Deland. Scribner's.

International Relations Section

The Cause of the Conflict with Mexico

THE following summary of the Mexican-American oil and land-law controversy is abstracted from the December 22 issue of the Foreign Policy Association Information Service. Complete copies of its summary, with the texts of the laws, may be obtained from the association, 18 East Forty-first Street, New York City, for 25 cents.

Four outstanding differences have arisen from the recent land and oil laws adopted by the Mexican Government to carry out the nationalization provisions of the Constitution of 1917:

1. The alleged retroactivity of the land law;

2. The alleged retroactivity of the petroleum law and the question of the modification of titles to oil lands acquired prior to May 1, 1917;

3. The nature of Mexican undertakings at the Conference of Mexico City in May, 1923, preceding recognition by the United States;

4. The Mexican Government's insistence that foreign property owners bind themselves not to invoke the support of their governments, but submit themselves to Mexican jurisdiction in all disputes where their property interests are concerned on penalty, if they do invoke the support of their government, of forfeiting their property. . . .

The Land Law

The agrarian provisions of the Constitution of 1917 gave constitutional status to the earlier agrarian decrees of January 6, 1915. These provisions gave sanction to the division of landed estates. Further agrarian measures were promulgated in December, 1920, December, 1921, and April, 1922.

The Mexican Foreign Minister, in a communication on March 31, 1923, explained the difficulties arising out of the redistribution of lands in Mexico:

> This administration succeeded in quelling such center of rebellion and in reestablishing peace throughout the national territory, not so much by military force and bloodshed as by the quick application of agrarian laws. Nobody doubts that, facing such dilemma, the adopted solution was the most humanitarian and economic one—in spite of the inevitable damage to individual national and foreign agricultural interests.

The American Commissioner at the conference of 1923 declared that

> Under the rules of international law there can be no taking of lands, water rights, or other property of American citizens, in whatever form their interests may be held, legally acquired prior to May 1, 1917, under the laws of Mexico and the Constitution of 1857, without indemnification in cash at the time of the taking for the just value thereof; and added that the United States cannot recognize any right of Mexico under the terms of any law to pay in bonds or to compel American citizens to accept bonds as compensation for land, and that the indemnity which the Government of the United States believes Mexico should pay for these lands is their just value in cash.

The Mexican Commissioners declared that although excesses may have been committed, the Government had always endeavored by all means within its power to comply with the law in all cases and that the bonds paid by way of indemnity would be redeemed, if a special loan in order to pay in cash all the indemnities for the expropriation of lands were concluded. They also promised restitution of property confiscated or wrongfully taken from their owners during the revolution and to have all claims settled by the Mixed Claims Commission.

The Question of Retroactivity

The land law regulating Article 27 of the Mexican Constitution was promulgated January 21, 1926. The prohibition of aliens acquiring land or being shareholders in Mexican companies owning land within 100 kilometers of the frontiers or 50 kilometers of the coasts or being shareholders in Mexican companies which may acquire such ownership in the prohibited zones contained in the constitution was amplified in Article 1 of the organic law. Secretary Kellogg inquired on March 1, 1926, whether this law was to be given retroactive effect. Minister Saenz in his answer declared that Article 1 of the land law was not retroactive and that it did not refer to an alien with property rights as described by Secretary Kellogg.

Article 2 of the land law prescribes that all aliens agree before the Department of Foreign Relations to consider themselves nationals in respect to any property rights which they may hold. Again Secretary Kellogg inquired of Minister Saenz whether this law was to have retroactive effect with reference to aliens "who prior to the promulgation of the law had acquired an interest in a Mexican company." Minister Saenz assured Secretary Kellogg that Article 2 required no compliance by aliens "who prior to the promulgation of the law had acquired an interest in a Mexican company."

Article 3 of the land law specifies that a permit shall not be granted to aliens owning a majority interest in Mexican companies owning rural property for agricultural purposes. Minister Saenz denied that Article 3 was retroactive and stated that "an alien who before the promulgation of the law held an interest in a Mexican company does not need to apply for any permit."

It is provided in the land law that the present owners possessing rights legally acquired prior to the going into effect of the law and contrary to the provisions of the new law shall hold them until their death, in the case of individuals, and for ten years, in the case of corporations, after lapse of which the interest in question will have to be disposed of under penalty of forced sale. Minister Saenz held that the articles containing these provisions were "not retroactive because the rights acquired by aliens prior to the going into effect of the law would be conserved by the present owners until their death. . . ."

Finally the seventh article requires that

> Aliens who may possess any of the rights which are the subject matter of this law, and which were acquired before the going into effect of the law, shall make a declaration [of their rights] before the Department of Foreign Relations within the year following the date of the promulgation of the present law. If this is not done it will be considered that the acquisition was made subsequent to the promulgation of this law [and therefore subject to its provisions].

Minister Saenz pointed out that aliens only have to make a declaration, which declaration must be a statement of such rights previously acquired.

The Mexican land law, like the petroleum law, requires foreigners to waive their nationality in so far as Mexican-owned property is concerned.

The Petroleum Law of December 31, 1925

Article 27 of the Mexican Constitution of 1917 containing the new dispositions with respect to the rights of foreigners to petroleum deposits in Mexico marked a complete departure from regulations previously governing these rights. Under the old mining codes of 1884, 1892, and 1909, owners of the surface, whether natives or foreigners, were given the right to exploit subsoil deposits of petroleum as owners and without

SCHOOL

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.
The course is open to graduates of colleges and universities of recognized standing.
Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.
Special courses will be arranged for social workers in accordance with their needs.
For information, address the Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL for JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)
210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

□ DINNERS □

ARTHUR PONSONBY, M. P.
(First appearance in America)
head of the movement to obtain a million pledges not to support any future declaration of war by Great Britain,
WILL BE GUEST OF HONOR AT A DINNER OF THE Women's Peace Society
Hotel Astor, New York, January 25, 1927, 7 P. M.
For reservations, at $3.50 a plate, write at once to
Women's Peace Society, 20 Vesey St., New York

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL ANNUAL DINNER and SYMPOSIUM
Fifth Ave. Restaurant, 200 Fifth Ave.
JANUARY 29th, 7 P. M.
Subject:* OUR CHANGING MORALS
Speakers: LEWIS BROWNE, EVERETT DEAN MARTIN, JOHN COWPER POWYS, DR. HANNAH STONE, ART YOUNG, EDMUND B. CHAFFEE, and WILL DURANT.
Reservations ($3.00) at Labor Temple, 244 E. 14th St. No appeal for funds

□ LECTURES □

COSMIC ECONOMICS
Orthodox economics is the business of earning a living; COSMIC ECONOMICS is the art of learning to live.
Lectures by
Leslie Watson Fearn of London, England
HOTEL WALDORF-ASTORIA, 12:30 P. M.
Jan. 26th—The Psychology of Strikes
Feb. 2nd—The Philosophy of Higher Economics
Dr. Fearn broadcasts from WMCA Saturdays, 9 P. M.
Collection to defray expenses.

PROF. GAETANO SALVEMINI
will speak on
ITALY UNDER FASCISM
at the Open Forum Meeting of the SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE, 2 West 64th Street, New York
Monday, January 24th, at 8:15 P. M.
The Public Is Invited.

The Nation's
MID-WINTER BOOK NUMBER
February 16
The winners of the Poetry Contest and the Prize Poem will be printed in this issue.

The New School for Social Research

SPRING TERM
February 21—May 13

E. R. A. SELIGMAN—Economic Interpretations of History and Doctrine. Thursdays, 5.20 P. M.
NORMAN J. WARE—Recent Developments in Economic Thought and Practice. Tuesdays, 8.20 P. M.
WILLIAM Z. RIPLEY—Critique of Corporation Policy. Wednesdays, 8.20 P. M.
PAUL SINGER—Current Problems in International Finance. Mondays, 8.20 P. M.
FREDERICK R. MACAULAY—Business Forecasting. Fridays, 8.20 P. M.
CHARLES M. JOSEPH—Labor and the Law. Thursdays, 8.20 P. M.
ARTHUR F. PAYNE—Systems of Vocational Guidance. Fridays, 5.20 P. M.
Psychology of the Worker. Wednesdays, 8.20 P. M.
NATHANIEL PEFFER—Imperialism and Its Practical Implications. Thursdays, 8.20 P. M.
The Present Status of Adult Education. Tuesdays, 8.20 P. M.
HARRY E. BARNES—Intellectual History of Contemporary Times. Wednesdays, 5.20 P. M.
The World War: Its Causes and Aftermath. Wednesdays, 8.20 P. M.
IRA S. WILE—Conduct Disorders of Childhood and Adolescence. Mondays, 5.20 P. M.
FRANKWOOD E. WILLIAMS—The Possible Significance of Psychoanalysis for Certain Social Relationships. Mondays, 8.20 P. M.
DUDLEY D. SHOENFELD—Interpretation of Conduct Disorders. Thursdays, 8.20 P. M.
HARRY A. OVERSTREET—The Newer Clues to Human Behavior. Mondays, 8.20 P. M.
MORRIS R. COHEN—Romantic Currents in Contemporary Thought. Tuesdays, 8.20 P. M.
EVERETT DEAN MARTIN—Conference on Fundamental Problems in Adult Education. Wednesdays, 8.20 P. M.
EDUARD C. LINDEMAN—Adult Education—Method and Content. Mondays, 5.20 P. M.
LETA S. HOLLINGWORTH—Individuality. Mondays, 8.20 P. M.
SILAS BENT—Modern Journalism. Thursdays, 8.20 P. M.
GORHAM B. MUNSON—American Literature, 1900-1927. Tuesdays, 8.20 P. M.
STARK YOUNG—Theatrical Season, 1927. Tuesdays, 5.20 P. M.
PAUL ROSENFELD—Modern Composers (Lectures and piano). Fridays, 8.20 P. M.

Twelve lectures in each course. Course tickets, $15
Write for catalogue.

465 West 23rd Street New York City

special concession from the Mexican Government. The deposits of mineral fuels were "the exclusive ownership of the owner of the soil." The rights acquired by foreigners under the provisions of the old laws were complete and not subject to geographic limits.

The change in the constitution consists primarily of the extension of the doctrine of nationalization of subsoil deposits to petroleum and other substances. "In the nation," Article 27 provides, "is vested direct ownership of all minerals or substances . . . and petroleum and all hydrocarbons, solid, liquid, or gaseous."

The nation's ownership of its natural resources was defined as "inalienable," but authorization to exploit the subsoil deposits might be granted in concessions to private parties or corporations organized under the laws of Mexico.

> Only Mexicans by birth or naturalization and Mexican companies have the right to acquire ownership in lands, waters, and their appurtenances, or to obtain concessions to develop mines, waters, or mineral fuels in the Republic of Mexico. The nation may grant the same right to foreigners, provided they agree before the Department of Foreign Affairs to be considered Mexicans in respect to such property, and accordingly not to invoke the protection of their governments in respect to the same, under penalty, in case of breach, of forfeiture to the nation of property so acquired. Within a zone of 100 kilometers from the frontiers, and of 50 kilometers from the sea coast, no foreigner shall under any conditions acquire direct ownership of lands and waters.

United States Position

The State Department does not deny the right of Mexico to make new laws governing the acquisition of property in the future. "This right," wrote Secretary Kellogg in a recent communcation, "cannot be questioned by any other state. If Mexico desires to prevent the future acquisition by aliens of property rights of any nature within its jurisdiction this government has no suggestion whatever to make." In recognizing this right of the Mexican Government the State Department, however, took care to point out on January 28, 1926, that the retroactive effect of any such law by damaging the rights of foreigners acquired prior to its promulgation would put it under the "positive duty to make representations and efforts to avoid such action."

The Mexican Constitution of 1917 had provided in Article 14 that "no law shall be given retroactive effect to the prejudice of any person whatsoever." On the other hand, Article 27 nationalized petroleum deposits previously regarded as the property of the owner of the surface. Five famous cases before the Supreme Court of Mexico in 1921 declared that Paragraph 4 of Article 27 of the Constitution of 1917 was not retroactive. The petroleum law of December 31, 1925, in providing, as did the constitution, for the nationalization of petroleum deposits and for the granting of petroleum concessions to Mexicans and foreigners under certain conditions, obliges the owners of vested rights secured prior to May 1, 1917, to exchange their titles for concessions of not more than fifty years' duration.

The petroleum law of 1925 provides moreover a series of definitions and distinctions as well as specific requirements affecting holders of oil land titles.

> The following rights [it reads] will be confirmed without any cost whatever and by means of concessions granted in conformity with this law:
>
> (a) those arising from lands in which works of petroleum exploitation were begun prior to May 1, 1917;
>
> (b) those arising from contracts made before May 1, 1917, by the surface owner or the successors in title for the express purpose of exploitation of petroleum. . . .

It is around these laws that the most recent and most critical discussion has centered.

The State Department has held since the first discussion of the petroleum law that each of these requirements of the

The Nation Editors choose 8 BONI & LIVERIGHT books as among the most interesting books of the year.

THE GOLDEN DAY
by LEWIS MUMFORD Author of STICKS AND STONES
GEORGE SANTAYANA writes: "The best book about America, if not the best American book that I have ever read." 2nd edition. $2.50

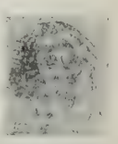
TAR A MIDWEST CHILDHOOD
by Sherwood Anderson

"Little Tar Moorehead makes Penrod look like a circus ring small boy. He is a fugitive breath of boyhood, caught on paper by one supposed to be the starkest, most ironical realist in our midst."—George Currie, Brooklyn Eagle. 2nd edition. $3.00

PERSONAE
The Collected Poems of Ezra Pound

"A poet who is the historian of the world," writes Mr. Ford Madox Ford in The N. Y. Herald-Tribune and goes on to call a section of the volume one of the most beautiful books of poetry in the world. Special format. $3.50

GEORGE WASHINGTON THE IMAGE AND THE MAN
by W. E. Woodward



"Out of these brilliant pages—and they are brilliant—emerged the man. Mr. Woodward unfolds the wrappings and gets down to flesh. Mr. Woodward has a knack for characterizations in a sentence. Mr. Woodward has given us the most brilliant, cynical, and clever portrait."—Claude G. Bowers, The Nation. 4th edition. $4.00

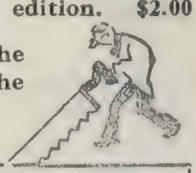
THE GREAT GOD BROWN, THE FOUNTAIN—THE MOON OF THE CARIBBEES And Other Plays
by Eugene O'Neill

The latest volume in the collected edition of the plays of Eugene O'Neill. Large 12mo., stained top. $2.50. The complete set, boxed, five volumes, $12.50

THE DYBBUK
by S. Ansky
Trans. by Henry Alsberg and Winifred Katzin

Besides the text of this tremendous drama, the volume contains an essay by the noted Hebrew scholar, Dr. Chaim Zhitlowsky, and the music of several of the chants sung in the play. Second edition. $2.00

VIRGIN SPAIN
by Waldo Frank



"Here in the flood of ephemeral books is one that is concerned with the mystery of life; that uses wit and learning, pity and wisdom, and passion and craftsmanship to bring this mystery close to us."—Alice Beal Parsons, The Nation. 2nd edition. $3.00

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF MARTHA HEPPLETHWAITE by Frank Sullivan

"In our humble opinion, Frank Sullivan is a genuine humorist and a great one."—Milt Gross. "His very name is a signal for merriment.... Inimitably funny—cannot be described by comparison with any other humorist."—Providence Sunday Journal. 3rd edition. $2.00

If you want to get advance news of some of the most interesting books of 1927, write in for the new Spring 1927 catalog.

BONI & LIVERIGHT, 61 W. 48th Street, New York
Please send me a copy of your new Spring 1927 catalog.
Name.....
Address.....

Mexican law is in violation of the rights of American citizens on the ground that the provisions are retroactive and affect the scope and value of properties to which titles were obtained prior to the promulgation of the laws in question. . . .

The Mexican Government has denied that there is any retroactivity in the present law. It held that both the constitution and the five amparo cases before the Supreme Court of Mexico in 1921 bore out this contention prior to the promulgation of the present law.

Mexico Denies Retroactivity

At the Conference of 1923 the Mexican Commissioners denied any desire or intention on the part of their government to impair the rights of foreigners having titles legally acquired prior to 1917.

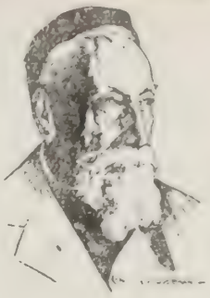
> It is the duty of the Federal Executive powers under the constitution to respect and enforce the decisions of the judiciary power. In accordance with such duty the Executive has respected and enforced, and will continue to do so, the principles of the decision of the Supreme Court of Justice in the Texas Oil Company case and four other similar amparo cases declaring that Paragraph 4 of Article 27 of the Constitution of 1917 is not retroactive. . . .

The principle of retroactivity was condemned also in the correspondence of the Mexican Foreign Minister, who on November 5, 1925, when the petroleum law was under discussion, admitted that in accordance with international law acquired rights may not be harmed. He insisted, however, that if a state respected property rights, it need not respect these rights just as they existed at the time of the acquisition. In another note the Mexican Foreign Minister wrote:

> that a subsequent law may modify a status in law created by a previous law without being retroactive. . . . It is always assumed that a new law is an improvement on the preceding one, and the only limitation to be placed on the application of such new law is that it shall not be retroactive, and it is not as long as it does not infringe upon any right that has already been put into effect.

What Is Retroactivity?

The exposition of the principle of retroactivity in the Mexican correspondence introduces a modifying idea. A law is not retroactive, it is held, "as long as i does not infringe upon any right that has already been put into effect."



This modifying clause raises the question as to when and how a vested right is acquired. Nothing in international affairs could be of a more legalistic character than such a discussion. It is here that the greatest divergence between the contentions of the United States and Mexico is to be found. The Mexican Commissioners at the Conference of 1923 held that a petroleum title is not complete unless it is confirmed by a positive act. Various legal authorities were quoted to support this view, in particular the treatise of Fernando Vega, a Mexican jurist who in 1905 elaborated the doctrine that rights which are granted by law "are not considered as acquired rights . . . except when they are exercised."

This distinction is based on the existence of "positive acts" prior to 1917 manifesting the intention on the part of the owners of the surface to exploit the subsoil deposits. These full titles are defined in the petroleum law as:

(a) Those arising from lands where works of petroleum exploitation were begun prior to May 1, 1917; and

(b) Those arising from contracts made prior to May 1, 1917, for express purposes of petroleum exploitation. . . .

The Mexican Government proposes to exchange only vested titles for concessions of fifty years' duration. In apparent contradiction to the statements made by Mexican Commissioners in the 1923 Conference as to the policy of the Mexican Government to grant preferential rights to such persons who had performed no positive acts, Secretary Kellogg pointed out: "The law in question seems to give no preferential rights to such owners or persons." Secretary Kellogg holds each of

"The Selection Is Beyond Criticism" —Will Durant

GOLDEN TALES of ANATOLE FRANCE

Admirers of Anatole France will welcome the opportunity of possessing in a single volume so many of his best stories. This collection, a score of his best-known tales, such as "The Procurator of Judea," "Olivier's Brag," "Crainquebille" and other favorites, is taken from various volumes of short stories. A golden book by a master of short story writing.

Handsomely printed and bound. $3.00

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY, 449 Fourth Avenue, NEW YORK

YOUR LEISURE A PLEASURE
YOUR PLEASURE A PROFIT

You can ensure yourself one evening's pleasant reading a week during the coming winter by devoting it to

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

You will like its freshness of viewpoint coupled with the accuracy of its facts.

It is a store-house of information on international politics, European trends of thought, current English literature, and cultural developments the world over.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings and on new trends of thought in various countries.

——————MAIL THIS COUPON——————

To The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed direct from Manchester, England, to:

Name .....

Address .....

these measures retroactive in substance and impairing the legal rights of American citizens in Mexico.

The Calvo Clause

The provision of the Mexican Constitution which requires all foreigners acquiring lands in Mexico to agree to certain stipulations before the Department of Foreign Affairs, known as the Calvo Clause, has also been the subject of protest by the State Department. This provision has been reaffirmed in the recent petroleum law and as it now stands requires that all foreigners who desire to obtain petroleum concessions must "agree before the Department of Foreign Affairs to be considered Mexicans in respect to such property and agree not to invoke the protection of their governments in respect to the same under penalty, in case of breach, of forfeiture to the nation of property so acquired."

Secretary Kellogg on January 8, 1926, denied that an American citizen could extinguish the obligation of his government to protect him in the event of a denial of justice and elaborated the American stand in the note of January 28 as follows:

> Article 2 of the recent land law provides that any alien who may have acquired ownership of agricultural lands, waters, or their appurtenances, or concessions for mining . . . shall agree before the Department of Foreign Relations to consider himself a national of Mexico in respect of his part of the property and shall agree not to invoke in respect thereof the protection of his government with reference thereto under penalty, in case of failing in the agreement, of defaulting his property to the nation. . . .
>
> The United States does not admit that one of its citizens can contract by a declaration or otherwise to bind his own government not to invoke its rights under the rules of international law. Under the rules applicable to intercourse between states, an injury done by one state to the citizens of another state through a denial of justice is an injury done to the state whose national is injured. The rights of his state to extend what is known as diplomatic protection cannot be waived by the individual.

The Mexican reply of February 12, 1926, admitted that an individual cannot prevent the state of which he is a citizen from asserting a certain right that belongs to it, but denied that the Mexican law made such an assertion:

> since that which is required is that the alien shall consider himself a national with respect to the property which may belong to him in a Mexican corporation which he enters, and shall not invoke in regard thereto the protection of his government.

Diplomatic Protection

Secretary Kellogg answering the Mexican rebuttal in his note of March 1, 1926, reasserted that an injury done by one state to a citizen of another through a denial of justice is an injury also to the state whose national is concerned. He added that even though the individual should make a waiver, > that could not stop his state in case of a denial of justice from extending its right to diplomatic protection or seeking redress in accordance with the principles of international law.

Arbitration

Article 21 of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848, confirmed in the Convention of 1908, between the United States and Mexico reads in part as follows:

> A resort shall not . . . be had to reprisals, aggression or hostility of any kind . . . until the government of that [country] which deems itself aggrieved shall have maturely considered in the spirit of peace and good neighborship whether it would not be better that such differences should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side or by that of a friendly nation. And should such course be proposed by either party it shall be acceded to by the other unless deemed by it altogether incompatible with the nature of the differences or the circumstances of the case.

Contributors to This Issue

William Hard, veteran Washington correspondent, wrote Mr. Coolidge, Here's a Court, in last week's issue of The Nation.

Carleton Beals, who has been living in Mexico for several years, wrote The Nicaraguan Farce in The Nation for December 15.

Arthur Warner, associate editor of The Nation, spent 1923 in the Caribbean as special correspondent of The Nation.

Lewis S. Gannett, associate editor of The Nation, has been active in the Haiti-Santo Domingo Independence Society and other anti-imperialist movements.

Donald Kirkley is a poet of Baltimore.

Oscar T. Crosby is author of "International War; Its Causes and Its Cure;" an explorer of note; and was Assistant Secretary of the United States Treasury in the Wilson Administration.

Donald Douglas is author of the novel "The Grand Inquisitor." He is at present on the teaching staff of Columbia University.

Louis Fischer, special correspondent of The Nation in Germany and Russia, is author of "Oil Imperialism; The International Struggle for Petroleum;" he is now lecturing in the United States.

Alter Brody is a poet, playwright, and essayist of New York.

Edward Thomas is a New York attorney and a Quaker.

"More straight facts and more sound sense about American economic life than we have ever seen gathered in equal space before."

—The Nation.

"Describes the economic activities and organizations actually visible in the workaday world, contains the best estimates concerning the national income, its distribution, real wages, etc., and on the whole presents extensively, concretely and entertainingly the sort of material out of which curiosity as to useful theory may grow."—George Soule, New Republic.

"A book that has long been needed."—Boston Transcript.

AMERICAN ECONOMIC LIFE and the Means of its Improvement

By

REXFORD GUY TUGWELL, THOMAS MUNRO, and ROY E. STRYKER.

$4.50; by mail, $4.65

Harcourt, Brace & Co. 383 Madison Ave. NEW YORK

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1927 No. 3213

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 103

EDITORIALS:

The Monroe Doctrine and the Coolidge Doctrine 106
Merging 12,000 Miles of Railway 107
The Last Serfs 107
Vegetarian Dogs 108

THE URGE TOWARD EMPIRE. By William Hard 109

THE LAST EMPRESS OF MEXICO. By Ernest H. Gruening 110

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS: A MISPRINT IN HISTORY. By Henry Noel Brailsford 111

THE EVOLUTION OF DISENCHANTMENT. Anonymous 113

A GOVERNMENT OF MINNOWS. By Frank R. Kent 115

THE DEBT UNSETTLEMENTS. By James N. Rosenberg 116

THE SOLID SOUTH BACKS "AL" SMITH. By George W. Hays 117

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 117

CORRESPONDENCE 118

BOOKS AND PLAYS:

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 120
Another Microbe Hunter. By Stuart Chase 120
Endless Adolescence. By Clifton P. Fadiman 121
Voltaire in Formation. By Leo Gershoy 122
This Unbelieving World. By Lisle Bell 122
Portrait of an Educated Man. By Mortimer J. Adler 123
A Fresh View of the Child. By Joseph Jastrow 123
Books in Brief 124
Drama: Ballyhoo. By Joseph Wood Krutch 125

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The New Danish Government. By Julius Moritzen 126
The Soviet-Lithuanian Guaranty Pact 128

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE MEXICAN CRISIS REMAINS GRAVE. And the responsibility therefor lies clearly at the door of President Coolidge who is shifting his ground continually so that no sane man can know from day to day just what it is that he stands for, he and his Secretary of State. Look at the dispatches as they have appeared in the press. On January 17 the delicate situation in regard to Mexico and Nicaragua was "more satisfactory than at any time." Mr. Kellogg stated that the Government's policy had "undergone no change whatever; it was not true that it had gone from one of a continued show of force . . . to a willingness to endeavor to promote amity by arbitration or mediation." The very next day, however, he "welcomed" the resolution of Senator Robinson for arbitration and added: "For some time I have been giving very careful consideration to the question of the definite application of the principle of arbitration to the existing controversy with Mexico." Naturally that was supposed to be the utterance of the Government and as definitely to commit President Coolidge to the principle of arbitration as he could possibly be committed. The announcement created joy in Mexico, but on January 21 President Coolidge, through the thin disguise of the "Spokesman," cast his Secretary of State overboard and announced that he saw "no hope in arbitration, no question which should be arbitrated," and let it be known that in his opinion "nothing helpful could be gained by a discussion of arbitration of a dispute." The President wished even discussion of it banned. As the New York Times reported: "In the President's opinion, the sole issue at stake was the inalienable right for people to own their property and it should not be taken away by a government unless paid for," and that was not subject to arbitration.

MR. COOLIDGE'S DESIRE TO STOP DISCUSSION of the question of arbitration is in keeping with his recent demand that the American press cease criticism of his foreign policy. The country properly continues to bombard the President with demands that the historic American principle of arbitration be applied to this issue. In addition to the magnificent manifesto signed by more than 400 prominent citizens including many university presidents, we have had two admirable utterances in favor of arbitration and against war with Mexico from William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, and a fine statement by 101 college professors, many of them teachers of international law, demanding arbitration and pointing out that "the United States has already agreed upon a method by which they [the issues] should be adjudicated." The professors further declared that the questions are "appropriate for settlement by the judicial method. Protracted delay is dangerous. . . . The issue may become one of national pride and sentiment; feeling may be aroused which will make impossible the judicial settlement now practicable." The protest of the administrative committee of the Federal Council of Churches is another answer to the President's effort to throttle the discussion of arbitration. We repeat that the danger remains grave; a Washington news service is about right when it quotes "an authority" as saying bluntly: "We simply are not going to tolerate unfriendly governments south of us, and that is all there is to it." That determination to impose our will upon others makes the late German Kaiser look like a "piker." The fire upon the President must be continued increasingly and, as Senator Frazier and Congressman Huddleston—who has done admirable work—declare, Congress must be kept in session in order to keep us out of war.

WHAT IS BRITISH POLICY in China? The cables are full of pacific speeches, but from the lesser dispatches we assemble the following amazing data: On January 12 there were in the Yangtze River in China 9 British gunboats, 1 sloop, 6 destroyers, and 5 cruisers. Three more cruisers, an aircraft carrier with airplanes, and other British warcraft were in other Chinese waters. In all, there were 62 foreign warships—British, American, French, and Japanese—in the Chinese Yangtze River! On January 19 the British cruisers Frobisher, Delhi, Dragon, and Danae left Malta for China; on January 24 1,000 royal marines sailed from Portsmouth for China on board the Zeeland, and the White Star liner Megantic was in drydock being fitted as a troopship for China; four more battalions of infantry, comprising 140 officers and 3,424 men, and the Fifth Armored Car Company were under orders to sail from England; two battalions in Malta were also under orders; two liners had been chartered to sail from India for China; the Durham Light Infantry, the Gloucestershires, and a battalion of Punjab infantry were reported mobilizing; and three companies of "Punjab Indian-British soldiers were dispatched from Hongkong to Shanghai"; on January 24 it was announced that an expeditionary force of 12,000 men, with armored cars, would leave England at once. Actions speak louder than words. The United States has 55 warships, 8,000 blue-jackets, and 800 infantrymen in or close to China. Is there something sinister and secret behind the fine words of the statesmen?

THE REJECTION OF COLONEL FRANK L. SMITH of Illinois at the door of the Senate by a vote of 48 to 33, or, rather, the reference of his case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, is welcome news. Rarely has there been such deep feeling shown in the Senate, at least by those Senators determined that this controller of public utilities, who accepted huge contributions to his campaign fund from the men he was supposed to control and to judge, should not take his seat among them. The vote is all the more impressive because all of the "lame ducks" voted for Colonel Smith. On his side were Cameron of Arizona, Ernst of Kentucky, Lenroot of Wisconsin, Stanfield of Oregon, Means of Colorado, Pepper of Pennsylvania, and Wadsworth of New York, all of whom have been defeated for another term, and with them voted Gould of Maine, who is under a cloud because he was once found guilty in a Canadian court of bribing a high public official. We do not deny that the issue was a difficult one. Senator Borah, for instance, voted for the swearing in of Colonel Smith, not because he wished him to take his seat, but because he thought that the wiser way to achieve his ousting. Had the question not been complicated by this doubt as to what was the constitutional procedure, the vote would have been overwhelming against Colonel Smith. As it is, there are sixteen precedents for this action of the Senate in refusing to swear in a Senator whose election has been protested, the precedents beginning in 1849 and ending in 1865. The difference lies in the fact that in these sixteen cases the question was whether the election was legal, or the applicant was eligible for reasons clearly specified by the Constitution, or because of doubts as to the contestant's loyalty aroused by the Civil War.

IN DECIDING THAT COLONEL SMITH cannot take his seat—and that is what the vote comes to—the Senate has indubitably gone further than ever before in passing upon the qualifications of Senators. From the moral point of view it is a wholesome decision, and the deep feeling displayed shows that the recent scandals have had a good effect upon the spirit and tone of the Senate. But when Senator Smith comes back in March to take the seat to which he will then be entitled by reason of the decision of the electorate of Illinois after it was aware of all the facts in the case, the situation will be more difficult and more serious. Then the Senate will refuse to accept a man deliberately chosen by the voters of a great State—now he is merely a gubernatorial appointee. If he does not resign it would appear that Illinois will be deprived of her constitutional representation by two Senators for an indefinite period, and the same will be true of Pennsylvania when Vare is similarly spurned. This raises the question of States' rights and that will be harped upon in many directions, though as yet there are few protests in the South where the States' rights doctrine has so long held sway. No one can doubt that the Senate has the right to set any standards that it sees fit. It alone is judge of the qualifications of those who are elected to it; that the Constitution specified. If it should decide to reject a Senator because he had one blue and one brown eye there could be no appeal, for neither the Executive nor the Judiciary could intervene. But as we have said, quite aside from the legal and constitutional factors we have much to be thankful for that the Senate has made it clear that so far as lies in its power it is going to prevent men coming into its fellowship who have bought their seats by enormous campaign expenditures.

ALONG WITH MR. KELLOGG'S embarrassment over the repudiation of his Nicaragua-Mexican policy by public opinion in the United States comes another disaster to the State Department's prestige, possibly a direct consequence of our invasion of Nicaragua and our insolence toward Mexico. Previous to our latest attempt at bossing Latin America the Secretary of State had proposed as a way out of the Tacna-Arica trouble that Chile and Peru both abandon their claims and allow Bolivia to buy the territory in dispute. Chile had accepted the proposal in principle and Bolivia was more than ready to carry out its part. But since our invasion of Nicaragua Peru has declined to accede to the scheme. Of course it might have taken that course anyhow, but it was certain to do so after an exhibition on our part which has stirred public feeling all over South and Central America, more deeply, probably, than any of our previous adventures in imperialism. Indeed it is not too much to say that Pan-Americanism, as once conceived, is dead. In so far as such an ideal is developed henceforth it is likely to be a moral and material coalition of the republics of Latin America against the aggression of the United States.

ENTIRELY GRATIFYING IS THE ACTION of the liberal Jewish women of the United States, speaking through the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods in their convention at Cleveland, on January 20, in urging the compulsory arbitration of international disputes, the abolition of poison gas in warfare, American cooperation in world disarmament, and the abolition of compulsory military training in all land-grant colleges. In addition, the convention favored the World Court and demanded arbitration in the present disputes between the United States and Mexico. That is really magnificent. Especially strong is the resolution relating to military training in the schools which, as reported by the New York Times, reads in part:

> Such training stresses war psychology in the minds of our youth. The War Department is thus given unprecedented influence in our civil and educational institutions. Such a training runs counter to the movement to substitute law for war. The Sisterhood's recommendation is that the compulsory feature of military training be eliminated in all land-grant colleges.

The establishment of the principle of compulsory arbitration of all international disputes is an essential step, the Sisterhood correctly holds, to the outlawry of war. So powerful is this organization that its outspokenness is bound to have an effect upon the politicians. It confirms us in our belief that if the facts as to military training in schools and colleges can be laid before the American people, the people themselves will demand its abolition. Why should Americans stand for training in arms of boys? The Prussians never resorted to it, if only because they were convinced that the military training of the physically immature is of no value whatever in the creation of soldiers.

SIX FORMER PASSAIC STRIKERS on January 19 entered pleas of "non vult"—substantially admissions of guilt—to a charge of "throwing explosives with intent to injure property"—thereby admitting a crime against masses of their fellow-workers more serious than the futile explosions in Clifton, N. J., which led to the indictments. It is no excuse to say that they were foreigners, living under a sense of brutal police oppression, and saw no other way out; it is no palliation to say that they were held in extravagantly high bail, or that they were tortured into signing confessions in a language they did not understand. Nor do the affidavits of company spies, paid by the mills, that they had discussed bombing as a means of discrediting the strike excuse them. The fact that they did use this peculiarly detested form of violence against the property of strikebreakers will be used against workers everywhere, bolstering up false charges in scores of coming strikes. One may understand these men, setting their action against the black background of mill and police violence in Passaic; one cannot excuse it. Union men cannot afford to tolerate violence in their own ranks: it always strikes first at petty individuals, leaves the real enemies unscathed, and reacts against the whole battle-line of labor.

WITH THE PERSISTENCE OF THEIR KIND the fundamentalist opponents of the theory of evolution are continuing their agitation for restrictive laws, and the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Tennessee in upholding the constitutionality of the anti-evolution law of that State will doubtless stimulate them to new efforts. In Kentucky as well as in Tennessee the law is already upon the statute-books, and, according to an informing pamphlet just issued by the Civil Liberties Union, campaigns have been started in South Carolina, Washington, Oregon, Kansas, Florida, Virginia, and California, while the bill drawn up in Arkansas in December is now ready to be put before the State Senate. To be sure, the efforts of the liberal forces are not always unavailing. In 1926 a referendum to the voters in Oklahoma sustained the State Legislature in its repeal of an anti-evolution bill previously passed, and the year before bills were defeated in North Carolina and Georgia. This year West Virginia has downed an anti-evolution bill. But the "Bible Crusaders" and "Bryan Leaguers" are not easily discouraged, and only organized opposition like that of the Civil Liberties Union can either defeat them or keep them defeated.

"BUTTON YOUR GALOSHES!" is the latest command of the censor. The Town Marshal of Salem, Indiana, has issued such an order to the flappers of the town and their flapping footgear. Unbuttoned arctics are a nuisance, he says, and while he remains in office will be kept neatly fastened. We must now ask of the censor what we shall drink, what we shall read, what plays we shall see, how long our bathing suits must be, and in some places how much of arm or leg may be visible when we appear in public. Censorship and the movement for it are progressing surely and not too slowly. The so-called "art" magazines have been ordered off the news-stands in New York, Yonkers, Chicago; the head of the Vice Society is urging the abolition of the New York play jury on the ground of its inadequacy; nude pictures have been removed from the walls of a Chicago picture gallery. All these restrictions, of course, are to protect the public; but has censorship ever protected anybody from anything to which he wished to expose himself? The Town Marshal of Salem introduces a new note. He dislikes unbuttoned galoshes and he uses his power to abolish them. This is a frank and refreshing revelation of the nature of censorship.

ONE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED people attended the dinner and one thousand were turned away for lack of seating capacity—this tribute to Jane Addams in Chicago on January 20 ought to give pause to the small minds of the American Legion and other organizations which have been seeking to bait this noble woman. No finer cross-section of American life has ever been brought together on such an occasion, nor have more heartfelt or better-earned tributes ever been paid to an American man or woman. "First citizen, not only of Chicago but of the American republic," they called her. We are especially pleased with the tribute of Governor "Al" Smith of New York. We give it in full:

> May I be permitted to share in the tribute to Jane Addams, for she belongs not only to Chicago but to the nation and the world. No American woman has contributed so much to awaken our social conscience. She has been a statesman of society, cooperating with public officials to have government an instrument to serve humanity. In her inspiring life, in her writings, and in the movements Jane Addams has typified lies the spirit of true democracy, which recognizes the potential worth of every human soul without regard to his race, creed, or origin. In honoring Jane Addams we honor the idealism of American womanhood.

EDWARD P. MITCHELL, LEE KOHNS, JAMES FORD RHODES—the death list for the week ended January 22 was a long one. In Mr. Kohns the city of New York lost one of the best of its citizens, who took his civic responsibilities seriously, kept an open mind, and always had time for public causes. No city could ask for more intelligent or more loyal service. Especially devoted to the College of the City of New York, of which he was for twenty-seven years a trustee, he capped his generosity by endowing last fall a professorship of American History, Civilization, and Letters at the Sorbonne in Paris—an act of international friendship deserving of the highest praise. Edward P. Mitchell was for a full half century connected with the New York Sun, and was its guiding spirit after the death of Charles A. Dana. During part of this period it was the most brilliantly edited and written newspaper in America. Yet it left no deep mark upon our journalistic life or our political progress since it was without principle, cynical to a degree, and more interested in poking fun, ridiculing, and satirizing than in pointing out a better way. And at times the Sun, less so under Mr. Mitchell than Mr. Dana, was incredibly brutal and unfair. Its viewpoint was too often narrow, and its vision limited; but Mr. Mitchell had a host of devoted friends and wielded a great personal and political influence. In James Ford Rhodes The Nation has lost a warm friend, the country a great historian. To his career we shall return on another occasion.

The Monroe Doctrine and the Coolidge Doctrine

THE powerful uprising of popular feeling against the threat of war with Mexico has, for the present at least, compelled the Administration to modify its tone, and arbitration of the outstanding differences seems likely. The marines, however, remain in Nicaragua; and public relief at the removal of the imminent threat of war seems to have obscured the fact that we are continuing to commit the crime of military interference with that small republic.

Despite the contradictory excuses offered by the Administration, certain facts stand uncontested. No American or other foreign property had been injured by the revolutionaries when we landed our marines; no American or other foreign lives had been lost. There was no threat of foreign intervention; at most the British and Italian representatives at Managua asked the American marines to give the property of their nationals the same special protection which was contemplated for Americans. There had been, we repeat, no damage to foreign lives or property; only that threat of damage which any revolution must cause. How does this relate to the Monroe Doctrine whose name the Presidential Spokesman uses so recklessly?

James Monroe was a cautious soul, fearful of political entanglements in either hemisphere. It was only when there seemed a real possibility that Bourbon France would form an offensive alliance with Spain to recover the old Spanish colonies, then young republics, in South and Central America, that President Monroe took action. And the momentous words in which he enunciated a century ago what has come to be known as the Monroe Doctrine sound strangely mild today when a score of battleships patrol the coast of Nicaragua and United States marines guard the capital.

> The American continents [said Mr. Monroe], by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European Powers. . . . We should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

Yet Mr. Coolidge explains that the Monroe Doctrine required us to intervene in Nicaragua. Piffle! Mr. Coolidge does not know what the Monroe Doctrine is.

The Monroe Doctrine, to be sure, has undergone certain sea changes in the course of a century; but never before has it been stretched so far from its original shape. President Polk, in the forties, suggested that the doctrine might require the United States to occupy territory of the Southern republics to prevent the introduction of the European system; President Grant, in the eighties, announced that the doctrine did not permit transfer of American territory from one European nation to another—but neither he nor Polk carried his new principles into practice. Mr. Blaine, as Secretary of State in the eighties, sought to extend the doctrine to the assertion of the exclusive right of the United States to umpire in all disputes between other American Powers, or between those Powers and Europe—a right which, one need hardly add, is admitted neither in Europe nor in Latin America, although it has become increasingly a habit. (The fiasco of Mr. Coolidge's "mediation" between Peru and Chile may put an end even to the habit.)

Theodore Roosevelt made the most striking additions to the Monroe Doctrine—but though he made the phrases "dollar diplomacy" and "big stick" current he never went so far as Calvin Coolidge. While he suggested that we might have to act as an international policeman in flagrant cases of wrongdoing by a Latin nation, he also said:

> If a republic to the south of us commits a tort against a foreign nation, then the Monroe Doctrine does not force us to interfere to prevent punishment of the tort, save to see that the punishment does not assume the form of territorial occupation in any shape.

And Roosevelt declared that

> It has long been the established policy of the United States not to use its armed forces for the collection of ordinary contract debts due to its citizens by other governments. We have not considered the use of force for such a purpose consistent with that respect for the independent sovereignty of other members of the family of nations, which is the most important principle of international law and the chief protection of weak nations against the oppression of the strong. It seems to us that the practice is injurious in its general effect upon the welfare of weak and disordered states, whose development ought to be encouraged in the interests of civilization; that it offers frequent temptation to bullying and oppression and to unnecessary and unjustifiable warfare.

Two short decades later, we have moved so far that a President of the United States justifies the use of military force not merely to enforce payment of contract debts but to ward off a threat of possible danger to property, and even suggests that we must use our troops to prevent a possible inflation of the currency!

A billion and a quarter dollars, the Department of Commerce says, is the rough total of American investments in foreign capital securities in 1926. Never in history has one nation poured forth so much money in a single year. Nor is this all: when Belgium, Italy, Hungary, Bulgaria, Honduras, Costa Rica, or Salvador, the Hugo Stinnes Corporation, the Swedish International Match Company, the Trinidad Oil Fields, the Chile Copper Company, or the South Porto Rico Sugar Company floats a loan in New York—as all of these, and many others, did in the last quarter of 1926—the fact is publicly noted; but when an American oil or copper company invests more money in its own estates in Chile or Mexico no public record is made. We are aware how loans from government to government have embittered our relations with Europe; most of us admit that without the loans from banks to Central American governments our increasing tendency to dictate in the Caribbean would at least have been more restrained. Whither are we bound?

The Coolidge message excusing intervention in Nicaragua made no distinctions of size and geography. Americans have just lent $1,500,000 to the Housing and Realty and Improvement Company of Germany and $2,500,000 to the German Protestant Church welfare institutions. Logically the Coolidge doctrine would justify us in landing marines, in case of another German civil war, to defend the houses and hospitals in which Americans have invested their cash. It sounds ridiculous, but it is no more absurd today than Mr. Coolidge's present doctrine would have seemed in the days of President Monroe.

Merging 12,000 Miles of Railway

THE whirligig of time has played no more remarkable trick in our recent political and economic history than in bringing to the fore a proposal for the reunion of the Northern Pacific and Great Northern railroads. The dissolution of the union of these two roads and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy constituted one of the great triumphs of Theodore Roosevelt. He wrote in August, 1904:

> The Northern Securities suit is one of the great achievements of my Administration. I look back upon it with great pride, for through it we emphasized in a signal fashion, as in no other way could be emphasized, the fact that the most powerful men in this country could be held to accountability before the law.

More important still was the principle laid down that competition should be kept alive in the railroad field; for that purpose the Anti-Trust Act of 1890 was invoked.

The Anti-Trust Act still stands, but as a result of our experience during the war the policy of this country toward its railroads has been reversed. Incredible as it seems, there is a law permitting the merger of railroads, and it is under this that the Northern Pacific and Great Northern are now applying for permission to do in 1927 what they were prevented from doing in 1904, when those who proposed it were denounced by Roosevelt as "malefactors of great wealth." In 1904 the proposal was to hold the three railroads through the Northern Securities Company, a company specially formed for that purpose. Today the plan is to have a single operating carrier which shall operate the Great Northern and Northern Pacific and the Spokane, Portland and Seattle Railway. The Burlington is to be operated separately for the present, but the statement given out in regard to its status shows that there is to be one ownership, since 97 per cent of the Burlington stock will be vested in the new company. Thus more than 12,000 miles of railroad will be brought together if the Interstate Commerce Commission approves, and competition will entirely cease in the great Northwest. It is pointed out by the proponents of the plan that "such unified operations will afford exceptional opportunities for improved service and for substantial economies promising to improve the aggregate net earnings of the railroads in the Northwestern region, which has made the poorest showing of any rate region in the country." All of which does not alter the fact that it was precisely this proposal which so stirred not only Mr. Roosevelt and his Administration, but the country as a whole. What, destroy competition and create a railroad monopoly in the Northwest? Fifteen years ago the mere proposal would have roused the farmers to fury.

The proposal for these mergers is camouflaged as "regional groupings," and the pretense is maintained by Mr. Coolidge and others that there will still be competition, possibly by one region against another. If this merger goes through it means, in our judgment, another step toward the inevitable government ownership of railroads. The war showed that in time of stress that ownership was essential. We do not propose here to go into the question again as to whether the Government ran the roads well or badly. The point is that there was a necessity for moving quickly large quantities of freight and men, and the advantage of controlling the whole railway system from Washington was so obvious that no one questioned the advisability. Were war to come again the same step would be taken immediately, even with the assent of those who believe that the roads were turned back to their private owners in bad condition. We are unable to understand why this should be done only in a war emergency. If there are unquestioned benefits to be had from a union of all the railroads in war time, there must be at least some benefits in peace time. Why not let the country, shippers and passengers, profit by the economies of administration from complete union and joint operation, as the railroad presidents insist will be the case if the new Northwest merger is permitted? Is it not true that if there are economies and greater profits, and perhaps lower rates, to be obtained by the merger of these three Northwestern roads, still greater economies could be obtained by merging all the railroads?

We are aware, of course, that this is treason, precisely as the Northern Securities Merger of 1904 was akin to treason. But facts are facts, and no sane man can deny that if, as a result of the merger, the farmers and the merchants of the Northwest feel that they are in the grip of a selfish monopoly—that the stockholders are getting all the benefits of the merger—there will be an overwhelming demand that the government itself take over these railroads. If government consent is given to the merger, the lines will never again be unscrambled. It is a sign of the times that Governor Smith of New York has just declared in his annual message that the public gets nothing out of Interstate Commerce Commission control except "long drawn-out battles in which experts disagree over capital accounts." The prostitution of that commission by President Coolidge's recent appointments is another very large nail in its coffin. Regulation of the railroads will inevitably give way to national ownership.

The Last Serfs

CONUNDRUM: When is a strike not a strike? Answer: When it is on shipboard.

A stray item in the newspapers lately is a reminder that almost the only part of the modern world that is free from strikes is the sea. For on shipboard a strike is not a strike but mutiny. When the American steamship Colombia of the Panama Mail Line arrived in New York recently from San Francisco it was learned that just before the vessel reached the Canal three Filipino stewards refused to do work assigned to them because they said it was duty usually performed by seamen. They were put in irons, upon which twenty-eight other stewards knocked off work and endangered the safety and lives of the passengers to the extent that the latter had to make their own beds. The next day the three stewards had a change of heart, were released, and returned to work, but the twenty-eight were arrested at Panama, taken ashore, and held for trial, charged with mutiny on the high seas, an offense that under American law is punishable by as much as five years in prison and a fine of $1,000.

To characterize by so serious a word as mutiny an act that led to no greater catastrophe than necessitating passengers to make their own beds seems obviously excessive, yet many would hesitate to demand the right to strike at any time on shipboard, partly because of the peculiar relation of a crew to its ship. But whatever the argument may be for carrying over the crime of mutiny, with its historically severe punishments, into an age of short voyages, radio communication, and ships in which nine out of ten employees have nothing to do with the vessel's safety, there is no such justification for the survival of a medieval system whereby a sailor is chained to his job and practically deprived of his wages until—and unless—he finishes his term of employment. Except for the modifications worked by the La Follette act, the sailors of the world are bondsmen in a civilization in which other labor—in theory, at least—has become free. They are the last serfs surviving into the twentieth century.

Up to 1915 the general law of the world was that when a ship left the country of her ownership she signed a crew that agreed to work aboard until she returned to a home port or until a stated period of time—usually about three years—was up. During this period a sailor's wages were withheld, with the exception of one month's advance pay—usually signed away to a crimp as a shipping fee—and such small sums as it pleased the captain to dole out in foreign ports or to account for against clothing, tobacco, and the like received from the ship's slop chest. A sailor who left a ship before his time was up was guilty of the crime of desertion; he could be forcibly brought back aboard and punished with a term in jail besides—although he rarely was. If he made good his escape he forfeited all his accrued wages. The amount of wages lost by sailors in this way has always been huge. Most sailors are rolling stones and after a hard voyage feel an urge to try life ashore in a foreign port—for a while. In favorite ports desertions may amount to 25 per cent of the incoming crews. Where other crews are obtainable, desertions are often stimulated by captains as a means of saving wages.

A breach was made in this system in 1915 by our Congress, in the La Follette act, which provides that a sailor in an American ship may demand one-half of his accrued pay in any port, at home or abroad, while a sailor in a foreign ship has the same right in a port of the United States. The act also abolishes the crime of desertion in American ships or in foreign vessels when in our ports. It was intended to be not merely domestic but international in its effect. It is only the beginning of the end of serfdom for the world's sailors, a moderate measure from the standpoint of the freedom acquired by labor ashore, but it is still opposed by many ship-owners in this country, and an effort is afoot to undermine it at the present session of Congress. There is also a tendency to make it the scapegoat for the recent slump in shipping, although low tide in that regard was reached years before the La Follette act. Silas B. Axtell, counsel for the International Seamen's Union, thinks that body must take an active, constructive part in the rehabilitation of American shipping in order to refute the charge that legislation for the benefit of seamen has killed our ocean commerce. Sea power, says Andrew Furuseth, president of the union, is in men, not in ships; the latter are but tools.

It is this view which the American people should impress upon their business men and legislators. No shipping policy which does not produce a great breed of men upon the sea is worth while. If sailors are generally thriftless and improvident—and they are—it is because they have not had the control over their money which develops contrary traits. If they too often quit their ships, it is a reaction against the harsh and outmoded terms of their employment. Better morale and higher ability will come when conditions at sea appeal to men possessed of those qualities.

Vegetarian Dogs

THE late W. H. Hudson, who got a great deal of attention whenever he wrote about animals, recorded in one of his books that a considerable portion of his popularity departed when he wrote an article calling dogs "scavengers." Hudson liked dogs, or rather he liked particular dogs, as any reader of the South American books and of "A Shepherd's Life" must know; but this did not prevent him from saying that he found their habits disgusting. They preferred carrion to caviare, they buried good food until it should become bad, they dug up refuse out of foul places; their famous noses had been perfected by nature for the sake of an unlovely search, and they slunk away from the scene of this search with something like the attitude of hyenas. Hence their moral qualities, such as they were or were not. Thus Hudson declared himself, and thus he got the sort of attention he cared nothing about—the attention of dog-lovers. There was no comfort for these readers in the fact that Hudson had credited their favorite animal with having taken on a remarkable amount of polish during the centuries.

Whether dogs, like men, will ever become fundamentally different from what they once were and now are is a question which men answer in diverse ways. What dogs think about themselves is unfortunately unknown. It is unknown, for instance, whether they have a doctrine of canine perfectibility under whose light they look forward to an era when garbage will have been forgotten by every member of the race calling himself or herself civilized. But a situation has arisen in India which may force a declaration of opinion. According to a dispatch received by the New York World, Shet Arjunlal, millionaire of Boroda, has founded a dog city, called Kutta Nagar, wherein he will attempt henceforth to lead dogs in the way he thinks they should and can go. His chief criticism of them at present is that they eat meat, dead or alive, and of course in the latter case have to kill other creatures in order to do so. So he has inclosed 300 acres within a fence that ingenuity can go neither over nor under, has paved the inclosure with concrete, so that there will be no rats or mice, and has put his charges on a strictly vegetable diet—milk being the only animal product available to them. The puppies are treated to "wheat flour fried in butter and slightly sweetened with sugar, with a dash of salt." Adults get "pancakes made of whole wheat flour, with a dash of curry made of vegetables and flavored with salt and pepper." The sick and the convalescent are let off with a special dish consisting of "almonds fried in clarified butter and sweetened with honey." For millions of years dogs have cleaned their teeth on the bones they gnawed; now in Kutta Nagar the operation will be performed by the human attendants who administer the morning bath. There will be no fleas if Shet Arjunlal can help it, and there will be the strictest moral virtue among the members of the colony. The sexes will be segregated until marriage time, after which monogamy will be the word and the law.

The result of these measures should be awaited anxiously by reformers everywhere. If the dogs die or go mad, that may mean something. If they live and continue to look like dogs, and appear happy, that will mean something too. To mere lovers of dogs, however, the whole experiment will mean little. Dogs to them are dogs.

The Urge Toward Empire

By WILLIAM HARD

Washington, January 24

WHAT is the psychological anatomy of the thing we call "imperialism"?

I observe in Washington that it would continue to exist even if no such persons as New York bankers or oil magnates were in being.

I hold it thoroughly inadequate to think that "imperialism" is forced upon the State Department and the United States by the machinations and pressures of wicked "interests." I hold it more reasonable to believe that the average American is naturally "imperialistic" and that, when he finds himself in the State Department, he just naturally acts "imperialistically."

Secretary of State Bryan owed nothing to any New York bankers or oil magnates. He had no political or commercial commitments impelling him toward the use of force against weaker countries. Yet he was thoroughly prepared to use force against Mexico and he laid the train of policy which necessarily exploded into the use of force in Haiti and in Santo Domingo.

For years I have watched my "imperialistic" friends in the State Department. They are not acting as the conscious tools of "interests." They are perfectly honest. They are perfectly patriotic. They would not for anything have the United States do wrong in order to help a mahogany company. The idea that they would arouses my indignation. I know them, and I know they would not. It also incidentally arouses sincere indignation in their breasts when I call them "imperialistic." They do not think they are.

Few of them have any relationships worth mentioning with the industrial or commercial or financial world. Those who are well-to-do are living on inherited or married money, quite aloof from all contemporary business struggles. Those who are poor are living honorably in their poverty, with their eyes fixed on a great glory—the glory of "the career." Any secretary of state would get about one hundred resignations tomorrow morning from our diplomats of "career" if he tried to make them follow a policy which they thought was a surrender of the interests of the United States to the "interests" of business.

Why then are they what the editors of The Nation call, and what I call, "imperialistic"?

I claim that it is for the same reason that, under President Polk, led Northern lads from the free States to volunteer in swarms to go and fight the Mexicans, although it was well known that the immediate result of the fighting would be the adding of more slave territory to the Union. It was against the interests of the North to fight that war. Yet the volunteers from the North were aboundingly plentiful.

Let me then state what I have observed in the psychology of our "imperialistic" diplomats; and then let me ask the editors of The Nation how in the world they are going to uproot the roots of that psychology.

The first characteristic in it is an extreme "consciousness of kind" and an extreme "consciousness of difference." "We" are Americans. "They" are something else—something else that is very, very different. "You can't treat Nicaraguans the way you could treat Americans." I have heard that remark until it requires all of what self-control I have to get home without kicking the roof off the car.

These people—and they are most of us—do not start with saying: "All of us inhabitants of this planet are first of all human beings. Then, afterwards, we have split off into being Americans and Nicaraguans." No! They do not start with thinking of our points of equality. They start with thinking of our points of difference.

It is the start of our thinking that determines the ultimate outcome of our actions. What is the instant result?

It is to despise the people from whom we feel ourselves to be so different. If Americans and Nicaraguans are so different, one side must be "higher" and the other side must be "lower." That is not necessary in logic; but it is necessary in human nature. Start once with the idea that you are more different from a Nicaraguan than you are like him, and you will inevitably find yourself saying: "One of us must be the higher. The other must be the lower." Well, then, which is the higher? Why, naturally, inevitably, I, we.

Take then a man who thinks himself necessarily "different" from a Nicaraguan and necessarily "higher" than a Nicaraguan and put him into the State Department. In other words, take almost any man in the United States and put him into the State Department. What will he do when some "low" Nicaraguan general seems likely to interfere in Nicaragua with the welfare of some "high" American?

Does any New York banker have to telegraph him? Does any sinister influence have to worm itself into an invitation to his dinner-table? Does the President have to call him in and talk politics to him? Not at all.

The American business men who have wanted our marines in Nicaragua at this moment are not worth the political powder to blow them out of their little counting-rooms. Our largest business interests have been extremely skeptical of our intervention in Nicaragua. Yet we intervened. We intervened—how shall I express it? We intervened by automatic psychological momentum.

We are different. We have ideals. They are different. They have no ideals. One of our fellows is in danger. We must rush to rescue him. It makes no difference who he is. He is lofty. They are degraded. Send the marines. We have them. We have the power. This gives a duty. Duty!

First, difference. Second, loftiness compared with degradedness. Third, duty. (That is the final and most frenzied step in the process.)

We have a duty to diminish the degradedness of the Nicaraguans. We have a duty to make them be peaceful. We have a duty to make them be better.

This is our moral compensation to ourselves for our original sin of despising fellow human beings.

Starting with a perfectly sincere under-emphasis on humanity, we end up with a perfectly sincere over-emphasis on humanitarianism. And we sincerely send the marines, to safeguard the exalted and to elevate the lowly!

Destroy every banking firm in New York. Destroy every oil company in the whole country. The psychology which I have here described will still drive us toward empire—and toward the ruin which always follows empire.

The Last Empress of Mexico

By ERNEST H. GRUENING

IT was Charlotte who dreamed of empire. Franz Josef's jealousy and court intrigues had removed Maximilian from the governor-generalcy of Lombardo-Venezia. He had been personally popular, but not strong enough to satisfy the Vienna militarists. He retired to Miramar, his castle across the bay from Trieste.

"Max is planning," Charlotte wrote a friend, "to place a fountain on the terrace, to build at the garden's edge a Moorish kiosk, furnished in Oriental style." He also contemplated a winter aviary filled with exotic birds. Charlotte had exacted a daily mass, and for it a chapel was designed so that even the servants could hear—from the vestibule. Such was life by the blue Adriatic. It began as an idyl. It became monotonous. A long Mediterranean journey duly reported through a series of detailed Reisebilder to the royal relatives at Windsor, Schönbrunn, and Laeken relieved the tedium but little.

Then Napoleonic intrigues; scheming of Mexican expatriates; Maximilian's availability warmly urged by Eugénie. His noble and sincere gesture of refusal "unless the entire nation, freely expressing its will, ratifies your demand." The Mexican Conservatives produced certified lists to show that 6,445,564 Mexicans of a total population of some eight million had voted to call Maximilian of Austria to a new imperial throne. He credited this fraud. Charlotte had always been for acceptance. Victoria of England counseled against it. Queen Marie-Amélie of France, Charlotte's grandmother, strongly opposed it. "It will be an occupation for Max, a diversion for me," retorted her favorite grandchild. Moreover, under the existing Austro-Hungarian constitution, Maxchen, were he to live to be eighty, could never be other than a private citizen, always the second in a realm where being first alone counted. Her father, Leopold I, of Belgium, agreed. The archduke's income, he pointed out, was insufficient to meet the needs and dignity of that station. Only when Franz Josef and the other Hapsburgs asked Maximilian to sign away all his archducal rights to patrimony and succession did the young couple protest violently and hesitate.

Napoleon III, learning of these vacillations, wrote sharply: "the assurances given in Mexico, the pledge to the subscribers to the loan . . . bind your Imperial Highness. . . . No, it is impossible that you renounce going to Mexico . . . the interests of your family demand it . . . for the honor of the House of Hapsburg is involved." What was really involved was 270,000,000 pesos, to pay which the unfortunate archduke's agreement with the French Emperor mortgaged in advanced the bankrupt Mexican treasury. Even around the Tuileries the court gossips referred to l'archdupe. In vain did Marie-Amélie, Cassandra-like, cry "they will assassinate them."

In the palace at Schönbrunn there was a terrible family quarrel, harsh recriminations, sneers, expressions hardly noble. Maximilian said to Charlotte: "Let's get out of all this."

The night Maximilian's signature to the family compact and his severing of the tie that bound him officially to the Old World became known, the Empress-to-be presided, radiant, over a great banquet at Miramar. But her consort, requiring a physician, lay in the Gartenhaus, to which the breeze wafted the music and tinkle of glasses. When next morning Charlotte hurried to give him, with her own hands, a congratulatory dispatch from Napoleon, he brushed it aside with "I tell you I do not want to hear of Mexico." The day following he refused to receive delegations come to felicitate him. As the Austrian frigate Novara, pennanted from stem to stern, weighed anchor amid the huzzahs of multitudes, Maximilian sat in his cabin, his face buried in his hands, weeping.

But after the Papal blessing was received at Rome, the party turned gay and lighthearted. He was thirty-two; she, twenty-four. The grave problems which the new monarch would face were brushed aside. Maximilian himself designed a new decoration for prominent Mexicans; precedence, titles, uniforms, court organization, and ceremonies were enthusiastically discussed.

From the fever-laden sandhills of straggling Vera Cruz blew the first breath of disillusion. So indifferent were the inhabitants that even the buoyant Empress—Carlota now—could not hold back her tears. Up to the plateau in rattling coaches pulled by mules straining under the arrieros' cracking whips, over roads that were often torrent-beds, the imperial cortège, with its five hundred trunks, struggled. At Cordova but one dingy room was prepared for the imperial guests, while their suite slept in coaches or in hallways.

But in the capital the splendor of the old viceregal days and of Emperor Iturbide shone forth. Arches of triumph blazoned "Eterna Gratitud à Napoleon III" and "Viva Nuestro Emperador." Moreover, there was a genuine outpouring of affection, of native cordiality for the gallant young couple and above all for the lovely little Empress, whose beauty and vivacity, whose regal bearing and democratic manner captivated every heart.

With all his weaknesses, Maximilian was at heart a liberal. Despite the constraint of rank and environment which hedged his mentality his was truly a nobility of soul. To his new and unknown country he brought a sentimental love for the oppressed, a modern disbelief in absolutism that boded an early clash with his supporters. Carlota shared these qualities; in addition she had fire, determination, and persistence.

"The arrival of the Nuncio," she wrote her grandmother, "is an important event in the settling of ecclesiastical matters. I hope that thanks to us this country will become healthily Catholic, at the same time as liberal, for it was neither one nor the other. To have survived the scandals of the clergy, our holy religion must indeed be of divine origin, though it would soon have disappeared without the reforms we shall undertake."

But the Mexican hierarchy was more influential with the Papal envoy than were the imperial couple. He was obdurate for the return of ecclesiastical properties disamortized eight years previously, inflexible for rescinding the religious tolerance promulgated by Juarez. Maximilian turned over the hopeless task of convincing Mgr. Meglia to Carlota. She was no more successful. The clericals were to become militantly hostile.

It was the intrepid Carlota who, during one of the Emperor's brief absences from the capital, legislated to alleviate the terrible abuses of the Indian peons on the haciendas. But she succeeded only in enraging the landowning class, while the reforms, like so many others throughout Mexican history, remained scraps of paper.

Finally, Bazaine, the French commander, persuaded the Emperor, much against his will, to sign a decree outlawing those who fought in arms against his government and subjecting them, upon capture, to execution as bandits.

With his only supporters, the clergy, thus alienated for reasons wholly creditable to him, and the opposition steeled to the utmost through the ill-advised ruthlessness of the French military, who were soon to be withdrawn, Maximilian was doomed. But when he considered abdication, the Empress opposed it passionately. She was determined to carry out her dream of empire with him.

Poor Carlota! She had already lost him. It was in the enchanted Borda Gardens at Cuernavaca, where the Morelos Valley lies in tropical warmth below the snowy volcanoes, amid the deep scent of jasmine, hyacinth, and heliotrope, that she lost him—to the gardener's daughter—lost him to the Indian loveliness that had conquered the conquerors. His absences from the capital became more and more frequent. From then on her feverish activities, her immersion in charitable works, her journey to Paris and Rome vainly to implore aid were a desperate effort to escape from her own burning unhappiness.

It is doubtful whether she ever fully grasped Maximilian's death. Despite widespread belief to the contrary, her derangement had begun before she left Mexico. In an Empress much may pass for caprice. Only when she openly conjured up Napoleon's poisoners as on her trail and refused to leave the safety of the Vatican did the world learn of her madness. Within a few months it had shrouded her bright spirit like a pall. For sixty years she lived—until January 19, 1927—in her native Belgium, "dans les tenèbres." How much she really knew, what fancies of hope, resignation, or despair passed through that clouded mind, will forever be a mystery.

The League of Nations: A Misprint in History

By HENRY NOEL BRAILSFORD

I

SIX years ago I found myself, at the height of the Russo-Polish War, in the border town of Minsk. Its starving citizens were watching the last relics of food vanishing from its shops. In the Christian villages the peasants lay prostrate, counting the horses and cattle which the retreating Poles had carried off. The Jewish villages were heaps of timber, which smoldered to the accompaniment of an incessant wail. Under my windows, along the cobbled street, there flowed two streams of peasant carts, drawn by diminutive ponies. One stream carried shells to the Russian front, and the other brought back the sick and wounded of the Red Army.

A young staff officer read out for me the news which had been picked up that evening from the West by radio. "This morning," ran one item, "the first assembly of the League of Nations met in Geneva." What was it, this League? I tried to picture Geneva to the mind's eye. But the cart-wheels went on jumbling their munitions over the cobble-stones, and in my nostrils there was the sickening smell of charred humanity and smoldering wool. Wilsonian phrases ran in my ears; they would not blend with the landscape around me.

I have often wished that some realist could carry the legislators of Geneva on a Candide's pilgrimage round their world. For the scenes at Minsk have been repeated in many corners of our earth since the creation of the League. Smyrna has gone up in smoke; the heavens have rained their fiery mercies on the villages of the Riff; by the light of the flames of Damascus one might see the French engineers diverting its rivers until the fruit-trees withered in its legendary gardens; the hum of airplanes in the sky has punctuated the phrases of a British ultimatum over Cairo; and as China entered the League's Council, British gunboats fired their salvo of welcome at the city of Wanhsien. The League has become the European goddess. By pacts and treaties of arbitration her ritual is celebrated from Vistula to Thames, but for Nile and Yangtze there are other gods and other rites. There seems to have revived in the atmosphere of Geneva something of the old sentiment about a European family, but it practices its exclusions as well as its intimacies. It is gradually evolving its intricate system of Locarno documents, complicated by an almost bewildering system of promises to arbitrate. The lower grade of peoples stands outside these family relationships. With them one does not conclude pacts; one "guarantees their independence."

One may indeed exaggerate the success of this local pacifism in turning the European Continent into an oasis of peace. The garrisons of the victors must still keep watch on the Rhine. The chimneys of Creusot and Skoda smoke busily, and around the chemical factories the air is not perceptibly purer. It is hard to follow with any optimism the news that the League's disarmament committee sits from time to time. No one is so simple that he interprets the treaties of arbitration which Italy negotiates with Albania and Germany as evidences of the devotion of Fascism to peace. Each garrison watches the increase of the other across the frontiers of Italy and France. And indeed we could find no clearer proof of the futility of a technique of peace which is content to cultivate its European garden. For if Italy seems to be enlisting a League of the Dissatisfied in Europe, it is because she cherishes extra-European ambitions. It is for Tunis or Smyrna, for Abyssinia or even for Syria that she seeks to enrol her partisans in the pacified Continent, flirts with Germany as she begins to reconcile herself with France, and disturns the staffs in Paris, whose duty it is to watch the Alpine passes, and guard the sea lines which in time of peril will carry the Negro troops from Africa to Marseilles.

Partly to provision herself with foods and raw materials grown under her own flag (or in more realistic language, for the profit of her own middlemen), partly to find a protected sphere for her own capital, but chiefly to secure careers for her surplus population, Italy is determined to expand. She coquets with Germany, whose Nationalists cherish the same ambition; and these things she cannot do without disturbing in the Balkans and elsewhere the balance of power which France had adjusted for her own purposes. No more than in 1914 can peace be established and war banished by a continental system. What Morocco and Bagdad were then, Tunis and Syria are now. Powers which believe that prestige and profit depend on their expansion outside Europe cannot be confined within the bonds of a Locarno pact. The plan of thrusting the lesser peoples outside the mercies and fraternities of this European concert does not work. You may revise your code of morals and decide that war is not war but only killing, when Riffi or Chinese or Syrians serve as targets. You may agree that "independent" Egypt shall not arbitrate with imperial Britain. You may make peace the privilege of an international upper caste, but within that caste itself the disturbing jealousy of imperialism breaks through. Italy wants colonies, and for that contingency there is no provision in all the verbiage of Locarno.

The political pacifism of which the League is the highest expression has its limitations. One may doubt, to begin with, whether every salutary movement toward the reconciliation of France and Germany which the Locarno pact registers had its real origin in a political calculation. Could it have succeeded while the heavy industries of the two countries were living in acute discord? Was it not the reflection in politics of the Iron and Steel Cartel, which was all but concluded before the statesmen ventured to sign its reconciling provisions? When these industries, each dominating the party machines of their respective countries, failed to agree, M. Poincaré invaded the Ruhr; so soon as they agreed, even his relentless memory consented to forget the racial feud.

On the eve of the decisive discussions over disarmament so good a friend to the League as Lord Cecil explained in a speech in London why Great Britain could not reduce her armaments. The army, he said, barely suffices to police the empire. Its geographical distribution and the safety of its communications will always forbid Britain to reduce, even by one unit, the number of her cruisers; she might, perhaps, reduce their tonnage if others would do the same, but that must be her only contribution to the world's disarmament. That speech revealed, as plainly as any hostile diagnosis, the motives of a great Power's armaments. The defense of one's home territories has become the least of the excuses for heavy armaments. It will become steadily less important as the reorganization of Europe proceeds on the models of Locarno and Geneva. It might vanish altogether, if ever the victors could bring themselves to revise the territorial settlement of Versailles, and clear away those racial grievances, which disfigure the map of Europe, like so many finger-posts pointing to the next war.

But even if one can stretch one's mind to this difficult climax of optimism, the imperial and economic reasons for armaments remain. Lord Cecil's enumeration was not complete. It is not solely the risk that communications with India and Australia might be broken which requires Britain to maintain a fleet in the East. There are at this moment fifty-five British naval units in Chinese waters, engaged, in the last analysis, in maintaining against the will of the Chinese nation certain privileges, valued by her traders, but so obnoxious to Chinese pride that force must defend them as force extorted them. Nor is "police work" an accurate description of the army's functions. Gibraltar, Malta, Suez, and Singapore are not the most turbulent spots on our earth's surface. But they may well supply the decisive arguments, if ever England is compelled to debate the question whether British capital shall control the railway development and banking system of India; or whether she shall continue to base her ability to dictate the world price of rubber on her possession of Malaya. And in the same order of thought, it is clear that on the ability to fly over Cairo in bombing-planes depends who shall ration the Nile water and grow cotton from the dry sands of the Sudan.

So long as the decision of such questions depends on the number of a Power's cruisers, on its coaling stations and its air force, an institution like the League of Nations disguises the operation of the real forces which shape the history of mankind. It is what Nevinson called the first Hague Conference, "a misprint in history." Pacifist ideals cannot be reconciled with the ownership or even with the exclusive exploitation of territory beyond the motherland. "Police," as Lord Cecil uses the word, is a complete misnomer. These imperial policemen are not the guardians of the common good; they are the defenders of owners' privileges. Sooner or later the glaring incompatibility between these claims of ownership and the new ideals of arbitration and disarmament must become apparent. The world cannot tolerate forever a system which allows force, past or present, to decide the ownership of materials which are the foundation of our daily life. While it hesitates to face this problem of economic imperialism, the League is tolerating the growth of the forces and motives which one day will destroy it, and civilization with it.

II

Is it possible to see the lines of an international solution for these problems? Some of them depend on the mobilization of the world's public opinion. When even one or two of the Great Powers is clean of compromising ambitions, the League's Assembly will gain the courage to speak the fitting word about such matters as the British ultimatum to Egypt or the proceedings of France in Syria. In Great Britain itself there are forces which may one day achieve for India a full dominion status. But for the problem of raw materials one must await the growth of a corporate consciousness vastly stronger than the world has yet developed in times of peace.

There are two suggested solutions, of which one is no solution at all. Mr. Hoover's criticisms of the British rubber monopoly proceeded from the obsolete doctrine of laissez-faire. His complaint seemed to be that the British Government had intervened to make the restriction of output effective. He would apparently have felt no objection if the same restriction had come about by the voluntary action of the syndicated producers. One must be very blind to the tendencies of the modern world if in the face of such facts as the formation of the European Iron Cartel one supposes that free competition among the producers can much longer protect the consumer in the world's markets. Even M. Loucheur, commenting on the formation of this cartel, declared, in the Berliner Tageblatt, that the European governments would have to take concerted action to control it and to regulate its prices. He was thinking solely of the world's need of cheap iron and steel. What may well be argued on that ground becomes an irresistible necessity when one considers the interests of peace. The world certainly needs oil and copper, rubber, iron, wheat, and cotton at stabilized prices which will yield a living wage to the workers who handle them; but no less must it be protected against the allocation by force of the power to control their sources. There is no way of escape, save by the revival on a permanent basis of the international machinery for rationing the distribution of the chief raw materials and foodstuffs, which existed in an effective though rudimentary form during the war. Given this assurance of regular and impartial supply, it would become even to London a matter of indifference whether British war-planes could circle over Cairo or British warships find a shelter at Singapore. But to this solution American laissez-faire is as much the enemy as British imperialism.

The need remains, it is said, for civilized administration of the territories which produce these things: that no nomad tribe has a divine right to keep, as its own hunting preserves, territory which might satisfy the world's need of cotton or oil. Possession must be justified by the effective use of natural resources. But if this argument, based on the claim of mankind to all the earth's potential riches, is to be honestly used, then there must be an authority which represents mankind and no national government with the right to apply it. In a very timid form this principle is latent in the League's system of mandates. That system, though it was in its origins a laughable hypocrisy, may be capable of further development. The Mandate Commission stands in need of stronger backing from public opinion in its occasional efforts to check and criticize the administration of the Great Powers. The suggestion that it should have its own resident reporter in every mandated area is worth consideration. In the long run we shall have to face the fact that every imperial Power which boasts that it holds its tropical possessions as the "trustee" of their native inhabitants and of humanity at large ought in that case to hold them not as owner or conqueror but under the mandate of an international authority.

I would base the future of the League on the decay in men's minds of the conception of a Great Power. The word means nothing but the ability to act, by virtue of force or the prestige which force conveys, beyond national frontiers. Within these frontiers democracy may seem to be sovereign; beyond them it has no meaning. To other Powers, save by courtesy and at a sacrifice, no Great Power can ever bow or yield. That is the meaning of the insistence on unanimity in the League's constitution. Many years ago, when we were discussing the foundation of the League, Gilbert Murray asked me: "Can you imagine the British Empire consenting to allow itself to be placed in a minority in any international assembly?" Candidly, I cannot imagine it. But so long as this clinging to the idea of national sovereignty survives, so long will the League be a mere decoration which barely disguises older and harder realities.

Disarmament alone will not cause the conception of national power and sovereignty to decay. Above it we must create a mechanism which represents and serves the common economic interests of mankind. Men will find the League workable when the bond of common opinions means more to them than the bond of nationality. Opposed to this evolution are the economic interests which use the power of the national state for gain. The future depends on their defeat in the social struggle waged within each national unit. But by constructive criticism and the reasoned statement of an international ideal we may, while we struggle, hasten the victory of humanity.

These Modern Women

The Evolution of Disenchantment

ANONYMOUS

AS one of those awful Southerners in the North, I shall have to begin with the Civil War. Of course there were earlier wars in the family annals, but I do not feel so personally responsible for them. Grandpapa A gave some money to the Confederate Army and stayed at home to look after his possessions, consequently came out of the war pretty well off, continued to beget daughters, and in his old age was rewarded by the appearance of a son who was to be my father. When I was very young I thought it a terrible disgrace that Grandpapa A had not gone to fight the Yankees; now I regard his perspicacity somewhat differently. Grandpapa B was a hero and went to war (it now appears that he went reluctantly but it was a long time before I knew this), ruined his health, came home to dire poverty, begat a number of children, and died with suspicious readiness. My mother was his oldest daughter.

Papa was a good-looking young man, trained to do nothing, who drove a fast horse and was supposed to have money. Mama was such a good girl that when a man once told her she had a pretty foot she blushed and wondered if she should feel insulted. The last cent of her inheritance from her grandfather had paid for her college diploma. She had taught school for a year and been sick most of the time; her mother told her to get married. So the city girl drove back of that fast-stepping horse to her country home; all the male relatives of the groom got drunk at the wedding supper and I was born as speedily as possible, not as an accident but as the natural consequence of ignorance. The physician was papa's brother-in-law and an autocrat; he believed that women should suffer in childbirth and refused to administer chloroform during the process. The parents were twenty-two years old, papa startled but inclined to strut, mama consumed with bitterness and terrified of having another baby, all three of us surrounded by a family organization tighter than a band of steel. It was determined that the only son must stay on the land, in spite of the fact that all other decent families had moved away and tenant-farmers were all around beginning their devastating efforts.

There was not a thing papa knew how to do except ride a horse and boss the Negroes about the crops. It developed, too, that after Grandpapa B had given each of his girls a good wedding and two thousand dollars there was not much left except the two farms. So we lived with the bluegrass hills and the rattlesnakes, the mocking birds and the darkies, my mother in a terror of childbirth and I in a loneliness not greatly mitigated by the contempt in which I was taught to hold all other children in the vicinity. I could play with the Negro children, who knew they were my inferiors, but I could not play with the white children, who might want to dispute this. The Negroes, too, taught me to despise the white tenants as trash, so it was not hard for me to perceive that my family was the most remarkable in the world. But those lonely, bitter years were a crime against childhood; I shall not ever lose their scar. There was always plenty of money for newfangled and useless machinery, never any for books; the small girl read Shakespeare and the poems of Edgar Poe; she thrilled over the composition books in which her mother had written college themes; she determined to be a writer.

We print herewith the seventh of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of women with a modern point of view. The next article will appear in The Nation for February 16.

Beatrice M. Hinkle, psychoanalyst, and John B. Watson, behaviorist, will analyze through these articles the underlying causes of the modern woman's rebellion.

Before I was six I knew that men could do something terrible to women, and I flamed with the injustice of it. I ached with the longing to make it up to my mother and I braced myself against the dining table to tell my father that I hated him, then fled in terror before his threatened vengeance. That ache and that hatred continued until I was myself out of college, and there have been many nights when I have stayed awake planning desperately how to make a great deal of money and take my mother away from my father. Now I know that she would not have gone; now I know that there were compensations which she never allowed me to suspect, and that there was never any reason for things to be half as bad as I thought them. But the scar remains.

When I was seven we moved to the city. My mother's family, more prosperous now, made a place for my father which he took on sufferance, always with the threat that he would soon be going back to the country. Once we did go back and I hated him worse than ever, but we did not stay long. In business my father has always been the kind of man who comes out of a trade poorer than he went in; he has the need to be generous and lordly and superior to money; he wants to give things away in order to assure himself that he is of some importance in the world. When I was seven there was also a little brother to relieve me of some of the injurious strain of my mother's devotion.

My two grandmothers must not be omitted. They were very different, except that both were proud as peacocks. Neither had any just cause for pride, but that was the way they had been brought up. They outlived their husbands many years and continued to dominate the families. My mother's mother was the daughter of a country doctor who roused the ridicule of his patients by the education he insisted on giving his girls. Perhaps it is from him I get my feministic strain. I doubt if either grandmother felt it was any particular hardship to be a woman; they were both vigorous, able women, capable of getting a great deal of enjoyment out of life. They took, as I remember, a rather tolerant and somewhat amused attitude toward the men of the family; it was my mother's mother who used to check me up when I said bitter things against men or specifically against my father.

By the time I reached my teens I had a well-developed dogma on the world's injustice toward women because they could not have everything they wanted, on nature's injustice toward women because they have to bear the children, and a lack of interest in God because he was a man. A lady god would have roused my soul's devotion. It is true I did get religion when I was about twelve, being then jointly in love with the minister and the minister's daughter. I spent an afternoon kneeling at the altar and tried to feel uplifted, but without great success; told my Sunday-school teacher of the visions I had and despised her for appearing to believe me. Then at fifteen I fell in love with a language teacher who was an atheist and lost my religion. Thereafter I had only one religion, a sort of perverse feminism, based on the convictions that women had all the children, men had all the fun, and men were pretty awful anyhow. I was still determined to have a career as much like a man's as possible. And no babies. And no matrimony.

Mama said she wanted me to have three good offers and to refuse three. She wanted me to be a glorified old maid, doing the things she might have done. I decided I would get married when I was thirty, in order to have tried everything, and then I advanced the date by six years to get rid of the argument: to be or not to be. It seemed to me it might be pleasant to have something settled, even though the settlement itself was bad. Then I had begun to suspect that marriage could not possibly be as bad as I had thought it. And I had met some Northern men who seemed to think women might be treated more or less as adults and who were willing to assume some of the responsibilities for the more boresome side of domestic life. I had lived too long in a family of men who in times of distress remained pleasantly incapable of making a cup of coffee; I do not believe I could have married a Southerner, and if I had I am sure I would have murdered him the first time he asked for his slippers or the evening paper. So I married a Yankee and found marriage not so bad as it might have been, nor yet so good. At any rate I got that cause of conflict more or less settled. My husband is interested in my work and I am interested in his; at a pinch we substitute for each other, though this is growing more difficult as we grow older and our interests become more specialized. He is eager for me to develop as far as I can, and he has few theories about woman's position, or man's. We keep house casually and travel a good deal. My own diathesis is against anything that is fixed. We have no children and thus my mother's old terrors are laid for me.

The war swung me out of college into a totally unexpected job. Since then I have dabbled a bit in college teaching and a bit in research. Over the college teaching I was discouraged because, while I liked the students, I found it rather dull ladling out platitudes to the indifferent adolescent, and I could see no prospect of working into graduate teaching. Women do not, as yet, get much chance at this cream of the teaching profession. In research I shall always be interested, though here, too, I am hampered by my attitude of disenchantment. I can never quite accept the finality of a statistical formula, and the errors which are constantly being demonstrated in the work of even the best scientists make me a little dubious about branding any conclusion as the Truth in capital letters. I can still get mad when I see an obvious case of discrimination against women, but in general all my old feministic revolt has been transferred from men to the conditions of human existence. There is nothing any of us can do about these conditions which does not seem to me futile, so my only test for different activities is the pleasure to be derived from them.

Thus I have at a comparatively early age lost all my motivating faiths, faith in the righteous cause of women, faith in the recreating powers of science, faith in the ennobling possibilities of education. This is indeed a very sad state. Worse, I have become that futile creature, a writer. I had rather make small black marks on paper than go through any experience I can name. The sensory pleasures have pretty largely ceased to be; I can sit here in my quiet study and desire to desire something, something to touch or taste or see or hear, but the desire does not come. If I were building a Utopia, I would take away our memories, so we would start fresh every day, and then I would endow each of us with strong, lusty desires, and I would give us strong, eager feet with which to run swiftly and determinedly after our desires. I would leave principles out of my Utopia, even feminism; in place of principles I would give us all a magnificent and flaming audacity.

A Government of Minnows

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, January 21

ALMOST exactly a hundred years ago a discouraged friend of the able but not amiable Adams coined a phrase, "the millennium of the minnows," in order to describe the small fry swept into public office on the great popular Jackson tide. There are times when a look around the official Washington of today makes that description seem to fit present conditions perhaps better than it could possibly have done in 1828. There is of course one really big fish in the Department of Commerce, and there is a splendid shining gold fish over in the Treasury Building, but for the most part they do seem to be more or less of the minnow variety. The glitter of the gold fish and the splash of the big one go a long way to prevent a general comprehension of the extreme insignificance of the others that swim about in the Capitol pool. To drop the piscatorial metaphor and get down to cases, when you eliminate Mr. Hoover and Mr. Mellon, about whose size and sense opinions radically differ, those occupying high place here today undeniably grade pretty low. There is a class of writers in Washington who think it dreadful to blurt things out like that. Even though it is a conceded fact it seems to them "unnecessarily vitriolic" and "unbecomingly violent" to state it in print. Yet not many unbiased and posted persons would privately combat that particular indictment.

In the White House, for example, we have a small Massachusetts machine politician whose flawless record of inertia and inaction in a dozen offices plus several extraordinary pieces of political luck has enabled him to keep an unbroken attachment to the public pay roll for thirty years. His real intimates include a retired Boston department-store keeper, an aged Vermont village lawyer, and a dull but rich Massachusetts mill-owner who rode up on the same State political machine. In his official Cabinet are the scintillating figures of Mr. Sargent, Mr. Wilbur, Dr. Work, James J. Davis, and Harry F. New. In the House we have the noble "Nick," who looms large as a leader only to certain congenial colleagues and to them only under certain circumstances. There too is the devoted Tilson, whose caliber was well illustrated in the recent cruiser fight. Over on the Senate side leadership, such as it is, is lodged in the hands of Curtis of Kansas, Bingham of Connecticut, Fess of Ohio—honest and worthy men, smooth but unstimulating. However, this lack of outstanding legislative leaders and great executive figures is not a thing of which to complain in this time of prosperity and absence of critical problems. The country has not suffered because of them. Perhaps on the whole it is better not to have stimulating men under such conditions. So long as a negative policy is all that is needed, these negative men, aided by a daily press four-fifths of which in the last ten years has become concentrated in strong Republican hands, can rattle around in their jobs without doing anybody any real harm and with great joy to themselves, albeit some of them never quite get over the uneasy feeling that in their case a mistake has been made and that somehow it is going to be found out. You can if you watch for it often see this apprehension in the eyes of the Attorney General. In negative action, however, they are all right. It is only when affirmative action is required that mediocre men clothed with power make trouble for themselves and the rest of us—which brings us quite naturally to Mr. Kellogg and the State Department.

Not long ago one of the wisest of Washington observers—he is not an office-holder—speaking of the conduct of our foreign affairs made what seems a searching and trenchant remark. Said he: "Our State Department, like the British Foreign Office, is conducted primarily and properly in the interests of the business of the country. The difference is this—in England it is business as a whole which is represented. With us it is not only business as a whole but individual business as well. At the British Foreign Office a group of business men representing an industry can get in—and they ought to get in, but the individual industrialist with his little individual ax to grind and his little personal grievance to air cannot get in and ought not to get in. With us that is the very fellow who does get in. Not only the bureau heads but the Secretary himself is easily accessible to him. Every little tin-pot business man who wants to can get into our State Department and muddle the minds and cloud the heads of the men who mold our policy and commit our country. This may be democracy, but it has its disadvantages."

The more reflection given this comment the more reasonable it seems. Unquestionably it is the individual business interest which has forced Mr. Kellogg on his indefensible course in Nicaragua and in Mexico, not industry as a whole. It seems to be generally believed that the interested individuals in this case were oil men and that they were powerful or persuasive enough to have compelled Mr. Kellogg to take affirmative action and for Mr. Coolidge, who is inherently averse to all forms of affirmative action, to support him in this policy as soon as he discovered what it was—which it may be said in passing was quite late in the game. The net result has been a sorry mess. No one can tell what the situation will be when this appears in print, but as it is written, while the prospects are that we will muddle through and avoid an actual clash with Mexico—perhaps even emerge on Arbitration Avenue—our loss will be none the less real no matter what we gain. Our prestige in South America has mostly gone; even the pretense of friendship with us among our Latin-American neighbors has vanished, and the diplomats in Europe are gleefully chuckling over the situation. Here is America, which since the war has been trying to save the soul of the world and has preached at the Powers without ceasing, pointing out to them the beauties of national goodness and unselfishness—here is America doing to a small nation on this continent exactly what it has been the American custom to deplore in Europe. Why shouldn't the diplomats chuckle? They have, as the Paris correspondent of the New York Times points out, got the United States on record in a way which will bind it to silence when the occasion presents itself—as it will—for European Powers to take analogous steps where their interests are involved. It is a great pity that Mr. Kellogg could not stick to negative action like the other Cabinet minnows.

The Debt Unsettlements

By JAMES N. ROSENBERG

THE clamorous European echoes of the recent Columbia manifesto urging a reopening of the European debt question remind us again that this matter of the Allied debt is far from being settled. Aided by our politicians we have come to look upon ourselves as benevolent and generous creditors. But Europe, led or misled by its politicians, has as strong convictions to the contrary and looks upon us as an international Shylock. Europeans know only that we are eternally asking for blood-money. Whenever the European tax collector comes around, they blame us. That is politics.

The only hope of a friendly and lasting solution of the question lies in removing it from the arena of party politics, dealing with the matter as if it were a business affair between an embarrassed debtor and an intelligent creditor. Let us forget that mighty sovereign states are involved. Suppose a business corporation gets into a jam—what happens? We examine the circumstances. Perhaps the corporate affairs have been so mismanaged, the corporate assets so looted, that the debts are far greater than the assets and it is not worth trying to resuscitate the concern. Then only one course is possible—receivership, bankruptcy, liquidation, the scrap-heap.

But perhaps the debtor corporation has assets and good prospects for future earnings. Perhaps it has mines, factories, lands, labor, but not enough cash or other liquid assets. It needs merely time to work out of its difficulties. In such circumstances an intelligent creditor gives time.

There is a third possibility—a settlement at less than a hundred cents on the dollar. If it is useless to accept extension notes because the debtor has not enough to pay them, intelligent creditors, as realists, accept a compromise. They trade and bargain and sometimes haggle. Finally they take fifty cents on the dollar, or forty, or whatever they can get.

Now, you cannot put a sheriff or a receiver in charge of a government. If the government is a weak one, or if it has been beaten in a war, you can arrange for a financial adviser or a reparation committee, which looks a good deal like a receivership; but with most of the countries of Europe such a course is not to be thought of. Let us perforce take a cheerful view and politely assume that our European debtors are solvent and want to pay us but are temporarily hard up for dollars. Just what shall we do?

We can grant an extension of time or take a settlement at less than one hundred cents on the dollar. But we in America have chosen neither course. What we have done is neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring. Our representatives have solemnly assured us that the last drop of blood has been squeezed out of the turnip, and the high-minded European statesmen have told their constituents that although the Americans are bloodthirsty sharks they have been induced to be quite reasonable. But when these statesmen are dropped from office, how do their successors talk? "What!" they exclaim, "the United States yielding or generous? Just listen to what the American Secretary of the Treasury has himself stated to the people of the United States." So they prove from our own lips that we are grasping and merciless. Thus the dragons' teeth of hatred are sown.

Now, when a business creditor exacts a settlement he makes sure that he gets real money and not worthless stage money. If he accepts a 50 per cent settlement on a $100,000 debt, he sees to it that before he releases his old debt he gets a certified check for $50,000. But what have we accomplished in our dealings with Europe? In place of the notes which England owed us at the time of the Armistice, we have accepted new notes for 75 per cent of the principal amount of the old notes. In place of Italy's old notes we have taken new notes for 25 per cent of the old debt. From Belgium we have taken paper for 54 per cent of the old debt, and we are now proposing to settle with France on a basis of 48 per cent. These agreements are merely the acceptance of new scraps of paper for old scraps of paper, of new promises for old promises. And we have called these agreements settlements.

Instead of pursuing this stupid, irritating, and discriminatory policy, why should we not, as intelligent creditors, say to our debtors in Europe something like this:

> We lent you eleven billions of dollars to help you win the war. You admit you owe the money. We, on the other hand, admit you cannot pay it at present. We do not wish to press you, but, of course, we know that yours is a high-minded, powerful, solvent government and that given time you will insist upon discharging these obligations for moneys which we were able to lend you because of heavy taxes imposed on our citizens. You shall, of course, have time, plenty of it. Ten years have gone by since we lent you this vast sum. No repayments of principal have been made.

Hardly any interest has been paid. Never mind. We are your friends, your brothers, as we were your allies in the war. So we declare that for another ten years you need not pay a penny of principal or interest. We lift the load from your shoulders so that you may prosper and so that you may feel free of burden to us for a total period of twenty years. We have already settled with some of you which we thought not only fair but generous, but we gather that you are not satisfied, that you consider us harsh creditors. If that is so we offer to let you cancel the settlement already made. Let the old debt be restored. It can stand for the additional ten-year period, and at the end of the ten years if you find yourselves ready to discuss payment in whole or in part, we shall be glad to discuss the matter with you. If at the end of the ten-year period you are not ready to pay in full, we know that you will be able to make some payment in part at least to reimburse our citizens.

If such a policy were to be announced and pursued we could take the matter out of politics, put it on a sensible and business-like basis, and make a step at least toward a final solution, or we would remove all opposition of the irreconcilables since we would not be canceling any part of the debt; and we would stop the mouths of the hate-breeding jingo foreign politicians.

The Solid South Backs "Al" Smith

By GEORGE W. HAYS,

Former Governor of Arkansas

WITH the popularity and influence of "Al" Smith and his importance as a national figure increasing every day, many persons are asking what attitude will be taken by the solid Democratic South toward his candidacy for the Presidential nomination in 1928. One can hardly pick up a newspaper without coming across the statement that the South will reject the New York Governor as Presidential nominee on account of his religion; that the Southern delegates will bolt the party to which the South has always given its whole-souled allegiance rather than accept Smith as standard-bearer. To one who is fully alive to the true sentiments of this section of the country such speculations appear almost ridiculous.

I doubt whether other parts of the nation realize the strength and solidity of the Democratic Party south of the Mason-Dixon line. Locally, to be nominated by the Democratic Party is to win the election. The candidates who lose in the primary go on fishing trips, while the successful nominee is interviewed by the press on the reforms and policies of his future Administration. This condition prevails throughout the South and Southwest with the exception of sections of Kentucky and Tennessee, both of which have gone strongly Democratic this year.

The Democratic Party is the party of our fathers and our fathers' fathers. It is the perfect organ for the expression of our political beliefs and hopes. We are mainly an agricultural people, in contrast to the industrial North and East. Our advancement must come largely through our farmers and small merchants. We are probably the largest group of individualists left in the nation in this day of industrialism and mass production. The Democratic Party is the only party whose ideals and platform represent our interests.

The Southerner distrusts the Republican Party with an instinctive suspicion fully as strong as the faith he holds in Democracy. His animosity is "bred in the bone," a heritage from the period of Republican ascendancy in the South during the dread days of Reconstruction when the carpet-bagger ruled over a desolate and wretched land. The deliverance of the South in those times was the Democratic Party. By lining up solidly under her protection the Southern white man discovered that he could once again win back to freedom and social supremacy.

In the light of these facts it is easy to see how absurd is the presumption that the South would desert its party in the event of Governor Smith's nomination. The argument that the religion of New York's chief executive would bring about a change in Southern allegiance assumes that religious prejudice and intolerance are stronger than party loyalty. Such an assertion is unfair to the vast majority of Southerners. While it is a fact that most of us are Protestants, I feel certain that I voice the sentiments of the average Southerner when I state that the principles of Democracy are too great and mean too much to us ever to be sacrificed for anything so un-American and so petty as religious bigotry. The Constitution of our country says that there shall be no religious test for office. Church and state are completely separated.

The events of the 1924 Democratic National Convention are not pleasant to recall. Religious dissension showed its ugly head. Painful and humiliating but inevitable were the results in the elections which followed. We learn from experience, and I feel certain that at the convention of 1928 the delegates, bearing in mind the fiasco of 1924, will nominate their strongest and ablest man and put aside petty politics and sectionalism.

The elections last fall showed that a reaction was setting in in favor of the Democratic Party. In view of the scandals of the Republican regime and the Republican Party's failure to coordinate and harmonize its own ranks, discord and discontent are widespread and the people throughout the nation are ready for a change to Democratic control. With such a leader as Governor Smith the return to Democracy should be an almost foregone conclusion. He is not only the greatest figure in the Democratic Party today; he is the most important statesman of our time regardless of party affiliations. To belittle such a man because of his religious views would be incredibly stupid.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter finds in his letter file the following from a correspondent in Cleveland:

That impulse to kill—to kill a fellow-being, to take upon myself the mark of Cain—has been coming over me. And I want you to file this letter whether you publish it or not; I may have to use it in my defense some day.

I spend much of my time in a Ford coupé, chasing around downtown Cleveland. A few months ago I welcomed, as a big step forward, these automatic, three-light signals at busy intersections. I have obeyed them faithfully. To me they are a much better traffic control than an officer. There is such an absolute, impartial Justice about them. The signal is inexorable and each driver checks the other, a symbol of automatic Democracy.

But pedestrians, apparently, are Republicans or Bolsheviks. What gets my goat is that after I have waited patiently for my green "Go" signal, and am just starting up, a pedestrian walks deliberately across the street.

I am mild. I consider the safety of the other fellow. But think of some of the drivers we have nowadays. Take a real he-driver; add to him some of the thoughts I had today; and you might get a dead pedestrian. Here am I with an incipient urge to hit the leering pedestrian who crosses my path at the wrong time. I have in my hands, under my power, the weapon that will do the job. I have the probable immunity. With an officer out at the intersection trying to speed me up, no court would hold me guilty.

I wonder how many of our traffic accidents are accidents. Are we going to wake up to a new spasm of our social order, an epidemic of traffic homicide? Will the time come when jury verdicts of "justifiable traffic homicide" will be common? We must do something to lessen the traffic jam. Is killing pedestrians the answer?

* * * * *

PROBABLY the Drifter's correspondent, like most car drivers, is unaware of the law of the highway. Ironically enough, a candidate for a driver's license is questioned about almost every other subject under heaven except his legal obligations toward pedestrians. Nor are policemen better informed. The ancient law of the road, as expounded to the Drifter in those halcyon days before it had become a dead letter, gives the pedestrian an equal right on any part of the highway with any vehicle and a special right at crossings. Legally speaking, a crossing is a continuation of the sidewalk. It is the pedestrian's special domain. A vehicle crosses it on sufferance. No automobile has a right to honk a pedestrian off a crossing or to keep him waiting at one side. Probably this is legally true in most cases even where there are lights or where a policeman regulates traffic. In New York City, at any rate, the municipality has been empowered by the State to regulate only vehicular traffic—not the goings and comings of pedestrians.

* * * * *

BUT of course in the year 1927 all this is mere theory—moonshine of the most impalpable sort. There has been no invested capital to champion the pedestrian's rights. He himself hasn't even been aware of them, and through neglect he has irrevocably lost them. The Drifter read a paragraph recently in which one citizen was represented as saying militantly to another: "We pedestrians ought to organize to protect our rights." To which came the placid reply: "What rights?" What rights, indeed? To reclaim the rights of the pedestrian today would, in most of our cities, tie up traffic in a Gordian knot in ten minutes. And the Drifter surmises that the pedestrian has got what he deserves. He is a chicken-hearted, white-livered insect who has been more devoted to getting a car in which to play the bully himself than to asserting his rights or those of his fellows when afoot. Let him suffocate in his own exhaust.

* * * * *

THE Drifter's sympathies used to be all with the pedestrian, but he is beginning now to regard the automobile driver as an object for commiseration too. When pedestrians straggle off the curb into the street and impede the progress of a line of cars without getting anywhere themselves, the Drifter would hardly blame some choleric driver for giving them a not-too-gentle bump. Come to think of it, the Drifter sometimes harasses drivers himself by stepping in their path and pretending not to see them.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

California Is Awake

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A student mass meeting, held on the University of California campus, January 13, discussed America's policy in Nicaragua and Mexico. Fifteen minutes before the meeting was scheduled to begin it was impossible to get inside the doors. An overflow meeting was held in another auditorium. About three thousand students attended, and many were turned away: sorority "sisters," fraternity "brothers," political-science students, foreign students, art majors—all the personalities that combine to make a university. Many sat in the aisles, more stood up; only three people left before the meeting was adjourned.

After the preliminary speeches by Professor Barrows, Professor Priestley, Chester Rowell, and others, the meeting was turned over to discussion from the floor. The trend of these talks was decidedly "liberal." A vote was taken and resulted as follows: For our policy in Nicaragua—about even. For our antagonism toward Mexico—80; against our antagonism toward Mexico—2,000.

The very fact that such a meeting was even called shows that the American youth is waking up; the fact that the discussion was "liberal" indicates that the splendid work of The Nation is bearing fruit; and the fact that the vote was 2,000 against 80 in opposition to America's maintaining a policy which may lead to war with Mexico offers evidence that American youth is unwilling to fight a war for "dollar diplomacy."

Our next ambition is a mass meeting on military training.

San Francisco, January 15 R. T.

Honor Where Honor Is Due

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Does The Nation know anything about the English case? Does it know that the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, in driving that corrupt judge from the federal bench, one of the most difficult feats imaginable, rendered a conspicuous public service for which it was applauded all over the country—everywhere, indeed, except in The Nation's Roll of Honor? It seems to me a very grave omission. How could you have overlooked this feat which made almost all journalism respectable?

St. Louis, January 6 CLARK MCADAMS

[We plead guilty. We should, of course, have placed the Post-Dispatch on our Honor Roll, and do so now with the greatest pleasure.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

No Rules for War?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Attempts to restrict the use of poison gas in warfare by international treaty are predestined to futility by the impossibility of including arbitrary regulations in a procedure which, by its very nature, must be without such regulations. War should not be confused with sport. In sport, ends are ignored for the sake of the means. In war, means are ignored for the sake of the ends, and by this an international Hoyle prescribing means is inconceivable. Indeed, by its very declaration of war, a nation says that all rules are off, and that henceforth anything goes.

Let poison gas be an indictment of war, and let us outlaw both; but if, as I cannot believe, it is possible to have war without gas, then it may also be possible to have war without guns or bayonets.

New York, January 15 A. Y. JAMESON, JR.

Down with "March" and "Thursday"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: For more than two thousand years the idea of war has been perpetuated in the names of one of the months and in a day of the week. Where do we find the idea of peace perpetuated in any universal public institution? Would a proposal to change the name of March to "Pax" and Thursday to "Peaceday" bring a storm of protest? Perhaps we are too "civilized" nowadays to create such memorials to the spirit of our age.

Indianapolis, December 27 Frank Ross

The Source of Freedom

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: We ought not to feel extremely happy over the freedom of worship in the churches and freedom of thought in the schools (there is considerable of both, although here and there are restrictions). What freedom exists comes from a smallness of interest in religion and in the schools. Let the public become vitally interested in either, and much of our boasted freedom will disappear. It will go like the freedom of Negroes to vote in the South, the freedom of the press in Italy, the freedom of speech in America during the war, the freedom of worship during the Middle Ages, when religion was a vital matter.

Freedom in church and school today is probably due to our twenty-four-hour attention to "Business as usual."

New York, January 11 Lloyd M. Crosgrave

Let's Have Lots of Holly

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: You say: "Now that Christmas is well over we can begin the New Year with good resolutions never to use live holly again." Why not say "Appreciate the plant so much that you will support a movement to learn how it can best be propagated by seed or cuttings. Help populate the region in which it can be grown, so that all that has been destroyed will be replaced. Persuade those who have helped in its destruction to join you in filling the world with more rather than less of the beauty of this or that American plant"?

Plant science has until recently paid little attention to the study of the propagation of native plants, but we are learning. We now know how the dogwood may be propagated, either by seeds or cuttings, and the response to a leaflet on dogwood distributed at the New York Flower Show last year leads me to expect an increase in the number of dogwood plants in America. With the information in regard to dogwood seeds and dogwood cuttings now available, one can say with conviction: "Use dogwood all you will; but use your own. Fill your world with the loveliness of the dogwood flower, of the gloriously colored leaves of the fall and the red fruit, but grow your own."

The problem of holly has also been solved. At one Christmas dinner this year the centerpiece was a ten-inch holly plant covered with red berries, and this was established in less than six months. Roses would have taken that long. Why should we be deprived of using living holly or dogwood any more than carnations or roses? We need funds for research work whereby in each State, at some college or university, at least one person will study the propagation of the plants of greatest beauty and those most in danger of extermination, so one can say: "Use the plant, but use your own, and help fill America with its natural loveliness."

The Garden Club of America has already given to the Department of Botany at Vassar College a Conservation Research Fund. The Boyce Thompson Institute of Plant Research is carrying forward the work without a special grant. Graduate students are at work on problems of this type at Ohio State University, Chicago University, and at Washington State University.

Do not sound the death-knell to the use of holly, nor ask us to use some scrappy substitute. Teach the Southern States how to have nurseries full of their own grown holly. It is done with the English holly in the West. It can be done with American holly in the East. Increase the number of American plants in America, first by aiding in obtaining the knowledge of how to grow them, then by aiding in growing of them. Enrich the lives of the American people with living American plants.

Poughkeepsie, N. Y., January 4 Edith A. Roberts

A School with a Lantern

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your editorial Authors with Lanterns glows with the fire of freedom. It emboldens me to bring out my lantern and ask you to lift it high. I am searching for lovers of freedom to help the Modern School of Stelton, New Jersey, pioneer of libertarianism in education since 1910. There have been fears lately that it might have to stop for want of sufficient income, and a committee is attempting to raise an endowment of $100,000, which would carry about half the annual load and banish further fear. But it is a stupendous job for poor men in a land of hundred-percenters, and the help of every lantern-bearer that can be found anywhere is needed.

This school follows the lead of the child's spontaneous interests, letting play be its teacher; the child learns by doing. We consider education not merely preparation for life but a large part of life itself; wherefore we give the children the environment and the contacts of actual daily living in the world. We have an art-room, a weaving-room, a carpenters' shop, a printing-shop, places for all sorts of outdoor activities—sports, of course, gardens, barns with cows and chickens.

The school publishes a circular for free distribution, a 25-cent pamphlet on "The Spirit of Freedom in Education," a dollar book of the school's history, and an occasional magazine, the Voice of the Children, written, illustrated, printed, and bound wholly by pupils. It appeals to every friend of happy childhood to give it a lift.

Stelton, New Jersey, January 14 S. W. Simpson

Elinor Wylie, Geographer

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In a review of "The Orphan Angel" in your columns I indirectly reproached Elinor Wylie for placing Portsmouth in Vermont. On rereading, by request, the passage I learn that Miss Wylie referred to Portsmouth in one connection and to Vermont in another, and she, you, and all concerned have my apology.

New York, January 18 Abbe Niles

One Soul Saved

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I cannot read a publication which lends its advertising pages to such rabidly blasphemous propaganda as that which has disgraced The Nation recently. Granted that the Bible is confusing and out-of-date in many ways—it has been and still is the best crutch for limping humanity to stumble along life's perplexing road, and until you can provide a better prop, why knock away the old one? You undo much of your excellent editorial work by the folly advertised in your publication. I have not even opened the later numbers—they are too poisonous.

Formosa, Japan, December 22 Clarence Griffin

Books and Plays

First Glance

The age demanded an image
Of its accelerated grimace,
Something for the modern stage,
Not, at any rate, an Attic grace;

Not, not certainly, the obscure reveries
Of the inward gaze;
Better mendacities
Than the classics in paraphrase!

The "age demanded" chiefly a mold in plaster,
Made with no loss of time,
A prose kinema, not, not assuredly, alabaster
Or the "sculpture" of rhyme.

THIS poem, one of the best, I think, to be found in "Personae: The Collected Poems of Ezra Pound" (Boni and Liveright: $3.50), is only half ironical. It is only half, that is to say, against this age. One part of Mr. Pound regrets being born into a time when it is necessary, if one is to write good poetry, to be occupied with contemporary externals. This part of him hankers, and has been hankering for eighteen years, after the grace of other years, after alabaster and the inward gaze. Hence the many pages in "Personae" filled with translations or paraphrases from Propertius, the Provençal poets, and the classical poets of China; pages which, however learned and clever they may sometimes be, are not for me the real thing. The real thing in Mr. Pound—leaving out of account the famous epic, which is yet to be assessed—is his objective rendering of the age one half of him hates. The other half not merely relishes the act of rendering; it relishes the world thus rendered. "In a few years . . . no one will remember the trivial parts of me," says Mr. Pound to his detractors, implying that something greater will be remembered. I am not so sure. The best of him is still the impudent breeze of satire which blows through "Lustra." Coming on that once more in this collection, I gave the jump of delight which one must always give before the spectacle of a poet who has glanced directly at the world about him, decided how it looks, and invented a way of speaking that will bring poet, reader, and world for the moment into perfect conjunction. Epic or no epic, to have done this in many poems, even if they be slight ones, is to have become one of the poets of your age. And Mr. Pound is that.

In a foreword to "White Buildings: Poems by Hart Crane" (Boni and Liveright: $2) Allen Tate says that Mr. Crane has written "the most distinguished poetry of the age," and that if Mr. Crane is difficult to read, as he certainly is, the fault lies with the age, which does not offer "a suitable theme." "The comprehensiveness and lucidity of any poetry," explains Mr. Tate, "the capacity for poetry being assumed as proved, are in direct proportion to the availability of a comprehensive and perfectly articulated given theme." The rejoinder that it is the business of the poet to find or make such a theme where no theme is, that indeed the theme is always in the poet and not in the world, will doubtless be made; but it will be absurd in the face of Mr. Tate's analysis of the two elements fundamental in all successful poetry: adequate vision and adequate subject. The capacity for poetry will be a certain energy of vision; but there must be a subject to be seen. Mr. Crane, says Mr. Tate, has the energy; our world, however, has not the structure to support this energy. So Mr. Crane's poems are formidable and, perhaps, futile; they are the result of a powerful and original poetic mind straining in its nakedness to express nothing. I am not convinced that this is the most distinguished poetry of the age, but I am sure that it is distinguished poetry, and I am sure that "White Buildings" is important.

> And a poor prayer, in these days, to be simple.
> What can the curled tongue say a straighter way
> When beauty breaks, even before we touch it,
> Into a thousand ardors at a thought?

This third commentary upon our time is made by Laura Riding Gottschalk, whose collection of poems, "The Close Chaplet" (Adelphi Company: $1.75), introduces simultaneously to England and America a metaphysician in verse of most curious and distinct merit. Miss Gottschalk, equally convinced no doubt with Mr. Tate that the present order does not invite the vision of the poet, escapes into her own brain for subjects to see.

> For in untraveled soil alone can I
> Unearth the gem or let the mystery lie
> That never must be found.

"The close chaplet of thought" to which she goes is nothing more or less than the knot of nerves at the top of the human spine. There she plants her eyes and plays with all manner of ingenious images, ideas, and rhythms sent to her along the nerves. Her book will seem laughably obscure to some. To others it will be fascinating with the fascination of the best, the most burrowing lines of Donne. Justly considered, it represents one of the numerous adventures which American poetry must make if it is to remain—or become—distinguished.

MARK VAN DOREN

Another Microbe Hunter

Wealth, Virtual Wealth, and Debt. By Frederick Soddy. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

I AM not competent to review this book. I cannot tell you whether it is one of the most important ever written, although it well may be. It is about money, and having dealt with money for fifteen years as a practicing accountant, I know nothing whatever about it. My perspective upon its social implications has been hopelessly befuddled by virtue of the thousands of individual transactions I have checked and balanced to the penny. Thus I stand—for once in my life—shoulder to shoulder with the banker and the captain of industry. The three of us cannot see the wood for the trees. The men who handle money the most have no more notion of what it does to society than a Mississippi fishwife—or a Congressman.

Frederick Soddy is Dr. Lee's Professor of Chemistry in the University of Oxford; he received the Nobel prize for chemistry in 1921; he is the author of "The Interpretation of Radium" and other learned works, and one of the most brilliant scientists alive. For many years his thinking has been regulated by the stern realities of quantitative fact. Struck with the objective absurdities of the economic scene, he has attempted to swing the searchlight of the exact sciences upon the poetry and mysticism of money, credit, wealth, value, and the other imponderables in which we economists, accountants, and bankers deal. It is an adventure at once illuminating and perplexing. His analysis of the going structure is clear, penetrating, and, for me at least, exciting. I did not miss a word, or an idea, as he looked at production, distribution, and physical plant in the light of the first and second laws of thermodynamics. But when he came to superimpose upon this physical picture the gossamer veil of money and credit, and particularly when he outlined specific controls for money to keep it from wrecking production, perpetuating poverty, going on the loose in business cycles—I stumbled and fell. The accountant rose up and overwhelmed me. He may have discovered, as his subtitle implies, "the solution of the economic paradox," but I cannot follow him in that solution. I hope to God he has; and that it remains for a Nobel prize chemist to lead us out of the wilderness.

Here is a ball of gold, nine inches in diameter. "As a hoard or store used to buy goods it will diminish in quantity, like soap when you wash with it." Even in the vault of a bank it will tend slowly to disintegrate. But lent out at compound interest, "in six hundred years, there would arise legal claims to a golden ball equal in size to the earth, and weighing four times as much." We remember the will of Timothy Forsyte. Of such nonsense is the fabric of money compounded. Its laws have no scientific relation—often no relation at all—to the laws governing the growth of tangible, consumable wealth. It is a gaudy fairy story, told in a parallel dream world of its own, never meeting the lines of matter, energy, and the physical realities upon which the food, clothing, and shelter of homo sapiens are necessarily based. And in that dream world, bankers, accountants, stock exchanges, public-utility valuations, mergers, high finance make their solemn way, mirthless and intent. Out of the stuff of dreams they appropriate a great fraction of the tangible wealth—diamonds, country houses, haughty motor cars, Ritz dinners, even beautiful blondes—and that is enough for them. What their dream stuff does to society at large they neither know nor greatly care. They are practical men who know how to make dreams come true.

So far so good. Money has evolved on the basis of a scarcity economy; the threat of not enough to go round ever furnishing its dominating drive. The industrial revolution, culminating in the marvels of modern technology, has achieved a surplus economy—more than enough to go round if the engineer were granted a free hand. The two systems do not interlock; money puts the engineer on half time. Capacity production of industrial America is twice the normal output of consumable goods. There is no more important problem than that of dragging money out of dreamland and forcing it to correlate with the curve of physical production, as governed by the technical arts.

Mr. Soddy says that the following measures will achieve this end. I copy blindly for the enlightenment of wiser men: The value of money should not depend on the quantity of a single commodity, such as gold. The standard of value should be based on the general average of goods consumed and used in living. Government statistical authority should work out an index number of prices and report its findings periodically to "the national authority charged with the issue of money, so that the issue may be regulated to maintain the standard of value constant, much as the National Physical Laboratory (in the United States the Bureau of Standards) is charged with the standardization of weights and measures. . . . The issue of money should therefore be regulated by its purchasing power, so as to maintain purchasing power constant, more being issued if the purchasing power tends to rise, or the index number to fall, and some withdrawn from circulation if the purchasing power tends to fall and the general price level to rise—very much as the speed of a steam engine under varying load is automatically controlled by steam being admitted by the governor when the speed tends to fall, and shut off when it tends to rise." All this is not so far from Irving Fisher.

Private banks should by law be required to keep national money, dollar for dollar, of deposits. They shall only be permitted to lend money genuinely deposited in their keeping by its owners, who give up the use of it for the period of the loan, and receive receipt in legal form therefor. Thus the bank becomes merely a brokerage establishment for placing loans for depositors. And thus, if you please, the whole tradition and practice of private banking is dealt a staggering blow. Bankers may know nothing about the social effects of money, but they can safely be predicted to know enough to call Mr. Frederick Soddy, M. A., F. R. S., seventeen kinds of a blundering fool. He puts them, as it were, in the ash can.

These two basic provisions plus a suggestion for inaugurating the new system comprise the remedy. No reader, however, should criticize them on the strength of this inadequate summary; he should first absorb all the cogent arguments presented in the book itself. And having done so, he can perhaps write a distraught reviewer and tell him if this is indeed the way out of that economic paradox which does so much to make life the half completed thing it is. And if it is the way out, suggestions as to a temporary chloroforming of bankers—in no other manner can they be kept quiet—will be also welcomed.

STUART CHASE

Endless Adolescence

Tar: A Mid-West Childhood. By Sherwood Anderson. Boni and Liveright. $3.

THE spectacle of a grown-up human being engaged in a continual process of self-examination and expressing his discoveries in terms of a naive bewilderment may well be disconcerting. In this sense it is always a little embarrassing to read a new novel by Sherwood Anderson. It is like being present at a birth. You know that you are witnessing a cataclysmic event in nature. Yet you cannot help feeling that after all you have no business to be watching that event, and, moreover, that the birth itself is hardly as important as the baby. In novel after novel Mr. Anderson continues to render, with a disturbing effectiveness, his mental and emotional birth-pangs, but somehow we never see the baby. Transposed into critical slang, this means that his books invariably furnish us with the spectacle of a genetic process, never with that of a creative process.

It is perhaps justifiable to ask whether an author who is also known as an artist has a right to manufacture a dozen books all of which are concerned with a sincere attempt to understand himself and a few simple ideas. The question becomes all the more puzzling when it is considered that Mr. Anderson is just as bewildered in his latest novel as he was in his first. Perhaps the criticism is obtuse; I have been told that this is what is called sincerity. Now, sincerity and simplicity are splendid things in themselves; but how far do they go toward the creation of an integrated work of art? In his foreword to "Tar," for example, Mr. Anderson explains that an author lives in a world of fancy, that he can never tell the truth about himself or any other real person, and that therefore the autobiography that is to follow is not really accurate but just sort of made up. Now, this is a fine, sincere thought—for a little boy. Unfortunately it is not part of the autobiography, which is told from the viewpoint of a little boy, but it is the sum and substance of the Foreword, which is presumably written by an adult. And even to arrive at this complicated idea (which has been worrying Mr. Anderson since "Windy McPherson's Son") he must write eighteen pages. Agreed, one is very sympathetic; but one can hardly be said to be vitally interested or aroused or moved.

"How are you going to understand women when you cannot understand yourself? How are you going to understand any one or anything?" Little Tar asked himself the question at the age of twelve, but Mr. Anderson asked it all through that quaint anecdote "Dark Laughter." Such questionings were the essential basis of his happily named "Out of Nowhere into Nothing." They may be legitimate, even profound —who can tell? But not all the interrogation marks in the linotype machine, no matter how charmingly arranged, can ever make a novel. It is pretty confusing to have an author create a character and then turn around and ask himself forlornly what that character means—in fact (more usually), what it all means. There is such a thing as detachment. It is the thing that comes last of all to the pioneer mentality.

To express his self-discoveries and perplexities Mr. Anderson employs a prose style which is like a glass tumbler in that it is utterly transparent. It is unlike it in that it will not hold water. The plain fact is that his style gets so simple as to become bald and monotonous; and eventually it fails to transfer the emotion. Despite the worshipers of naivete, no particular magic resides in words of one syllable. It will be objected that Mr. Anderson is trying to reproduce American speech rhythms. But if these rhythms are dull and sleepy, what is the sense in reproducing them? A novel does not have to be a stimulant, but it certainly need not be a narcotic. When Mr. Lardner reproduces the lingo of the baseball player or the hard patter of the manicurist, we are fascinated because these linguistic patterns have a hyperbolical poetry, a surprisingness peculiar to themselves. But the flat monosyllabic middlewestiness that Mr. Anderson transcribes (undoubtedly with admirable accuracy) is merely dull. It is not poetic, it is not flexible, it is simply a poor medium for expression. At times it sounds like a first reader, at times like the first profundities of a thoughtful fourteen-year-old.

In Mr. Anderson's latest book of wondering reminiscence these crudities are probably more in order. "Tar" purports to be a transcript of life as seen through the eyes of a young boy. What puzzles the reviewer, however, is the astonishing similarity of this book to the others Mr. Anderson has given us. We have heard these bewilderments before. We have even seen that race-track before, in the story I'm a Fool. We have met Tar's father several times, in Windy McPherson, in "A Story Teller's Story." "Tar" is a tale of youth; but Mr. Anderson seems to have put a spirit of youth in everything. Adolescence is admittedly a fascinating phenomenon. Perhaps it is most fascinating to the adolescent.

"Tar" is another reminder of the fact that Mr. Anderson has written and can write superb short-stories.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Voltaire in Formation

The Young Voltaire. By Cleveland B. Chase. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

THIS welcome addition to Voltaireana is a sympathetic attempt to tell "the dramatic and unusual story" of Voltaire's exile to England and "to trace the important part played by this episode and by other influences in the shaping of Voltaire's subsequent life and writing." It is distinctly a book for the general reader who knows rather vaguely that Voltaire got a good deal from his sojourn across the Channel but who cannot recall exactly what it was all about.

Mr. Chase's Voltaire is a vivid personality. Heir of a bourgeois tradition which our age values more highly than it does the social circles to which he aspired, the young notary's son determined to "make good." If we are to believe the author, this vulgar ambition, more than any other single factor, urged him on to the noble goal of admittance into the best social and literary groups at the capital. The cartes d'entrée were his plays and his brilliant, polished verse. That ambition also made him ridiculous in exalted regions, for he once lost his temper over a beating at the hands of one of the Chevalier de Rohan's lackeys and crassly sought retaliation. His efforts brought social disgrace upon him and he betook himself to England, where his temper could less readily be exercised and where the accident of his middle-class birth would be undiscussed.

He arrived in 1726, unknown, ignorant of the English language, and almost penniless, and in less than three years was an accepted social institution in England. Mr. Chase gives a faithful and vivacious account of his prodigious activity and his amazing success. Apparently all that Voltaire needed to do to win friends and admirers was to present himself and begin talking. But he did much more important things than talk. He observed everything carefully and pondered and made comparisons and broached half a dozen literary projects simultaneously. When these appeared in the years following his return to France, they served the double purpose of presenting England and a new Voltaire to his old followers. For, in Mr. Chase's own words, "when Voltaire arrived in England he was a deft and superficial poet; when he left he was a 'philosophe.'" Thanks to the philosophical influence of the English deists and the impressions which free English institutions had made upon him, he returned to France a reformer and a mature critic of society.

At this point Mr. Chase's enthusiasm leads him astray into broad and dogmatic generalizations on the influence of Voltaire's writing. "His ceaseless tirades were one of the most important causes of the French Revolution and of the fall of the old regime," he writes in one place, and in another: "It is not too much to suppose that had Voltaire realized that his preaching against the old regime was to bring on the cruel slaughter of the French Revolution he would have restrained his tirades." Apart from the question of Voltaire's prophetic soul, there is the weightier problem of determining the causes of the French Revolution. It is safe to say that neither Mr. Chase nor any other literary historian will solve it adequately. In common with Lytton Strachey and the early Morley, Mr. Chase lays entirely too much stress upon the influence of writers and books in the eighteenth century and entirely too little upon social and economic factors. Indeed, where he does touch upon them he does so violently, almost hysterically, which suggests that his acquaintance with the period has not yet ripened into intimacy. Moreover, it stands in unpleasant contrast to the rest of the book, which is distinguished by a gracious and polished urbanity.

LEO GERSHOY

This Unbelieving World

Power. By Lion Feuchtwanger. The Viking Press. $2.50.

CASTLES and titles and jewels and women—these are the coveted realities for which people chaffer and cheat and pawn their souls in the glittering world created by Feuchtwanger. Scruples are for weaklings; trickery and violence are more becoming to gentlemen. And so the tangible goods of a state and the feeble rights of its citizens are piled up in the rich profusion of an Oriental bazaar—a bargain counter to be exploited by prince and priest, by Catholic and Jew alike.

It is a racy and kaleidoscopic picture which the novelist draws—a veritable panorama of civilization in a turbulent South German state in the declining years of the Holy Roman Empire. Swabia is a vortex in which the influences of Vienna and Rome and Versailles are set spinning—a political whirlpool so vividly presented to the imagination that the book takes high rank among historical romances.

Dominating the story is the character of Josef Süss, the Jew whose march to power has the glamor and the assurance of a tale out of the Arabian Nights. Even in his ultimate surrender to the forces which he has built up only to have them destroy him, the note of splendor remains. The moneyed despots of his race offered to buy his life for five hundred thousand double ducats, full and unclipped. And it was to be a cash transaction, for "out poured a stream of gold, minted gold of all currencies, red gold, Spanish, African, Turkish, from every quarter of the world. It piled up, towered high, and never stopped; it grew man-high and as broad as a full-grown oak, a mountain of gold." But Josef Süss goes to his execution in spite of all, a diamond solitaire blazing on his hand.

Feuchtwanger is a poet; his intricate story moves in a rhythmic pattern and woven into it are passages of stately music:

> Where the Orient and the Occident meet, there lies the land of Canaan, infinitely small. . . . From the Occident there beats a wild continuous wave upon the land of Canaan: a thirst for life and personality, a will for action, for happiness, for power. . . . But in the south under the pointed pyramids there lie dead kings embalmed in gold and spices, refusing majestically to give their bodies to destruction; their images set in colossal alleys in the desert smile at death. And a wild continuous wave beats from the south upon the land of Canaan; a passionate cleaving to Being, a burning desire not to lose form and shape, not to lose the body, not to disintegrate. But from the east comes a message of gentle wisdom: Sleep is better than waking, to be dead is better than to be alive. . . . And the mild continuous wave ebbs softly from the Orient toward Canaan. Eternally these three waves flow over the tiny land and mingle one with another. . . . The tiny land of Canaan lies still and attentive and lets the waves flow over it and into each other.

All the clamor and trickery and riotous action of the novel are muffled down at last to this note, vibrating to the harmony of the poet. That the outlines of this harmony have not been blurred in translation is due to the expert rendering of it into English by Willa and Edwin Muir. LISLE BELL

Portrait of an Educated Man

The Meaning of a Liberal Education. By Everett Dean Martin. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

IT is true, as Mr. Martin says, that "there is an important change in the attitude of the public toward education." Especially is this observable in the fields of education which lie beyond the walls of the academy. When Professor Dewey wrote "Democracy and Education" he did not envisage the very problems in human training which democracy inevitably had to face —an adult, extra-curricular demand for education and discussion. Adult education, Mr. Martin points out, is not new. The schools of Athens and the medieval universities were engaged in it; but they were established in a social milieu that gave them an intellectual aristocracy and conferred upon them the privileges of a leisure class. The crucial difference today is that intellectual life must be created and lived in an industrial democracy which neither grants leisure nor values reason above all things.

In this sense it is Professor Dewey's problem which Mr. Martin undertakes. But Mr. Martin's solution is sounder. Managing to see around the edges of his predicament, he realizes that social and economic forces cannot alter the ideals of the educational process when its aim is defined in terms of the attitudes it cultivates rather than the dogmas or doctrines it may inculcate. The description and historic exemplification of these attitudes, which is the chief preoccupation of the book, ultimately brings Mr. Martin to the position, more often implicit than stated, that if a liberal education means an intelligent pursuit of life, only a few in any multitude can achieve it. This may not solve the problem of democracy and education. If not, it does something better. It gives democracy up as irrelevant to education.

When one considers the traits which this book enumerates as belonging to the educated man, one rejoices in Mr. Martin's intimate appreciation of what intelligence really amounts to, apart from and above its expression in I. Q.'s; but at the same time one is appalled that he should not have been bothered, as Plato was in the "Protagoras," by the question whether such virtue could be taught. The educated man is "a mellow amateur, competent and well informed, but withal natural and human, wholly at ease with his knowledge and master of his technique; one whose thinking is play and whose mind does not squeak as it runs along." Mr. Martin turns to Plato, Aristotle, Abelard, Montaigne, Erasmus, Voltaire, and Anatole France to illustrate this definition. "In their words there is laughter and there is light." To be free of prejudice and propaganda, to be "debunked" as it were, to be an arduous skeptic without becoming an easy scoffer, to be an amateur inconsiderate of disutility, and to be forever in possession of a playful sense of humor, in short, to be intelligent—this is what being educated means. Who could deny the wisdom of this conception? But are there not some who would ask whether any educator who fully understood it would dare propose a program for its accomplishment? Mr. Martin is prudent as well as wise; he offers no positive measures, but contents himself with criticism of such obstacles to liberal education as utilitarianism, propagandism, the emphasis on mere rote learning instead of insight, Rousseauan romanticism, the conventional morality, and the intrusion of economic "class ideals."

In his exposition of the types of educated man in the great historical epochs Mr. Martin reveals his sympathies. These are with the humanists Erasmus and Montaigne, and his discussion of such men makes one of the most exceptional chapters in this excellent book. But here at the same time is Mr. Martin's weakness. He is just a little too this-worldly properly to evaluate rationalism, either in Plato, in scholasticism, or in contemporary science. Being deeply a humanist gives Mr. Martin unquestionable sanity in his understanding of the role of education in life, and genuine liberality in his conception of it, but it somehow prevents him from ever appreciating that which really makes education, knowledge, and insight a vital experience, the "amor intellectualis dei." MORTIMER J. ADLER

A Fresh View of the Child

The Language and Thought of the Child. By Jean Piaget. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

PROFESSOR CLAPARÈDE in his preface to this volume attributes its value to the fact that the author is young enough to have escaped the domination of older concepts from which the veteran psychologists of today had to free themselves, and so has been able to combine the dynamic and pragmatic view of the mental world as an organism that works under urges in a real world, the rich approach of Freud with his emphasis on emotional motives and mechanisms, the tremendous play of the social forces, the genetic clue as pursued by Hall, Gross, and Binet, and all the experimental and analytic methods from which these approaches were derived and which, in turn, they stimulated. There can be no doubt that one of the most amazing discoveries of modern science is the mind of the child, a thing as obvious as the evidence of the geological record and as readily overlooked until the proper viewpoint appeared. Yet nature does not cease to be landscape when it is recognized as the story of geology; and the sympathetic and aesthetic flair remains indispensable in the study of childhood, which would remain mute and inglorious if limited to the mechanisms of a narrow behaviorism. M. Piaget presents a novel approach to the rationalistic phases of the infantile psyche; and his opportunity comes through the provisions and spirit of the Institut J. J. Rousseau of Geneva, which in its nursery school provides for the most favorable development of its charges. It is the freedom and spontaneity of that pedagogical atmosphere that accounts for the naturalness and validity of the author's data. Now that it is all done (and a second volume is promised which will present the conclusions as a general interpretation), one wonders that no one did it before; the technique is so simple. It consists in nothing more than taking down the total conversation of two children of six years of age during a period of a few months. And the skill is all in the analysis of the material.

Confining attention to the major conclusions alone, we discover that the child begins to talk as an ego-centric exercise. First there is an imitative prattle, then a monologue, in which he neither tells nor expects a listener, then a collective monologue, in which the other person is a stimulus and yet in which there is no dialogue because each goes his own way. The second order is socialized speech, in which there is true interchange, the talk of one depending upon that of the other, as in most children's games. In the statistical analysis the ego-centric quality appears and even yields a formula; for about half of the elements in early language deal with expressions of the actions and intentions of the speaker. In the beginning was the act, and the word followed it. The older child thinks socially, though talking to oneself may be a relic of an earlier technique but invested with the complexities of a later argumentative logic; accordingly the socialization clue must be well considered and directed in the child's development. By the same analysis we learn that the child's thinking is undirected, or rather directed from within; and consequently imaginative, fantastic, wish-fulfilling, not fully shaped by reality or directed to a realistic goal.

Under this generic formula there appear types and stages. Some children grow rapidly, precociously, others slowly; some are given to one, others to another of the common components of the language and thought activity. Quarreling is presumably the commonest variety of social and linguistic and, if primitive enough, fistic interchange, and in verbal encounter may vary from Billingsgate to Westminster parliamentary rejoinder; and argument, the most common name for the exercise, may be statement, gesture, demonstration, justification, and finally true reasoning, first with a dominantly concrete and then with an abstract application. What we obtain from this shrewd venture in the infantile jungle is at once a genetic picture decidedly more in focus than any which appears in previous contributions, and as well a confirmation of the analogy between the thought and speech of the child and those of the primitive mind. Piaget confirms Lévy-Bruhl.

M. Piaget varies his technique interestingly and profitably. In order to gauge and record the child's status in comprehension and narration, he tells a story to one child and then has this child tell it to another, who in turn repeats it back to the psychological observer. Since one must measure what each understood and was able to convey, the "functions" are complex; but they can be managed, though it appears plainly that children understand one another no better than they understand adults. The child is at first too ego-centric to be aware of these deficiencies; it understands itself as far as the pragmatic situation goes, and in addition, being interested in verbalism, its language exceeds its thought. In opposition to our analytic world the child's world is a verbal syncretism, which is not so unlike the fused patterns which the Gestalt psychologists emphasize; but its own patterns are so different from adult forms that we may account for the confusions of children—and their originalities also, both always interesting—in this more definite diagnosis. Children also feel the need of justification, which in the Freudian terminology becomes rationalization, and combined with the artistic trend is responsible for much fantastic delusion.

M. Piaget's book cannot be a popular one. It is addressed to serious students of child nature whose interest runs deep enough to follow a technique. With the appearance of the second volume it will be possible to extract the cream of it all for purposes of child-study, and by the same token to reduce to simpler statement the intrinsically significant interpretations. For the child jungle, like the primitive jungle of mentality, is to our sophisticated view, in which generations of simplifiers have been at work, arbitrary, confused, intricate, blind. But it is not clueless, if we have the wit to cast aside the rigidities of our enforced logicality and enter again into the world from which we have laboriously emerged. It is all part of the story of civilization, of how differently—individual and race alike—we begin and end; it illustrates that when the past is the forgotten and the outlived, the obvious is the hardest thing to discover. M. Piaget's treatise is an admirable example of the profitable journeys still possible in the familiarities that fail to become intimate because we have become foreign to them in their own provenance, or because they are so commonplace in ours that they seem insignificant. If only a child could psychoanalyze itself, psychologists would have a simpler occupation.

JOSEPH JASTROW

Books in Brief

Religion in the Philosophy of William James. By Julius Seelye Bixler. The Amherst Books. Marshall Jones Company. $3.

Any attempt to derive a narrow systematic doctrine from the philosophical writings of William James must fail to be considerate of the diversity of his insights and the ubiquity of his thought, veering in so many directions and inclusive of so bewildering a heterogeneity of opinion. Least of all is there a determinate creed in his philosophy which might be called the religion of William James. The structure of Professor Bixler's book suggests a more rigid system of ideas than it actually contains. He is given, as is anyone writing about James, to ample quotation, and that alone would make impossible any thoroughly doctrinaire presentation. There is no doubt that James was tremendously interested in all sorts of religious phenomena and the relevant intellectual problems that any individual had to face. This part of his total philosophical thinking Professor Bixler has rather vividly indicated by collecting, reviewing, and organizing scattered passages in his major works, and more personal documents, including some delightful letters, for the first time published here. But James's interest in religion generates only a part of his philosophizing, and that part must be cooked and stewed in the sauce of the whole. Sometimes Professor Bixler forgets this, and then one feels that William James would have handled this book, as he once wrote of another dissertation that tried to systematize his ideas, "with mingled admiration and abhorrence."

Children of Ancient Egypt. By L. Lamprey. Illustrated by Margaret Freeman. Little, Brown and Company. $1.50.

Miss Lamprey has a nice instinct for what will interest children, and fortunately she bases it on such careful research that her writing is as dependable as it is entertaining. She manages here in a graceful story of a boy and girl of old Egypt to bring in a hippopotamus and a crocodile fight, to discuss hieroglyphics and the pyramids, and even to describe how they went shopping in the days of the Pharaohs. While writing primarily for young readers, Miss Lamprey drops in some observation here and there that gives her volume substance for older persons also. "It is hard to see," she says, "by what mental convulsion any one could conclude that because the ancient Egyptians decorated and dignified the tomb and spoke freely of the life beyond the grave, they were a gloomy and unspiritual people. Those who took this view seem to have inferred that the men who were the first to believe in immortality must have regarded their tombs with the same sensations of terror that ignorant and superstitious persons now have when passing a graveyard."

The Sublime Boy. By Walter de Casseres. With an Introduction by Benjamin de Casseres. Seven Arts. $2.50.

When Walter de Casseres drowned himself in the Delaware one night in 1900 he left behind him in the world a number of exceptionally lyrical and finished poems. Eight years seems little time for reenriching with any new experience the tried themes of life, love, and death. Yet Walter de Casseres sang these with so much freshness of feeling, and simplicity and grace of form and sound, so much definitiveness, that we come to realize we are in the presence of an experience beyond our own, another kind of experience—"that agony," perhaps, "drawn by sure measurement of the soul's fallibility," the coming universal desire not to live, as Hardy thought. Benjamin de Casseres waited twenty-six years to publish this book, and that implies its sort of tragedy. Passages of his introduction, where sincerity escapes the trick of words, become the substance of a profounder poetry than Walter's own.

The Book and the People. Essays on the Old Testament. Edited by Arthur S. Peake. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

Between the man on the street and the specialists in the universities the gulf often seems hopelessly wide. Any effort to bridge this is always welcome. Here is a book which aims to summarize accepted results in the field of Old Testament study. The authors are men who speak with authority, at any rate for Englishmen. While they have primarily in mind an audience of scholars, a novice ambitious to know what has been doing in recent years among the professional craftsmen of Old Testament research will find the volume of interest and instructive.

Rural Sociology. By Carl C. Taylor. Harper and Brothers. $3.

This book testifies to the common view that education consists of information. It contains a mass of facts, quotations, and statistics, not always accurate or up-to-date, on a great number of rural problems. The author's philosophy is suggested by a regretful observation that among rural people "the sentimental is almost universally decried."

The Free-Lance Writer's Handbook. Edited by William Dorsey Kennedy. Cambridge, Massachusetts: The Writer Publishing Company. $5.

Helpful suggestions to writers and would-be writers are like sermons over the radio—mildly inspiring and remotely effective. This collection is considerably better than the average, but its chief value lies in its reference list markets.

Drama

Ballyhoo

WHOEVER has happened at any time to read the Carnivals and Tent Shows section of that most comprehensive of theatrical journals The Billboard must have longed to be a playwright capable of doing justice to the life which those pages reveal, for whatever railroads and business methods may have done to the circus, the "Midway" is still Bohemian and its denizens are the last uncorrupted descendants of those wandering medieval thespians whom the unkind but doubtless accurate legal code of England classified as "rogues and vagabonds." They have—and the pages of the above-mentioned journal are still my evidence—their own language, their own code, and their own ideals. Through the medium of their chosen organ the man who "writes in" from a village in Kansas keeps in touch with his brother who is playing the remoter centers in Maine, and though I note that business is seldom better than "fair" and though village chambers of commerce seem almost universally unreasonable, these members of "the profession" are at least resigned to their lot. So far as I know, no one else respects them, but they obviously respect themselves. There are Hula dancers—Koochie was of course the name before the Hawaiian craze struck even the rural regions and made them change their Oriental pantaloons for a grass skirt—as well known in their world and as proud of their names as any actress who ever demanded twenty-four-inch letters on Broadway; there are ballyhoo artists as vain of their voices as an Italian tenor; and even the humble member who sells potato-peelers from a suit-case on a tripod has both his professional secrets and his shop talk. Few outside the profession know that there are New York firms which for five dollars will supply "pit-shows" with an assortment consisting of one tarantula, five horned toads, and three pounds of assorted snakes; most are ignorant even of the fact that common "eating snakes" of the sort supplied to the various imitators of the famous Bosco are had at a special rate. Yet these market quotations are a matter of intimate concern to a very considerable body of human beings. When his paint is off and his wig put away Bosco has his private life, his professional pride, and the secrets of his craft. He occasionally drops the boys a line just to let them know that business this season in the Middle West is lousy; he would be surprised to learn that anybody did not know that the adjective "flashy," when applied to anything from the "front" of a tent show to one of the premiums offered at the Japanese rolling game, implies the highest possible compliment; and if there seems to be no demand at the moment for an artist in his particular line he, being a versatile man, is quite capable of responding to an advertisement which reads something like this: "Wanted—Blackface who can double in brass. Join on wire. No boozehounds need apply. Tickets? Yes." A great life, he will tell you, if you don't weaken.

It is a slice from this rich life which Kenyon Nicholson has undertaken to portray in "The Barker" (Biltmore Theater), and in certain respects the job is well done. He has created a convincing atmosphere in outward things, he has, in many spots, mastered a vigorous dialogue, and he has created one or two characters—notably that of "Sailor West" the tattoo artist—who have a vivid life. But however original these various trimmings, he has, unfortunately, borrowed all of his situations from the common stock of melodrama, and the effect is of something terribly stale which has been artificially freshened up. In spite of a superficial air of newness it is always the expected that happens, and one may enumerate, one after the other, the inevitable stages of the action. (1) When the barker's son runs away from school to join the show the barker, of course, casts off his mistress for his son's sake. (2) This mistress, of course, plans a revenge by hiring the vamp of the troupe to seduce the son. (3) The vamp, of course, finds herself really in love with the boy and is much troubled because she is "not worthy" of his innocent devotion. (4) When the barker bestows upon her the biblical word for prostitute, the son, of course, exclaims: "You lie; even if you are my father you can't talk to her that way." And so it goes. Of course the heart of the barker is broken and of course he plans to leave the business, but of course the lure of the canvas is too much for him and even—need it be said—there is every reason to suppose that the vamp is about to reform her ways and make a very good wife after all.

Now I claim no first-hand knowledge of carnival life. It may be that those who live it really behave as other people do nowhere else except upon the stage of melodrama. Outside, the head of the usual flapper of the tents may be arranged in a very fetching marcelle and inside it she may be capable of the general emotional reactions of the ingenue in a Ladies' Home Journal romance; but I confess, nevertheless, that I have my doubts. I suspect that the real comedy, the real drama, and the real tragedy of the midway existence are something more deeply colored by the knowledge, the habits, and the ethos of that life, that they are more individual and less familiar than anything here presented. I suspect, that is, that the author of "The Barker" has not gone very far below the surface in the study of his characters and that he has made up for his deficiencies by a very considerable familiarity with the traditions of the popular drama. But to say this is not, of course, to deny that in all probability the present work will please a good many more people than the one I vaguely feel could be written. By the standards of Broadway it is a good show and it stands an excellent chance of great success.

"Bye Bye Bonnie" (Ritz Theater) is that very rare thing, a musical comedy with a genuinely amusing book—a book which happens in this case to deal with the plight of a reform candidate who was made by a cruel fate to figure in the courts and the jail as a bootlegger.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

International Relations Section

The New Danish Government

By JULIUS MORITZEN

IF it were not that Denmark is a very small country, the recent political changes, which retired the Social Democratic regime and brought the Liberal Party into power, would have aroused more attention from the rest of the world than was the case. It is perhaps the peaceful methods that characterize a Danish election and campaign for political supremacy that keep the news largely within the country, but at the same time enough importance attaches to the event which brought another party into power to warrant a résumé of what took place.

In Denmark today four parties are bidding for the popular vote. These are the Right, or the Conservative Party; the Left, or Liberals; the Radicals; and the Social Democratic Party. In the recent election the Social Democrats did not have the cooperation of the Radicals, due to differences about the economic crisis that caused the resignation of the Stauning cabinet and to the calling of a new election to the Folketing of the Danish Parliament.

As each of the four parties went into the election singlehanded the Liberals, represented to a great extent by the landed proprietor class, saw their great chance and with considerable generalship succeeded in proving to a large portion of the farmers that all the economic troubles of the nation could be laid at the door of the Social Democrats, supported largely by the workers of the city. This, of course, was begging the question. It is true that the trade unions of Denmark are basically Social Democratic in tendency and that between them and the agriculturalists ties of cooperation were being gradually loosened. But this condition is similar to that in the United States, for instance, where the farmers of the Northwest feel aggrieved because of their belief that the industrialists of the East are getting the major benefits of existing legislation.

The Liberals, assisted indirectly by the Conservatives, gained the day at the polls in that they won two more seats to the Folketing. The Conservative Party likewise obtained two more seats, while the losses sustained by the Radicals and Social Democrats were four and two seats respectively. The result, then, was that the Conservatives and the Liberals control seventy-seven members in the Folketing against a combined Radical and Social Democratic membership of sixty-nine.

The leader of the Liberal Party, Madsen-Mygdal, being charged by King Christian to form a cabinet, then chose the following, retaining for himself the portfolio of Minister of Agriculture, besides the premiership: Foreign Minister, Dr. Moltesen; Minister of Finance, M. Neergaard; Minister of Justice, M. Rytter; Minister of Commerce, M. Slebsager; Minister of the Interior, M. Kragh; Minister of Defense, M. Brorsen; Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs, Pastor Brunn Rasmussen; Minister of Education, Dr. Byskov; Minister of Traffic, Director Stensballe; Minister of the Department of Sanitation, Dr. Rubow.

In analyzing the result of the election in Denmark the recovered province of South Jutland assumes a political importance perhaps not so noticeable on the surface. But the fact has been established that however much the South Jutlanders formerly under German rule desired to return to the mother country, Denmark, their desire, and its fulfilment at the hands of the Allied victors in the war, did not prove a wholly unmixed blessing. It is true that the loyalty of the South Jutlanders toward their Danish brethren north of the border never wavered during all the years since Germany, after winning the war in the sixties, possessed herself of the province. But patriotism is one thing, and economic well-being another. And as the situation became more acute in South Jutland there were many who wondered what had become of the promised benefit.

Naturally, the Social Democratic regime in power was made to feel the brunt of the criticism, and the Conservative and Liberal leaders did not fail to derive whatever benefit they could from the South Jutland dissatisfaction. All the political crimes in the calendar were charged against the Government, and when one Cornelius Petersen succeeded in combining a considerable number of South Jutland farmers into what was known as the "Self-Rule" organization which openly threatened to take matters in its own hands, the Stauning cabinet found itself obliged to put a stop to an agitation that was really the result of circumstances over which the Government had no control. Whether the Madsen-Mygdal regime will succeed in doing more for the South Jutlanders than the Stauning cabinet could do is a question for the future.

It was on April 11, 1924, that the general election to the Folketing brought victory to the Social Democratic Party. The Liberals had been in power nearly four years, M. Neergaard, the Minister of Finance in the Madsen-Mygdal cabinet of the present, holding the premiership. The four years of Liberal rule preceding the Social Democratic advent could not have been wholly satisfying to the Danish voter, but whatever may have been the cause the return to power of the Liberal element will be awaited with considerable interest by Europe in general if only for one reason: their attitude toward disarmament.

If no other legislation of importance had been introduced by the Social Democratic organization than the attempted reduction of the Danish military establishment to a minimum this alone should entitle it to respectful consideration. It is true that the Landsting, or upper house of Parliament, was opposed to this measure which had the support of the Folketing, but the Stauning cabinet succeeded in keeping the question alive. In spite of organized opposition a large portion of the population realized the futility of a military establishment which could prove of little value in war. Probably little will be heard about disarmament in the Danish Parliament unless the Social Democrats continue their campaign as the largest opposition party. The Conservatives have consistently stood out for the status quo in this matter and even pointed to the general European situation as an argument against any reduction in military and naval strength.

It is to be hoped that the rapprochement with Germany, which was a feature of the Stauning administration, will be continued by the new Government. The German minority in the now Danish province of South Jutland has a representation of its own in the Danish Rigsdag. It played no particular role in the recent election, but, like all minorities in any land, needs special attention. But there need be no fear for the parliamentarism of Denmark. It is well grounded in principle. Monarchical in name, the rule is essentially democratic.

by

PHILIP GIBBS

¶ The rapid action of this brilliant new novel takes place in England of the General Strike.

The vision and skill which made THE MIDDLE OF THE ROAD the great novel of its day captures here the very spirit of this later time.

Young Anarchy

is the generation which has followed the "younger generation" grown older. Its revolt, its humors, its loves, its recklessness are the theme of this fine novel.

$2.00 at all booksellers.

DORAN BOOKS

Recent Publications

681 Fifth Avenue, New York

E P D

FRANCISCAN ITALY
by Harold Goad
$6.00

GOETHE'S FAUST
translated by
W. H. Van der Smissen
$5.00

HER MAJESTY
The Romance of the Queens of England
by E. Thornton Cook
$6.00

E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY

THE LAW OF THE JUNGLE

by Coburn Allen

With an Introduction by John Haynes Holmes

Readers of The Nation who, like Dr. Holmes, "have found a truth and caught a vision in this troubled age of human history" will share his enthusiasm over this book. This "masterly portrayal" of the present world wide social disorder "stabbed" him "wide awake." "This book," Dr. Holmes writes the author, "is suffused from start to finish with a moral passion and spiritual idealism which lift it out of the realm of economic discussion into the realm of genuine prophetic literature." Nothing published in years has made a more certain appeal to Nation readers.

$2.50

Greenberg, Publisher

112 East 19th Street New York

The WARFARE between SCIENCE and RELIGION

The Story of Comparative Religions—Rationalism—Biblical Criticism—All Available at 5c. Each in the LITTLE BLUE BOOKS

: : : : ORDER BY NUMBER : : : :

5c. Per Copy

THE STORY OF RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSY

By JOSEPH McCABE

1007 The Revolt Against Religion
1008 The Origin of Religion
1030 The World's Great Religions
1059 The Myth of Immortality
1060 The Futility of Belief in God
1061 The Human Origin of Morals
1066 The Forgery of the Old Testament
1076 Morals in Ancient Babylon
1077 Religion and Morals in Ancient Egypt
1078 Life and Morals in Greece and Rome
1079 Phallic Elements in Religion
1084 Did Jesus Ever Life?
1095 The Sources of Christian Morality
1102 Pagan Christs Before Jesus
1104 The Myth of the Resurrection
1107 Legends of Saints and Martyrs
1110 How Christianity "Triumphed"
1121 The Evolution of Christian Doctrine
1122 The Degradation of Woman
1127 Christianity and Slavery
1128 The Church and the School
1130 The Dark Ages
1132 New Light on Witchcraft
1134 The Horrors of the Inquisition
1136 Medieval Art and the Church
1137 The Moorish Civilization in Spain
1140 The Renaissance: A European Awakening
1141 The Reformation and Protestant Reaction
1142 The Truth About Galileo and Medieval Science
1144 The Jesuits: Religious Rogues

FAMOUS RATIONALISTIC WORKS

4 The Age of Reason. Thomas Paine
28 Toleration. Voltaire
88 Vindication of Thomas Paine. Robert G. Ingersoll
174 Ten Dialogues on Religion. Voltaire
185 The Gods. Robert G. Ingersoll
129 Rome or Reason? Robert G. Ingersoll vs. Cardinal Manning
130 Controversy on Christianity. Robert G. Ingersoll vs. Wm. E. Gladstone
200 The Ignorant Philosopher. Voltaire
935 The Necessity of Atheism. Percy Bysshe Shelley
936 Essay on Christianity. Shelley
937 Refutation of Deism. Shelley
3 Fourteen Skeptical Essays. Voltaire
103 Pocket Theology: Skeptical Definitions. Voltaire
62 Religion, and Other Essays. Arthur Schopenhauer
160 Wit and Wisdom of Voltaire
512 Voltaire and the French Enlightenment. Will Durant
1020 Why I Am an Infidel. Luther Burbank
928 The Religion of a Darwinist. Sir Arthur Keith
30 What Life Means to Me. Jack London
26 On Going to Church. Bernard Shaw
640 He Renounced the Faith (The Apostate). Jack London
1056 The Devil's Dictionary. Ambrose Bierce
1099 A Cynic Looks at Life. Ambrose Bierce
1123 The Facts About Puritan Morals. Rupert Hughes
224 God: Known and Unknown. Samuel Butler
910 Is Life Worth Living? Clarence Darrow vs. Frederick Starr
911 Is the Human Race Getting Anywhere? Clarence Darrow vs. Frederick Starr
829 Lecture on Voltaire. Clarence Darrow
53 Insects and Men: Instinct and Reason. Clarence Darrow
762 Optimism or Pessimism? Henry Frank vs. Percy Ward
599 Haeckel's Monistic Philosophy. Carrell Lane Fenton
908 Brief Burlesques and Epigrams. E. Haldeman-Julius 840 Conventional Lies of Our Civilization. Max Nordau
952 Sumner Sermons. E. W. Howe
140 Reflections on Life and Destiny. Anatole France
844 A Voyage to Lilliput. Jonathan Swift

THE BIBLE AND BIBLICAL CRITICISM

111 Sermon on the Mount, and Other Sayings of Jesus.
600 The Essence of the Bible
624 The Gospel of Luke
625 The Gospel of Mark
706 Should the Bible Be in the Schools? Franklin Steiner
236 61 Reasons for Doubting Biblical Inspiration. Robert G. Ingersoll
97 Self-Contradictions of the Bible
628 The Making of the Old Testament. Clement Wood
851 Sources of Bible Myths and Legends. Maynard Shipley
535 Critical Estimate of the 4th Gospel
848 Poems About Jesus
532 Essays on Jesus. Alexander Harvey
533 Essays on the Friends of Jesus. Harvey
76 The Prince of Peace. W. J. Bryan
191 Evolution vs. Dogma. Maynard Shipley
49 Controversy on Creation. Ernst Haeckel

SKEPTICISM AND ICONOCLASM

1138 What Atheism Means to Me. Wm. Cunningham
33 Brann, Smasher of Shams. John W. Gunn
1081 Fantastic Debunking Stories. Ambrose Bierce
467 Evolution Made Plain. John Mazzn
1125 A Book of American Shams: Symposium
907 Sex Obsessions of Saints and Mystics. Wm. J. Fielding
211 Idea of God in Nature. John S. Mill
1106 The Truth About Greenwich Village. Clement Wood
1072 The Truth About Wm. J. Bryan. Clement Wood
1071 A Psycho-Analysis of Jesus. Clement Wood
993 Preaching from the Audience. E. W. Howe
991 Guilty Notes for My Biographer. E. W. Howe
985 A Psycho-Analysis of America. James Oppenheim
977 Pope Alexander VI and His Loves. Clement Wood
173 Has Life Any Meaning? Frank Harris vs. Percy Ward

ORDER BY NUMBER—Your choice at 5c. per copy, minimum order $1 (20 books). Add 10% of amount of your order to remittance, for carriage charges, or your books will be shipped express collect. Canadian and foreign customers must remit 6c. per book.

NEW 1927 CATALOGUE now ready, listing 1,150 different Little Blue Books on all subjects—free copy on request.

HALDEMAN-JULIUS CO., Dept. S-1, Girard, Kansas

The Soviet-Lithuanian Guaranty Pact

DURING the past year the Soviet Union has been negotiating treaties of neutrality and non-aggression with its Baltic neighbors in order to insure permanent peaceful relations with these countries. The Soviet-Lithuanian guaranty pact was the first treaty of this kind actually concluded. The treaty was signed in Moscow on September 28, 1926, a few months before the late coup d'etat in Lithuania. According to a recent statement by the new Lithuanian Government, the treaty will not be revoked as a result of the coup. The text as published in the Soviet press follows:

The Central Executive Committee of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, on the one hand, and the President of the Lithuanian Republic, on the other, convinced that the interests of the peoples of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and of Lithuania can be advanced by constant cooperation based on confidence, and also desirous to secure the establishment of universal peace, have agreed to conclude a treaty with the aim of furthering the friendly relations existing between the two countries, and for this purpose they have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

For the Central Executive Committee of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—George Chicherin, member of the C.E.C. of the USSR, People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, and Sergei Alexandrovsky, plenipotentiary representative of the USSR in Lithuania, and

For the President of the Lithuanian Republic—Mikolas Sliazevicius, Prime Minister, Minister of Justice, and Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Lithuanian Republic, and Jurgis Baltrushaitis, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Lithuanian Republic,

Who have met in Moscow and, after having presented their credentials which were found to be in good form and corresponding to the legal requirements have decreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The peace treaty between Russia and Lithuania concluded in Moscow on July 12, 1920, all the stipulations of which have preserved their force and inviolability, remains as the basis for the relations between the USSR and the Lithuanian Republic.

ART. 2. The USSR and the Lithuanian Republic mutually bind themselves under all circumstances to respect the sovereignty and the territorial integrity and inviolability of each other.

ART. 3. Each of the contracting parties takes upon itself the obligation to refrain from any aggressive acts against the other party.

In case one of the contracting parties, notwithstanding its peaceful conduct, is subjected to an attack on the part of a third Power, the other contracting party binds itself not to lend any assistance to the third Power in its campaign against the contracting party which had been subjected to the attack.

ART. 4. In case a political agreement is entered into by other Powers directed against one of the contracting parties, or in case of a conflict like that mentioned in Article 3, Paragraph 2, or if, when neither of the contracting parties is involved in an armed conflict, a coalition should be established of other Powers aiming to subject one of the contracting parties to an economic or financial boycott, the other contracting party will not be a party to such agreement or coalition.

ART. 5. In case of a conflict between the contracting parties which cannot be adjusted through diplomatic channels, they agree to appoint a mediation committee.

The composition of such committees, their rights and rules of procedure will be defined in a separate agreement. . . .

ART. 6. The present treaty is subject to ratification which must take place within six weeks after the date of signature. The exchange of ratifications will take place in the city of

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

The course is open to graduates of colleges and universities of recognized standing.

Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.

Special courses will be arranged for social workers in accordance with their needs.

For information, address the

Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL

For

JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)

210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

Arbitrate

all questions with all nations.

Request President COOLIDGE to outlaw war by negotiating treaties providing for obligatory arbitration of all disputes that may arise.

Send for petition blanks and information regarding prizes to

The American Arbitration Crusade

114 East 31st Street
New York City

Brilliant and Poisonous Words

These are the weapons with which Ruth Hale, President of the Lucy Stone League, neatly disposes of the male sex. She is polishing and sharpening new barbs for the third Nation Dinner

Men—What of 'Em?
February 15

Bruce Bliven will stand alone against Miss Hale and Miss Pruette (who, in a cold way, pities men) unless the Chairman, Freda Kirchwey, Managing Editor of The Nation, decides to help him out.

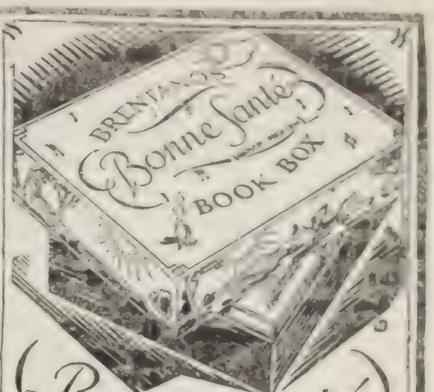
Make reservations this week if possible. Seats are assigned in the order reserved.

THE FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE

$2.75 for subscribers and their guests.

($6.25 will make you a subscriber and buy a dinner ticket.)

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York



Reserve ..... places for me at the dinner on February 15.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Tickets will be mailed a few days before the dinner. 2-2-27

Bonne Santé
(Good Health)
BOOK BOX
℞

Prescribing books is a happy business. We enjoy doing it. If you are in doubt about what to send a convalescent or sick friend, here's a delightful prescription—

A sunny, gay, attractive Bonne Sante Book Box filled with jolly books and enticing magazines.

The sick-bed, the invalid chair are no longer prisons to those who have Bonne Sante Boxes by their side; as long as eyes and ears are open they are free in the company of the immortals.

¶ Write or wire the name and address of your friend, giving the price of the assortment desired. Books and magazines of your choice or ours will be sent to home or hospital.

BONNE SANTE BOXES are priced at $5, $10 and up.

BRENTANO'S
Booksellers to the World
1 W. 47th St. New York

Branch: 5th Avenue and 27th St.
CHICAGO: 218 S. Wabash Avenue
WASHINGTON: 1322 F. St., N. W.

Kovno. The treaty is drawn up in the Russian and Lithuanian languages. In the interpretation of the treaty both texts shall be considered as authentic.

ART. 7. The present treaty is to be in force from the moment of the exchange of ratifications for a period of five years, except Articles 1 and 2, the term of which is not limited.

The action of this treaty will be automatically prolonged for the period of one year if one of the contracting parties does not declare, at least six months before the expiration of the term of the treaty, that it desires to open negotiations concerning future relations between the two states. . . .

[Signed] G. V. CHICHERIN
SERGEI ALEXANDROVSKY
MIKOLAS SLAZEVICIUS
JURGIS BALTRUSHAITIS

At the conclusion of the treaty there was an exchange of notes between Chicherin and the Lithuanian Prime Minister. Chicherin's note follows:

The Soviet Government has repeatedly in its declarations declared itself to be guided by the desire to see the Lithuanian people, as well as any other people, an independent nation, and also in accordance with the note of the Soviet Government of April 5, 1923, addressed to the Polish Government, and moved by the sympathy which the fate of the Lithuanian people is arousing among the toiling people of the USSR, the Soviet Government declares that the actual violation of Lithuanian territory which took place against the will of the Lithuanian people has not changed its attitude toward territorial sovereignty as defined in Article 2 and in the notes of that article of the peace treaty between Russia and Lithuania of July 12, 1920.

The above note refers to the capture of the Vilna district by the Polish militarist Zheligovsky which was subsequently upheld by the Council of Ambassadors. The Soviet Government had protested at the time against the Council of Ambassadors which decided the fate of Vilna without consulting Lithuania. In the Riga treaty with Poland the Soviet Government agreed to recognize any agreement between Poland and Lithuania concerning the territories west of the new Polish frontier, i.e., including the Vilna district.

Contributors to This Issue

WILLIAM HARD will speak on Calvin Coolidge at the fifth Nation dinner, April 12.

ERNEST H. GRUENING, formerly managing editor of The Nation, has for some time been studying Mexican affairs.

HENRY NOEL BRAILSFORD recently resigned as editor of the English New Leader.

FRANK R. KENT, vice-president of the Baltimore Sun, writes regularly from Washington to The Nation.

JAMES N. ROSENBERG wrote three articles on the World Court, published in The Nation and now reprinted in pamphlet form.

GEORGE W. HAYS is a former Governor of Arkansas.

STUART CHASE wrote "The Tragedy of Waste."

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN wrote The Process of John Erskine in The Nation for January 12.

LEO GERSHOY has been engaged in historical research at Cornell University.

LISLE BELL is a New York journalist and reviewer.

MORTIMER J. ADLER reviewed "The Story of Philosophy" in The Nation for September 29.

JOSEPH JASTROW, author of a number of works in psychology, is a frequent reviewer for The Nation.

The author of The Evolution of Disenchantment is a member of the faculty of an Eastern university.

Why Was Lincoln's Greatest Speech Censored?

A Startling Revelation!

Because we believe that you will welcome the truth, however bold and daring it may be—we announce the publication of an amazing discovery of Lincoln's personal beliefs.

"LINCOLN THE FREETHINKER"

By Joseph Lewis

Contains an exact reproduction of the original draft of Lincoln's immortal Gettysburg address, written by Lincoln's own hand. It proves, as is shown by comparison with the other authentic copy of this document, that LINCOLN'S GREATEST SPEECH WAS CENSORED SO AS TO MAKE HIM APPEAR TO BE WHAT HE HIMSELF SAID HE WAS NOT!

Highly Commended by Celebrated Men

Hudson Maxim, famous inventor and author: "I have read with much interest Joseph Lewis's brochure on 'Lincoln the Freethinker.' Mr. Lewis has done an excellent piece of work and deserves great credit for it."

The late Luther Burbank, world-famous scientist: "It is very fortunate that this book ('Lincoln the Freethinker') has been published to offset the falsehoods which have been told about Lincoln by so many religious zealots who think more of keeping up the 'system' than adhering to the truth."

The World's Foremost man of Science writes: " 'Lincoln the Freethinker' is another of the many publications brought out in late years which are dispelling the clouds of superstition and breaking our bondage to a mythical religion."

A Famous Clergyman writes: "I am glad that this pamphlet was written, as the idea that Lincoln accepted the conventional creeds of the Church is a myth which it is highly important to destroy."

This brochure contains 32 pages and is beautifully printed on fine sepia paper. Sent prepaid upon receipt of only 25 cents

THE FREETHOUGHT PRESS ASSN.

1658 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

EVENINGS—SPECIAL PARTIES ONLY. ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS. SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.

OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management
by THEODORE KEMM
GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

True food is the foundation of Good health

Fresh Vegetables
Whole Wheat Products
Satisfying Diet for Diabetics
No animal fat used

Trufood
VEGETARIAN RESTAURANT

153 W. 44th St., East of Broadway

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1927 No. 3214

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 131
EDITORIALS:
While the Bands Play "Tipperary" 134
American Wives 135
A "Hun" of the Civil War 135
James Ford Rhodes 136
THE SHIP OF STATE. By Hendrik van Loon 137
BRITISH POLITICAL PARTIES. By J. Ramsay MacDonald 138
BOOTLEGGING RELIGION. By Arthur Garfield Hays 139
HUMILIATION. By Kwei Chen 140
A NEW SLAVERY IN SOUTH AFRICA. By Lord Olivier 142
SHALL WOMEN BE PROTECTED? By Valeska Bari 143
THE CLEVELAND RESERVOIR. By Elbert Peets 145
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 146
CORRESPONDENCE 146
BOOKS, MUSIC, PLAYS:
Turbines. By MacKnight Black 148
"Copey." By John Macy 148
Significant Ugliness. By Joseph Wood Krutch 149
Reintroducing Tom Thumb. By James Fuchs 150
Teaching Adults to Read. By H. E. Buchholz 150
Books in Brief 151
Music: A True Professional and Some True Amateurs. By Henrietta Straus 151
Drama: Intelligence vs. Intensity. By Joseph Wood Krutch 152
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The South African Color Problem. By R. F. Alfred Hoernle 153

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

WHERE DO WE STAND WITH MEXICO? No one seems to know. The Senate has adopted, unanimously, an arbitration resolution which is variously interpreted as a slap at the President and as standing by the President. It commends the principle of arbitration, but insists that pending arbitration American property rights must be maintained unchanged. That is asking Mexico to suspend the sovereign application of her laws until an arbitral decision can be reached. Meanwhile neither President Coolidge nor the State Department has taken any step toward arbitration. One American oil company has obtained an injunction against application of the new laws; another has been denied an injunction. But the most important developments are the clearing up of the situation in George Barr Baker's dispatches from Mexico City to the New York Evening Post. He tells us what is at stake. There are, it appears, 28,500,000 acres of oil lands in Mexico rights to which were acquired prior to May 1, 1917. The dispute hinges about these. But while titles to these lands are held by 387 foreign oil companies, all but 22 of them have accepted the new Mexican laws and applied for confirmatory concessions under the new regulations. The whole dispute concerns the remaining 1,600,000 acres, 6 per cent of the total—and almost half of these belong to the Pan American Oil Co.—Mr. Doheny's old company of fragrant memory! As the New York World says in one of a splendid series of editorials, "the heart of the opposition is the same group of men who engineered Teapot Dome and Elk Hills"! More than that, it appears that the Mellon interests also are involved in this little fraction of oil drillers.

A WISE FOREIGN POLICY is of increasing importance to the United States as it becomes more and more of an exporting nation—an exporter of both merchandise and capital. Yet an uninformed, indifferent public opinion allows our policy to be shaped by the President and his Secretary of State, largely secretly until some action is taken, so that neither Congress nor the people has any but a negative voice in it—that often too late. Thus, although public opinion has rebuked Mr. Coolidge's Mexican-Nicaraguan policy, the mischief—in respect to Nicaragua anyhow—has already been done, and Senator Wheeler predicts that after the adjournment of Congress on March 4 the Administration will have its way in Mexico too. In so far as the United States has had a definite foreign policy since the Spanish-American War, it has been one of unconscious imperialism. We say unconscious because the average American does not realize the tendency and resents the assertion that it exists. The latter is a hopeful sign, for if the public can become sufficiently interested to express itself formidably against the imperialist drift, then the policy can be changed before it has wrecked our trade and our reputation in the way that it now promises to do. As a first step Senator Wheeler has introduced a resolution calling for an inquiry into American investments in foreign countries, and many mass meetings are indorsing the plan.

TO US TWO PRINCIPLES seem simple and obvious: First, that there can be no dispute about property rights which should not be arbitrated. Will Rogers well summed up President Coolidge's position when he said: "He feels so sure we are right that there is no one he would trust to decide it in our favor." Second, that Americans investing money in foreign countries should be entitled to no privileges not available equally to the inhabitants of those countries. When, before the war, Lloyd George was taxing the nobility out of their estates in England, the program was denounced as confiscatory. It was confiscatory; but it was part of a national program which foreigners holding land in England had perforce to accept. If France should adopt a capital levy, foreigners holding property in France would have to accept it. When the United States adopted prohibition, it wiped out some foreign investments in the liquor industry in the United States; the foreigners had to accept it. The contrary principle is applied only to small or weak countries. The whole trouble about foreign property in China and in Mexico today is due to the arrogant assumption of the big investing Powers that their nationals have rights superior to those of natives.

JUST BEFORE CHRISTMAS no one doubted that little Panama would sign on the dotted line the treaty proposed to her by the United States; and it seemed likely that the Kellogg compromise proposals for settlement of the Tacna-Arica dispute would be accepted by the interested parties. On Christmas eve United States marines were landed in force at Puerto Cabezas, Nicaragua. The next chapters are familiar. Results thus far: Faced by a violent campaign against the treaty, the Panama Government has withdrawn the Panama-United States pact "for modification"; Peru and Chile have enthusiastically agreed to reject the Kellogg proposals. There are likely to be other results if Mr. Kellogg is not replaced soon by a Secretary of State with some discrimination and sense of realities.

"WHAT ABOUT THE CATHOLICS?" we asked two weeks ago. Several Catholic readers indignantly refer us to the pacific pastoral letter of the American bishops, part of which is printed in our correspondence columns this week. The editor of the Catholic Bulletin of St. Paul, whose emphatic editorials entitled No War with Mexico deserve the warmest praise, insists that even "the church in Mexico does not want war with the United States" —"in spite of the inevitable few hot and empty heads here and there." Other readers call our attention to semi-official denials from Mexico that the Archbishop of Guadalajara is in fact leading an armed revolt. We hope the report will prove false, and that the Archbishop, if found by government forces, will have an open trial. We have no more sympathy with the reported position of the Mexican Government, that it will deport foreigners who openly or secretly criticize Mexico adversely, than with American Catholics—or non-Catholics—who want war. Joseph Scott, speaking at a Knights of Columbus mass meeting in Washington on January 27, declared that "no sane, patriotic American will countenance intervention." He wanted to "bring to bear on President Calles the powerful force of outraged public opinion." So far, so good. But when he "registered" his "indignation at the contempt the Calles Government has shown for the support and protection with which the American Government has most bountifully supplied them," calling on an overwhelmingly powerful government to act, as a government, against a weak neighbor, he was on dangerous ground.

IN NEW JERSEY the lawlessness of the police has suffered a just and heartening rebuke; the hearing before a coroner's jury on the attack made by New Jersey State Police on a farmer's family, in which a woman was killed and her brother lamed for life, has resulted in a charge of murder against twelve policemen, and, without waiting for court action, the superintendent of the Constabulary has conducted an investigation which has led to charges against three of the troopers of "wanton, brutal" assault, "without justification," failing to render first aid, false report, and misappropriation of property. But in South Carolina, where three Negroes were lynched because of the refusal of the Sheriff and his deputies to protect their prisoners, the Aiken County grand jury reported, after listening to thirteen witnesses: "We do not find that sufficient evidence has come before us to warrant us to ask for indictments." That is, as predicted, nobody who took part in the lynching expected to suffer for his lawless and abominable act. Nobody even thought it worth while to conceal the fact that a lynching was to take place. The action of the grand jury in failing to bring indictments reflects deeply on the State and on itself. The new Governor of South Carolina, too, has uttered brave words: "There can be no justification of lynch law, I care not what the offense. . . . I promise the people of South Carolina that if it lies in my power the Aiken lynchers shall be brought to justice." It remains to be seen, therefore, whether it is within the power of South Carolina to bring the lynchers to justice.

IF THIS ADMINISTRATION were a sensitive organism it would feel extremely uncomfortable these days, but not even the Senate's rejection of Cyrus E. Woods by the overwhelming vote of 49 to 28 will, we prophesy, make a dent upon the President's thinking. He has not been affected by the similar rejections of Charles B. Warren and Henry H. Glassie, who were rejected by the Senate when nominated for the Attorney Generalship and the Tariff Commission, respectively. Neither of these rebukes to the President was as severe a blow as the defeat of Mr. Woods, because that gentleman was declined not by Democrats and the Progressive Senators alone, but by a number of regular Republicans who ordinarily vote as they are told. Twenty-six Republicans refused to follow the Presidential lead and went on record as being unqualifiedly opposed to the appointment of a lawyer for a Pennsylvania coal company and a stockholder in coal companies and railroads to the Interstate Commerce Commission, where he would have to sit both as a judge of the railroads and of the coal companies. No President with a fine sense of honor would have made such an appointment, but it is the kind of thing that seemed right to Mr. Coolidge during his long affiliation with the Republican machine in Massachusetts, and he cannot understand what the fuss is about today.

CAPTAIN WALDO EVANS, U. S. N.—where have we heard the name before? He has just been appointed Governor of the Virgin Islands to succeed Martin E. Trench, who died on January 6 while on a visit to this country. Oh, yes, Captain Evans was sent to Samoa in 1920 to preside over the court of inquiry into our naval administration there, against which serious charges of financial irregularities and wrongs done to the natives had been made. Rather than face the charges, the commandant committed suicide. He was unnecessarily hasty; the inquiry was such that naval rule received a clean bill of health, and Captain Evans got the job of commandant. He was no more sympathetic than his predecessor to the pleas of the natives for a restoration of their rights, and when Samuel S. Ripley, an American citizen of Samoan birth, sought to land at Pago Pago in 1921 in the interest of the people's grievances he was deported by order of Captain Evans—probably an illegal and certainly an unjustifiable act. [The story was told by Mr. Ripley in The Nation of March 15, 1922.] We must be excused, therefore, for not finding much cheer in the appointment of Captain Evans as governor of a people already highly restive under our rule—in need of an administrator unusually equipped with sympathy, intelligence, and tact.

STRAWS SHOW THE DIRECTION of the wind. These items are gleaned from recent newspapers arriving from China:

> Despite wars, strikes, and boycotts China's trade in 1926 was the largest in her history. Shanghai's custom receipts were $5,000,000 greater than in 1925, Canton's $1,200,000.
>
> China exported a quarter of a million dollars' worth of tobacco to Egypt in 1926.
>
> Great Britain's share in China's cotton-goods trade fell from 50 per cent in 1915 to 40 per cent in 1924 and 26.5 per cent in 1925. Japan's share rose to 65.8 per cent in 1925. Figures for 1926 are not yet available.

Tang Yen-tat, chief of the Political Section of Military Headquarters, and General Chang Fat-hui flew by airplane from Hankow to Canton—half-way across China—on November 24; twelve new automobile streets were opened in Canton in the same week.

The British-American Tobacco Company cleared a net profit in China of £6,195,000, in the year ending September 30, 1926.

All the B. A. T. workmen in Hankow struck in December—except the company teachers in the schools for workers' children.

The (British) Hongkong-Macao-Canton Steamship Company has agreed to take back its workers who struck in June, 1925, and accordingly will be permitted to receive cargoes in Canton.

The Canton Provincial Council on December 13 prohibited strikes in native industries involving military supplies, finance, communication, or public service.

A Chinese Fashion Show was held in Shanghai in December for the benefit of the Chinese babies' clinic.

Just before Christmas Bishop Roots and other missionaries in Hankow gave a dinner at the Terminus Hotel in honor of Madam Sun Yat-sen and various ministers of the "Bolshevik" Government.

THE CENSOR NOW GOES ON THE AIR. In the new radio legislation which has already passed the House and which seems likely to pass the Senate, there are various little jokers which make existing proposals for censorship of literature or plays seem childish. The radio bill gives lip service to free speech; it provides that if one candidate for public office is permitted to make a speech over the radio equal opportunity must be given by the same broadcasting company to all other candidates for that office. We predict, however, that equal opportunity will not in fact be given to Republicans and to Socialists or Communists. Another section of the bill provides that no alien may be an officer or director of a broadcasting company, nor may he own more than one-fifth of the capital stock of any company. The bill provides that the President may by proclamation take over any or all stations in the event of "war or threat of war, or a state of public peril or disaster, or other national emergency, or even in order to preserve neutrality." What is a state of public peril? Might it be a coal strike? What is a national emergency? Might it be a threatened invasion of Mexico or Nicaragua? In short, what sort of control is this toward which we are moving? No government official is honest enough or unbiased enough to be given power so absolute to stifle opposition to government policy.

WE ARE NOT SURE that Elihu Root has done a wise thing in endowing Foreign Affairs, the quarterly review, with the $25,000 which he received as the Woodrow Wilson Foundation award "in recognition of his services to humanity and the cause of peace through justice in helping to create the Permanent Court of International Justice." That it was generous and out of the best of motives goes without saying. But the more we hear of endowed journals, or semi-endowed journals, the less we believe that the way to make a publication successful. Inevitably a certain dead hand comes to rest upon the endowed publication. The administration slackens; there is not the imperative incentive to make a success of the undertaking and achieve self-support. The final acid test of creating or filling a genuine public want cannot be applied, and in the long run that test must be met. Of course, large as Mr. Root's gift is, the income from it will, we presume, hardly meet the annual deficit of Foreign Affairs, and it is quite possible that its receipt will be the excuse for many who ought to support it to dodge their duty. As a representative of conservative American thought on foreign affairs, it has a place to fill.

THE VICTORY OF THE TAMPA CIGARMAKERS in reestablishing their factory readers brings to public attention again one of the most interesting customs in American industry. For many years the unionized cigarmakers who roll their cigars by hand while sitting at long tables have hired out of their own pay a man who sits on an elevated platform in the middle of the room and reads aloud to them in Spanish while they work. He is usually a man of commanding presence and leather lungs, who sits, hat on, slouched down in his chair, shouting his sentences like a campaign orator, while the white and colored cigarmakers quietly roll their tobacco-leaves and frown upon whispered interruptions. In the morning he reads newspapers for an hour; in the afternoon he turns for three hours to novels and works on social progress. Everything that he reads must be approved by a committee of cigarmakers. Before the last great strike in Tampa the readers frequently read I. W. W. literature and they were fond of the novels of Zola.

DO THESE PUBLIC READERS of the cigar factories hold the key to the workers' education of the future? Is it possible to give men education and entertainment while they work at the machine? Today there are few factories in America where quietness prevails; in the cigar factories it is only in the hand-made-cigar rooms that reading is possible. The radio with its ear-phones may some day provide a refuge from the machine roar. Is it too fantastic a dream to picture the factory of the future equipped so that the Ford automata who now give a screw a quarter-turn while the moving tray passes by will listen through their own ear-pieces to jazz or classical culture? We offer the dream without charge to the radio manufacturers, sure that it is not as crazy as many dreams which modern science has already realized.

WITH THE PASSING OF "Jehoash" (Solomon Blumgarten) the young-old Yiddish literature loses another of its still numerous living classics. Unlike many of his contemporaries, who are survivors of the galaxy that gathered around Peretz at Warsaw, Jehoash was a purely American product. In poetry Yiddish did not put its best foot forward, but Jehoash, though no longer a dominant poetic force at the time of his death, served as a vital link between the older rhetorical school and the more authentic accent that it assumed in the younger men under the invigorating influence of the new American poetry. His translation of "Hiawatha" and his poems of the American scene helped to naturalize the Yiddish muse in its American locale, but his greatest work may prove to be the Yiddish translation of the Bible, at which he worked twenty years. If the Yiddish language survives, this magnificent translation may come to mean to it what the Lutheran and King James versions are to their respective languages: "A well of purest Yiddish undefiled."

While the Bands Play "Tipperary"

"GREAT BRITAIN proposes to hand back Weihaiwei to the country within whose frontier it lies. . . . Chinese sovereignty will now be restored," Arthur Balfour, speaking for the British Government, announced at the Washington Conference on February 1, 1922. The Union Jack, however, still flies at Weihaiwei; and the Chinese may be pardoned if they regard the pleasant statements of Austen Chamberlain, made just five years after Arthur Balfour's unkept promise, with reserve. Experience has taught them that Western promises mean nothing; that the Great Powers give nothing that they are not forced to give, and avail themselves of any verbal loophole to escape the plain implications of their pledges.

When bands are playing "Tipperary" for soldiers marching through London streets to China-bound transports; when soldiers are mobilizing for China service in England, Malta, India, and Hongkong; when one of the greatest international navies ever assembled in the history of the world is gathering at Shanghai; when barbed-wire fortifications are thrown up about the foreign city there and daily parades are being held of foreign volunteers and of England's bearded mercenaries from the Punjab, China is justified in wondering what is the significance of the fine speeches which the white statesmen are making.

If it were not for these martial demonstrations we should hail Austen Chamberlain's Birmingham speech as a tremendous advance in British China policy. He went further than any British statesman had ever dreamed of going before. Like Secretary Kellogg, he seems to say more than he does say, but he says more than Mr. Kellogg. Both are prepared to abandon extraterritoriality where there are modern Chinese courts, but not everywhere; both grant China's right to fix her own tax and tariff schedules, but both refuse to accept new tariffs until all the other Powers do likewise—a less generous position than that adopted by Russia. Mr. Kellogg denounces the concession system, but forgets that an American is chairman of the Shanghai Municipal Council and that the council is responsible to the Consular Body in which the American representative plays a leading role. Sir Austen is more specific, but not specific enough. He says:

> As regards the concession areas we are prepared to enter into local arrangements according to particular circumstances at each port, either for the amalgamation of the administration with those of the adjacent areas under Chinese control or for some other method of handing over the administration to the Chinese while assuring to the British community some voice in municipal matters.

That sounds well, but is it well? He is "prepared to enter into local arrangements." When? At once, while the iron is hot? Or will he wait until the 20,000 men and the rest of the cruisers arrive in China; and what will he mean then by "some voice in municipal matters"? Will he begin by keeping Balfour's promise without delay? The Chinese know that the only British concessions which have ever come back to them are in Hankow and Kiukiang, and that those were won by Chinese mobs which overran them. The way to teach the Chinese a better way is to prove that something can be attained by peaceful methods. The Chinese have negotiated and negotiated for two decades, and listened to promises galore; and they have no faith left in them.

It is too late to talk in terms of ultimate treaty revision; fortunately for China and the world the famed "unity of the Powers" is beginning to break up, with the result that England, America, and Japan are bidding against one another for China's favor. The old custom of waiting for joint agreement among the Powers meant that no one ever did anything. The Powers have begun their competitive bidding hesitantly enough, but they are likely to go far. Once their deadening unity is lost, there is no safe place to stop until all the treaties are revised, all the old shackles removed, and sovereign China reestablished.

Thus far, in all the recent chaos and civil war, with riots in a score of cities, missions requisitioned, concessions overrun, not a single foreigner has lost his life. The warnings to women and children to leave China apparently have been issued by flighty consuls in the safest treaty ports. Perhaps it is just as well; if the consuls had foreknowledge of the plans for the vast international armada they did well to order their nationals out of China. From the attempt to use force can come but one result: the unification of China in opposition to the foreigners. "Anti-foreignism" is a word lightly used and easily exaggerated. But it should not be forgotten that even the Nationalists want foreign capital to remain in China and negotiated for the reopening of the British banks in Hankow; and even the Northern militarists want the foreigners to abandon their special privileges. The first repercussion of the seizure of Hankow by the Southerners was a demand by the Northerners for return of the Tientsin concessions in their territory; the first effect of the announcement of the British expeditionary force was a declaration by Chang Hsueh-liang, son of Chang Tso-lin, generalissimo of the North, that if the British landed troops in China the North would join the South to drive them out—and the next step was to appeal to the League of Nations against the British invaders.

There is dynamite in this situation. Shanghai, geographically, is easily defended. But the cities under foreign administration which have grown up at Shanghai are largely populated by Chinese. The so-called French and International Settlements between them have a population of nearly two millions, of which only 50,000 are whites. Eighty per cent of the land, even, is owned by Chinese. It is possible to land as many troops as there are foreigners in Shanghai, and to hold the city; but is it worth it? What is the use of the foreigners existing there if they cannot do business with the hinterland, if their troops arouse against them a resentment which makes trade impossible? Let the Powers take thought before it is too late. There was a time when they might have pacified the Shanghai Chinese by opening the forbidden parks to them, giving them schools, allowing them joint representation on the municipal council. It is too late now; the foreigners are reaping the harvest of their own mistakes; Shanghai thinks in national terms. The West has taught China national pride and accentuated her race consciousness; it has sold her modern guns and artillery and instructed her in their use; it has forced upon her a trade which is more important to it than to her; and it must accept the consequences. More than promises and fine speeches are needed today; and to send warships is to add fuel to the flames.

American Wives

THE Immigration Act of 1924 denied admission to the United States to wives of American citizens if these wives are of a race ineligible to citizenship. Hindus, Chinese, and Japanese are ineligible. Hence the curious and cruel fact that while an Oriental merchant with his wife may enter America, the wedded wife of an American-born citizen is held at the coast for deportation. Our legislation, which admits the children of citizens, of whatever color, has on occasion even led immigration officials to admit a nursing baby while barring its mother! Simple humanity would seem to dictate a change in this law. Surely we need have no such panic at the thought of intermarriage as to bar the wives of the handful of Americans who marry Oriental women.

Indeed, the present situation works in some ways to promote interracial marriage. In Hawaii and on the mainland there are 13,318 native-born male Chinese, present or prospective American citizens. What are they to do? Return to a land they have never seen, of whose language many of them know not a word? Remain unmarried? (The number of Chinese women in this country is inadequate to provide them with wives.) Or intermarry? The natural course would seem to be to permit any American citizen who marries abroad to return with wife—or husband—whatever the race, color, or creed. For a country of 120,000,000 to gag at such a minor measure of humanity is utterly to lack a sense of proportion. The Supreme Court, in the case of Chung Fook vs. White, indeed, virtually suggested Congressional action:

> The words of the statute being clear [the Court said], if it unjustly discriminates against the native-born citizen, or is cruel and inhuman in its results, as forcefully contended, the remedy lies with Congress and not with the courts. Their duty is simply to enforce the law as it is written, unless clearly unconstitutional.

There are other anomalies in the law which ought to be remedied—and can be remedied without affecting the principles of selection upon which the present network of legislation is based. (With those principles, as our readers are aware, we are not in sympathy; but we do not raise such questions today.) American wives who married foreign citizens prior to the passage of the Cable Act became ipso facto foreigners and can return to America today only under the foreign quota. Frances Parkinson Keyes calls our attention to the fact that the only member of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Jerusalem is barred from this country except under a six-months' permit as a visitor—because she had committed the indiscretion of marrying a German!

We have already noted in these columns the petty cruelty imposed upon a score of American women who married Hindus before the Supreme Court decided that Hindus were ineligible to citizenship. They thought they had married American citizens and were still citizens themselves; overnight a court decision cast doubt upon their position, and the State Department proceeded to attempt to cancel their citizenship, impugning, in some States, their right even to hold property. In these cases the lower courts have thus far refused to accept the State Department's interpretation of the law; but the proper course would be for Congress to remedy the situation by appropriate legislation. Senator Reed of Pennsylvania has introduced such a bill; we have not often agreed with him in the past but this time we heartily congratulate him upon his effort to right a wrong, and hope that his measure will pass.

A "Hun" of the Civil War

"HARDLY a man is now alive who remembers that famous day and year" when a thrill of horror went through the North as the news came that a Confederate cavalry general, one John McCausland, had led his troops into Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, on the thirtieth of July, 1864, and burned the greater part of that town to the ground. In an hour this inconspicuous brigadier-general who, with "Stonewall" Jackson, had been a professor at the Virginia Military Institute prior to the war, became one of the most execrated of men. He was declared an outlaw, a brigand, a violator of all the decencies of war and the laws thereof; a beast who warred on women and children. Had the word "Hun" been in use then it would instantly have been applied to this destroyer of private property. It was openly declared that no quarter would be granted him if he were caught—and he was so nearly caught by General W. W. Averell just a week later that he lost his artillery, three flags, nearly all his wagons, 420 prisoners, including thirty-eight officers, besides about a hundred killed and wounded. No matter what might happen to General Robert E. Lee or to "Jeff" Davis, General McCausland was slated, in the united opinion of the North, for a drumhead court martial when the Confederacy fell.

On January 23, 1927, he died in his sleep at the age of ninety in the West Virginia town that bears his name—the survivor of almost all those who once thirsted for his blood and, with one exception, the last of the Confederate generals. More than that, General McCausland was of the Old Guard who die but never surrender. Lee might give up his sword and Early and Johnston and Pickett and all the rest, but not the destroyer of Chambersburg. There was no Appomattox for him. With numerous others he went into Mexico and began that hegira through Europe which for some of these irreconcilables led to Egypt, service in the Egyptian army, and almost two decades of wanderings. McCausland's exile was cut to two years because Ulysses S. Grant came to his rescue, declaring that Chambersburg belonged in the category of things to be forgotten and forgiven, which resulted in the quashing of indictments—for arson—brought against McCausland and General Bradley T. Johnson in Franklin County, Pennsylvania. General McCausland came back, but never yielded to the "Yanks." To his dying day he boasted that he had never surrendered, nor taken the oath of allegiance. If ever a man deserved to have the "Stars and Bars" on his coffin it was surely the "Hun" of Chambersburg.

What influenced General Grant? Primarily, doubtless, the fact that McCausland acted under the orders of his superior officer, General Jubal A. Early, who had instructed him to demand from the citizens of Chambersburg "$100,000 in gold, or, in lieu thereof, $500,000 in greenbacks and national currency." Why? It was, General Early declared, "in retaliation of the depredations committed by General Hunter . . . during the recent raid." So the Germans in Belgium had good American precedent for any fining—or firing—of Belgian towns. The citizens of Chambersburg, who the year before had watched the march up to Gettysburg of the Confederate legions, could not produce the necessary funds. They could only stand by and see the best part of their town and their personal property, too, go up in flames and smoke. Something of this may have been in General Sherman's mind when he apparently said that it would not hurt him deeply if Columbia, South Carolina, should burn down. It did. The war in the Shenandoah was full of bitterness about this time. General Sheridan, it will be remembered, undertook to lay the valley waste so that if a crow were to fly over it "he would have to carry his rations on his back." Sheridan's men executed some Confederate officers there out of hand—without trial—in retaliation for what was said to be the murder of some of his officers and men by Mosby—Hunnish work on both sides! A monument to some of these victims stands by the side of the Shenandoah turnpike today. Such is the nature of war even when conducted by American heroes. The little quarter given at Fort Wagner, the massacre at Fort Pillow—they have their counterparts in every war and so does Chambersburg, which proves anew that the minute one side resorts to what the opponents consider villainous practices, the "purer" and "nobler" side immediately descends to the same practices, cheerfully making them its own. So it was with poison gas, which we are now so proud of and find so humane, and so it will be without end until war is forever abolished and the profession of soldiering is no more.

James Ford Rhodes

JAMES FORD RHODES was that rare phenomenon in American life—a business man who, having made a great deal of money, gives his life to letters. He was born to wealth and he carried on a successful business career until he was nearly forty years of age. A brother-in-law of Mark Hanna, allied by friendship and relationship to the most powerful men of politics and business in Ohio, he cut loose from all business ties and determined to devote himself to the writing of a history of the United States from the Compromise of 1850. He had never stayed in any college long enough, although he had attended two, to obtain a degree. He had also studied abroad, but he had had no training in writing or research when he determined to give the rest of his life to the history of his country. The chances were a hundred to one against success, yet he wrote one of the fairest, most dispassionate, readable, and authoritative histories of his country, which is still unsurpassed in its treatment of the decade from 1850 to 1860. Honors were showered upon him. Nine American universities and Oxford gave him honorary degrees, and the National Institute of Arts and Letters conferred its gold medal upon him. In 1918 he won the Pulitzer Prize; the Loubat Prize of the Berlin Academy of Science was awarded to him in 1901. He was one of the most successful presidents of the American Historical Association.

Now the interesting fact is that these honors were earned virtually by one work, comprising eight volumes, the "History of the United States." Beyond this in various forms there were only three published volumes to Mr. Rhodes's credit, one of historical essays and two dealing with the American Civil War. This places him in that limited group of authors who have achieved preeminence by one great work. He moreover worked slowly and deliberately; his final volume, "The McKinley and Roosevelt Administrations," appeared exactly thirty-three years after his first volume. His means enabled him to command a skilled force of assistants. With them he searched the field he had chosen to cover with great conscientiousness, giving especial consideration to the newspapers of the period with which he was dealing. For the Abolition struggle he had a special interest because of his father's devoted friendship with his kinsman, Stephen A. Douglas. It will always be a cause for regret that the boy who knew Stephen Douglas so well and drew such a striking picture of him in his history did not essay a biography of him; but that form of historical writing never appealed to Mr. Rhodes.

It was the good fortune of The Nation, when Mr. Rhodes's first volumes appeared, to prophesy that "if he shall live to complete his task, we shall have a noteworthy and valuable addition to our solid literature." His second publication seemed to us of such value as to make it improbable "that we shall see a more complete or better balanced history of our great Civil War than that which Mr. Rhodes is giving us." Time has confirmed this estimate. His style was direct and strong, his treatment of every question candid, and his desire to be unbiased was apparent upon every page. The result is that his history has stood the test of time. New material has, of course, been developed. Individual studies of various phases have thrown new light here and there, but the main outlines are unchanged. Its length, unfortunately, bars it from ordinary school use, where its candidness, its honesty, and its clear understanding of the finest things in our American tradition would make it infinitely superior to the biased and narrow works which too often are adopted by boards of education, especially when the authors are willing to cut out objectionable parts and write in accordance with the prejudices of the hour.

It is an unfortunate fact, however, that in his later volumes Mr. Rhodes did not conform to the high standards of his earlier work. There was a greater reliance upon the work of his assistants and his personal ties surely affected some of his judgments. We do not doubt that he was right in saying that if Mark Hanna had been President in 1898 war with Spain would never have been declared; at the same time, he could not see Mr. Hanna's relations to President McKinley in the same light in which that gentleman was viewed by the bulk of the American people. Similarly, Mr. Rhodes was often unable to recognize the influence of economic causes and questions upon the trend of events. He had a clear grasp of the relationship of the slavery question to the constitutional history of the country, but he was not as clear on the compelling force upon the South of the economic character of slavery, and the withering blight of that institution upon the economic life of the South—its exaltation of one crop, its consequent exhaustion of the soil, and the barriers to industrial development which King Cotton set up. None the less, Mr. Rhodes had a dignity of writing, a vision, and a comprehension of the times of which he treated which entitled him to every one of the honors bestowed upon him. He was good enough to say that he found no source more valuable in his writing on the periods from 1865 to 1897 than the New York Nation of that day. The present Nation differs in many respects from that which he praised, but it is at one with The Nation of Godkin in paying tribute to the business man who became one of the great American historians.

"The Ship of State seems to be in terrible difficulties."
"Yes! They need a new Skipper and First Mate."

British Political Parties

By J. RAMSAY MacDONALD

AT the crossing of the threshold of a new year we naturally attempt to answer for ourselves the cry: "Watchman! What of the dawn?" Our country has been going through something akin to a civil war during which the still small voice of reason has been drowned by strident slogans and shut out by deaf ears. What has been the effect on our politics?

I pass the Government first of all under review. It has lost ground as every by-election and the remarkable series of municipal elections in November show. In the contested elections its vote is reduced by about 20 per cent, while Labor's vote has risen by 7 per cent. Within the party itself there is widespread dissatisfaction and a serious loss of confidence which result in abstentions from the ballot box even when they do not mean a transfer of votes. It has suffered from bad trade for which it indeed bears much of the responsibility, and it has given a general appearance of flabbiness and lack of ability. Its friends feel it to be no credit to them, and its enemies despise it when their feelings are not akin to hatred. The great British Tory Government has been a failure.

But it must never be forgotten that the Tory Party in England is less a political than a social party—a party of status either attained or sought; a party of visiting lists. It is, therefore, a party of great coherence, and when its only rival is Labor there are no outlets from the compound of society except those that lead into the blank wilderness. Liberalism till the very end kept a few rich hostesses who gave "At Homes" attended by some "good people." The dinners and the dances of a Liberal hostess still figure occasionally in the Times. But this sort of thing is a virtual monopoly of the Tory Party, and so long as it is valued—and it is valued today pretty much as ever it was—it will be the wall of a political compound extraordinarily difficult to breach.

Failure and dissent within the Tory camp is, therefore, of much less political importance than within any other political camp, and one easily puts too much electoral importance upon it. Were this not so, the Government would not have a ghost of a chance of surviving the year.

In the House of Commons, the Government has fared badly except in the Division Lobbies, and in the debate on the final vote of censure it perhaps fared worst of all. It cannot extricate itself from what is universally recognized as its deplorable mess of the coal dispute. It is blessed, however, by the backing of a press overwhelming in its numbers and united in its support when there is any question at issue between the Government and the Opposition. Therefore, to the public the following morning a Government that had been whipped all over the ring the night before is presented as triumphant. But even such refereeing cannot for long hide the facts from the electors, and the by-elections are a dependable indication of what changes are taking place.

The Liberal Party makes no headway. My reports from two localities indicate that Mr. Lloyd George's land campaign is stirring nobody, that there is not enough political volume behind it to drive it. The disgrace of its candidate at Smethwick, which closed the political events of the year, was really a very serious blow to it. No old party can survive a series of elections in which it does so badly as to forfeit its deposit. Moreover, there is no unity in its ranks. When Mr. Lloyd George stays away from the House of Commons, the Liberals are individuals; when he is there, they are hostile groups. Lord Grey's recent speech at the Phillips's luncheon at the National Liberal Club has been resented by the party on account of its effect on party unity, but most Liberals I have met have admitted its truth and secretly enjoyed it. Lord Asquith seems to have gone completely. Had he been the virtual as well as the titular leader of the Liberal Party in 1923-1924, I do not believe he would have made the fatal speech at the National Liberal Club at the end of the former year, when he announced that, while about to put a Labor Government in office he was to see that they did as he told them. That speech standing alone made an approach from Labor impossible at the time, and I believe he was much too old a hand not to see what he was doing. Later, it was really Mr. George's policy that ended the Labor Government and drove the Liberal Party headlong upon the rocks. There it has been a wreck ever since, and only a wasting company of enlisted and hardened Liberals (barely 2,000,000 if the country were now polled) support its candidates. It is turning out some good political studies at its summer schools and otherwise, for it has some men of great intellectual power still associated with it, and in this it is in contrast with the Tory Party whose efforts to produce anything of an educational character—including the Stott College for educating Tory propagandists—are a complete failure. Since the general election, the Liberal Party has not gained a single seat but has lost one; and there is less prospect than ever that men like Mr. Runciman and Mr. Wedgwood Benn will accept the present leadership.

The Labor Party steps into 1927 with the airs of a victorious party, and its trophies justify its airs. It is now plain that it holds well over 50 per cent of the votes of the industrial areas and that in the great majority of these constituencies it does not matter much whether Liberals or Tories combine against it or make a triangular fight of it. That is not so in rural constituencies. In these the Labor Party is still regarded as a queer phenomenon—an evidence of the errant town mind. At worst, in the teeth of Liberal and Tory opposition, at best without assistance from them, the Labor Government passed the Wages' Board Act for agricultural laborers and the immediate result was an improvement in these wages. That destroyed much prejudice, but the English countryside is slow to move and lies under the shadow of a most effective tyranny of landlord and farmer. To this day, it does not feel convinced of the secrecy of the ballot, and the Tory influences see to it that the suspicion lives long. But education spreads in the villages. Trade unionism, though not at all strong, has no mean influence in some districts; wireless is having an invigorating effect; and now after much consultation, diplomacy, and patient drafting and redrafting, the party has launched a comprehensive scheme for dealing with agricultural problems and has inaugurated a campaign that has aroused considerable interest in the villages. The prosecution of this campaign will be the chief special work of the party this year.

The real danger ahead of the party is that its success is not all of its own making. The other parties are throwing success at its feet. Will it be ready for office when the time comes? Has it a clear conception of what it will do when in power? It is being threatened and hampered by slogans raised by its propaganda sections, like "Socialism in our time," which not only raise impossible expectations, but distract attention from immediate concerns. Nevertheless, the core of the movement is both practical and solid, and much thought is being given by it to this matter. The most baffling problem that confronts it is unemployment, and as regards that, the party knows that it must stimulate trade. It is of some significance that the live leaders of industry have shed their fears of a Labor Government, and recognize that such a government would be more successful than the present one in making the wheels of industry go round. The coal dispute has left it a prickly inheritance, but on that a Labor Government will certainly take its own line in reorganizing a trade that for a generation has been nothing but a breeding ground of industrial strife. In the meantime, the trade-union movement will have recovered from the staggering blow dealt it by the mining dispute and the events that accompanied it, and with a bolder handling of the Communist anti-parliamentary intrigues within its ranks, a closer cooperation with the Parliamentary Party will be secured. Therefore, it is my conviction that with a steadily augmenting support in the country, 1927 will see the Labor Party consolidating itself and preparing to resume the government of the country.

Bootlegging Religion

By ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

ON January 5 the courts of New York, through the Appellate Division, Third Department, sustained the validity of a school regulation which is applied in 130 cities and villages in New York State, pursuant to which children are excused from school for one-half hour on Wednesday afternoons to attend religious instruction. Cards are sent through the teachers to the parents, who, on these cards, signify their willingness to have their children absent themselves from school for this purpose. The teacher must no doubt be satisfied that the child attends at the place of instruction for the remaining half hour of the school session. Those who are not sent to church remain in school, and in the case of the city of White Plains the time is made a study period. Through this method the child, as recompense for going to church, avoids one-half hour of school.

No doubt even the church people realize the triviality of one-half hour a week to offset the often-alleged criminal tendencies of modern children. Their admitted desire is not so much to provide religious instruction as to connect the church in some way with the schools. It may be argued that if a regulation providing for a half hour a week is legal, then a regulation for two hours a week or two hours a day would likewise be legal. But the court has held that "reasonableness in the method adopted is the test of . . . legality." So, from the court's point of view, the question is one more of time than of principle. The thought of connecting religion with the schools under the plan adopted is not disapproved.

The attack on the law is made by Joseph Lewis, as president of the Freethinkers' Society, who in the words of the brief charges that

> This is an endeavor to bootleg a forbidden product (religion) into the public schools. It may be a good product; it may be a bad one. It may be an article of tolerance, mercy, and love, and undiluted. It may have nothing in it of bigotry, hate, and ignorance.

The question of law involved in the case might be decided either way, which means that the decision depends upon the attitude of the judges toward such regulation. Mr. Justice Seeger in a case in Mount Vernon held the regulation to be illegal. In this, the White Plains case, Mr. Justice Staley held the regulation to be legal and his decision has been affirmed by the Appellate Court. The only difference between the two cases was that in the Mount Vernon case the cards were printed by school pupils on school printing machines. Thus there was a use of school property to some extent in connection with carrying out the regulation. But the teachers are likewise paid by the community and their school time is community property. A teacher must concern himself with distributing the cards and with checking up the child's absence. In principle there is little distinction between the two cases.

Under the education law a child is obliged to attend during the entire time in which the school is in session. The only exception relates to occasional absences not amounting to irregular attendance. Thus, taking the education law to mean what it says, the question of law would seem to be whether a regular program, pursuant to which all children who desire are excused at a regular time for a recognized purpose, leads to occasional absences not amounting to irregular attendance. These would seem more like regular absences amounting to regular inattendance. But the Appellate Court said that there were various policies in the schools which could not be adopted if there were "a blind and stubborn adherence to the strict letter of the statute."

Thus we come to the question of the intent of the law or of public policy concerning the separation of church and state. Matters of this kind usually have small beginnings. The position of the State Department of Education was supported by the Greater New York Federation of Churches and the New York Sunday School Association, as well as by the General Committee of Week-Day Religious Instructions in the City of White Plains, and an attorney representing a group of Washington, D. C., "Christian people." Behind the movement is the purpose of associating religious with secular instruction; the church and state should be separate but there should be a connecting bridge. The opposition answers that a school is composed of children representing all elements in the community. At 2:30 the Catholic children may be herded or may herd themselves together from whatever class in school they come, the Protestant children likewise, the Jewish children likewise; the Hindus, the Mohammedans, the Chinese, and the infidels remain in the classroom. Children are not always tolerant and considerate of one another. The Catholics become the "Micks," the Jews become "Kikes," the Protestants become "Ku Kluxers," and the rest become infidels. And the lines of division through the school, not formed by harmonious relationship from class association, become perpendicular, dividing children according to sect or religion. Records of attendance at church are kept by teachers. Each week the Catholic children feel a sympathetic closeness to a Catholic teacher and the others likewise, with a pressure, however slight, toward a particular church.

In the Appellate Division the court said:

> It is natural that parents should wish their children to have religious instruction at any favored opportunity. It is not thought wise that it should be given directly in the school but when children are assembled they may be sent elsewhere.

This is a dangerous beginning.

In a case dependent upon the attitude of the judiciary, which is inclined to be conservative, it is regrettable that the president of the Society of Freethinkers should alone be bringing an action which may have such momentous consequence. A majority sect always endeavors to exercise tyranny over the minority and the only protection for the religious minority is absolute equality without discrimination arising directly or indirectly from civil government. Any particular sect is in the minority. Every sect should itself be anxious to avoid religious meddling with the schools. All men should know that toleration was not found sufficient for the framers of our Constitution, but that equality was their goal—that there was to be such an absolute separation of church and state that civil establishments should be free from any connection whatever with religious institutions. If we provide for religious instruction half an hour of school time, some other sect, when it becomes dominant, will excuse children one hour a day and, with this as a precedent, another sect, perhaps anxious to avoid the necessity of establishing its own denominational schools, will provide for two hours a day; and still another will provide that the hours of release should occur during the biology or the geography or the astronomy hour, so that a youngster may learn only Bible biology and Bible geography and Bible astronomy.

But the courts will not carry the matter to its logical conclusion for they have founded their decision not on the letter of the statute, not on the meaning of the Constitution providing that there be no public aid for religious institutions, but on the question of reasonableness, which depends upon the attitude of very human judges. The judges in Tennessee are likewise human.

Humiliation

By KWEI CHEN

IT is already dark when I reach my home village. All the houses are lit. I see the lights from the window of my own home, and note particularly the friendly glow from my father's study. From afar I hear the barking of my dogs. My heart leaps—but this time with fear and sorrow more than joy. Usually I run as I descend the hillside path. Now I cannot run.

"Is this Ching-yü?"

It is a familiar voice and I look about me, over the rice-fields in the starlight. I stop and at once recognize the passerby. In his left hand as always he carries a large bamboo wine-bottle; in his right hand a basketful of bean-cakes. He is a good middle-aged farmer of our village.

"Yes, Elder-Brother Shen-wu."

In my village people still preserve the traditional courtesy, the younger people addressing their seniors as "Elder-Brother" or "Elder-Uncle," regardless of social position.

"You have grown since you went away to school," says the friendly farmer. "I can see it in the dark. Perhaps you are a match for your Second Elder-Brother or for your Elder-Cousin Hsu at least. But I forget! they will be growing up also, big boys by now! But where are they? They should have accompanied you?"

"They will return—later." I speak with hesitation.

"I hope," the farmer adds curiously, for he has noticed that I falter—"I hope that nothing has gone wrong? Your mother expected your arrival yesterday, according to your letter from the provincial capital. Well, don't let me detain you. You must be as eager to see your mother as she is to see you." Thus the good Shen-wu leaves me.

When I approach the fish pond in front of the house all my dogs dash forth to welcome me home. They run a few steps ahead of me to lead the way and then come back, bounding about my feet. When I enter the house they all follow, waving their tails.

I come into the dining-room. The family are there eating their supper. My mother is the first to see me, and she is the one whom I first see.

"Ah!" exclaims she, putting down her chopsticks and rising to meet me. "My expected one!"

"We were just talking about you, Third Elder-Brother," remarks my Younger-Sister, smiling. "Fifth Aunt worried so much, when she did not see you arrive yesterday. She had a nightmare last night. I told her that Father was sure all of you would come home safe today."

"Where is your Second Elder-Brother?" my father asks me, anxiously.

"He will be home after a day or two," I reply in a low voice.

"Has your Elder-Cousin Hsu come with you?" asks my mother quickly.

"No," I answer her. No longer can I keep the mournful secret. My tears fall like rain; my head burns violently.

"No, Mother," I continue, "Elder-Cousin Hsu has not come home, and never will. . . . He is dead. . . ."

"What!" my father cries out, bursting into tears. The lamps seem to burn less brightly.

"Poor Fifth Aunt!" It is my mother, weeping. She hides her face in her hands. "This will kill her. . . ."

"Listen!" declares my father, drying his eyes. "Not a word of Hsu's death should be spoken outside this room.

How is it," he asks, looking at me, "it happened so suddenly? Tell the whole story."

I strive to collect myself.

"Three days ago, in the provincial capital," I begin, "early in the morning Second Elder-Brother, Elder-Cousin Hsu, and I reached the railway station. There was a big crowd as usual. Elder-Cousin Hsu joined the line to buy our tickets. Suddenly there came a drunken foreigner—a tall man with red hair and a hawk's nose. Disregarding the waiting line, he tried to crowd in first at the ticket window. He forced out Elder-Cousin Hsu, who was second in line. Elder-Cousin Hsu protested: 'Do you not see the line?' The foreigner did not reply, but struck Elder-Cousin on the cheek! Elder-Cousin kicked back. The foreigner again struck Elder-Cousin, and he fell to the ground! 'Do you fear me now?' cried the foreigner, threatening him with his fist. Elder-Cousin jumped up, sprang at the foreigner. Although the foreigner was big as a bull, Elder-Cousin Hsu fought like a panther! But a watchman seized hold, and stopped him.

"'Did you not see what the foreigner did to me?' said Elder-Cousin to the watchman. 'You ask the others about it!'

"One of the young students stepped out and told what had happened, and all of us—for there were many students returning from school—shouted: 'Arrest the foreigner! Arrest the foreigner!' But the watchman would not move!

"'There is no use to arrest him,' said he.

"'How can you say that!' one of the students cried out angrily. 'Can you fold your hands in your sleeves when you see a foreigner strike your own people? What do you do here? You, a watchman!'

"The watchman began to explain: 'What use to arrest him? We Chinese cannot punish a foreigner in accordance with our law! He will be handed over to the consul of his country—freed without punishment.'

"Elder-Cousin Hsu had become faint and was leaning heavily against my shoulder; his mouth was bleeding. Second Elder-Brother and I wept. So did the other young students. As for the foreigner, he had his ticket and was gone, laughing contemptuously.

"A few minutes later," I continue, "Elder-Cousin recovered a little. He still spat blood. His face was very pale. He was murmuring to himself, sobbing: 'Humiliation . . . Humiliation . . .' His words cut into my heart. I wished to console him, but I could do nothing but weep. My eyes were two fountains, flowing incessantly. Second Elder-Brother, however, remained more calm. 'Dear Cousin,' he said, 'the humiliation is as much mine as it is yours. It is our nation's humiliation! Take care of yourself. He who always does wrong will slay himself, so our sages say. Some day these foreigners will learn to obey our laws!'

"Now the train gave a whistle, preparatory to leaving. Second Elder-Brother had gone to buy us the tickets at the last minute. Elder-Cousin Hsu remained with me, still in tears: 'I who was born of an honorable family to be thus humiliated by a foreigner! No, I am humiliated by my own people—the cowards! They all hate the foreigners, but crouch before them, like pigs for the slaughter! . . . Why do I live? To be humiliated, like a slave, like a dog! With what face can I meet other people, my mother? Oh! how dare I see my mother! No, no . . .' Meanwhile he was spitting more blood."

"Poor child . . ." my mother interrupts, "he ought to have known that his mother would not choose to live without him, her only child. Woe is Fate that takes from the widowed mother the most cherished hope of her life! Seventeen years ago, Ching-yü my son, about three months before your Elder-Cousin Hsu was born, your Fifth Uncle died. He was an honorable man, loved by all who knew him. Your Fifth Aunt was then but twenty-one years old. At your Fifth Uncle's sick-bed she said: 'Our love is of the unusual kind. I will not live alone, if you are to leave me. But in about three months, I shall bear you a child, which will be the continuation of our love. I will, then, live with our child, or die without it.' Ah, what a disciplined woman! What a faithful wife and a wise mother! In these past seventeen years she has devoted all her time and attention to bringing up and educating her son, who had become so hopeful, and so worthy of his family name."

"When Second Elder-Brother returned with our tickets," I resume, "Elder-Cousin stood up, intending to walk to the train by himself. But Second Elder-Brother and I insisted on supporting him. 'We shall see,' said Second Elder-Brother to Elder-Cousin Hsu. 'If you are too ill to ride on the train, we can get off at the first stop.' 'Don't worry,' Elder-Cousin Hsu replied, smiling. 'I shall be all right. I feel better.'

"On the train he slept most of the time, and said nothing except to tell me about how many of his books I could have, since he had finished high school and would need them no longer. He appeared quite composed.

"Late in the afternoon, while the train was approaching our destination, he rose, saying that he wanted to go to the wash-room. Ten minutes elapsed, but he did not come back. Suddenly the train stopped on the middle of the bridge over the Green River. Two railway watchmen appeared in the doorway, calling out:

"'A young man has committed suicide! He threw himself out of the window of a wash-room and jumped into the river. Has he any relatives or friends on the train, or does any one know of him?'

"Oh, frightful! frightful! I trembled and wept. All over my body there was cold sweat.

"Second Elder-Brother ran toward the watchmen, stammering: 'I . . . I have a cousin . . . He went to the wash-room, and has not come back!' He disappeared immediately with the watchmen, and left me alone weeping.

"Soon Second Elder-Brother returned, with a piece of paper in his hand. 'Read, Younger-Brother,' said he. 'This is the last word left by our cousin.' I read:

"'Cousins:

"'I am gone! I am gone forever!

"'I can not live any longer in this world.

"'The land of humiliation is not mine.

"'Hsu.'

"The watchmen came: 'One of you must stop off. The train must go on.' Second Elder-Brother turned to me: 'Younger-Brother, you go home first. I get off here to search for our cousin's body. Take care, don't let Fifth Aunt see you mourning.' So second Elder-Brother left me. I came home as soon as possible. Now I have told it."

* * * * *

My Fifth Aunt and her son were buried together. Today in my village the people sing:

"Heaven makes sudden changes;
Men have unexpected calamities!
The Chen family had a son;
He refused to live in humiliation!"

A New Slavery in South Africa

By LORD OLIVIER

THE South African Union Government, which is a coalition of the Nationalist (predominantly Dutch) Party and the (White) Labor Party, alarmed at the forecast made in the Report on the Census of 1921 of the rate of increase of the Native population as compared with the European, is taking in hand a comprehensive program of legislation* with a view to arresting social developments which are regarded by the Government's supporters as a menace to white supremacy. There is strong division of local opinion and feeling: important parts of the policy being opposed by those, especially in the Cape Province, who adhere to the traditional British principles of equal treatment of colored and white races.

It is proposed to withdraw the political franchise from members of the Native races, who now enjoy it in the Cape Province, and to withhold it in the other provinces, where they have not yet been allowed it; to restrict the right of owning real property by Natives to particular areas and by what is known as the Color-Bar Law, recently passed; to prohibit the employment of Natives in any work in which machinery is used and in any other industry which the Government may hereafter proclaim. No Native, unless he owns land in a permitted area, is to be allowed to live outside the Native reserves except as a bonded servant to a white man, liable to punishment under the Masters and Servants Law.

The whole morale of South African society and industry has been vitiated by the fact that the original Cape Settlement was established upon imported slave labor, and that the white people have never since got rid of the mentality of a slave-based society. From slavery time onwards, all manual labor has been and still is regarded as work unfit for a white man, and only fit for a black. Further, the result of this tradition, combined with land monopoly, has produced a class of "poor whites," who have never learned to work and for whom it would be a disloyalty to the traditions of white society to be willing to work except in the position of bosses. On the basis of this tradition, such capitalized industry as has been set up in South Africa in supplement to the original patriarchal farming and pastoral industry (in which these relations of white and black were comparatively innocuous) has been established on the theory that all the manual labor must be done by Kaffirs at Kaffir wages. When the sugar industry was started in Natal white labor was therefore not available and the industry could not, as it was later in Queensland, be developed on a basis of white man's wages. Natives neither would nor could undertake plantation labor. Indian indentured coolies were therefore imported. This laid the foundations of the Natal Asiatic trouble and reinforced the theory that all labor must be done by non-Europeans at wages insufficient for white men.

The mining industry (diamonds and gold) was founded upon the same theory, and it is clearly brought out in the report rendered last spring by the Union Government's Economic and Wages Commission that the South African mines are now capitalized and can only be worked on a system whereby one white man is employed in combination with, on an average, twelve or thirteen black men. These Natives do not in fact do only manual labor; they do skilled and semi-skilled work with machines under white direction. But a white contractor, working with Natives, alone gets the skilled man's pay; the Natives get Kaffir unskilled pay. White men are paid on the average about ten times as much as the black, whose wages are kept down by the white land monopoly. Wages are further kept down by the importation of laborers from Portuguese East Africa, who are forced out of their own country by the exactions of the Portuguese Government, as testified in the recent report of Professor Ross, of Wisconsin University. Kaffir farm wages average about 12 cents a day, with rations. Kaffir mining wages have a maximum of 54 cents a day.

The real wages of white miners on the Witwatersrand are higher than anywhere else in the world except in a few cities of the United States. "These high wages," the Economic Commission declare, are paid and can only be paid "largely at the expense of the Native workers." "White wages are high because Native wages are low."

The mines are over-capitalized on a scale at which they can only be kept running on a basis of underpaid Native labor. The Native's wage is not sufficient for the full maintenance of himself and his family, to whom, after serving his contract, he returns, as the Irish harvest-laborer used to return from England. Far less is such a wage sufficient for white men. If the mines had to pay living wages all round they would have to reduce output and discharge many white men.

Hence the association of the South African Labor Party with the Afrikander Native repression policy.

The Economic Commission are explicit in their verdict that the Color-Bar Law will not mend matters in South Africa. They say that the only way to deal with South African trouble is to get rid of the superstition that white men cannot do manual labor, to provide a sufficiency of land for the natives, to break up the great monopoly holdings of land syndicates and settle the "poor whites" as working farmers on them, to stop the importation of laborers from Portuguese territory, and to increase generally the wages of unskilled laborers so that the standard of living of the Natives may be raised and they become better customers for the services of the skilled white man.

Some apologists argue that as the white man is racially superior to the black, he is justified in seeking to maintain his position by preventing the Native from attaining equality with him. That sort of self-deceiving pseudo-Darwinian claptrap is indicative of the kind of argument used in defense of the South African white Labor policy. It is claptrap because, in the first place, not all white men, on any scale of human valuations, are superior to all black, and a great many white men are inferior to a good many black. There are a great many educated black South Africans who show much more intelligence in regard to the essentials of this question than whites who thus argue. They admit that the white man must not allow himself to be pulled down by the competition in the capitalist labor market of workers with a lower standard of living: but they point out that the way to prevent that is the way recommended by the Economic Commission, and that it can be done by the use of the Wages Regulation Laws already set up in South Africa. Whatever white South Africans may think, the Native and his spokesmen simply do not admit their theory that they, being a superior race, are entitled to hold the Native down as an unskilled laborer and forbid him equal opportunities of learning to exercise his capacities and of earning equal pay for equal work. Thousands of South African Europeans, the councils of all religious denominations (save the Dutch Reformed Church), and, it must uncompromisingly be said, all the more intelligent leaders of the community hold the same view. The program of General Hertzog's policy for binding down the Native as a laborer on the land, and of the Labor Party's policy of keeping him on unskilled wages as a manual laborer, owes its political support to the worst-educated and most obstinately reactionary class in the community, the Afrikander farmers, with whom the South African Labor Party have temporarily allied themselves.

* The proposed laws are discussed in detail by Professor R. F. Alfred Hoernle in this week's International Relations Section.—EDITOR.

It is futile to imagine that this policy of keeping the Native in his place is going to establish the supremacy of white civilization. It is diametrically opposed to everything that has made white civilization. The British Labor Party's declared policy in regard to dealings with Native races explicitly and categorically condemns it. It is largely this theory, as I have said, that has produced the South African problem of the "poor white" class. It is also, in fact, an impossible policy. There are already two and one-half millions of detribalized natives intimately associated with and intermixed in the white man's society, doing every kind of manual work and domestic service, as against two million still in tribal organizations, and the only way to arrest the progress of common degradation is to raise the standards of Native life by allowing them facilities for education and the privileges long established in the Cape Colony policy of equal rights for all men of equal civilization.

If the attempt to maintain the repressionist and color-bar policy should be persisted in, it is not the Natives that, in the long run, will be defeated. It is not they, but the white race, that have shown the first symptoms of degeneration—a degeneration entirely due to their own perverse social theory. The Native is at present desirous and disposed to adapt himself to the life of European civilization: and if white men worthy of that civilization continue to assist him to do so, South African society will develop on stable lines.

Shall Women Be Protected?

By VALESKA BARI

ALL the laws passed by the various States to shorten the working hours of women, to protect them from starvation wages and from the strains of night work are again threatened by the renewed campaign for the Blanket Amendment. The right of the normal woman to her freedom is argued against the theory that the state should restrict the liberty of all women in order to protect the helpless. On either side the theories are convincing; discussion of them brings us flatly to the question, What does protective legislation mean in our national life?

We class these laws as labor laws but they have been held constitutional only on the grounds that they are health measures, designed to protect women as potential mothers. On this biological basis we restrict women from the freedom of contract which the Constitution guarantees to citizens in general. Logically, we might expect that the administration of such measures would be given to the health authorities so that enforcement could be directed with a rounded awareness of all working conditions which might be harmful to women in their biological functions, but nowhere are the laws enforced as health measures. The muddle of protective legislation is due mainly to this basic subterfuge.

Other countries have enacted legislation controlling the conditions of employment for women compared to which our laws are mere gestures, and those laws have been accepted by industry because they rest upon definite and responsible foundations. Imperial Germany, with an eye on world domination, developed a complete system of protecting all the workers—men, women, and children—on the theory that the citizens existed for the benefit of the state, and the state was protecting its property. Britain has enacted legislation which to us appears highly socialistic but which is understandable on the basis of fixed classes: the recognition of a ruling class carrying with it the responsibility of that class for those beneath it, and the fixed position of the laboring class. Australia's labor legislation is a recognition of union principles, the controlling class placing the stamp of official approval on its own regulations.

Our protective legislation, in contrast, is chiefly an outgrowth of charity. Our charities grew from a personal and volunteer to a professional and organized basis, then widened into social agencies which discovered that many of the persons they were called upon to assist were the human wreckage of industry. In seeking to get at the roots welfare workers lent their strength to the movement which labor was making to obtain politically what it was too weak to obtain by industrial organization.

The attitude of labor toward protective legislation is a confused mixture of aggression and defense. Organized labor has had no clear policy concerning political action. Few women have been organized into unions. Some of the leaders who hoped to organize the mass of women have opposed the passage of laws which would wipe out the incentives to organization, and others, losing faith in the possibility of getting women to join unions, have accepted the viewpoint that the struggle for organization was a man's fight and that the women should be taken off the industrial firing line and placed behind a barricade of protective laws. Most of the women of organized labor have worked valiantly for ameliorative laws, partly hoping for the prestige of victory and the chance to use the administration of the laws to the general advantage of organized labor, but largely from a genuinely altruistic desire to improve the conditions of all working women. They have been responsible for introducing many of the bills to shorten the working hours of women and to curtail night work, even though they knew that such laws would lessen the incentives to unionization. To minimum-wage legislation they have given little support—and at times active opposition—but minimum wage has been from the start a reformers' and not a union program, and labor has been suspicious of surrendering the control of wages to boards on which it would have only a minority vote.

The officials to whom the enforcement of these laws has been given have been drawn partly from organized labor, partly from the social-welfare group, and partly from groups chosen for political reasons. More have been appointed from the ranks of labor than their political effectiveness warranted, but often these appointees have been the "old war horses" of the labor movement rather than the more aggressive younger blood, and they have taken their positions rather as rewards for past services than as opportunities for constructive use of the power given to them. It is a matter of interest, at times of discouragement, to observe how little is often accomplished by labor representatives when given the enforcement of labor laws. They are, of course, seldom given a free hand from above as few governors would stand back of a policy which would irritate business interests. They are hampered in taking cases to court as usually they have to employ the legal services of public prosecutors both ignorant and suspicious of social-welfare legislation.

The position of a labor representative enforcing a labor law is far from easy. He can hardly be expected to prosecute a union establishment as readily as a non-union shop; for this there is considerable justification in spirit if not in the letter of the law. The union recognizes the principle of overtime work and overtime pay, and this overtime pay serves not only as a deterrent to extra work but also it pays for some "extra" which either actually or psychologically tends to offset the strain of additional work. A non-union shop usually does not pay for overtime, particularly if in violation of the law—partly for the reason that the extra wage would constitute evidence of the violation. The recognition of the union by an employer gives the workers a greater degree of protection, and a more tangible protection, than is given by protective laws. If all the workers belonged to unions protective laws as we now have them would be unnecessary; consequently it is only natural that labor representatives should consider protective legislation as a political substitute for organization, to be enforced only against non-union establishments. This point of view, while almost unavoidable, is of course quite without the law. It makes protective legislation, as administered by labor representatives, a weapon in the struggle between workers and employers and reduces the scientific bases, such as those of strain and fatigue, to mere subterfuges.

A further weakness of enforcement by labor people is that they know too much of the conditions they are called upon to improve. They know all the practical, workroom difficulties of the present system and by familiarity are tolerant where an outsider, less aware of the difficulties, by the very attitude of being unreasonable would force industry to direct more of its brains and imagination toward improving conditions.

Where the enforcement of protective legislation is given to members of the social-welfare group they have usually found themselves stranded like orphans in an alien world. The background of the social worker consists of a half knowledge of economics, sociology, public health, and kindred subjects. In seeking the passage of such laws the group argues not merely in general humanitarian terms that the long working day, low wages, and night work are harmful to the individual woman and her family but also that they are directly and indirectly inefficient, and harmful to industry itself. On this basis the enactment of such measures becomes a matter of giving the advocates a chance to use the force of law to demonstrate their point. Herein lies the essential difference between protective legislation gained by the efforts of reformers and laws gained by the strength of labor. The police club of enforcement is needed to compel attention, but the effort of the law should be directed toward changing the viewpoint of industry. For instance, the object of enforcing an eight-hour law should be to demonstrate that long hours are bad business practice. So, too, with low wages and night work; once get industry to realize that they mean inefficiency and higher costs and business will exert itself to solve the problem.

There are two approaches whereby officials enforcing protective legislation can carry their point. One is by knowing more than business knows and by telling business exactly what to do to correct its shortcomings. The other method is by using the force of law to irritate business into solving the problems in self-defense. Either method would be effective but the social-welfare group has neither the knowledge necessary for first-class scientific administration on the one hand nor the courage and dramatic insight requisite for first-class propaganda on the other; consequently, its enforcement of protective laws has been a muddled mixture of the two.

Most enforcement officials have utterly failed to realize that protective legislation occupies much the same relation to industry as does a guard placed around a dangerous machine, which serves to prevent the operator from being hurt but which is usually hampering to the worker who desires to turn out a creditable amount of product. The guard is clumsy because it was not designed as part of the process; such a guard should be considered merely a temporary expedient. The next step is to build a new machine whose operation will embody the principle of safety to the operator.

The foundations of protective legislation are muddled and its administration has been muddled, but to abolish the whole structure would not necessarily clarify the situation. To remove the special legislation which has been enacted because of the biological functions of woman would not change the physical handicaps of those functions or their importance to society but would only grant the doubtful benefit of an eighteenth-century liberty to engage in twentieth-century industry. But in bringing to public consideration the whole question of protective legislation, in questioning its value and pointing out its weaknesses and inconsistencies, the agitation for an amendment which would wipe all such laws from the statute-books is rendering signal service. It has reduced protective legislation from its niche of sacredness and permanence to its proper position as a temporary expedient, and it has stimulated thought as to the possible solution by industrial means of the problems which protective legislation is striving to meet by legal and political means.

The Cleveland Reservoir

By ELBERT PEETS

OUR drinking water, in Cleveland, is stored in a covered reservoir. The reservoir keeps the water clear and cool, and to do that as effectively and economically as possible is its only reason for existing. Quite incidentally, it is an architectural masterpiece.

It is called the Baldwin Reservoir. (Actually there are two, but I shall use the singular number because they are exactly alike.) It is a subterranean room about five hundred feet square, surrounded by concrete walls, paved with concrete and covered with a roof of intersecting flattened barrel-vaults of concrete carried on round concrete piers. The crown of the vaults is forty feet above the floor. The piers, which are thirty inches thick, are about twenty feet apart both ways. The only openings are a few small manholes in the ceiling.

The beauty of the Great Hall of Cleveland is first of all in its vast extent—its six hundred columns, its fifty aisles. But it has delicacy, too. The aisles are pleasantly proportioned in cross section. The columns are spread conically at the floor, an unpleasant shape but at a distance softening into a simplified diagram of an architectural column base. At the top there is a rather bungling transition from round to square to meet the square springing of the vaults, but here again, with almost pathetic lack of affectation, the aesthetic function of a capital is expressed.

There is nothing quite like it anywhere. Each aisle has about the proportions of the side aisles of a moderately high Gothic church, Winchester Cathedral for example, though the flattened vaults remind one of later Gothic buildings such as St. George's Chapel, Windsor. But for the great area, the forest of equispaced columns, the precedents are ancient. That is a hot-climate, Mediterranean idea. The great hall in the temple of Ammon at Karnak was 160 by 320 feet and contained 134 columns. The Hall of a Hundred Columns at Persepolis had just a quarter the area of the Cleveland hall, but its ceiling was twenty feet higher.

For the "public inspection" in 1925, before the reservoir was flooded, a few aisles along the west wall were lit by hanging an electric bulb close to the ceiling in every fourth or fifth bay. The rest of the hall was dark save for a few "Jove's eyes" where manholes had been left open. The warm yellowish electric light spread out from each of the lit bays and laid a net of radiating column shadows on the floor. The curved shapes of the springing vaults, caught by the shadows of the vaults nearer the lights, produced a fantastic mosaic of interwoven spots and lines varying from bright gold through every shade of warm gray to deep soft black. The columns were halved and quartered by the shadows of other columns or were picked out of the darkness by narrow tangent strips of light.

In search of new aspects I wandered out from the lit bays into the dark forest of columns. A dozen bays deep in it, when I looked back along an aisle I saw a bluntly bullet-shaped area of warm gray concrete wall, streaked with vertical shadows and framed by the lighter lines of the more directly lit columns near it. Nearer me the columns became less and less light. There was a similar gradation of light in the ceiling, not uniform but flecked with light and dark as rays or shadows caught the surfaces of the groined vault. Across the bottom of this deep stage-setting moved a line of little people silhouetted against the bright wall, so far away that I could not hear their voices or tell whether they were looking out into the darkness toward me.

Another fine view was from north to south along a dark aisle in which there was an open manhole in the top of the last bay. Everything around me was jet black. In the distance again the bullet shape, this time not of warm light but cool silver, the white light streaming down through the manhole and along the gray columns, spreading out on the floor to form a white line from one base to the other.

The view which had most of "art" in it was a concrete stand-pipe, seen from about two hundred feet away, along the aisle in which it stood. The front of the enormous pipe was lit by an open manhole just above it. The white light flooded down along the gray cylinder, broken only by the black drooping shadow under a flange-offset ten feet from the top. Each side of the cylinder darkened into shadow, but just at the turning was a pale line of ruddy light from the electric bulbs. On the floor some ponderous valve-affair served as altar and a dark crowd of pigmy worshipers stood with heads uplifted as the high-priest chanted "Ten million cubic feet, two million dollars." . . . Everywhere I was surrounded by a star of diagonal vistas, narrower, more sharply crowned, more Gothic than the full views down the aisles.

No architect ever lived who would not stand in silent wonder in this Hall of Six Hundred Columns. It is an abstraction, a song in some nameless mother-language that everyone understands. It is the work of a law, of a formula ruling over space and mass—rather, perhaps, a law brought into the range of our feelings by being stated in the most fundamental, most simple terms of human need for formal perfection. It is the product of man's desire for order, freed from the old conventions of architecture by the new conventions of engineering.

The great beauty of the reservoir is its simplicity and purity. Nothing is petty, nothing is irrelevant, nothing is boastful, nothing tells a story, nothing mumbles the names of gods, men, or races—nothing is human. There are no windows, no doors, almost no light, no sign of human use, not even a stone cut small so men could lift it. And yet it is superbly human. Beside it the formless jumble of nature becomes a congeries of wilful antics. It is so human that in an hour it became very dear to me. Its floor's level firmness gives my body the safest and most assuring relation to the earth; the solid ceiling, curving from pier to pier, does not weigh upon me and yet protects me from all the unknown things of the air. The strong round columns seem human, make me feel taller and stronger. My eye follows them as they march away into the shadow and I actually touch and measure and embrace the space that surrounds me. I live at last in a cosmos.

And we built it to cool our drinking water.

In the Driftway

WHAT are the ten most beautiful things in New York City? The New York State Federation of Women's Clubs has set the Drifter thinking on the subject by offering prizes for the best answers.

* * * * *

THOSE in charge of the contest made some suggestions, in announcing it, in regard to subjects: a statue or painting, a stained-glass window, the span of a bridge, the tower of a skyscraper, a secluded corner or bit of landscape gardening in a park, a view from a given point. The Drifter is inclined to rule out statues or paintings in galleries. There are plenty of beautiful ones; so many that a choice of one or two would be unsatisfactory. But such works belong only accidentally to New York. Few were created there, and any might be transferred tomorrow to St. Louis or San Francisco, where they would be as beautiful. Outdoor statuary, when designed to stand in a particular place, may be as integral a part of the city as its architecture. The abounding and intrinsic beauty of New York, the Drifter thinks, is in its outdoor vistas and panoramas, the glorious glimpses of or from streets, buildings, bridges, and parks.

* * * * *

THE Woolworth Tower will be included by nine out of ten contestants, and the Brooklyn Bridge will be a choice of many. It would be mere snobbishness on the Drifter's part to pass them over for this reason. He thinks they deserve a place, no matter how many others agree with him. They shall go at the top of the Drifter's list —or would if he weren't sure to forget to send one in. Another thing. The Drifter sees no reason for confining his list of New York City's beauties to iron and stone, to trees and grass and water and sky. Is not the most beautiful thing in New York the humanity within it? Has the city anything more worth looking at than the faces of some of the aged Jews of its East Side; the sheer loveliness of the Italian children of Mulberry, Mott, or Elizabeth Street; the morning parade of the babies—yes, and their nurses—in Central Park; the flow of eager, confident youth on Broadway or Fifth Avenue?

* * * * *

ENOUGH of palaver. Here is the Drifter's practice list:

1. The tower of the Woolworth Building from anywhere at any time.

2. The far-flung span of the Brooklyn Bridge from almost underneath it on South Street.

3. The noonday parade of New York's young-women office workers on lower Broadway.

4. The equestrian statue of General Sherman at the southeast corner of Central Park.

5. Washington Square after a snowfall, looking from a third- or fourth-story window on the south side across the park to the mellow row of old houses on the north.

6. The beach at Rockaway Park on a bright Sunday afternoon in summer when the sand is swarming with gay umbrellas, bathing suits of still brighter plumage—and humanity.

7. The view of lower Manhattan, the East River, and Brooklyn Bridge from the terrace at the foot of Montague Street about 5:30 on a December afternoon, when, though it is dark outside, the downtown buildings are still illuminated.

8. The dogwood grove in the northwest corner of Van Cortlandt Park when abloom in the spring.

9. The pushcart market on Grand Street on Saturday night.

10. High Bridge by moonlight from the banks of the Harlem River.

11. The view east from the Serpentine Road, Staten Island, with the valley below, New York Bay, and a panorama of Brooklyn.

12. The view southeast from the small lake in Central Park during a misty twilight, taking in the top of the Plaza Hotel.

* * * * *

BUT here are twelve, while only ten were called for. No matter. Anybody who has ever lived in New York knows that its ten most beautiful things number at least forty or fifty.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Catholic Replies

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You must have never read the Pastoral Letter of the Catholic Episcopate of the United States on the Religious Situation in Mexico. Do you really want to know where the Catholics of the United States stand in regard to the present situation in Mexico? Open that pastoral letter and you will be told as plainly as possible that

> The second human remedy [the sword] is equally hopeless, for Christian principles forbid the church founded by the Prince of Peace to take up the sword or to rely upon such carnal weapons as the inflamed passions of men would select. If the church has learned many things in her life of two thousand years the principal lesson came from the patience of her Divine Founder. . . . She has learned how to suffer. . . . The weapons of men are not for her. But, if these human weapons the church will not use, she has one that well fits her hand, armored as it is in justice and in truth. She has prayer. . . . The hatred of men may spurn it. The malice of men may curse it. The unbelief of men may mock it. But its hope is in a Promise and its power is in a Faith.

The answer to your question, What about the Catholics? has been given by all the Catholic bishops of this country. All of the New York dailies commented on it and carried excerpts and the Knights of Columbus sent a copy of it to every member of the order. Where, in the name of common sense, were you?

Columbus, Ohio, January 23 F. DREES

Kellogg Needs Memory Training

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I call your attention to a treaty signed between the United States and the governments of Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica in February, 1923, and proclaimed (and thus brought into force) in June, 1925.

This treaty contains the following article:

> When two or more of the Contracting Parties shall have failed to adjust satisfactorily through diplomatic channels a controversy originating in some divergence or difference of opinion regarding questions of fact, relative to failure to comply with the provisions of any of the treaties or conventions existing between them and which affect neither the sovereign and independent existence of any of the signatory Republics, nor their honor or vital interests, the parties bind themselves to institute a Commission of Inquiry with the object of facilitating the settlement of the dispute by means of an impartial inquiry into the facts.

This obligation ceases if the parties in dispute should agree by common accord to submit the question to arbitration or to the decision of another tribunal.

A Commission of Inquiry shall not be formed except at the request of one of the parties directly interested in the investigation of the facts which it is sought to elucidate.

Aren't we grand at making treaties—and forgetting them?

Seattle, Washington, January 25 ADDISON SIMS

The Rape of Syria

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The leading French paper in Syria cheers because at last there has been a victory over the Syrians; a young French officer has been able to lead a band of hired Circassians, the most cruel of brigands, against a people living in their own country! The French officer is an alien; the Circassians are aliens; they are hired by money which, in the last analysis, is American, to smash a mild people, protesting as best they can against an iniquity.

Some thirty thousand of the finest young Syrian men have been killed; some of the oldest historical houses in Damascus have been destroyed, and their families—old Moslem families—made refugees. There are thousands of homeless people in Damascus and over the frontier, all because they were trying to live up to what American missionaries had taught them and what Syrians had learned in America of American ideals. Is it really worth while, all of this devotion on the part of American well-wishers and American teachers, running through two generations, if, when they accept our friendly advances and try to act up to our teachings, we give them no help?

When the French came into Syria in 1920, the people of Palestine and Syria, following perfectly clear promises made to them during the war and afterward, had set about establishing a government. They had chosen a Constituent Assembly that would be an honor to any of our own States, and elected a king upon whom both Moslems and Christians united. This promising little government was immediately smashed with machine-guns. The French took over all of the metal money, some £12,000,000, and forced a paper currency upon the people. They tried to disarm the whole population and largely succeeded, and imposed a cruel, incompetent, and expensive government.

With the meagerest resources, however, the best of the Syrians took up the fight under the direction of the foremost physician of Damascus. They have received no outside help and have won most of their fighting material in victories over the French. The French hired Circassians and Senegambians to do their worst work with the understanding that they could commit any kind of abominations. Many villages containing only women and children have been bombed.

After thoroughly ruining the country, the French are now demanding that the Syrians pay their share of the old Turkish debt. The French don't talk about cancelation of debts out here! One wonders what Lafayette would have thought about this whole enterprise!

Damascus, Syria, January 2 AMERICANUS

The Maid Militant Too

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your article, The Making of a Militant, may be a fine autobiography of the militant middle-class woman. She conveys the idea that maids should be employed to do housework, to which the woman with some knowledge of algebra, advanced geometry, Greek, Latin, or old Norse should not stoop. It would be interesting to know the attitude of the maid. Why should there not be greater compensation for drudgery than for parlor and office work even if we do write and picture world problems in the interest of those who can best afford to pay. This militant's ideas parallel those of medieval times, when knighthood was in flower and the large majority were worse than slaves. Most people in this land of plenty would be only too glad to cook elaborate Sunday dinners, but they are denied that privilege by a well-guided public opinion engineered by well-paid writers.

Erskine, Minnesota, December 5 CARL BERG

"By and Large"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I point out that this phrase is recognized in the New English Dictionary not only under "by," as stated in this week's Nation, but also under "large," where an example dated 1704 is given of its figurative sense "in one direction and another, all ways"? And Thornton, in his American Glossary, cites examples ranging from 1833 to 1906. Thus the phrase, though often in recent years animadverted upon both in England (where it appears to be regarded as an Americanism) and in this country, has been established for over two centuries. Unless my memory is treacherous, it was once the subject of one of those learned letters that the late Dr. Fitzedward Hall used to contribute to The Nation in the eighteen eighties.

Boston, January 14 ELBERT MATTHEWS

Germans Also Gave

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Louis Fischer, in his otherwise excellent article, Communism . . . A Religion?, is at fault when he asserts that "German workers . . . could not be roused to . . . even give alms" toward the cause of the British miners. German workers, despite their own ills, contributed considerable sums.

Brooklyn, N. Y., December 26 THEODORE SINGER

Cruisers and Gun Caliber

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The agitation in Congress over additional cruisers for our navy (in view of the discovery that the cruiser ratio is 5 to 2.35 to 1.88, the first figure representing Great Britain, the second Japan, the third the United States) may justify this belated correction of an error I made in The Nation of July 21, last, under the title, Evading the Washington Treaty. The article dealt with the utilization of metals lighter than steel in cruisers, and with a new technique of construction as to motive power. In it I said that the caliber of guns on light cruisers was not limited by the treaty; as a fact the number of cruisers was not limited, but the caliber of guns was limited to eight inches. Objection has been raised also to my statement that, by the use of light metals, "the goal is to get warcraft which, weighing but two-thirds as much as if built throughout of steel, can be proportionately larger and more powerful." Doubt has been expressed, and occasionally is still being expressed, as to whether our Navy Department had set such a goal. It had. The fact was as stated.

New York, January 12 SILAS BENT

What Made These Women "Modern"?

The eighth article in the series of personal revelations by well-known women will appear next week. If you have missed the first seven, mail this announcement and seventy-five cents. John B. Watson, behaviorist, and Beatrice M. Hinkle, psychoanalyst, will point out in The Nation the significance of the anonymous articles.

Books, Music, Plays

Turbines

By MACKNIGHT BLACK

Look, these are all
We have for symbols;
And these are bare
Of thought and pain and hope,
Yet heavy with another bloom
Like trees of paradise;
For they lay hold
On soil of time and space
Unwatered by our dream;
And they are near
To motion that fore-ran
Our flesh; and they are solitary, strong;
And from the steel how splendidly
They lift their buds
Of doom transcended and complete.

First Glance

THE history of American literature may be written in as many ways as there are persons to write it. It may be written as a series of aesthetic judgments upon authors selected by the historian on the basis of what seems to him their abstract excellence; and this, in spite of all that has been said against critics who did the thing feebly, is not a bad method. Or it may be written, as fashion now dictates, in the light of philosophical and sociological generalizations. American literature, that is to say, may be studied in relation to American life; and one's attitude toward such studies will be determined by one's notion of the importance either of literature to life or of life to literature.

Historically considered, the American people are probably most interesting when viewed as pioneers—as people who over a period of three centuries devoted practically all of their energies to the task of rushing in and filling the vacuum of the American scene. Here was a continent with two seaboards, two neighboring mountain ranges, and a vast level space between. There, chiefly in Europe, were people to occupy this land; and occupy it they did, bringing with them as much of their culture as they could carry, dropping, once they were here, as much of it as they thought they did not need, and developing new ideas, new morals, as the pressure from their new environment increased. The story of the physical movement of peoples westward over the Alleghenies, across the prairies and the plains, and over the Rockies to the sea is of course interesting. The story of what happened to their minds as they moved may be more interesting still. At any rate this is the story that students of American literature are telling today.

Two such students simultaneously publish treatises dealing with the frontier as it has affected the written word. Dorothy Anne Dondore in "The Prairie and the Making of Middle America: Four Centuries of Description" (Cedar Rapids, Iowa: The Torch Press: $4.50) attempts to digest all of the pages poured out by man, European or American, describing the great central plain between the Alleghenies and the Rockies and between the Great Lakes and the Gulf. She begins with a vision of this plain which leads a reader to suppose that she will do something rather handsome by it—that she will at least keep its outlines clear while men move over it and report their impressions. She ends by being far from clear; her material, of which she has oceans, swamps her because she has never quite decided what description is. Is it landscape painting merely? It might be, and on that basis Miss Dondore could have written a delightful book. Or is it social criticism too? Miss Dondore seems to think it is, as indeed it may be; but, lacking a certain philosophical equipment, she fails in the task of generalization and so fails to write a significant book. It is to be sure a useful one, particularly in the quotations and the bibliographies, which are the result of long labor.

Lucy Lockwood Hazard's "The Frontier in American Literature" (Crowell: $2.75) is better all around, though it is far from satisfactory. Miss Hazard has a very definite notion of what pioneers are and of what frontiers mean to the mind. She traces with no little acuteness the extension of intolerant optimism from New England and the earliest South to all of the successive borders as civilization stepped westward. She knows, now the physical frontier is gone, that we have turned in upon ourselves, and that we have not the least idea what to do with the unformed spiritual forces we find there. One of her best sections is that in which she makes Mark Twain, "son and satirist of the Gilded Age," the middle man between, say, Emerson and Dreiser. All this is good. But there is little meaning in her insistence, shrilled against a straw man who seems to be a composite of Waldo Frank, Van Wyck Brooks, and Lewis Mumford, that an era of "spiritual pioneering" now awaits us. Her straw man seems to say that we have done—thank God—with frontiers. She, while quite as glad as he of the change that has come over us, wants to call the new line of thought simply another frontier. But to do so destroys the value of the word frontier, which means something geographical or means nothing at all. Thought, to be sure, faces the dark unknown; but it always did, and it does so now in other places than America. What should have been the most stimulating portion of Miss Hazard's book becomes merely a tour de force of definition.

MARK VAN DOREN

"Copey"

The Copeland Reader: An Anthology of English Poetry and Prose. Chosen and Edited by Charles Townsend Copeland. Charles Scribner's Sons. $10.

EVERY anthology is a personal affair. "The Golden Treasury" is Palgrave. The Oxford "Books" are Quiller-Couch. Of course, a book must be made by one man, no matter how many assistants he has or what authoritative title he lurks behind. I remember no anthology so avowedly personal as Copeland's book and I know of nobody so well qualified to make so personal an anthology.

Copeland puts together the things that he has read aloud to students and general audiences. The selections range from the Bible to Ring Lardner. As a collection of literary masterpieces, a string of pearls, a garland of flowers, it is a good anthology, a two-inch book-shelf. Anybody could make such a book out of the classics of the world which are within arm's length of any reader who has a fairly good library. But no other man's selection would be like Copeland's. Not only because men differ and we choose according to our tastes. There is a special difference. Copeland's selections are all vocal, all orally readable. If you say that all good poetry and prose is "vocalizable," try some of the unquestionably great passages from Carlyle, Ruskin, Henry James—and then send for a throat specialist.

This is Copeland's secret as reader in public, as teacher of composition, as appreciater and imparter to others of appreciation of literature: the sense of words as primarily spoken and secondarily written. He felt phonetics while the professional phoneticians had their eyes on printed pages. Since his anthology is so declaratively individual, he invites us to make any personal comment that we who know him choose to make. And any comment must be so favorable that even his best friends, of whom there are about ten thousand, will not object to anything one says about him.

He is not an actor, not a leather-lunged "elocutionist," not a singer, not a poet, not a scholar in the profoundly erudite sense. But he learned, so far as I know all by myself, to develop in a not very robust body a voice that an actor might envy. He hated histrionics, never made a gesture, but sitting perfectly still would with his voice dramatize any drama. He did not sing. But I have often sat on the side-lines watching or painfully hearing teachers of singing try to make pupils understand what a song was about and what the voice is for, and I have silently said, being neither singer nor speaker but only listener: "I wish to God they would get Copey to show them how to project the voice and what the values are of vowels and rhythms . . . and Oh, I don't know, whatever it is that these singers haven't got and he has."

Copeland would read John Anderson, My Jo, and make you cry. And if the churches really want to make people believe in the Bible, they had better elect him a sort of lay bishop. But of course that would choke and kill him. It is odd enough to read that he is now Boylston Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory. He despises both rhetoric and oratory. I will agree to set him an examination on questions out of his predecessor, Adams Hill, and flunk him. And if he ever orates I will have him mobbed and sent to Congress. As a scholar he is out of luck. Kittredge can lick him hands down. Copeland is not in the least interested in the final "e's" of Chaucer. He has been too busy learning the voluptuous sequences of all the vowels in Keats. He is not a poet. If he ever tried to write verse, there is no printed evidence of it. He is an interpreter of poetry. And of prose.

Here perhaps is our one quarrel with him. Why did he not write more? I once offended him by asking him that. I even accused him of writing too little and talking too much. It was simply a disciple's enthusiasm gone tactlessly wrong. Copeland writes well when he writes at all. The bits of criticism in his introduction to the present volume are excellent but tantalizingly brief and few. Like his occasional Atlantic Monthly papers and his biographical and appreciative notes on the men of letters whom he has edited, these critical flashes reveal a fine literary spirit which has too seldom expressed itself in written words. Copeland has preferred to speak. And he has spoken for thirty years to all of us graduates of Harvard—a great university, but there are those who love it—all of us who tried to be writers and many more who simply tried to be readers and moderately literate.

For Copeland is a teacher. He had the knack, when he was only a young instructor, of getting boys interested in interesting books. He did not preach but enacted the idea that literature is amusing and delightful. He cajoled you into liking things by reading them aloud and proving to you how good they were. He had what I think is the right dope about teaching composition. Read a theme aloud and hear how it sounds. The pupil will know, if he will ever know anything, whether he has made a fool of himself or has turned a good phrase. And Copeland had this great essential art of the teacher: he was never aloof but always one of the boys, dignified and exclusive when he had work to do and did not wish to be bothered, but always good at boyish give and take. We of the Lampoon, thirty years ago, used to rag the life out of him. And he ragged back, enjoying it hugely.

He was an instinctive artist, and his creative work lies largely, generously in the work of younger men whom he taught. I apologize for speaking of him in the past, but my mind runs back to cub undergraduate days when I was struggling with sentences and he was giving me sharp, sometimes caustic tips about how not to make a sentence or a grunt of approval when a sentence seemed to slide easily. I learned more from him about writing and reading than from any other professional teacher of English. The reason, I think, is simply this—the selective principle of his book—that words are not written signs but spoken vitalities with a human voice behind them.

JOHN MACY

Significant Ugliness

The Case of Mr. Crump. By Ludwig Lewisohn. Paris: Edward Titus. $10.

MR. LEWISOHN'S hideously powerful novel is a story of the unequal conflict between a creative artist and the vulgar entanglements of his disordered life. Herbert Crump, a promising young composer, comes from his quiet home in a little Southern city to the sordid loneliness of a New York boarding house and there, in the bleakness of his spirits and without realizing the extent to which he is committing himself, drifts into an alliance with a vulgar woman standing upon the brink of middle age. Almost before he knows what has happened she is making vast and terrible assumptions. She will divorce her worthless husband and Crump—has he not showed that "he loves her"?—will, of course, be glad to assume the responsibility for her sprawling children and her grotesque old mother. Stunned, he flees to his home to consider his predicament, and in a short time she is upon him—smiling, affectionate, but inexorable. To his parents, much as they instinctively dislike her, her version of the story is correct. Herbert has "broken up her home"; for him she has abandoned her husband; and his duty is clear. He, realizing that the world would judge him, at best, no more favorably than his father and mother, yields to his fate; and the rest of his life up to the time of the catastrophe which closes his story is the struggle, every year more intolerable, with a woman who meets his every effort to extricate himself with a tighter grip and franker, more desperate determination to hold what is her own.

It is upon the portrait, physical and spiritual, of Mrs. Crump that the novelist centers his effort, and it is indeed her book. Beginning with a description in a tone of half-detached irony of her and her antecedents, it gradually increases in power and ferocity as it describes the increasing sluttishness of her personal habits and the increasing meanness of her soul. No disgusting detail of her physical decline is omitted and no aspect of the tortuous process of her mind is left unanalyzed, until she at last stands forth a figure at once monstrous yet credible. In spite of the increasingly preposterous disparity between their ages and the violent incompatibility of their temperament she clings to him for various reasons—because she needs his meager earnings for the support of herself and her family, because she needs his growing fame for her position in life, and because she needs his body for the satisfaction of the last desperate flicker of her passions. Yet these reasons are not the only or the worst ones. There is, in addition, a dumb, relentless possessiveness, a stubborn unreachable inexorability, a determination to revenge herself upon her husband for the unhappiness of her life, which is terrifying in its intensity. To him her malignity, so impersonal and incalculable, becomes almost a symbol of that mysterious evil of the universe which nothing can reach or placate, and through him she becomes, for the reader also, sinister in her inhumanity. Without that touch of almost insane malignity she would be, for all her meanness, grotesquely pitiful, but because of it pity is drowned in fear.

By reason of its bitterness, its frankness, and its almost brutal directness, Mr. Lewisohn's book challenges comparison with various other ultra-modern novels, but it is set apart from them all by two faiths—the one artistic, the other moral—that its author has managed to retain. Unlike so many of his fellows he still believes in the power of standard English, composed with complete, syntactically clear sentences and arranged in orderly paragraphs, to express the full force of whatever thoughts or feelings the most chaotic situation can call forth, and unlike so many more others he still retains a perhaps romantic faith in the ultimate importance of certain fixed values in the world of ethics. Because of the first his novel has a beauty of form which only throws into sharper relief the hideousness of its material, and because of the second it gives the effect not of complete futility but of something won in a battle of good against evil.

When Crump, goaded at last to madness, struck his wife down and saw that she was dead a certain calmness came over him:

> Quietly he went to the window and opened it and looked up at the stars. If the universe was a mere mechanism and we but accidental crawlers on this planet's crust, neither deeds done nor undone mattered and love and hate and cruelty and mercy and rancor and justice were indisguishably one. But if this were not so, if—were it only by a slow process of becoming—the universe strove, like man himself, for values beyond the dust, then he had helped to reestablish the shaken moral equilibrium of the world, to save cosmos from chaos, to make justice prevail.

A little earlier he had wondered at this tendency of his "to ally his small troubles to the eternal nature of things and to drag the universe into his tiny conflicts." He had amusedly considered how difficult it was for a man, riding in the smoker of a Pullman car and dressed in a Kuppenheimer suit, to conceive himself as the protagonist in the universal drama. Yet it is just this power to project himself upon the universe, to see his struggle as the struggle of evil against good, which sets the spiritual tone of the book. Perhaps it is merely a romantic delusion, but, delusion or not, it is still capable of an effectiveness in art, for it gives to the hero his dignity and lends to his story something of the elevation of tragedy. Perhaps Mr. Lewisohn is the only man alive capable of writing such a book and capable at the same time of maintaining that the world which it describes is something more than sound and fury.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Reintroducing Tom Thumb

Thiers and the French Monarchy (1797-1848). By John M. Allison. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

LOUIS ADOLPHE THIERS, journalist, historian, twice Premier under Louis Philippe, and first President of the Third French Republic (1870-73), had, beyond dispute, one good quality: an immense, never-wearied diligence. Apart from that respectable quality, he was physically, mentally, and morally a veritable Tom Thumb of statesmanship—one of the smallest successful men that ever lived. The greatest critical genius of the nineteenth century, in a pamphlet justly admired and praised by G. B. Shaw, calls him, after the incident of the Commune, "the realization of Voltaire's idea of an ape turned tiger—that bootblack of the first Napoleon—that pitiful manikin, incapable of making a respectable figure outside of the artificial atmosphere of parliamentary chicanery—that past master of petty parliamentary knaveries and wire-pullings." His own countryman, a Parisian capitalist of philanthropic tendencies, told him publicly in 1871: "It has always been the chiefest aim of your life to set capital and labor by the ears." So it would seem that the only charity bestowable upon the memory of such a man would be the mercy of silence. These stigmata, however, were inflicted upon Monsieur Thiers in his extreme old age. Professor Allison fancies that he can make him impressive by an account of his youth and middle age.

He has made nothing of the French Tom Thumb, but he has succeeded in throwing many curious sidelights upon the history of the Restoration and the period of the Citizen-King. What, indeed, could he have made of a statesman with no abilities beyond a gift of wire-pulling and forensic chicanery? A statesman so incredibly inept as to inveigh in his young manhood, before assembled Parliament, against the railroads, newly introduced in England and on the Continent, as pernicious, useless, dangerous; a Liberal defending the worst abuses of the Catholic hierarchy on the plea "that the church teaches obedience to the constituted authorities and the salutariness of suffering"; an enemy of King Bomba, who in his own old age bombarded Paris; a mellifluous, Bryan-like Man of Peace, whose armies slaughtered 20,000 insurrected Frenchmen—such a man cannot be lifted, fifty years after his death, upon a pedestal of glory by any effort of Boswellian loyalty, however well intended. For all that, Professor Allison's biography is a noteworthy item of academic research—both the work itself and the bibliographic appendices afford ample evidence of his circumspect scholarship.

JAMES FUCHS

Teaching Adults to Read

Libraries and Adult Education. By J. T. Jennings and Others. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The University Afield. By Alfred L. Hall-Quest. The Macmillan Company. $3.

Correspondence Schools, Lyceums, Chautauquas. By John S. Noffsinger. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

New Schools for Older Students. By Nathaniel Peffer. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The Meaning of Adult Education. By Eduard C. Lindeman. New Republic. $1.

Education for Adults and Other Essays. By Frederick Paul Keppel. Columbia University Press.

INDICATIONS are that adult education will be quite the thing this year for pedagogical chatter. Within a few months some eight or nine volumes bearing on the theme have issued from the press. Each in a different way attempts to make the subject more inclusive, so that this cumulation of inclusiveness compels the inference that adult education is regarded as comprising everything in life from puberty to senility, with liberal extensions across the borders at either extreme. The exact scope of adult education was not clear before these books appeared; now it has been dropped into a London fog.

Something over two years ago the American Library Association decided to study the possibilities of the library as an agency for adult education. Had the association been permitted to proceed in its natural state of stimulating poverty, something of worth might have resulted. Unfortunately, the project caught the fancy of the Carnegie Foundation and a few money bags were opened so as to make the investigation indecently elaborate. At touch of Carnegie's magic wand, five substantial tomes have appeared in the twinkling of an eye and an association has been created to do more producing.

Four of the volumes are here considered. "Libraries and Adult Education" reports what libraries are doing to get books to the reader. It is a study in library science. "The University Afield" relates the wonders accomplished by extension and correspondence courses. It is primarily a treatise on the removal of deficiencies from those who went into professional work with inadequate preparation—a thing which, let it be hoped, the coming generation will not repeat. "Correspondence Schools, Lyceums, Chautauquas" exposes the quackery by which mail-order houses distribute doctorates in philosophy and chiropractic; it also performs a lively autopsy upon two once-famous institutions of near-learning. "New Schools for Older Students" is devoted to non-utilitarian education for adults. "The Meaning of Adult Education"—not of the Carnegie group—protests the failure of American colleges to impart real education and, at the same time, breathes "a hope that some day education might be brought out of college halls into the lives of the people who do the work of the world." Mr. Keppel's volume of essays touches the subject chiefly in its title.

Here is a great mass of writing on adult education which, collectively, is of uncertain worth to those who are really interested in the subject. Most of the authors see only transient and relatively unimportant phases. Teaching an old man to read is, in a sense, the education of an adult; but in a much more vital sense it is merely elementary education deferred. Removing illiteracy, Americanizing foreigners, conducting open forums, carrying the university in diluted form to those who should have attended the university, and damning American colleges en masse—these are types of sport that should not be put upon one program unless the purpose be to stage a battle-royal and have them destroy one another.

Mr. Peffer, it would seem, comes closest to the bull's-eye. There is a feeling in this country, especially among those who live in the suburbs of intellectual America, that all citizens should be required to partake of the intellectual life. Mr. Peffer points out the danger of making this endeavor a form of uplift, and then himself tumbles into the very pit against which he has warned others. He grows hot for rescuing "the great sodden middle class—college graduates, owners of $3,000 cars, members of country clubs," all of whom, he doubtless wishes to imply, have no brains at all. But before any concerted effort is made to rescue these people, a few pertinent questions should be answered. Apparently none of the writers here considered possesses the courage or vision essential to this preliminary task.

Allow that a large part of the people show no inclination to lead intellectual lives, and it may be found that the fault, in its entirety, can be traced to inadequate schooling. If so, the problem becomes one of elementary, not adult, education. Again —and this is more important—what evidence has so far been adduced to prove that a large part of the people cannot be happier as individuals and more useful as citizens if permitted to own $3,000 cars, belong to country clubs, and talk golf than if they should be transformed into collectors of first editions and members of Browning societies who will take to talking adult education?

H. E. Buchholz

Books in Brief

The Days of My Life. By Rider Haggard. Longmans, Green and Company. Two Volumes. $7.50.

Who has ever forgotten his first reading of "King Solomon's Mines" and "She" and "Allan Quatermain"? Who has any respect for the present fashionable scorn of Rider Haggard? He may not be Dumas; but neither (praise be) is he Stevenson or even Sabatini. He has no brains and he has no style; but unlike Stevenson and Sabatini and Stanley Weyman he caught the very spirit of the romance of adolescence. In actual fact he was a hard-working investigator of agricultural England. His reminiscences proceed in a dull pedestrian account of his life and his meeting with various literary bigwigs. His style once occasioned one of George Moore's most amusing ribaldries. Yet his novels hold the very dream of adolescence: the war of white adventurers with yowling savages; the love for white adventurers given by dazzling queens who reign in secret hinterland cities; all the nostalgia for a lost Atlantis which is the portion of very young youth. His imitators (like Pierre Benoit) are distressing hacks. His superiors (like Edward Lucas White) have written just one good book such as "Andivius Hedulio." Unlike Stevenson he is not beloved by professors. His gigantic dreams remain.

The Two Sisters. By H. E. Bates. The Viking Press. $2.

This first novel is a work of power, although the power is unevenly applied. It has moments of beauty and insight, and the contrasted temperaments which give the story momentum are analyzed discerningly. In style, however, it lacks the assured crescendo which its material demands—a rhythm which escapes definition and which the author no doubt will acquire with greater experience.

Music

A True Professional and Some True Amateurs

IT is difficult to compress within a brief paragraph Mr. Harold Samuel's revelations of Bach in particular and of piano playing in general. Still more so is it to analyze in detail six programs—one a day—containing no repeats and covering some thirty-eight works of Bach, excluding encores. It was a stupendous feat of artistry even more than of memory and endurance; for to leave one refreshed after even a single program devoted to but one composer is a tour de force. To do so after six such programs, as Mr. Samuel did, is a miracle. He did it, perhaps, by letting Bach speak for himself. Through the medium of a tone equally singing and alive in both hands, an extraordinary rhythmic vitality, and that independence of finger which only Bach can give, Mr. Samuel has brought piano playing back from a mannered and exaggerated utterance to a simple, natural, and beautifully articulated speech. Hearing Bach in this way one has the actual and constant impression of hearing Bach's music as Bach, too, heard it. That such a sane and pure musical expression has become once more a spiritual force among laymen as well as among musicians we owe indeed largely to the sane and pure art of Harold Samuel himself.

The MacDowell Foundation has fostered some of the best American art of late years. It has done this by maintaining a studio colony in the woods of New Hampshire—Peterborough, to be exact—where the artist of proved creative ability can work undisturbed for a nominal sum, and where he can escape alike the terror of the noisy summer boarder and the burden of the householder. To keep up this practical idealism—more necessary than ever now with our New England farm houses asking de luxe prices—the foundation must have money. And it was for this purpose that Messrs. Downes, Erskine, and Urchs courageously offered their respective talents for two concerts of which the program was the same. Their offer was accepted joyously, even at five dollars a ticket; and Steinway Hall must have chuckled to itself to see musical celebrities jostling important music patrons in their eagerness to hear the music critic of the New York Times, the author of "Helen of Troy" and "Galahad," and a member of the House of Steinway make their first public debut as pianists. Even such important dailies as the Times, the Herald Tribune, and the World turned over their music departments for the occasion to such amateur critics as Josef Hofmann, Ernest Hutcheson, and George Gershwin, respectively. It was the professional's turn to take his holiday, and a grin of anticipation greeted Messrs. Downes and Erskine, the first to be sacrificed. Only the professional critics looked unhappy. But then they had more at stake! Mr. Erskine immediately furnished "dramatic foreshadowing" by a witty and sincere plea for the "true amateur" and his place in the world; but the audience heeded not. It did not heed even when author and critic, plunged, with an almost professional authority, into the Brahms-Haydn Variations for two pianos; the grin still persisted. As the two progressed, however, it began to fade. By the time Mr. Erskine had finished the next number—Mozart's "Coronation" concerto—it was barely perceptible. Mr. Erskine had given a most exquisite performance to a most sympathetic accompaniment by his sister. And it was a sober-faced audience indeed, livened only by some happy looking critics, that greeted Ernest Urchs when he joined his colleagues for Bach's triple piano concerto. As one auditor expressed it, "I thought they would play so badly that it would be funny. But they played so well I couldn't even laugh."

The joke was indeed on the audience, and the MacDowell Foundation was the richer therefor by $2,500. As Ernest Hutcheson summed it up in his criticism for the Herald Tribune: "The significance of the afternoon lay perhaps in the demonstration that even the busiest men find time in the hurry and worry of modern life to foster their artistic instincts and turn them to excellent use." But for this much credit should be given to Ernest Hutcheson himself. Himself one of the "busiest of men," he nevertheless found time to coach the trio and to do it so thoroughly and intelligently that, with only one month of practice and rehearsals, three men, of whom two had not practiced for years up to date, could make the world safe—in one corner, at least—for amateurs.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

Drama

Intelligence vs. Intensity

DURING the past few seasons our theater has not concerned itself much with the drawing-room. Somehow or other it seems to have lost interest in the sedulous elegance which Pinero and Jones made popular, and whatever it may have become it is no longer "polite." One may, for example, search the dramatis personae of the five American plays which Mr. Burns Mantle chose as the best of the last dramatic year without finding a lady or a gentleman among them, and Mr. Mantle's list is typical. Our chosen scenes are the battlefield, the boiler room, and the dive; our chosen characters the roustabout, the bootlegger, and the roughneck. Sometimes we rise to the social height of Babbitt and lay our scene in the suburban villa or the farmhouse kitchen, and sometimes we study the ways of our grandmothers in the night clubs, but we have given up "society" as a bad job. Robust is our favorite adjective, and strength, not refinement, the quality which we most admire; for the serious as well as the popular dramatist seeks a large action, picturesque scenes, and violent contrasts. Under the spell of a new and masculine romanticism he disdains the members of a more or less fixed order upon whose tragedies, even, a certain decorum is imposed; he prefers the milieu in which anything from explosive profanity to wholesale carnage may occur.

With this tradition I have no particular quarrel. At its best the drama produced under its influence keeps us aware of the infinite variety of life and it is symptomatic of the growing and healthy tendency to seek the meaning of contemporary existence not upon its surface only but in its swarming depths. Yet the appearance of a "polite" play as nearly first-rate as "Lady Alone" (Forrest Theater) serves to remind one how effective another and neglected genre can be. Here is a drama confined within a definite framework and concerned with a society in which certain things are not done. The choices open to its characters and hence the possibilities of its action are definitely limited by the traditions of "good society"; the primitive impulses of humanity cannot here express themselves directly; and one is perfectly sure that no character could conceivably cut the knot. Certain artificial restraints have become more powerful than natural impulse, and what one gets as a result is not merely the charm of which an orderly society is capable but a particular kind of drama as well. For the excitement of the pitched battle is substituted the interest of a game played according to rules.

The end of such a game may be tragic, but in one important respect its premises are always the premises of comedy. One does not, that is to say, expect of its protagonists heroic actions or spectacular virtues. One does not even expect them to go to the bottom of things, and one realizes that their problem is the problem of compromise—of how to adjust their lives not to Truth or Virtue but to the conventions which they have accepted as fundamental. And so it is in the present play. The heroine, born poor and yet socially elect, is faced with the problem of livelihood. Since she is cast in neither the heroic nor the romantic mold she must solve her problem in a manner consonant with the traditions of her class, and she chooses a convenient marriage. She believes that she has attained the state of mind which makes such a solution possible, that she has risen by means of a clear humorous intellect above the delusions of passion, and that she can play out her life upon the level of comedy—not "selling herself" but merely playing fair with a man who happens to love her and whom she genuinely likes. But the considerations which she had definitely ruled out intrude themselves, a romantic love springs up between her and another man, and upon that love her life is wrecked. Here are no tumultuous passions or great actions but a story which, as worked out with great delicacy and verisimilitude, affords an absorbing study of the conflict between natural impulse and the fixed traditions of a society.

By the standard of our moralist plays the young lady concerned should doubtless have learned stenography as soon as she was old enough to realize her predicament, but it is just the function of drawing-room drama to concern itself with those characters of whom nothing fundamental is to be expected. And judged by the standards of such drama the tragic guilt of the heroine lay not so much in her failure to find means of supporting herself as in her inability to maintain the role which she had assumed. We watch the disintegration not of moral character but of self-control. High comedy demands the continual subordination of emotion; our heroine went down in defeat because she allowed drama—emotion—to enter her life. Incapable of the reorganization of her life which poverty would have suggested to the more robust spirits, she was incapable also of that steadfastness which alone can make mere discretion successful. To master the passions is to achieve one kind of success, to obey them is to achieve another; but they will not be dallied with.

Doubtless much of the charm as well as much of the force in the present drama depends upon the skilful playing of Miss Alice Brady, whose increasing expertness has been made manifest in a whole series of recent plays. She has neither the conventional beauty nor any of the irritating artificialities which mark the usual popular star, but there is a delicate assurance in her playing equaled by no other contemporary actress. She is no mere "personality" displaying herself in this role or that, and yet in each of her interpretations there is a certain constant element of engaging and ingratiating charm. No one could have conveyed better than she the mingled intelligence and intensity which is the soul of her part in the present play.

In "Praying Curve" (Eltinge Theater) Martin Brown, remembered faintly for "The Great Music" of two seasons ago, makes another effort at melodrama thinly disguised as "significance." This time it is about a dope fiend who was regenerated by life in the great open spaces, and it is pretty bad. "Damn the Tears" (Garrick Theater) is an expressionistic play strikingly set by Norman Bel Geddes and marked by some vivid individual scenes; but its general intention remained, to me at least, obscure. The comic genius of Sam Bernard succeeds in making amusing the musical comedy "I Told You So" (Royal Theater), which has little more than good dancing to recommend it.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

International Relations Section

The South African Color Problem

By R. F. ALFRED HOERNLE

THE South African color problem cannot be understood without a glance at its background.

There is, first, the population factor. The results of the 1926 census are not yet available, but the following figures may be taken as approximately accurate:

Europeans	1,700,000
Natives	5,210,000
Asiatics	170,000
"Colored"	560,000

By "Asiatics" are meant natives of India, originally introduced as indentured laborers for the sugar plantations in Natal, where they now outnumber the white population (145,000). That the treatment of these Asiatics is a grave source of friction between India and South Africa is well-known, but it does not enter into our present problem.

The term "Colored," or, more precisely, "Cape Colored," covers a mixed group, consisting partly of Malays (who came to the Cape in the old days from the Dutch East Indies), but chiefly of descendants of the early white settlers and the Hottentots. The Hottentots are a light-colored people, remnants of which still exist in South West Africa. They were the inhabitants of the Cape when the Dutch established themselves there. They are not to be confused with the "Natives." To this "Colored" group belong also a few mulattoes, i.e., the offspring of whites and Natives. The "colored" population is in all respects at least as civilized as the lowest strata of the white population.

The term "Natives" covers all the tribes generally called "Kaffirs," or, better, "Bantu" peoples. They are warlike tribes who appear to have come from the North, pushing down the East Coast into the Eastern Cape Colony, and across the continent, through Rhodesia, into South West Africa (Ovambos). They outnumber the white population in the proportion of 3 to 1. They are South Africa's "Native problem."

The problem does not consist in any danger of their swamping the whites by sheer natural increase of numbers. This is a bogy all too frequently used by an ignorant press to strike terror into an ignorant public. If the birth-rate of the Bantus is high, so also is their death-rate, and especially the infantile death-rate. And census statistics show unanswerably that the rate of increase of the Bantu population is slightly below that of the white population.

The second factor in the problem is the extreme diversity in conditions of life and civilization within the Bantu population. The bulk of that population still lives in reservations under tribal conditions, mostly with communal land tenure; another section lives as squatters, tenants, or servants on farms owned by whites; a third group, almost completely detribalized, lives in or near white towns and works for wages; a small group of educated Natives —chiefly teachers, ministers of religion, clerks, independent farmers—has completely outgrown tribal conditions and lives according to white standards so far as limited means permit.

It is obvious that any uniform Native policy will bear very unequally on these different classes of Natives, and that a policy which is good for the "raw" Native in his tribe, may be very unjust in its application to his detribalized, and still more to his civilized, brother.

The third factor is land. Between 86 and 87 per cent of the land is owned by the 1,700,000 whites; only 13 to 14 per cent by the 5,210,000 Natives. Yet the Natives' economy rests on cattle and maize, and access to the land is their crying need. The reservations are overcrowded with humans and overstocked with cattle, and cannot in general support the population within them. Hence at any one time as much as half the able-bodied male population in certain districts is likely to be away, working for wages in the white man's towns, mines, and factories. From domestic service down, Natives do almost all the manual work, unskilled and semi-skilled, in the Union, wages ranging from £3 to £5 per month.

The last and most important factor in the background is a profound division on policy among the whites. More than thirty years ago Cecil Rhodes laid down the policy: "Equal rights for every civilized man south of the Zambesi." No doubt it was an easy principle to lay down in days when the "civilized" man who was not white was a rare exception. But it established a noble tradition, in accordance with which the Cape Colony admitted to equal franchise with the whites not only colored men, but also Natives provided they could meet the fairly low educational and property qualifications which were held to define the minimum of civilization. The three Northern provinces —Transvaal, Orange Free State, Natal—set their faces in the opposite direction, excluding both Colored and Native in principle from any access to equal rights. When the Union was established, these two policies fought a drawn battle. The existing rights of Natives were explicitly safeguarded in the Cape, but it was no less explicitly laid down that they were not to be extended to the North.

It is against this background that the Native policy of General Hertzog's South African Government has to be judged. The policy has been formulated in four bills which were published in June, 1926, in order to give a year's time for discussion and the education of public opinion before the debates in Parliament. The general aim of all four bills is to introduce a uniform Native policy for the whole of the Union.

It is a policy of segregation, keeping the white race and the black race as far as possible apart. Its professed aims are to reduce to a minimum the existing causes of racial friction and conflict and to secure to each race, black no less than white, the opportunity for development in accordance with its own genius and traditions. The black man is not to be made over into an inferior edition of the white man, but is to be allowed and encouraged to develop along his own lines, assimilating, as he does so, what he can and what he needs of the white man's civilization. The white man, on the other hand, is to be protected in his standard of life against the economic competition of the black man in the labor market, and in his politics against the menace of a huge preponderance of black voters.

In some such colors as these the aims of the new policy are painted by some of the enthusiastic young idealists who have been trying to prepare the soil of popular opinion for the reception of the new policy. But no eloquence can hide the fact that in principle the policy of segregation amounts to a victory of the North (Transvaal) over the South (Cape). For segregation, whatever opportunities and rights it may establish for the Native, does in fact spell exclusion from that organic incorporation in the white man's society to which Rhodes's principle had taught him to aspire.

Segregation has four aspects.

There is social, or, more precisely, sexual segregation, i.e., the prevention of sexual intercourse between members of the two races, whether by lawful matrimony or otherwise. The Minister of Justice, Mr. Tielman Roos, is understood to be drafting a bill to make all sexual intercourse between black and white a criminal offense.

Next, there is economic segregation. This means that the law is to exclude Natives from certain skilled trades which are thereby automatically reserved for Whites. Early in 1926 the notorious "Color Bar" bill was passed to give effect to this principle. So far it has been used only to legalize a color bar which had been in practice in the gold mines for many years. But the sting of the law lies in that it gives the Minister of Labor power by mere proclamation to apply the color bar, i.e., to exclude Natives from any trade in which, in the Minister's opinion, the interests of the white workers require such a step. Potentially, therefore, the bill is a weapon for stopping economic competition and intrenching white labor in an aristocracy of skilled trades. Incidentally, in proportion as it is applied, it keeps the Native down to the wages of unskilled or semi-skilled labor, and thus perpetuates his poverty, which is the chief obstacle to the rise of vigorous industries in South Africa. At present the bill has done no specific harm beyond filling the Natives with suspicion and alarm. But it clearly opens the door to tyrannical and irresponsible abuse of power. It is supposed to be the price which Hertzog had to pay in advance to the Labor Party, on whose support his Government rests.

Thirdly, there is political segregation, i.e., a separate franchise for Natives and separate provision for the expression of their will. And, lastly, there is territorial segregation, i.e., a division of land, checkerboard-fashion, between white and black ownership. It is with these last two aspects of segregation that General Hertzog's four bills deal. They are the crucial aspects.

Three of the four bills are devoted to provisions for representation and franchise. The first of these confirms the Colored population at the Cape in its possession of the European franchise, and extends the same privilege to the Colored residents in the three Northern provinces who, at present, are there excluded from the vote even though they may have exercised it at the Cape. In other words, the bill proposes that the colored man who can meet the same electoral qualifications which the white man must meet shall be included in the same voters' list, and vote for the same candidates as the white voters.

Of the remaining two bills, both of which apply only to Natives, one sets up a Native Council for the Union, and the other establishes a separate Native franchise and separate representation in Parliament. These bills are the substitute which General Hertzog offers for the taking away of the Native franchise at present existing in the Cape Colony.

The Native Council is to meet once a year, and to consist of fifty members, under the chairmanship of a white official who is given somewhat autocratic control over its proceedings. In other ways, too, government control of the Council is intrenched. Fifteen members are to be directly nominated by the Government, thirty-five are to be elected by Natives, nominated by government. Thus indirectly even the elected members will be government nominees. The functions of the Council are purely deliberative and advisory. There is, indeed, a clause giving the Council power to pass ordinances binding only on Natives. But such ordinances can deal only with matters, if any, delegated to the Council by future acts of Parliament; the Council cannot initiate them—they must be proposed by the Minister for Native Affairs, and they require to be approved by the Governor General after they have been passed. In practice, a power so hedged about is not likely ever to be exercised. The Council may be of minor use in ventilating Native opinion, but even this restricted function would be discharged better if its members were freely elected.

After providing for the abolition of the present Native franchise at the Cape, the Native Franchise bill proposes that the country be divided into seven areas, the Native inhabitants of each of which are to be represented by one White member in Parliament. The electors are to be the same government nominees who form also the electorate for the Native Council, and are expected to consist of chiefs and headmen of tribes, members of local native councils, and prominent individual natives. The number of these electors, their qualifications, the manner of their nomination, etc., are left undefined in the bill. Clearly, the Government has every power to "rig" the electorate to suit itself. It is to be remembered, further, that some of the electoral areas will be huge (e.g., the 276,966 square miles of the Cape Colony will be divided into only two areas), and it is difficult to see how electors scattered over such an area can choose intelligently among the candidates nominated for election. The seven representatives of the Natives in Parliament cannot sit, speak, or vote on any motion proposing any alteration in the provisions of this Franchise bill, and they cannot vote on any motion of "No Confidence," unless such motion should deal with matters touching Native interests, as detailed in a schedule to the bill. On such terms, it is clear that seven representatives for over 5,000,000 human beings can do little to prevent legislation adverse to Native welfare or to obtain fair treatment for the Natives in such matters as taxation (especially indirect taxation through the customs) or education. They will require to be men of exceptional personality to gain the ear of the House or carry any weight. The chances seem to be rather that the Government incidentally to its control of the electoral body will push upon the Natives candidates who will dance to its piping.

Why does General Hertzog, who is generally believed to be a fair-minded man and has shown himself more anxious to meet the Natives than ever did General Smuts, put forward such proposals? In his speeches he reiterates two arguments. First, that the Northern provinces are firmly opposed to an extension of the full Cape franchise to the Natives within their borders. This is true, but would, in itself, be a reason rather for a continuation of the present compromise. Second, that the Native vote even now is powerful in most of the fifty-one Cape constituencies; that in the "next forty years" it will grow to such proportions as to compel the Cape representatives to vote for the extension of the Cape Native franchise to the North, thus splitting the Union; and that this growth "would necessarily mean the ruin of the white population and of white civilization in the Union." What are the facts? The number of Native voters in 1926 was 14,182, i.e., about 3 per cent of the total in the Union and less than 10 per cent of the European electorate in the Cape. This total of 14,182 Native voters is an increase of 113 per cent on the total of Native voters in 1910; and, clearly, General Hertzog's fears are based on anticipations of the Native vote doubling itself every fifteen years or so. But there is no good reason to expect this rate of increase to be maintained; and in any case experience has shown that the representatives of districts with a large Native vote are as able and honorable as their colleagues from more purely White districts. It is true, however, that Natives have tended to vote for the South African Party candidates, thinking their interests safer in the hands of that party than in those of General Hertzog's party. Whether this fact has anything to do with General Hertzog's proposals, no man can tell.

If the present Cape Native franchise is continued Native interests, not only at the Cape but throughout the Union, are likely to receive increasing attention and consideration with the growing strength of the Native vote. If General Hertzog's bill becomes law, there is an end, once and for all, to these hopes of Natives exercising an increasingly effective influence on the Government under which they live. For the alternative scheme of representation offered to them is one which in practice is likely to prove potent only for the mild voicing of complaints and desires, but impotent for securing any effective redress or satisfaction. As regards "ruin to white civilization," it has yet to be shown that the civilized Native is a danger rather than an asset. If he is a danger, it is not because he is civilized, but because, being civilized, he finds himself shut out from the opportunities and rights of other civilized men.

Last of all comes the question of territorial segregation, that is, land. Prior to 1913, the Natives were protected in the possession of their reservations and in addition they were free to buy land outside them in the open market. The Native Land Act of 1913 was a first attempt at territorial segregation. It sought to divide the land between the blacks and whites by granting additional areas for exclusive Native ownership but prohibiting Natives from acquiring land, except by very special permission, in white areas. Successive commissions and committees have since then been wrestling with the problem of demarcating additional Native areas, but their recommendations have met with so much opposition that no government has cared to enforce them by law. General Hertzog's bill now proposes to continue the existing reservations and to allow Natives to purchase additional land in adjoining areas, which are to be "released" for this purpose. But the wording of the bill appears to imply that these purchases are not to exceed the total area of land which the commissions under the Act of 1913 had proposed to demarcate for exclusive Native ownership. Thus in two ways the new bill worsens the position of the Natives. The former act contained no absolute limitation on the amount of land to be set aside for Natives, and it proposed to make that land accessible to them by legislative grant, whereas the new act offers only permission to purchase in the open market, in competition with white buyers. The South African Native, in general, is desperately poor, and even with the provisions in the bill for a fund to be created in order to assist Native land purchase, it does not look as if the real and urgent need of the Natives for more land could thus be adequately satisfied. Furthermore, if the bill really fixes

The Real Arabian Nights

IF YOU had sat at the Sultan's feet, on the satin cushions of the haremlik, as Scheherazade wove the pattern of these wondrous tales into a many-hued oriental tapestry of words, you would have enjoyed "The Arabian Nights" no more than you will this sumptuous, illustrated limited edition.

For years the translation of Richard Burton has been the last word. But it is no longer. Dr. J. C. Mardrus translated the exotic Eastern tales into French, treating the unblushing, original Arabian text with the deft and delicate touch of a great French artist. From this complete, unexpurgated version, E. Powys Mathers has given us "The Arabian Nights" in English, more complete, more beautiful, more scintillant than it has ever been before.

Privately Printed for Subscribers

Publication of this most complete and authentic edition of the epic of the East brought the highest praise from the British press.

"In the 'THOUSAND AND ONE NIGHTS' the tale after all is the thing, and the tale is better told by Mardrus than by Burton. But let not those who are jealous of every word suppose he has attained this result by the method of a subeditor. For artistic presentment the abhorred shears are not necessary. All the superfluities have also a value. Burton cut out a great deal. The Mardrus version is very much fuller in detail."—The London Times.

LIMITED EDITION—NOW NEARLY EXHAUSTED

Less than 100 sets of the edition remain unsold. Your opportunity to own these books is limited to a very short time.

Each of the handsome volumes on hand-made, watermarked paper. Frontispieces in four colors from Persian illuminations. Sixteen volumes bound in four 6¼" by 9¼" by 2" thick. Bound in French boards. Oriental motif, gold tops, gilt backs, colored end papers.

Mail the coupon for descriptive brochure.

DINGWALL-ROCK, Ltd., Dept. 12
45 West 45th Street New York City

DINGWALL-ROCK, Ltd., Dept. 12
45 West 45th Street, New York City

Gentlemen: Without obligation or cost to me, kindly forward information in detail about "The Real Arabian Nights."

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

once and for all the maximum acreage available to purchase, it will be wrecked by the natural increase of the population.

The question remains, What is to be the status of the numerous Natives at present residing as squatters or labor-tenants or servants in areas reserved for white ownership? It is here that the most serious features of the new land bill come into view. Areas owned by whites, but containing also Native inhabitants, are to be "proclaimed," in order that the Natives in these areas may be dealt with as follows: Such Natives may be either (a) full-time servants of the white farmer, receiving their keep and perhaps a small money-wage; or (b) labor-tenants, bound to render annually 180 days of work (not necessarily continuous) in return for permission to reside and cultivate a strip of land; or (c) squatters, who cultivate a plot in return for a half-share of their produce. The effect of the bill will be to destroy the squatter class, for it imposes on the white farmer a license fee for each squatter so "ferocious" (as General Smuts rightly terms it) that it will not pay him to keep squatters. The squatter, then, must become either a labor-tenant or a servant. For each tenant, too, the farmer will, under the bill, have to pay a license fee, whereas there is no fee for servants. Moreover, the bill gives the right to any farmer who is short of labor to claim that his neighbor has too many tenants. Local boards are to decide on these claims, and if they uphold a claim, the surplus tenants must be shifted to the claimant's farm. Thus the Native labor-tenant has no security of tenure and may be moved about from farm to farm. Obviously the only effective alternative for the Native, and certainly the cheapest for the farmer, is for the former to become a full-time servant, earning for himself little beyond his keep.

This is presumably the price which General Hertzog found himself compelled to pay to his farmer followers, just as the Color Bar Bill was his price to his Labor followers. The Native in a "proclaimed" area will not be wanted as a squatter; he has no security of tenure, even if wanted as a labor-tenant; and if he does not want to become a permanent servant, he is compelled either to move into a Native Reservation ("scheduled" area) already overcrowded, or to purchase land in a "released" area at competitive prices. In fact he will become a servant—for in this grim choice this is his easiest alternative. The effect of the bill can be only to create a large reservoir of Native servants who will be at the white farmers' disposal in return for bare subsistence.

While servants in name, these Natives will be worse off than slaves in fact. They will enjoy all the disadvantages of slavery without any of its advantages. They will not be owned by their masters; the farmer will feel toward them none of the interests and obligations of ownership. Yet he will have them in his power and they will be forced to labor for him. Any Native not working for a farmer will be homeless, and to be homeless in a "proclaimed" area is forbidden.

Clearly, if this bill is passed into law in its present form, it will usher in a period of misfortune for the Native peoples unparalleled in the history of South Africa under white rule. General Hertzog and his advisers would do well to recall, before it is too late, the principles which General Boka laid down when speaking on the Land Act of 1913: "The Native has got as much right in the country as the white man. The white man must do nothing to oppress the Native. In the Union there is no room for oppression; there is room only for justice and good honest legislation."

Contributors to This Issue

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, first Labor Prime Minister of England, is a frequent contributor to The Nation.

ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS is a New York lawyer. He was a member of the counsel for defense in the Scopes evolution trial in Dayton, Tennessee.

KWEI CHEN is a student at the University of Nebraska. His story is true.

LORD OLIVIER, Governor of Jamaica, B. W. I., from 1907 to 1913, was Secretary of State for India in the British Labor Government. He is the author of "White Capital and Colored Labor."

VALESKA BARI bases her article on four years' experience with the California Industrial Welfare Commission and five years with the Federal Department of Labor.

ELBERT PEETS is an architect and writer on architectural subjects. He is coauthor with Werner Hageman of "Civic Art."

MACKNIGHT BLACK'S poems on machinery have been appearing in various American magazines.

JOHN MACY is author of "The Story of the World's Literature." He will speak at The Nation Dinner, February 15.

W. E. BUCHHOLZ is author of "U. S.: a Study in Democracy."

R. F. ALFRED HOERNLE is professor of philosophy at the Transvaal University College in Johannesburg, Union of South Africa, and a member of the Joint Council of Europeans and Natives.

THE LAW OF THE JUNGLE

by Coburn Allen

With an Introduction by John Haynes Holmes

Readers of The Nation who, like Dr. Holmes, "have found a truth and caught a vision in this troubled age of human history" will share his enthusiasm over this book. This "masterly portrayal" of the present world wide social disorder "stabbed" him "wide awake." "This book," Dr. Holmes writes the author, "is suffused from start to finish with a moral passion and spiritual idealism which lift it out of the realm of economic discussion into the realm of genuine prophetic literature." Nothing published in years has made a more certain appeal to Nation readers.

$2.50

Greenberg, Publisher

112 East 19th Street New York

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

EVENINGS—SPECIAL PARTIES ONLY. ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS. SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.

OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management
by THEODORE KEMM
GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

Men? They're All Right

John Macy, whose article in Harper's denying woman's equality with man stirred thousands of women to protest, will attempt to stem the onslaught of Ruth Hale and Lorine Pruette at the third Nation Dinner

Men—What of 'Em?
February 15

Freda Kirchwey, Managing Editor of The Nation, will act as referee and the men's case looks dark.

Seats are assigned in the order reserved, and reservations are beginning to pour in. A word to the wise . . .

THE FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE

$2.75 for subscribers and their guests.

($6.25 will make you a subscriber and buy a dinner ticket.)

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York

Reserve ..... places for me at the dinner on February 15.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Tickets will be mailed a few days before the dinner. 2-9-27

The American Mercury says of:

HUMANIZING EDUCATION

BY SAMUEL D. SCHMALHAUSEN

"As sensible a book on the ailments of present-day education as has been written in many a day. The author has a sharp eye for the sore spots in the modern school system, and comments shrewdly on all of them."

BERTRAND RUSSELL: I am impressed by the freedom of its outlook and the vigour of its onslaught on the many forms of respectable humbug.

GEORGE SANTAYANA: Your book has one strain in it with which I am in sympathy: viz., your satire and invective against the emptiness of American, or typically modern, education.

MARY WARE DENNETT: It is a wonderfully meaty book, and all the folks who are battling for vital education ought to be profoundly obliged for this compact bundle of riches. It is quite the most surprising aggregation of quotable, epigrammatic nuggets of wisdom that I ever met.

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN: I think your book ought to have a splendid effect in liberalizing thinking, as well as helping young people orient themselves at a time when they need just such help as you have given.

PROF. E. A. ROSS: It reacts vigorously against the terroristic fundamentalism that rests like a pall upon a good deal of American education. With many of its contentions I am in full sympathy.

CHARLOTTE PERKINS GILMAN: Your book is a courageous, honest and interesting piece of work.

Order direct from

The New Education Publishing Co.
11 WEST 68th STREET
NEW YORK CITY

$2.50 343 pp.

THE NEW CHINA

You can appraise from the proper perspective the new awakening of the East which is today thrusting China into the limelight of public attention by reading

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

You will like its freshness of viewpoint coupled with the accuracy of its facts.

It is a store-house of information on international politics, European trends of thought, current English literature, and cultural developments the world over.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings and on new trends of thought in various countries.

——————MAIL THIS COUPON——————

To The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
224 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed direct from Manchester, England, to:

Name .....

Address .....

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.
The course is open to graduates of colleges and universities of recognized standing.
Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.
Special courses will be arranged for social workers in accordance with their needs.
For information, address the Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL for JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)
210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.20 per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

Want someone for a position? Want a position?
The responsive employer and the intelligent applicant for employment read The Nation. Write for rates. Dept. W, The Nation.

EDUCATIONAL

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE
Program Feb. 6-12
AT COOPER UNION
(8th St. and Astor Place)
At 8 o'clock ADMISSION FREE

Sunday, Feb. 6—Emanuel Sternheim: "Education in Recent Fiction."

Tuesday, Feb. 8—Alfred Adler: "Mental Hygiene and Individual Psychology."

Friday, Feb. 11—Everett Dean Martin: What Is the Matter with Modern Ideas? "Naturalism."

AT MANHATTAN TRADE SCHOOL
(Lexington Ave. and 22nd St., at 8 o'clock)
Single Admission, 25 cents
Reduction for Course Tickets

Wednesday, Feb. 9—Harrison E. Howe: How the Scientist Works—"Chemistry Old and New."

Thursday, Feb. 10—E. G. Spaulding: Questions People Expect a Philosopher to Answer—"Must One's Philosophy Express One's Temperament?" Wm. James.

Saturday, Feb. 12—Mortimer J. Adler: Psychological Relativity: "The Soul as a Body."

FOR RENT

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL, N. Y.
LIVE in a modern, fireproof hotel by the seashore for less than in the crowded city. Homelike comforts, moderate priced restaurant, maid, valet and telephone service. Winter rates:—$12 per week for two 37 minutes from Times Square. B.M.T. Phone, Sheepshead 8000.

FURNISHED ROOM FOR RENT

GENTLEMAN, single room, sunny, airy, attractive. Steam heat, electricity, residential section, convenient downtown business district. $5 weekly. Fessler, 437 West 24th St. Lackawanna 2330.

COUNTRY BOARD

CHARMING LINDEN HALL—an exceptional Colonial Home with Solarium—midst spacious grounds, for elderly women, convalescents—stressing quiet, home atmosphere, diet, kindly care, attendance. Dr. Sophie Klenk, 3818 Bayside.

THE LLOYD
On Great South Bay Bellport, L. I.
OPEN after January 27th for accommodation of week-end parties, winter-sports groups, conferences, and permanent guests. Apply, The Lloyd, Bellport, L. I. Telephone 17 Bellport.

FOR SALE

TWO complete sets of the American Mercury for 1924-1925. $15 each. Call afternoons or write: M. J. Ostrom, 952 Leggett Ave., Bronx.

MISCELLANEOUS

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

BONDS

Mexican Government & Railroad Bonds
These bonds at prevailing prices offer attractive investment and speculative possibilities.
Detailed information furnished on request. Correspondence invited.
J. SANTILHANO
Specialist in Mexican Issues
50 Broad Street Tel. Han. 4419

POSITIONS WANTED

COLLEGE woman, 35, just returned from European appointment, desires position as secretary-assistant to executive. Experienced, capable, dependable. Best references. Box 630, care The Nation.

REFINED, intelligent young lady desires work for evening. Adaptable, but has no specific training. Box 627, care The Nation.

BOOKMAN, 35, four languages, literary inclined, extensive experience in Ships, Hotels, Bookshops, wishes suitable position. Box 628, care The Nation.

YOUNG woman, college education, expert stenographic ability, seeks secretaryship. Well read; literary and publishing experience. Box 629, care The Nation.

YOUNG lady, educated, well versed in literature, drama and music, desires position as editorial assistant or secretary to writer; could assist managing editor; excellent stenographer; personality; sense of humor. Box 631, care The Nation.

WOMAN, well educated, liberal outlook, wants research work along line of economics and history. Box 632, care The Nation.

YOUNG woman, experienced secretary, also pianist, wishes position July-August in country, few hours daily. Box 634, care The Nation.

FORMER journalist, speaking several languages, convalescent, university graduate, elderly single man, is looking for not too heavy work with modest salary (and decent room or home as part-compensation for services). Address Box 633, care The Nation.

Do you want to make extra money?
Address Dept. 11
THE NATION
20 Vesey St. New York

BOOKS

THE CURE of IMPERFECT SIGHT by TREATMENT WITHOUT GLASSES
By W. H. BATES, M.D.
The author of this book presents evidence that all errors of refraction are caused by strain—and cured by rest or relaxation.
The complete method of treatment is described so clearly that the reader can usually discard his glasses and improve his vision.
All leading bookstores.
Central Fixation Publishing Company
Price $3.00 Postpaid
383-A Madison Avenue, New York City

ANY BOOK IN PRINT
Delivered at your door. We pay the postage. Standard authors, fine editions, new books, all at biggest savings. Be sure to send postcard for Clarkson's catalog.
FREE Write for our great book catalog. This catalog is a short course in literature and is so used by some of America's leading universities; 300,000 book lovers buy from it. Free if you write now.
DAVID B. CLARKSON THE BOOK BROKER
211 CLARKSON BUILDING, CHICAGO, ILL.

MARRIAGE and DIVORCE
By MILTON IVES LIVY $1.00 prepaid
A complete compilation of both the divorce and marriage laws of 48 States, with a comprehensive discussion of the evils and remedies of the divorce laws in the United States.
MILTON IVES LIVY, 233 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

LINCOLN'S Religion Revealed! Only 25c

This remarkable brochure of 32 pages reveals the truth about Lincoln's religious beliefs. There is also reproduced the original draft of Lincoln's immortal Gettysburg address which not only is worth the price of this pamphlet but is unanswerable testimony of his religious faith. Valuable Catalogue FREE.
THE FREETHOUGHT PRESS ASS'N
Dept. L-17 1658 Broadway, New York City

GOOD CHEER, COMRADES!
Daca sells books 20% to 80% off at the NEW DOOR BOOK SHOP, 4 Christopher St., N. Y. C. Come on over! Open evenings.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1927 No. 3215

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 157
EDITORIALS:
The Right to Confiscate 160
Nullification in Tennessee 161
The Sick Indian 161
THE INDECENCY OF CENSORSHIP. By Joseph Wood Krutch 162
WHY "AL" SMITH IS GREAT. By Norman Hapgood 164
ONE WAY TO FREEDOM. Anonymous 165
IN WEAKNESS THERE IS STRENGTH. By Frank R. Kent 167
AVERTING CALAMITY. By Stuart Chase 168
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 169
CORRESPONDENCE 169
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Cooperatives in South Tyrol. By M. Sering 171

MIDWINTER BOOK SECTION

THE NATION'S PRIZE POEM FOR 1927:
This Foreman. By Thomas Hornsby Ferril 173
H. L. MENCKEN. By Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant 174
UNCHANGING SPAIN. By Havelock Ellis 178
BOOKS:
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 180
The Serbian Crime. By Henry W. Nevinson 180
A Greater Than Daniel Boone. By Clarence Walworth Alvord 182
French Commonplace. By Llewelyn Powys 183
Heredity and Variation. By H. S. Jennings 184
An Economic Interpretation of Modern History. By J. A. Hobson 184
Toward Objectivity. By Allen Tate 185
Cardboard Greatness. By Lawrence S. Morris 186
There Is a World. By Irwin Edman 187
The Moscow Road. By Keith Hutchison 188
The Creator of Modern Opera. By Daniel Gregory Mason 189
The Better Side of the Senate. By William MacDonald 190
Books in Brief 191
Collections and Reprints 192
Art: A Lively Sculptor. By Ernestine Evans 192
Drama: Contemporaneity. By Joseph Wood Krutch 194

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT
DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MANAGING EDITOR FREDA KIRCHWEY
LITERARY EDITOR MARK VAN DOREN
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

WHITE MEN'S ARROGANCE was never better displayed than in Secretary Kellogg's demand that the foreign settlement of Shanghai be made a neutral zone. There are, he said, 30,000 foreigners, including 4,000 Americans, in Shanghai, and they should be spared the rigors of civil war. It happens that Shanghai is a part of China, and that there are some two million Chinese in Shanghai who, whatever happens, will undoubtedly suffer more than any of the foreigners. The white men in the East persist in thinking that they are entitled to exemption from the perils and difficulties which yellow men have to suffer.

SOMEONE IN SHANGHAI has reminded the British that Shanghai is not a British city. There is in it, to be sure, an "international settlement" administered by a council of foreign taxpayers, but even that is technically Chinese soil. The British, however, serenely content with the old doctrine that possession is nine-tenths of the law, started to build barracks in Jessfield Park, outside the boundaries of the International Settlement, planning to house in them a part of their Chinese expeditionary force. The Chinese authorities protested—even the friendly local militarist protested; and the British had to change their plans. Then "someone" on the Municipal Council protested against quartering the troops anywhere within the "international" city. The cable dispatches did not tell us who protested; but when one recalls the fact that the council is composed, with three exceptions, of Englishmen, that its two American members are as British in their views as any Britisher, and that the other member is Japanese, one can guess. The Japanese are beginning to recall that they are Asiatics, that the British-Japanese alliance was broken by the British to please America, and that British colonies and the United States exclude them as undesirables; and their policy in China is cutting square across the British program of force. The British, therefore, announce that while they will defend Shanghai at any cost the expeditionary force will be diverted to Hongkong, which they took from China after the First Opium War, and Weihaiwei, which they grabbed in 1898 promised in 1921 to return, and still hold. Naturally the Cantonese have broken off negotiations, declaring that they will not parley under duress.

"WANTED: MARINES, for service in China," the recruiting boards read all over the United States. The marines have been withdrawn from the mail-trucks, mobilized at the ports, and, like the British regiments, are being transshipped for the Orient. We have no concessions in China, it is true; our officials make as pretty speeches as the British; but we have sixty warships in Eastern waters, and will soon have 15,000 troops available. Does anyone in Washington expect the Chinese to take our words seriously when our actions speak the language of war?

WE CONTINUE TO INTERVENE in Nicaragua. The New York Herald Tribune for February 7 contains two dispatches which it is amusing to set side by side. Linton Wells, the Tribune's own special correspondent in Nicaragua, cables that when the Diaz forces learned that the Liberals were about to attack Chinandega "Major L. J. Clay, American officer attached to the Nicaragua National Guard, hastened from Managua [the capital] with 100 men. At noon the Herald Tribune correspondent flew to the war zone from Managua in a Nicaraguan air-service plane, piloted by Major Lee Mason [United States reserve officer]. . . . Major Mason and Major Brooks dropped bombs for the moral effect but did not engage in the conflict." Mr. Wells notes that "No American or other foreign lives or property were endangered there," but "in the event that the Liberals remain in control at Chinandega it is virtually certain that the American naval men will land there, establish a neutral zone, and reestablish communications." That is what Americans have done elsewhere in Nicaragua thus far—help Diaz, drop bombs, establish neutral zones wherever the Liberals win, disarm Liberals, dump their ammunition into the rivers, and then—well, let Admiral Latimer talk. "The American naval forces are not engaging in any operations against either side in Nicaragua and MEXICO, says Mr. Coolidge, is going to confiscate American property without paying for it, and that is a deadly sin. The issue therefore cannot be arbitrated. Now, in the first place, this is humbug, because the Mexicans are at most diminishing American property rights, since they propose to substitute fifty-year oil concessions for eternal ones. Even if it were confiscation the President would be enunciating a dangerous doctrine and making a dangerous stand, for the United States Government has repeatedly destroyed rights in private property, confiscated without compensation the property of citizens of foreign countries residing here, and has refused to heed their protests.

The Right to Confiscate

When Mr. Hughes was Secretary of State and would not recognize the Mexican Government and the Soviet Government because they did not guarantee the sacredness of private property, we pointed out some of these cases. When the United States abolished slavery it abolished private property owned by Mexicans, Spaniards, Englishmen, Frenchmen, and we know not how many other foreign citizens. It is idle to point out that the Emancipation Proclamation was a war-time measure; that in no wise relieved the Government of the United States from responsibility. There was no war, moreover, when we passed the Prohibition Amendment and the Volstead Act. Many hundreds of foreigners held shares in distilleries and breweries, or owned them outright. In the exercise of its police power the United States destroyed these properties out of hand; if they could not be transformed into some other line of business, or were not operated illegally, these foreigners lost by virtue of confiscation the money which they had invested in good faith in enterprises which were legal at the time of the investment. Did anybody rise in the House or Senate or White House and demand that these foreigners be reimbursed? Did any country, such as France or Great Britain, threaten to break off relations with us? Not one.

If the Mexican case were as black as Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Kellogg paint it, it would still be lily-white compared to what the United States has recently done in the wholesale stealing of the private property of foreigners. Reverting to the practices of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, our Alien Property Custodian stole some 4,500 German, Austrian, and Hungarian patents worth about a half billion dollars. The Supreme Court, in the Chemical Foundation case, admitted that this was confiscation, but declared that the confiscation of private enemy property was not in conflict with the Constitution, because the procedure did not violate the criminal law or commit fraud. It being outside of its scope, the Supreme Court omitted to tell one truth, namely, that the transaction was grossly contrary to the accepted tradition of international law. For the United States, with such a record as this, to criticize Mexico is to exhibit Anglo-Saxon hypocrisy in its most revolting form.

Surely there must be lawyers in the State Department who know that it is a hoary rule of the English common law that an alien may hold land only by sufferance of the Crown. There are whole volumes of judicial decisions expounding this principle, which the colonists brought to America along with their theories of religious and personal liberties—at a time when the Bolsheviks were as unknown as the dodo today. Is there no one among Mr. Coolidge's advisers who has ever read that decision of the United States Supreme Court which says:

> It is obvious that one who is not a citizen and cannot become one lacks an interest in, and the power to effectually work for the welfare of, the state, and, so lacking, the state may rightfully deny him the right to own and lease real estate within its boundaries. If one incapable of citizenship may lease or own real estate, it is within the realm of possibility that every foot of land within the state might pass to the ownership or possession of non-citizens. (Terrace vs. Thompson, 263 U. S. 197, 220, 221.)

Several American States have adopted laws discriminating against aliens, and some of these have been in effect retroactive. California and Washington, it is well known, refuse to permit aliens ineligible to citizenship—Washington includes other aliens who have not declared their intention to become citizens—to own or lease land; and the Supreme Court has affirmed the validity of these statutes, which have a retroactive effect. Pennsylvania does not permit aliens to own firearms and its statute compelled aliens to dispose of firearms purchased previous to the enactment of the law. Our immigration laws are regularly applied retroactively.

The pundits in Washington who happen to have charge of the honor of this country cannot be so incredibly ignorant as not to know of these things, as not to know that no nation ever contracts with anybody, whether foreigners or citizens, that its laws will not be changed. What did not the United States Government do to the Indians who were its wards? Has it not stolen their lands, dispossessed them of their private property, often merely to legalize the seizure of those lands by marauding settlers?

There is no issue between us and Mexico which cannot be submitted to judicial determination. Confiscation? Retroactivity? These are not such horrendous bogies. We have indulged in them ourselves; probably we shall indulge in them again. The case in Mexico is not so desperate. The English companies in Mexico accepted the offer of the Mexican Government to let them extract oil for fifty years. We have seen no denial of the press report that even the American oil companies agreed about Christmas day to accept the Mexican oil laws, and a day later were persuaded to change their minds at the suggestion of the State Department, which took the ground that if the Government of the United States yielded to Mexico in this matter there would be no safety for American investors anywhere south of the Rio Grande.

No, the confiscation bogy is a swindle. Big business does not want a liberal government in Mexico; Mr. Kellogg considers the Calles Government too radical; Washington officialdom has imperiously decided that it will not have to the south of us any government that it does not like, that refuses to do our bidding, or that dares to compete with us for the leadership of the American republics. The private-property issue is camouflage. Perhaps the explanation of Mr. Coolidge's refusal to arbitrate is that he knows that if we came into a court of arbitration on this issue we should not come in with anything approaching clean hands.

Nullification in Tennessee

THERE are men opposed to prohibition who say that the way to get rid of a bad law is to ignore it. There are others who proclaim the doctrine that the law is the law "for a' that." The legalistic fellows rarely apply the theory to the Sunday laws, the traffic laws, or the tax laws, but, for the benefit of the public, they expound the theory in general terms.

Rare it is to find a court that nullifies enforcement in the same breath that it finds a statute to be a "good" law. Yet this is exactly what was done by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in the Scopes case. In spite of three opinions, interpreting the anti-evolution law in three different ways, the court held that the statute was so clear and definite as not to violate the federal Constitution, which lays down as a fundamental that no law is sound under which a citizen may "guess" himself into jail. Having done this, the court prevented an appeal to the United States Supreme Court by reversing the judgment on a ground on which no exception was taken in the lower court, which was not raised on appeal —to wit, that the court, not the jury, fixed the fine. This was in the face of State precedents, among them State vs. Greene, 129 Tenn. 619, a liquor case (where perhaps the Constitution is not so important) holding that where the minimum fine is fixed by the judge there is no prejudicial error. But the Supreme Court went further and suggested —virtually ordered—the Attorney General to nolle prosse the case. Why? The law is sound—the court had just said so. Scopes admittedly violated it. No one could violate it more than he did. But, the court said, the "peace and dignity of the State" are "better conserved" by dropping the case. The State had already spent thousands of dollars to enforce the law. Certainly the court could not mean that the law should be used on some more defenseless individual while this impertinent violator should be free. No sinner could be more defiant in his sin than Mr. Scopes in his determination to continue teaching the truths of evolution as he saw them; and surely no court would argue that the impenitent should be selected for pity and pardon.

"Those in charge of the educational affairs of the State," the court added, "are men and women of discernment and culture"; biology "may be entirely omitted from the curriculum of our schools." So may biologists. Prospective teachers may be carefully selected and sanitated so as to assure that no honest evolutionist will be made a teacher—or perhaps, no materialist, for only the materialistic conception of evolution is contrary to the law, according to Judge Chambliss. Another way to avoid enforcement may be found in quibbling over the meaning of the word "teach." Judge Chambliss says that "the term is here employed in the sense of seeking to convince"; the prevailing opinion says that the "statutory scriptural reading" of the Bible is not teaching; presumably, then, reading the theory of evolution, or stating it, need not be considered teaching and a teacher need not fear to expound it if he is careful not to seek to convince.

Governor Peay, in his message approving the bill, suggested that it was the kind of a law which would probably never be enforced; others have suspected it; the court confirms it. Does the Supreme Court of Tennessee support those cynics who say that the way to get rid of a bad law is to ignore it?

The Sick Indian

In 1921 the Indian death-rate per 1,000 of Indian population in the registration area was 17.5. In 1922 it was 19.2 per 1,000. In 1923 it was 22.5 per 1,000. In 1924 it was 25.9 per 1,000, or approximately twice the white death-rate. The excess of births over deaths in 1924 was only 3 per 1,000. The white death-rate is about 12 per 1,000 per year.

The above statistics are startling enough. But the tables show that the Indian death-rate per 1,000 in 1924 was 34.5 in Montana, one of the States with large Indian population, and whose Indians nearly all live on reservations under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. In North Dakota the rate was 33 per 1,000. In Washington it was 34.5 per 1,000. And in Wyoming, whose Indians are under Indian Bureau jurisdiction, the 1924 death-rate was 86.1 per 1,000. These figures presage the extermination of whole great tribes, proceeding swiftly or slowly.

THE figures in this statement by Dr. Haven Emerson, president of the American Indian Defense Association, were obtained from no other source than the Bureau of Indian Affairs. And it is at the bureau that he and his association just now are directing their attack. The federal census, the ultimate source of the statistics, shows infant mortality among the Indians to be two and five-sevenths times greater than among the population of the United States at large, and the proportion of deaths from tuberculosis three times as high as among the white population. Twenty-one per cent of the Indians in the Southwest area are afflicted with trachoma, which leads to blindness and death.

Only two conclusions are possible. "Either the expenditure on Indian medical service is excessively insufficient," says Dr. Emerson, "or the administration of the Indian Health Service is excessively incompetent. As a matter of fact, a disinterested investigation would prove that both these conclusions are substantially correct." Meanwhile the Indian Bureau, says Dr. Emerson, continues to proclaim a falling Indian death-rate and a corresponding increase in the total Indian population. Its figure for 1924 was 312,702; for 1925, 333,674; for 1926, 335,070—in another report 349,876. How are the two sets of data to be reconciled? Dr. Emerson's implication is that the bureau either has neglected to compare them at all or has decided to hide the discrepancy in order to escape the accusation of inefficiency. It is only the federal government to which appeal can be made in the case, since the Indians, being federal charges, do not come under the jurisdiction of the several boards of health which otherwise would care for them. And Dr. Emerson is demanding an investigation by Congress.

It is hardly necessary to speak of the loss which America, whether she knew it or not, would suffer through the swift or slow extermination of one or more Indian tribes. One tribe would be loss enough; it looks as if many were threatened. The future of the first Americans is at best problematical. The continued existence of the race whose continent we took may or may not be important to the present members of that race. It may be totally unimportant to us. Absorption by marriage would give us a few drops of their blood but none of their culture, which we have destroyed anyhow. Our generation should not wish to establish that there is no Indian future whatever.

The Indecency of Censorship*

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

I

ART—including dramatic art—is not, as it is sometimes supposed to be, a trivial thing. It is just as important as any of the other means by which men express their criticism of life, and its freedom is just as essential for the healthy functioning of society as any other freedom. There is no argument for the freedom of thought and of the press which does not apply with equal force to dramatic art.

If you attempt to answer me by saying that certain farces and certain revues are not Art I will reply that it is equally obvious that certain editorials appearing in newspapers are not Thought. We have, however, agreed that when we say that we believe in the freedom of the press we mean just that; we recognize that there is no means of discriminating between this editor or this newspaper, and another, which is not subject to intolerable abuse; and exactly the same thing is true of the stage. If occasional misuse of that freedom is inevitable, we have exactly the same recourse—the laws which make obscenity and libel punishable after due conviction obtained at a trial by jury—in one case as the other. At the present moment the stage enjoys no more liberty than the press. Why should it have less?

Surely no mere impropriety upon the stage is more poisonous than the subtle appeals to the lowest and most destructive human passions contained in the worst of the metropolitan newspapers. Yet we tolerate and must tolerate them if we would avoid worse evils. Set up a censorship of the press and before long The Nation would be barred from the mails because the provisions of every censorship law always have been and always will be twisted so as to be made to apply to whatever happens to be distasteful to the authorities in power, and exactly the same thing would happen in the case of an American censorship of the stage. Ibsen's "Ghosts" and Shaw's "Mrs. Warren's Profession" were both banned in England and the latter was banned here. William Winter, the most distinguished dramatic critic of his generation in New York, treated Ibsen's plays as filth, and Anthony Comstock called Shaw "that Irish smut-hound." Whatever may be said of the alleged possibility of distinguishing between what has claims to be considered as Art and what has not, the fact remains that no censorship has ever yet maintained that distinction. Baudelaire's poems and Flaubert's "Madame Bovary" were both condemned in France. In America there was a strong movement against the best native play written in the last five years ("What Price Glory?") and Will Hays, Czar of the Movies, kept its closest rival ("They Knew What They Wanted") off the screen.

II

It is impossible to set any legal standard of decency, for the simple reason that decency is purely a matter of changing convention. The knee-length skirt worn by the most daring soubrette of the Age of Innocence was just as shocking to the public before which she appeared as the most nearly complete nudity yet achieved by Mr. Carroll or the Messrs. Shubert; and the most modest bathing-suit now worn by the most scrupulous member of the Purity League would have shocked a rake's grandmother a few generations ago. When skirts were conventionally worn about the feet, ankles were as disturbing as knees are today and a "D—n" in a book was as surprising as any vocable which appears in "Ulysses." That dress is "indecent" which reveals a little more than is customary at the moment, whatever the prevailing fashion may be; and that book is indecent which is a little franker than other current books, whatever the reigning literary mode of the moment. The mores of any society set the standard of decency, and that is decent which the mores permit. The attitude of the audience, not the attitude of censors, represents the mores of our particular society, and hence it is the audience alone which can truly set a standard. What it finds inoffensive enough to attend is by the prevailing standard decent, and it is this audience alone which is concerned.

In so far as anything recognizable as indecent per se exists, that thing is an emotional reaction on the part of a spectator, which, being purely subjective, is not subject to regulation. Given the desire to experience this emotion—and the desire to experience it occasionally is certainly normal in many, perhaps all, people—and the occasion will always be found in the most nearly appropriate thing. Little boys look up obscene words in the dictionary, and I have the authority of Mr. Sinclair Lewis for the statement that before the days of the "art magazines" rustics used to gloat over the underwear advertisements in the Sears-Roebuck catalogues. The desire will always make the occasion, and no possible censorship could legislate the nation into a universal purity of heart. It might ruin the stage by setting up a standard of outward propriety inconsistent with the mores of society, but it could do nothing more.

Moreover, I suspect that the danger of indecency is vastly overestimated. There are few people who have not in the course of their lives seen pictures and read books which at the time they regarded as indecent. Yet never in the course of a persistent inquiry have I found anyone who thought that he had been injured by such an experience. I have found many who were sure that others would have been injured, but never one who had himself suffered—from which I conclude that if any exist they must constitute an infinitesimal minority of the population. There seems to be a current assumption that while the moral nature of youth is extremely fragile its intellect is incorruptible. A single impropriety witnessed upon the stage is regarded as sufficient to start a boy or girl upon the downward path, but (if I may judge by the "clean lists" sent out by various organizations) these same young people may be trusted to sit through a whole season of superficiality, falsehood, and misrepresentation and come away with their minds unimpaired. I suspect that the reverse is true; that piffle is more dangerous than obscenity and that more youths are corrupted by the inadequate platitudes of the conventional drama than by the indelicacies of that which is called risque, and I am certain that the inanities blessed by Mr. Hays are more genuinely corrupting than any pornography. I know many admirable people who are occasionally more scabrous than any play I have ever seen; I know no tolerable person who is ever as superficial as most "clean plays."

* A speech delivered at The Nation's dinner on Censorship of the Stage on January 11, 1927.

"Clean" is, indeed, a negative virtue. It is seldom applied to any work of art unless there is nothing else to be said in its favor. Certainly I myself do not like what are called "clean plays," whether by that description is meant either those which remain only upon the surface of life or those whose humor is completely antiseptic. In drama those plays are most important which concern themselves with the fundamentals of life and character and which almost inevitably have some concern with the darker or at least the more commonly concealed aspects of human nature. In comedy those are usually most entertaining which at least toy with the proprieties.

Wit has been defined as "The kiss given to common sense behind the back of propriety." One of its chief functions is that of relief. Through it we enjoy a vicarious freedom greater than we usually permit ourselves in everyday life, and because of the release which it affords to the imagination we submit more rather than less gladly to the conventions which control our conduct. Certainly Aristophanes, Rabelais, Montaigne, Cervantes, Shakespeare, Voltaire, and Congreve were not always "clean," nor was their indelicacy always merely incidental to their wit. Expurgate them and you would destroy no little part of their greatness; and I see no reason why moderns should be hampered by restrictions which we would not think of applying to the masters. The best comedy is often gross and often irreverent. Playing with fire is a part of its business though not, unfortunately, a part which a censor is very likely to understand.

III

But the final and to me conclusive argument is the character of the censor himself, since there was never one who was not ultimately ridiculous. To say that the only problem involved is the problem of finding the perfect censor is like saying that the only problem involved in government is the problem of finding the perfect despot, and the answer is the same in both cases—no such creature exists. Not only is there something inevitably corrupting about arbitrary power but there is something in the nature of every decent person which makes him loath to assume it. There is something essentially absurd and essentially petty about drawing lines and pointing out details, and something essentially presumptuous about setting oneself up to judge what another shall see. To analyze jokes, to discover how indecent they are; to decide which statues, like certain ones in Italy, shall be fitted with galvanized iron trousers; to patrol bathing-beaches with a tape-measure to determine the length of the ladies' skirts—no man can do any of these things without being degraded and made ridiculous, and no man fit for any office requiring delicacy of feeling will consent to do them for long. Censoring is a job which appeals to the meddler, the prig, and the sneak. The Pharisee loves it, and it offers gratification to many mean little vices; it appeals to those who rejoice in the display of trivial but arbitrary power as well as to those twisted souls who take a libidinous delight in smelling out obscenity to protect their neighbor and delight in gloating over the deeds to which it might lead their neighbor. Censors may be drawn from many classes—from the stupid, the humorless, the fanatical, and the prurient—but the one class from which they cannot be drawn is the class of decent and intelligent men.

Upon this fact any scheme of censorship is inevitably wrecked. In the case of a crisis like that which led to the formation of the Play Jury certain decent people may consent for a time to serve, either from a sense of duty or in order to prevent something worse, but they will not serve for long. There is something about being a censor which is repugnant in just the way that being an informer is repugnant. Even those who themselves believe in censorship would shrink from performing the function of the censor, in exactly the same way that the majority of those who believe in prohibition still shrink from imitating General Butler, who had his host arrested, or from calling the police to arrest a neighbor who happens to be making beer in the cellar. And the reason is simply that spying out indecency and setting up oneself as the judge of another's pleasure is just as repugnant to decent feelings as the carrying of tales. The office must of necessity gradually gravitate to the class of those to whom its repulsive functions are agreeable.

I myself long sought the perfect censor. Anthony Comstock was not he, because at times there was a certain sly plausibility about Comstock; I believe that I have found him at last, however, where the bluebird is said to be found, on my own doorstep, or, to speak more plainly, in my native town—Knoxville, Tennessee. He happens to be feminine and, when discovered, was presiding over the local chapter of the D. A. R. The lady had just been stirred to activity by a threatened visit of "Rain" to a local theater, and though when she was interviewed by the reporter of the Knoxville News she admitted that she had neither seen nor read the play, she confessed that it was, indeed, somewhat confused in her mind with the film version of "Three Weeks"; but she gave out the following statement:

> We do not fear the effect which such a play would have on us. We of the D. A. R. and the United Daughters of the Confederacy have had the advantages of education and travel and have been prepared for such things. Such a play would not injure us; it would only disgust us.
>
> But there are other women who have not had these advantages, and there are the young people who are inexperienced in the problems of life. It is for their benefit and protection that we seek to prevent the showing of such plays in Knoxville.
>
> Such a play would not injure me, but I have seen the world. Nobody knows the world better than I. No woman has had greater educational advantages, has been more in social life, or has traveled more than I. I am able to judge of the temptations that come to the young and the inexperienced. It is the duty of us to protect those who have not had our advantages.
>
> We have a great commiseration for the artists who must appear in such plays for their living, but we hope by raising the moral tone of a community to enable them to work in something higher.

Is the picture here evoked a caricature? I do not think so. The lady in question is naive; she does not know how to hide behind persuasive phrases; she exposes herself and she lets the cat out of the bag. But the motives—pharisaical virtue and self-importance—which are upon the surface here are at the bottom of every person who has the impulse to be a censor. Scratch the most urbane and you will find, just below the cuticle, the aboriginal protector of Tennessee morals.

Why "Al" Smith Is Great

By NORMAN HAPGOOD

AROUND the country can be felt an increasing wish to know what is the power of "Al" Smith. West and South, and in Republican circles everywhere, exists also an eagerness to find and specify his weaknesses.

If one would see Smith in perspective, the volume of his popularity should not be honored with first place. It is large, of course, but it would never have lifted him to his present position in a class by himself among living Democrats. He won by fewer votes last fall than the preceding time he ran in an off year. Another Irishman, Walsh of Massachusetts, carried Coolidge's own State, a more Republican State than New York, and did it at a moment when the governorship was going heavily Republican. Ohio has become Republican normally by about 200,000, but it was carried in November for the third time by a third Irishman, Governor "Vic" Donahey.

New York, to be sure, is the most important State in a Presidential election, and that fact helps the man who has been four times elected governor. But it is not the message that is spreading most rapidly through the country and even in the South changing opinion in the class that sends delegates.

Only part of the increase in Smith's strength is to be sought in the changing Wet issue. Local government, as exemplified in the demand to soften the Volstead Act, is likely to be the point at which there is most hard fighting in 1928. The solid South will go Democratic whoever the candidate may be. Elsewhere the party strength is in the big cities, mostly Wet. The convention will fight about it, but in the end it will adopt a formula asking for a law by Congress that leaves to each State the opportunity of interpreting the word "intoxicating" and taking its chances with the Supreme Court.

Nobody can tell ahead how the nine men who speak the last word (or five of them) will decide. From what I hear there is a probability that they will defend the right of Congress to limit its functions. If Congress shall, for instance, after modifying the law, or without modifying it, demand that the Executive at Washington limit its part in the concurrent job to what the States cannot do, I do not believe the court will object. Jurisdiction is concurrent, and so is enforcement. The federal law is binding on the States, but no law is entirely enforced. There are laws against prostitution, for example, but they are enforced, if at all, only in cases of organized traffic or nuisance.

If Congress shall some time decide to grant money for liquor enforcement only in a distinctly federal field it will be leaving the national government all it can do, and more. The federal task should be to protect the country from liquor smuggled in, to protect any State that desires protection against shipments from a wetter State; and to keep track of concerns manufacturing alcohol for business purposes. It would, I believe, be wholly constitutional for the federal government to concentrate on these matters, at one-half of 1 per cent, if it chooses, or at a higher point, and leave all other aspects of the amendment to the States.

That position, or something equivalent, must prevail before Smith can be nominated. If he is nominated his handling of the Wet issue will be dignified. He will not talk like an excited Wet at a dinner party. He will show sympathy with the march of temperance; with check on the stronger drinks; even with further restrictions in communities that unmistakably desire them. But he will graphically portray the evil effects of moral legislation in communities that are to any large extent divided. After a bitter struggle this view will carry the convention. Hence the delegates cannot put a refusal to nominate Smith on the ground that he seeks liquor revision. His opponents will be in the position of stopping him because he is a Catholic. That outcome will be much clearer than in 1924, when he by no means held a position of unquestionable preeminence. They will be stopping him because of his religion. His appointments are regardless of religion, and hundreds know the severity with which he treats emissaries who tell him what the church desires.

The third argument to be used against him brings us to the quality that makes his greatness. His opponents, worried about too openly displaying religious bigotry, and also somewhat timid about the issue of whether drink should be a local question, are now trying to concentrate on Tammany. Smith grew up in Tammany, their plea runs; he is still a member of that body; to make him President would be to bring Tammany to Washington.

He did grow up in Tammany Hall. He is close to the sidewalks of New York. He was born in a tenement, under the Brooklyn Bridge, in a region where political interest is Tammany or nothing. He went to the Assembly. He became leader of his party there. Sometimes when reformers would go to see him about a bill he would say: "I have read your bill. It is right. I wish we could pass it. But orders have come from Fourteenth Street."

In spite of that handicap a large percentage of those independent citizens interested in civic causes became adherents of Smith while he was in the Assembly. Then, as now, he studied every paragraph of every appropriation bill. He studied to the bottom one difficult question after another. He never forgot. His sympathies were with the public. He cared when a neighbor's child was sick. But the Lord had equipped him with a precise, energetic, imaginative brain. As he studied questions he saw them in terms of welfare. He saw also that this welfare was not obtained unless the machinery was appropriate, the human instruments superior. After brilliant service as party leader he took a motor one day and went down to Good Ground, where he told Charley Murphy the party owed him the nomination for governor. Murphy did not want him, but he recognized the claim.

Entering his first term Smith was partly free and partly under obligation. He no longer represented Tammany Hall. His heart swelled that the voters of the largest State had raised a poor waif from South Street, the sordid river front, to so high a post. He meant to deserve the tribute. He showed what a friend of mine calls the noblesse oblige of poverty. He would prove that a boy from the river front could be a strong governor. He did repay Murphy with some appointments, though not with any voice in legislation. That term wiped out the debt. When the second term began Al Smith, ablest product of Tammany, had grown far beyond the Hall. The second and the third terms have passed. The fourth is with us. The Governor's measures have cut the machine to pieces. As he said once to me, the Republicans have kept him in office by blocking his program. He has gone back to finish it. He is in Albany to take the water-power of the State away from politicians and lobbyists, to put it where the public will realize on their property. He is in Albany to complete a reorganization of State machinery that will complete his slaughter of useless offices. On those two remaining measures both the Republican politicians and the Democratic politicians are against him. One other reform is in the foreground. About this change it happens that the Republican politicians rather than those of the Hall are doing the wincing. Smith is fighting for an improvement favored by every independent, when he demands that we elect the governor in a year when there is no election for President. As far as I know he has made a mistake of political judgment but once. I suppose it was a mistake to appear before the Democratic national convention of 1924. He had no business before the convention. He made a bad impression. It is his only time.

Today the measures which he has sponsored, including those for which he is still fighting, are the most difficult and enlightened set of measures ever led by any governor of whom I know. His appointments, in his last three terms, I take to be the soundest and most independent made by any living executive. There is now in a lofty judicial position a man who before he went on the bench was as constructive a reformer as the country had. A few weeks ago, dining with this dignitary, I said: "When I was in college we were accustomed to look upon Billy Russell of Massachusetts as the model governor. How did he compare with Smith?"

"There is no similarity," said my friend. "Russell's problems were child's play in comparison. The remarkable thing about Smith is that the hardest modern problems come before him, and every one is thought out and solved."

The man who thus spoke is a nation-famous expert on public utilities. He was excited over an address by Smith on water-power. To this expert from another State the speech showed a creative grasp of one of the most baffling of questions. A few weeks earlier, in the city of Washington, another friend of mine was talking to a club of women, all interested in civic progress. He is not a New Yorker, but in order to analyze the November election, he needed to look up Smith's record. As a result he read before the club a list of his achievements. They covered every field in which any one of those socially minded citizens had labored.

We often think of Smith's popularity as being found especially in the masses. Of course it is his popularity with the masses that gives him votes, but it is something other that gives him prestige. Suppose we think not of actual numbers but of percentages: where then is his strength? Ask devoted, independent citizens who have been giving their lives to civic problems: to reform of the constitution, efficiency, women's labor, factories, children, housing, living wage, health, care for the injured, prisons, transportation, congestion, finance, freedom of opinion. Make up your own list of a hundred to suit yourself, regardless of party; go to see them; I shall be amazed if over 90 per cent of them are not for Smith.

What has caused the social workers to form solidly behind Smith is an experience of twenty-three years. Those facts, becoming known, are winning the country for him. He is a strong man: he is also a good man. Not a theorist, but a person who meets each new need with a solving plan, executive talent, intimate knowledge, audacity in leadership. Not for him the easiest way. Other popular leaders seize that course. "Al" decides first whether a step is desirable; then the best method of taking it; finally how to convert the public. His clearness of statement is possible only because of his clearness of vision. The organization of the State's business is as clear to him as a baseball game is to me. To him transportation, water-power, port facilities, income and expense are not abstractions. They are life.

These Modern Women

One Way to Freedom

ANONYMOUS

A LITTLE girl of six or seven, clinging to a rickety picket fence and listening, still and intent as if she listened with her whole body instead of with ears alone. Coming? Yes, of course, he was coming. Mama was too anxious. There—a little hint of sound again. The murmur of wagon wheels maybe on the hill beyond the second slough. Hope shot through her young heart. The wagon would rumble loudly and certainly when it came to the corduroy at the foot of the hill. Breathless she waited as if all life depended on her hearing. Her young mother came silently from the kitchen door and joined her.

"Yes, I thought I heard something, mama. Listen. Maybe now he will pass over the bridge at the slough." But even hope could hear nothing more definite than the wind in the fir trees at the edge of the little prairie. So they listened, mother and daughter both, in the spring, summer, autumn, winter twilight. Listened every time he went to town, and heartsick knew they hoped in vain.

It was always the same story. Oats to be ground into chop, hogs to be marketed, grain to be hauled to the warehouse, winter supplies to be bought, taxes to be paid, interest to be met—each time there was the sickening uncertainty as to whether he would come home cheery and happy when he ought to come or whether mother would have to do the farm chores, four little children left in the house alone with the fires, trailing her skirts as she milked cows, fed horses, cleaned stables; and he, the father, would come a week later, hang-dog and ashamed because he had succumbed to another periodical spree, and had spent not only himself but all the family income as well derived from hogs, grain, hay, and dedicated to winter groceries, taxes, or interest.

Always there were children, four then, and more as the years went by until mother had given birth to eight.

To the despair that grew in her in consequence of the repeated sprees was added the deadly certainty of another child inevitably near. When the fourth child was born, father disappeared the day after to be gone a week or ten days, and I can remember yet mother's explanation to hired girl and midwife—it was always both in one for us—that Mr. —— had been called away on business. Would he be home for dinner today? Day after day she could not say, she did not know. When we had moved for the third time, far away this time from anybody who had ever known us before, her hour for a sixth deliverance close at hand, and he, the father, gone again to exercise his individual liberty, I saw her one night get out the family revolver, oil it, load it, and place it under her pillow. When, white and sick from foreboding, I ventured to ask, "Why that?" she answered, "If it comes upon me when he is gone and nobody here to take care of me, I am through, that's all." Child of thirteen that I was then, I argued the silliness of that, and urged my own capacity to do as much as he could do.

We print herewith the eighth of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of women with a modern point of view. The next article, by a woman who grew up in an atmosphere of freedom and intellectual daring, will appear in The Nation for March 2.

Beatrice M. Hinkle, psychoanalyst, and John B. Watson, behaviorist, will analyze through these articles the underlying causes of the modern woman's rebellion.

This was the man I then knew best. Good natured, easy-going, loving my mother and his children in his own way, but selfish and irresponsible, wicked it seemed to me then, in his capacity for inflicting suffering and humiliation. Now after thirty years, and he ten years gone forever, I cannot find much easier words. As the oldest of the children and the nearest to my mother, I experienced her anxieties as if they had been my own, and because I loved her I hated the poverty, shame, and endless child-bearing forced upon her. I cannot remember a time when I did not look upon my father with reproach and often with feelings not to be described by so mild a term.

My mother's dominant passion for me, through these years, and for the five other daughters who came in the course of time, was a desire for our education, that we might fit ourselves for work and for salaries that would make us independent of marriage, or if we did elect it, able to leave it if it were unsatisfactory. She herself had been tied and fettered once for all because she had married at seventeen. An old-fashioned father had refused her the privilege of either going to school or learning a trade, and in marriage which had seemed to offer a way out she had found herself more helpless than ever on account of the never-ending succession of babies. I realize now that mother in her insistence on our schooling was preaching the economic independence of woman, though of that as such I am sure she had never heard. She preached it day after day with a singleness of aim and an earnestness that brought to pass what she desired even though the handicaps were well-nigh insurmountable. Education of her daughters every day in the school term, every school term through the years was not to be achieved without domestic battles won only by intensity of purpose and a desire to protect her own. Mother was proud that I never missed school on wash-days, cleaning days, or even when another new baby incapacitated her for a week or two. School for her children was a religion to this mother, and to one end—that we might be free.

She had, of course, educational ideals for her sons, but these were early frustrated by my father's insistence that no mere woman could ever know as much about the desirable education of a male child as a man, with the result that the boys left school in the eighth grade to learn the trade of their father. The younger had a flair for drawing, painting, mathematics, and might have turned into a creditable architect, but he learned to handle the hock and trowel instead. As I look back I realize that a part of father's reluctance to have the boys remain at school was fear lest they be educated into disapproval of himself and his ideal of a man's life.

A great part of the subjection of woman in our family resulted from mother's complete separation from purse-strings. When we lived on the farm, she would earn eight or ten dollars in the course of a year through meals and beds furnished to farmers from the upper country who made our house their stopping-place as they came and went getting in their winter supplies. Yet even getting this much depended on two contingencies. If father was in town engaged in the usual preoccupation, she got the money; or if, he being on the farm, the lodger paid the reckoning into her own hand. Otherwise she lost it entirely. Mother never asked for money for herself, probably because she felt too much humiliated in the asking, but as her girls grew up and needed cash upon occasion, she did it for them. When I had reached high-school and later normal-school age and I needed a dollar a month to pay for my toll ticket across the interstate bridge, she and I alike dreaded the monthly ordeal of getting that dollar. As the time drew near we watched closely for the auspicious occasion that would make reproach least likely. The best time of all was on Saturday night just after supper, when father would be handing out ten dollar bills to the boys "to have a good time."

"Give Cora a dollar, too, daddy. She needs it for toll."

"What? Again?" and the smile of Jove benevolent faded into narrow-eyed suspicion.

As soon as I could attain to the educational distinction of a two years' certificate from the normal school, mother's dream for her eldest was realized, the toll battles were forgotten—one woman at last was free. Eighteen and free. Free to do as I wished with my own.

There were differences between my father and me as to what constituted my own. Through a good many years he suffered from my inability to see that I ought to turn my monthly pay checks over to him; and my silly way of hoarding money for more education gave him acute distress. I remember that when I left for the university, $750 cash in hand—the result of three years' teaching—he sulked in the barn-yard and refused to say goodby. He was indignant to see me throwing away my money. But three years later when I returned I was astonished to know that he was proud that I had graduated and indeed was giving himself some credit for this higher education in the family.

Once the two-year certificate had freed me, not even love's young dream could rob me of wariness. The most desirable youth in the world, in a boy and girl affair, pleaded the blessedness that would ensue if we would but take the reins in our hands and the bits in our teeth (two separate arguments), but realist that I had to be I argued the necessity for his finishing college and getting himself established before we took any fatal steps. And the worst pitfall of all was safely avoided. The most desirable youth in the world was a no-account college student and a philanderer as well, and that was the end of him as an argument. Years afterward I met him again. He had become a second-rate bookkeeper, his wife had had seven children in as many years, of whom only two survived, and every pay-day he handed his salary over to a broker to be gambled on the stock exchange or he lost it in backroom crap games. The home was mortgaged and the wife was sticking it out until the children should be up from under her feet. He was still philandering.

Other men have come my way. One planned a house for me and insisted on a nice big kitchen. That was the end of him. Another dear kind soul with whom I thought I could live rapturously could not build a fire on a camping trip and fancied always when he was lost that the Pacific Ocean must be in the east. The psychoanalyst will say—but who cares what the psychoanalyst will say? I know myself that if I had done otherwise in any one of these three marriage opportunities I would have been a fool.

Having learned my lesson complete and being a creature with a sense of responsibility to womanhood, I have passed on the lesson as best I could. A good many years of my life have gone into helping mother pass it on to my father's other daughters, and being engaged in rearing his family I have felt less the lack of one of my own. All of my sisters have achieved something more than the usual education; some are teachers, some are business women, and any of the three who being married may find in marriage too many fetters has power and ability to strike the irons away. They have, in other words, freedom in their souls.

To confirm the fear of the good souls who tremble for the human race and see it tottering to total extinction as female educationists ply their guile upon the artless young, I might as well now confess that the thirties found me with a doctor's degree, and the forties with a full professorship, in which I enjoy unlimited scope for preaching to men and women alike the need for economic independence of women as an honorable and self-respecting basis for love and marriage. One can hardly hope that any lesson is ever learned complete. Perhaps the tranquil, peaceful, rich life I live is more of an argument than any words I shall ever say.

In Weakness There Is Strength

By FRANK R. KENT

IT has been penetratingly said that a woman's strength often lies in her weakness—particularly if she is a beautiful woman—but that does not hold good with politicians. It has never been true as to Presidents. Yet an analysis of Mr. Coolidge's career not only as President but before rather bears out the idea that his feebleness and futility have helped rather than hurt him politically. And he isn't beautiful either.

It would not be the case at all if he were now, or if he ever had been, the titular leader of the minority party. Under such circumstances strength, courage, color, virility are required to play the game successfully and keep one's grip from slipping. The Coolidge record shows that none of these things is required of a politically minded Executive of the dominant party. In the absence of a national crisis and in a time of prosperity his lack of strength is an asset rather than a liability, provided he has sufficiently powerful press support and the approval of the great business interests—and no President of our time has had both to the same extent. The best illustration of the truth of this idea about Mr. Coolidge is presented by the McNary-Haugen farm-relief bill, which—barring accidents—by the time this article appears, or soon thereafter, will have been passed by Congress and put up to the President. To a stronger man the position in which this places him might easily prove fatal to his political prospects. To a man of more robust fiber and a fighting spirit it would at least prove enormously embarrassing. To the austere and acidulous Calvin, disappointing as that will be to some who would like to see him in a jam, it will do neither.

This does not mean it will be a pleasant experience, or that whether he signs or whether he vetoes the bill he will not sustain a certain loss. But it does mean that his political injury and embarrassment will be small compared to what it would be were he the sort of man who fights for his beliefs and who is not beaten without the other side knowing there has been a fight. Consider the facts about him and this bill. From the start he has been opposed to it because his Morgan advisers and the two Cabinet members upon whom he principally leans and to whom he looks for guidance both pointed out that it was a socialistic proposal, economically unsound, unworkable in practice, worthless as a remedy, and terribly dangerous as a precedent. That was and that still is, if Republican journalistic supporters can be relied upon, his idea of the bill. At the last session it was killed by Administration influence, although Mr. Coolidge himself, as is his habit, cautiously refrained from overt hostility. This time the enraged Corn Belt farmers, enhanced in strength and determination, formed an alliance with certain cotton Senators, put in their bill again, swept aside the Administration compromises, and are pressing forward to victory.

A few weeks ago a writer who usually reflects the White House attitude with remarkable accuracy heralded the Crisp-Curtis bill, which contains everything the Haugen bill does except the equalization fee and is in effect a general surrender, as the Administration solution, predicted its passage, and proclaimed that this would mean the end of the Lowden movement and the farm-relief issue. Such was the general idea, but it did not work out. The forces back of the other bill were too strong and Mr. Coolidge was too weak. The movement that sidetracked the Administration measure and brought the McNary-Haugen bill to a point where today it seems sure Mr. Coolidge will have to sign or veto it was engineered by Mr. Dawes and Senator Brookhart with Mr. Lowden in the background. Everybody knows that. If the bill finally goes through the only reason it will not be a knock-down defeat for Mr.

Coolidge is that he did not stand up for a real fight. Perhaps something will happen to kill the bill again. The President hopes so, and you can never tell in Congress until the last lap is run. The claim is made that if it is passed this session and Mr. Coolidge vetoes it he will give tremendous impetus to the Lowden movement, infuriate the farmers of the West, and insure a revolt against himself. On the other hand, if he signs the bill the contention is that his solid business support in the East and some of his newspaper support, too, are bound to be shocked at his failure to stand firm against an economic heresy, and will leave him. But it is not likely to happen to Mr. Coolidge, no matter what he does. If he signs the bill his Eastern business backing will not like it but they will pour out their wrath not on Mr. Coolidge but on Congress. And if he vetoes the bill the Corn Belt boys will tear their hair, rip, rave, and roar—but the blame will be placed on Herbert Hoover, not on Calvin Coolidge.

In spite of the feeling of some astute political prophets around Washington the chances are that the net result of his farm-relief fight, whatever happens to the bill, will not greatly alter the situation so far as the Republican nomination is concerned. Whichever way the cat jumps it will do Mr. Coolidge no vital damage. Already some of his staunchest press supporters are beginning to say that the changes in the bill are such as to make it possible for the President to approve it without doing violence to his previous convictions, that its objectionable features have been eliminated, that the farm-relief people have met him half way, that he has "veered around" to the view that the price-fixing features in their present form are not so bad—all of which is rot. What he will do if the bill comes to him he himself in all probability does not know. It will depend upon what seems to be the best politics. He will give that deep thought.

Averting Calamity

By STUART CHASE

ON a winter day early in the year 1925 a gentleman dealing in millinery was found hanging with a rope about his neck in his showrooms. He was quite dead. Style had killed him.

Nineteen twenty-five was a bad winter and spring for milliners. Women had gone on the loose in an unaccountable fashion. Instead of wearing the hats they had been instructed to wear by the normal channels of trade pressure, they had taken style into their own hands and were buying felt hats simply trimmed; or, what was worse, not trimmed at all. And this unprecedented independence threatened to annihilate the bulk of the millinery business. "The makers of ribbons, flowers, braids, and straws," said Editor and Publisher, "are compelled to gaze upon the whole feminine world wearing something on their bobbed heads that wasn't made by millinery manufacturers at all! For the first time in anybody's remembrance a whole industry has been deserted almost without warning."

The milliners stood trembling on the brink of the abyss, but they did not take the plunge. The highest kind of the higher salesmanship saved them in the nick of time. The machinery which accomplished this miracle is worthy of attention. It shows what can be done nowadays to a buying public that exhibits symptoms of a wrong-headed and unprofitable independence. Mr. Edward L. Bernays, Counsel on Public Relations, tells the story, and well may he be proud of it, for it reflects great honor upon his profession.

> Obviously strong medicine was needed, and at once. The methods of display advertising were scarcely possible in such an emergency, which had already reached to the stage of an established style. There was only one emergency tool which could do the job—the indirect tool of publicity, validly based on news-creation. If society women and artists could initiate a counter-current of style, then all might not be lost. Style is like a great tidal wave; dikes can't hold it, but the powerful pull of the gravitational force which induces it to flow west can also make it flow east.

The simile is apt. East-bound gravitation started with the semi-annual style show in New York in February, 1925. "The basic idea applied as a remedy was to interest key leaders of art and society and trade in higher millinery standards of beauty." Two groups were created: the first composed of artists "who definitely gave the millinery displayed artistic standing"; the second made up of society women, "who sponsored the 'artistic movement' back toward standard millinery materials."

Heyworth Campbell, art director of the Condé Nast publications, headed the committee of artists which had to select the beautiful live models who wore the hats (adequately trimmed hats) "on the basis of carriage, pose, grace, and entire form as well as facial beauty." The artists had also to judge one of each class of hat represented, in respect to "the beauty of the model, her hat, and her entire ensemble costume." Thus the hat was happily linked, in news value, to the charms of the manikin as well as to her frock and the rest of her costume, if any.

After the winning model in each class was selected by the assembled artists her photograph was taken by a leading New York photographer. Hundreds of them appeared in the rotogravure sections of the Sunday newspapers throughout the country. The pictures were also used in traveling exhibits to retail establishments. Gravitation began to pull. The authority of its sponsors could not be ignored by retailers. "They began to shape their millinery purchases, window displays, and publicity along the new lines." Meanwhile publicity experts were at work upon news reports of the style show. Articles, interviews, special illustrated stories, began to pour in upon editors, in a volume sufficient to create authentic news value. Carefully instructed salesmen of millinery houses descended upon merchandise managers and millinery stores armed with "authentic news" and with the glad tidings that the new styles were ready to be shipped in quantity lots.

> In thirty days' time the millinery trades were humming again with activity. A casualty had been averted by the skilful use of sound public relations. . . . It was a subtly built plan, and it worked.

It was and did. Not only God but Counsels on Public Relations are masters of the mystic pulls of gravitation. Mr. Bernays holds, furthermore—and we cannot but agree with him—that the principle is applicable to all types of merchandise. "Ideas that desire to get public attention must avail themselves of this kind of mechanics." And so, happily, the consumer may forever cease from buying what he freely wants; and the Kingdom of Heaven of the Salesman will come upon earth.

High on the awful steps, above the Angel Gabriel himself, in morning dress, their honest faces transfigured with pleasure in a work well done, will sit Mr. Bruce Barton and Mr. Ivy Lee.

In the Driftway

WHY does nobody love an automobile? Our affections go out to a ship or boat; we prove it by calling almost any kind of vessel "she." The Drifter, too, was brought up to regard a locomotive engine as of feminine gender. The men who drive these great machines often come to care for them as they do for members of their family, and the Drifter rarely descends from a train after a long journey without pausing for a moment of tribute beside the locomotive as it stands grunting and panting after its race. For many persons nowadays the automobile has displaced both railway trains and boats. In many ways it is the most wonderful means of transportation ever invented. It contains more capacity for speed in less space and simpler form, usable at less cost and effort, than any other vehicle man has devised. In only twenty-five years of evolution it has become almost as dependable as the rising sun. It has the staying powers of a bore, and will stand more abuse without going on strike than any other delicate piece of machinery of which the Drifter knows unless possibly a $2 watch.

* * * * *

AND yet who has any affection for an automobile? Most men brag of their cars, a good many admire them, but do any become devoted to them as they do to other means of transportation, say boats or locomotive engines? (The Drifter never had a pet locomotive as a boy, but he assumes his readers were more fortunate.) What owner of a steam, motor, or sailing boat would take a day's trip without talking to his vessel on the way, without calling her "old girl," without urging, caressing, and bullying her? Nor would he think of making his boat fast at the dock and rushing away without a final glance of affection, a nod of friendship, in the direction of the vessel. Yet a man will drive a car 200 miles in a day, uphill and down, through sand and mud, in pelting rain and burning sun, without ever a kind word to the faithful engine. If the engine falters and pleads at the top of a steep hill the driver's only response is to shift to low and say "Hell!" And at the end of the trip out jumps the driver and runs into the house without a further thought unless that it is going to be the dickens of a job cleaning the mud off next Sunday morning.

* * * * *

BUT the final test of a man's affection comes in his willingness to sell. Nobody ever sold a boat, however dilapidated, without a pang. Age cannot wrench our affections from those things for which we care. Rather does it add dignity and worth. A man gets to be fond even of an old coat. But an old automobile? One can't get rid of it too soon. Many persons insist upon a new car every year; probably all would if they could afford it. An outworn or even outmoded automobile goes to the scrap-heap without a mourner.

* * * * *

NO, nobody loves an automobile. Everybody extols it, everybody must have it, but nobody cares for it. The Drifter can't guess the reason. Probably it has something to do with the age we live in—something to do with a lot of things the Drifter can't explain. Fortunately he doesn't have to. This column is not an information bureau. It is more often a confused and gaping interrogation point.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Lost: Cal's Economy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I notice in the report of the Bureau of the Budget that Calvin managed to use up in the fiscal year 1926 exactly $23,364.45 of the $25,000 allowed to the President of the United States by congressional legislation for traveling expenses. Hence it would appear that economy in Presidential traveling expenses has not been too emphatic under Calvin.

Washington, D. C., January 21 B. H.

The Great Oil Myth

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Were we not so accustomed to the superstition current in radical circles that the politics of the Powers exude from a petrol tank it would be disappointing to find in Anton Mohr and Louis Fischer two more victims of the great delusion. Save that the Standard Oil interests had a history formerly as spicy as their present methods are the reverse and that the Rothschilds brought the mythology of their name to mingle with the other materials available for the writing of romance, probably, this preoccupation with a single mineral would not so have taken hold of the journalistic fraternity.

The idea that there is a great and irreconcilable conflict between the Standard Oil interests and the Anglo-Persian and Royal Dutch "Shell" alliance is at variance with the fairly obvious facts of the present situation. The Soviet Government, whose allies were subsidizing trouble in the coal-fields while their trading agencies were pouring petrol into the fuel markets of Great Britain and the United States, is the only really formidable independent oil vendor in the world today. In the face of this rivalry, the British and American concerns have adjusted their differences and are cooperating all over the world. The "Shell" has recently erected one of the proudest office blocks in the Middle West in the city of St. Louis, where its headquarters is, if anything, more majestic than its offices in London. Its distributing system laces across the Mississippi Valley, and the "Shell" and the Standard companies are helping to finance the new coal-oil process, or at any rate the sale of the product devised by the German, Bergius. In Northern Persia the Anglo-Persian has welcomed the Standard Oil interests as an ally against the operating owners of the Caucasian wells. In Canada and elsewhere on the American continent, the Standard and the British interests are patently collaborating.

With the entire machinery of the Communists—trade corporations, diplomatic service, trade unions, and political agitation—in an elaborate if elusive chain, fomenting trouble in the British and American coal-fields, in the oil-fields of Persia and from Canton and from certain innocent-looking quarters in Holland, in the Dutch East Indies, no wonder that the British and American petroleum companies have closed their ranks. The Communists have asked for it and they are going to get it—War!

Washington, January 24 J. T. WALTON NEWBOLD

On Religion

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Machiavelli remarks "Non requiri in principe veram pietatem, sed sufficere illius quandam umbram, et simultationem externam." Napoleon, with a number of other old reprobates, divided Poland into three parts in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. The Emperor William made his bandit-raids into China and Belgium with "Gott mit uns" on the uniform-belts of his soldiers. One of the slave-ships that Queen Elizabeth sent to the coast of Africa to make slaves was named the Jesus. Our public men are all ostentatiously pious, and go to church regularly, and say "God have mercy on us miserable sinners." Then they steal oil and boost the tariff. The most popular and appealing of all pictures of our President is taken when he is entering or leaving the sanctuary in Washington. That means many votes.

CHARLES EDWARD STOWE

Santa Barbara, California, January 15

Protection, Not Prohibition

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your review of two books on Maupassant suggests the equipment of books with a device for the protection of readers. Let the works of all admittedly abnormal, tainted, diseased authors be stamped as such. Inapplicable to the doubtful and the living, this would nevertheless tend to circumscribe a source of infection from the fetid past. It would secure protection without prohibition. The books would be there for such as find, or like to pose as finding, fleurs du mal piquant or soothing.

Perhaps my device is not really so original. Is it in a way foreshadowed by the magazines that give their contributors a kind of certificate of character, often with photograph attached?

Whitman, Mass., December 21 MARGARET GAFFNEY

"Safe" "Thinking"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A course was given recently at the University of Washington called "The Romantic Movement in American Literature," chiefly to teachers and advanced students.

Emerson and Thoreau came up for discussion. Most of those present considered the two authors too dangerous to be studied. One experienced teacher said it would take a genius to present their writings in a way that would be safe for young students in high school. Emerson was clearly an intellectual anarchist, and Thoreau such an outstanding individualist that he set himself up as a critic against his own government.

These things my daughter, a member of the class, told me. My interest in our intellectual atmosphere being quickened, I picked up her note-book—the one she used in garnering wisdom from "Introduction to Logic: Philosophy 5"—and happened upon this intriguing passage: "To get the partial contrapositive convert the obvert of the original proposition: to get the full contrapositive obvert the convert of the obvert."

That seemed safe, anyway.

Seattle, Washington, January 6 JANE GARROTT

Yehudi Menuhin and The Nation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It may interest you to know that Yehudi Menuhin loves his weekly Nation next best to his violin. It is upon his request that I am now asking you to see to it that we do not miss any copies. The Nation is of a great help to us to give Yehudi a liberal education. We prefer to teach him privately at home. The first doses of The Nation were small, picked editorials or articles. That was around his ninth birthday. You would be surprised to see what a big part of a Nation Yehudi consumes ravenously each week. Yehudi has not reached his tenth birthday.

A few days ago, while on a hike with his best friend through the Golden Gate Park, prior to his appearance with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra as soloist in the Tchaikovsky Concerto, I overheard their heated debate about Debs. His friend told him that the high-school teacher had called Debs "a downright law-breaker"; to which Yehudi answered that on the contrary Debs was "not only a lover of humanity but also a lover of human individuals" . . .

I have not missed one copy of The Nation for the last fourteen years. I feel doubly happy that my son has been deeply infected with and inspired by that redeeming feature of the new America which is in the making—the New York Nation.

San Francisco, December 18 MOSHE MENUHIN

Afraid of Socialism?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I bear you a grudge. I have recently returned from England, where labor leaders and most of the "intelligentsia" proclaim their full-blooded socialism, where not even liberals shy at the word, where political parties stand for definite economic programs, where the trade-union movement is politically conscious.

I returned to America, where fundamentalism versus evolution is still one of the absorbing issues, where most radicals are skittish of any association with the term "socialist" and cherish respectability as the most cardinal of virtues, and where the most daring of journals has for its economic program the entirely admirable but somewhat obvious proposal of free trade.

True, The Nation valiantly espouses the cause of political prisoners and occasional strikers, and staunchly advocates race and religious toleration and the free progress of science. These have surely won for it its reputation as the foremost American journal of its kind. But it handles anything smacking of comprehensive economic reorganization or of socialism gingerly or not at all. Trade unionism and progressive republicanism (an evanescent political program at best) it finds worthy enough—even socialism, so long as it remains in England, where American liberals can coquet with it on the theory that there it is of a more aristocratic and innocuous species.

Doutbless I shall still look to The Nation as the somewhat "respectable" expression, but withal the finest American expression, of a movement which will one day be sturdier and more virile, no matter what its name.

Milwaukee, Wis., January 10 DORIS BERGER WELLES

George Converse Fiske

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For a long generation your wise pages have chronicled from time to time, as among the important events of American life, the passing of one or another quiet American scholar. And today (January 8) you will need to chronicle the passing of Professor George Converse Fiske, a sturdy New Englander of old stock (Harvard A.B. '94, Ph.D. 1900), who for twenty-six years worked for classical culture at the University of Wisconsin, here in the new and recalcitrant Middle West, where many of the best secondary-school teachers have been his pupils. He worked hard and victoriously, equally in the undergraduate classroom with Livy and Latin composition, in the seminary with Tacitus's "Germania" or the Sixth Book of the "Aeneid" or the "Epistola ad Pisones," and at his desk in significant discoveries, particularly in Roman religion and in Greek rhetorical theory as a major influence on Roman satire. His great study on Lucilius and Horace is one of the outstanding contributions in Latinity of our generation in the United States, or indeed in Europe. And besides completing the double and all but impossible American task of college teacher and university professor, he completed the good life of courage, humor, loyalty, kindliness, and simplicity. We said completed, but at fifty-four Professor Fiske's work, however complete, was far from completed—either as teacher, scholar, or friend. At the time of his sudden and unexpected death—it was from heart-failure a week after an operation for appendicitis—he was preparing for publication a volume, "Rhetoric and Literary Criticism," for the well-known series Our Debt to Greece and Rome.

Madison, Wis., January 8 WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD
GRANT SHOWERMAN

International Relations Section

Cooperatives in South Tyrol

By M. SERING

THE farmers of South Tyrol have at all times enjoyed independent self-administration of their communities, from the time their forefathers settled there more than a thousand years ago. When modern commerce necessitated the building of free economic unions as substitutes for public organizations, out of the ancient spirit of a neighborly community was developed a strong cooperative movement. The annexation of South Tyrol by the Italians, however, has put an end to the self-government of the communities: in the whole of Italy the administration of each community has been put under a podesta, usually an Italian public school teacher, often a former petty officer. The members of both town and rural communities lack any representation of their interests. But although the cooperative communities had to suffer severely under the new conditions, they remained at first untouched. Only during the last two years have the Fascisti, at the command of the local boards of administration, begun to attack the agricultural cooperative societies. The foreign press has only reported the struggle against the German language, the banning of every German word from the law courts and the public schools, the prohibition of private instruction in the mother tongue—a prohibition which cannot be found in any other civilized country throughout the world. But only a few newspapers reported the internecine war against the cooperative societies. Wandering about the Tyrol, talking with the small farmers as well as with the business men of the towns, I have learned the facts.

The alteration of the frontiers was naturally followed by many economic difficulties for the farmers. Their chief products suffered by low prices. Their beautiful farms are scattered along the wooded mountains nearly up to the snow line. A little lower down the open country allows the development of villages. Here live stock, together with agriculture, furnish the chief market products. In the river valleys and on the slopes the culture of wine grapes and fruit predominates. Except for a temporary boom in wood prices are hardly profitable. The former valuable market for cattle in Austria and Bavaria is lost. The foot-and-mouth disease has spread to a hitherto unknown extent and has destroyed the live-stock markets. The cultivation of wine grapes suffers from the increased import duties of Austria, Southern Germany, and Switzerland. The more extensive cultivation and the more favorable climate of Italy cheapen the Italian wines and thus lower the prices both at home and abroad. The changed money value shook credit and caused grave losses of fortune, as did the repudiation of the Austrian war loan by Hungary.

After this the cooperatives came particularly to the front. The farmers turned from meat to the production of milk and butter, and founded for this purpose a number of cooperative dairies. They do a good business. The very important wine cooperatives are endeavoring to conquer the German wine market. By dint of great industry the fruit farmers and their unions, with the help of a great export firm, succeeded in regaining the old markets and in winning new ones. Their valuable products command good prices in Germany, Holland, and Scandinavia. The buying departments are just as busy as the selling departments. The Agricultural Cooperative Union (Landwirtschaftliche Verband) protects the prices of the farmers' requisites and keeps an eye on the quality of these articles. The exchange amounted to 10,000,000 lire in 1925.

The foundation of the whole system is the Raiffeisen banks. Eighty per cent of all the farmers are shareholders or savers in them. After the war they separated from the former headquarters in Innsbruck and founded a special revisionary council and central bank of their own. This concern began its activity in September, 1921, and in a short time attracted most of the cooperative business. This central bank also succeeded in liquidating the Bozen department of the Farmers' Savings Bank in Innsbruck, which had suffered grave losses caused by the conversion of Austrian currency into Italian. With the help of the headquarters in Innsbruck the liquidation was carried out so as to save many farmers from further loss. Up to this time the Raiffeisen Central Bank has made its way through the whole crisis and has fulfilled its obligations without difficulty. The savings it has administered amounted to 24,700,000 lire at the end of 1925. The number of its members is increasing.

The credit cooperatives connected with the Central Bank are less favorably situated. They dispose, indeed, of money deposited to the amount of nearly 80,000,000 lire. If the state had not, shortly after the annexation, given a twenty-five years' respite to all credit institutions for public welfare—by the so-called guaranty law—a great part of them would have suffered heavily because of the conversion losses and because they possessed a great deal of worthless war loans. The state guaranteed the banks, in case of liquidation, against losses caused by the conversion; it promised to advance cash against such losses and, in fact, has paid out 20 per cent on account. The Raiffeisen organizations still have 20,000,000 lire in losses caused by the conversion which are secured by the state's guaranty, which, however, has not yet been made good. Furthermore, the credits given by the Raiffeisen institutions are not at all available. So the result is that the farmers' assets are frozen and unavailable, a great disadvantage for the entire agricultural population.

The Fascist attack upon the cooperatives of Tyrol is based on the contention that the cooperatives act in an anti-Italian manner. The fact is, however, that they have consciously abstained from every political activity. The central organization in Bozen very soon recognized the necessity of seeking support from similar unions in Italy. The agricultural union joined with the Federation of Agricultural Cooperatives at Piacenza, the wine cooperatives with the Federation of Wine Cooperatives at Modena. The Raiffeisen Central Bank and the local societies became members of the Federation of the Italian Cooperative Societies of Credit in Rome. Following the example of the Tyrol, central cooperative banks were founded in some ancient Italian provinces, and on the platform and in the press the central organization in Bozen agitated for the foundation and completion of the Italian Raiffeisen organization by the foundation of a central institute in Rome.

The Fascisti in Trent wish not to neutralize the cooperatives politically, but instead to destroy them. The free self-sustaining organizations are to be destroyed and in their place societies dependent upon the state and the Fascist Party alone may exist. A press campaign has been directed against the Central Bank, accusing it of financing the German Union and of causing the boycott of Italian wares and of influencing German travelers against Italy. To meet these charges the Central Bank named as a second director an Italian of the old provinces and with the consent of the governor voluntarily laid open all its accounts, down to the smallest item. The investigation was completed without any official objection. The Central Bank also acceded to the wish of the board of administration to discharge some members of its committee who were politically "objectionable." Nevertheless, the struggle of the Trent financial institute against the central institute went on. A "blond renegade" by the name of Steger permitted himself to be the tool in the struggle. He was made general secretary of the German Union by order of the Government, and now edits two Fascist papers, the Bauernbote and the Alpenzeitung, published in German but subsidized from Rome.

For October 3, 1926, the Central Bank and its revisionary council had called general meetings to elect a committee and to decide whether to join the compulsory syndicate of the Italian Raiffeisen institutions. The directory of the German Union had shortly before called a general meeting in the same hall, on the same day, but both meetings were violently broken up by intruders, among whom were hired Black-shirts from Trent (the local Bozen Fascio was unwilling to do such dirty work), and the representative of the Government, when appealed to for protection, refused to stop the clubbing.

The following day the Governor of Trent published a decree which dissolved the committee of the revisionary council because of the opposition shown in the chief meeting. In its place a commissioner of the Government was appointed; at the same time he was made overseer of the Central Bank. This commissioner is none other than the appointed (not elected) Mayor of Bozen, who had been put in the place of the dissolved common council and is at the same time a functionary of the Istituto Federale. He immediately appointed an Italian secretary and made Italian the language of administration and intercourse in the institution, although only a few members understand it. Finally the first director, who had served many years in the Central Bank, was banned from the boundary provinces. Under pressure of the Government, the directors were forced to resign. Their place has been taken by Fascisti Italians.

No one knows whether it would have been worth while appealing to Rome to regain for the Raiffeisen banks the right to administer their own money. The question is whether there will in the future be any free cooperative movement in South Tyrol. The situation seems not to be quite hopeless, however. The attempt made by the Istituto Federale to create a special compulsory syndicate under its control, a syndicate that was to comprise the Tyrolian Raiffeisen Banks and make them dependent, has failed. The central federation of the Raiffeisen Institutes in Rome, to which the Tyrolian societies belong, has recently been declared a legally compulsory syndicate. In Rome there seems to be some recognition of the fact that the local governing boards of South Tyrol have seriously injured the economic interests of the districts confided to them. Their actions violate the spirit of communal unity that lives in the cooperatives and must penetrate the relations between nations and nationalities if Europe is not to suffer from still greater hatreds, struggles, and poverty.

Contributors to This Issue

NORMAN HAPGOOD has been editor of Collier's Weekly, Harper's Weekly, and Hearst's International.

FRANK KENT, vice-president of the Baltimore Sun, is sending The Nation biweekly Washington letters.

THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL of Denver, Colorado, won the latest Yale Press competition for younger poets with a volume called "High Passage."

ELIZABETH SHEPLEY SERGEANT will publish her volume of American portraits, "Fire Under the Andes," in March.

HAVELOCK ELLIS is the author of "The Soul of Spain" and other famous books.

HENRY W. NEVINSON, British journalist and author of "More Changes and Chances," reviewed Edith Durham's "The Serajevo Crime" in The Nation for March 24, 1926.

CLARENCE WALWORTH ALVORD is the author of many volumes dealing with Western American history.

LLEWELYN POWYS'S latest book is "The Verdict of Bridlegoose."

H. S. JENNINGS is professor of zoology at Johns Hopkins University.

J. A. HOBSON, British economist, is a contributing editor of The Nation.

ALLEN TATE is a poet and critic of New York.

IRWIN EDMAN'S latest book is "The Education of Richard Kane."

KEITH HUTCHISON is a British journalist.

DANIEL GREGORY MASON is professor of music at Columbia University.

WILLIAM MACDONALD is author of "A New Constitution for a New America."

ERNESTINE EVANS is a frequent contributor to magazines.

M. SERING is a professor in the University of Berlin.

The author of One Way to Freedom is a professor in a Southern university.

Men—What of 'em?

Third Nation Dinner

February 15

Speakers

LORINE PRUETTE, who, as a sociologist, pities mere man in an age when women dominate;

RUTH HALE, who disposes of the weaker sex with brilliant and poisonous words;

JOHN MACY (Bruce Bliven, by speeding South has escaped the combat), who is writing a book on woman and has a virile respect for man. (Did you read his blast in the November Harper's?)

FREDA KIRCHWEY, who will be as near an impartial chairman as a frail woman can be.

THE FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 Fifth Aveuue
7 P. M.

$2.75 each for Nation subscribers and their guests.

Telephone for reservations—
Whitehall 7730

The Nation

Vol. CXXIV, No. 3215 WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1927

1817 The HOUSE of HARPER 1927

takes pleasure in announcing

THESE NEW AND IMPORTANT BOOKS

FICTION

Tomorrow Morning

By Anne Parrish

"Even truer, even more pitifully funny and sad than 'The Perennial Bachelor'."—Kathleen Norris. A tremendous success. $2.00

The Red Pavilion

By John Gunther

"Genuine sophistication."—New York Times. "The best attempt to do for American society what Huxley has done for the English variety."—The New Yorker. $2.00

Jill

By E. M. Delafield

A remarkable novel of the break-down of morale in post-war England. E. M. Delafield's best novel. $2.00

One Crystal and a Mother

By Ellen DuPois Taylor

"Astonishing. I never came across a first novel that had one-half its brilliancy."—Ford Madox Ford. $2.00

BIOGRAPHY

As It Was

By H. T.

Introduction by J. Middleton Murry

An idyll from life. "The memorable story of a love that was utterly candid."—J. Middleton Murry. $2.50

Michael Collins

By Pierce Beasley

The official biography of the great Sinn Fein leader. Fascinating and significant. Two volumes. $10.00

Through Many Windows

By Helen Woodward

"One of the most remarkable autobiographies that ever came out of American business."—Baltimore Evening Sun. $2.50

Portraits and Portents

By A. G. Gardiner

Brilliant verbal portraits of a number of contemporary celebrities by a famous English editor. $3.00

HISTORY

The Human Adventure

By James Henry Breasted and James Harvey Robinson

A monumental history of human progress by two of the greatest living historians. Two volumes. Over 500 illustrations and 1,400 pages. $10.00

POETRY

The King's Henchman

By Edna St. Vincent Millay

A lyric drama of Saxon England, a play of great beauty by one of the most distinguished of living poets. The newest American opera. $2.00

Autographed edition: 31 copies. $25.00

Limited Edition: 150 copies. $10.00

HUMAN RELATIONS

The Babbitt Warren

By C. E. M. Joad

The author of "The Future of Morals" holds the mirror up to America. Acrid and stimulating. $2.50

American Labor and American Democracy

By W. E. Walling

An illuminating survey of the policies and achievements of the American Federation of Labor. $3.00

The Art of Being Ruled

By Wyndham Lewis

"The importance of Wyndham Lewis cannot be overestimated, and 'The Art of Being Ruled' is certainly his best book."—Osbert Sitwell. $4.00

Why We Behave Like Human Beings

By George A. Dorsey, Ph.D.

Now in its third successful year. The best book in its field. Praised unanimously by critics and psychologists. $3.50

MURDER

Murder For Profit

By William Bolitho

"It is a book that Shakespeare and DeQuincey would have reveled in."—Christopher Morley. $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS • Publishers since 1817 • New York City

ROME THE LAW-GIVER

By J. DECLAREUIL

Professor in the University of Toulouse

This volume sets forth in luminous fashion the formation of Roman law; its evolution; the establishment of a public order where the rights of the individual are reconciled with social interests; finally, the loss of equilibrium due to exaggerated individualism on the one hand, and on the other to the establishment of State Socialism. In the History of Civilization Series. $6.00 net

THE FALL OF ROBESPIERRE

And other Essays

By ALBERT MATHIEZ

Translated from the French by CATHERINE ALISON PHILLIPS

On the basis of unpublished documents, the author, perhaps the most distinguished of the younger French historians of today, undertakes a defense of Robespierre, a reconstruction of the current conceptions founded on misinformation and false interpretation. Robespierre is shown in his relations with Aigoin, Deshorties, Fouquier-Tinville, Catherine Théot, and others, for proof of his part in certain events, notably the Terror, in connection with which he has been persistently misrepresented by historians. $4.00 net

THE RACIAL BASIS OF CIVILIZATION

A Critique of the Nordic Doctrine

By FRANK H. HANKINS

Professor of Sociology in Smith College

This book, the seasoned work of a temperate scholar, presents a constructive account of the rôle of race in the advancement of human and social life, accompanied by a concise analysis of the established facts bearing upon every aspect of the racial question. But it does more than that; it offers a convincing and authoritative refutation of the Nordic Myth as expounded in particular by such writers as Grant, Stoddard, McDougall, Brigham, Burr, Gould, and others. $3.75 net

Contents

Part I—A Critical History

I. Introduction
II. Aryanism
III. Gobinism
IV. Teutonism
V. Anthropo-Sociology or Social Selectionism
VI. Celticism and Gallicism
VII. Anglo-Saxonism and Nordicism in America

Part II—Concept and Social Rôle of Race

I. Introduction
II. Concept of Race
III. Are There Pure Races?
IV. Are Race and Nation Identifiable?
V. Political Significance of Race
VI. Are Races Equal?
VII. The Problem of Race Mixture
VIII. Are Racial Characteristics Unchanging?
IX. Changes in the Hereditary Constitution of a Population
X. Race and Cultural Opportunity

FINE CLOTHES TO THE JEW

By LANSTON HUGHES

Author of "The Weary Blues"

These poems interpret the so-called lower-class Negroes in America—the bell-boys, the cabaret girls, the migratory workers, the singers of Blues and Spirituals; the makers of folk-songs. As in The Weary Blues, Mr. Hughes expresses the joy and pathos, the beauty and ugliness of their lives. $2.00 net

THE FIELD OF MUSTARD

By A. E. COPPARD

Anthor of "Fishmonger's Fiddle," etc.

"Mr. A. E. Coppard's latest collection of stories will satisfy all who admire his talent, and those who may come to his work for the first time through this book will recognize the hand of a born story-teller with strongly marked individual qualities. Mr. Coppard sees into the crooked corners of the heart a little derisively, like a troll, but that is his affair. Our affair is that he makes art of what he sees."—The London Times. $2.50 net

Joseph Wood Krutch, Carl Van Doren, and Mark Van Doren, listing independently for THE NATION under "Interesting Books of 1926," included Thomas Beer's The Mauve Decade and H. L. Mencken's Prejudices: Fifth Series. Other choices were Alcohol and Longevity by Raymond Pearl, The Orphan Angel by Elinor Wylie, and The Decline of the West by Oswald Spengler.

ALFRED A. KNOPF BORZOI BOOKS 730 FIFTH AVE., New York

Midwinter Book Section

The Nation's Prize Poem for 1927

This Foreman

By THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL

"What did you see when the girders rose?"
"A house of steel, a net."
"What else?"
"Men in their working clothes,
Men with their foreheads wet;
I saw them sway on the high steel beams,
But I knew their heads were wet."

"Did you see a workman slip and fall dead?"
"I saw one leave the steel;
I heard what some of the others said,
And I saw the swallows wheel
Round the foreman with the twisted head,
Whose foot was half a heel."

"When the man fell, what did this foreman do?"
"He sang, he sang like a swan
Of how two naked lovers loved
In a cage of steel till dawn;
He sang—and his mouth was a slit of dark—
Of a sword that could be drawn."

"You say you heard this foreman sing?"
"I heard him sing like a swan."
"You say this foreman stopped to sing
When a man had fallen down?
(He says he heard this foreman sing
Like a swan when a man fell down.)"

"You heard this foreman testify?"
"I heard each word he said."
"Now briefly what did the witness say?"
"He said when the man fell dead,
He slid like a flash to the dead man's side
And gave the dead first aid."

"All right, now what did this foreman do?"
"I heard him sing like a swan
About two naked lovers trapped
In a web of steel till dawn."
"You swear to God you heard him sing?"
"By God, that man's the one."

"Court please, I'll ask the witness more,
Court please, I wish to show,
Court please, the witness on the stand,
Court please, is trying to
Make light of what he saw and mock
The State, Court please, and you."

"Do you affirm that this foreman sang?"
"I affirm that he's the one."

Now the bailiff hammers a terrible din,
But nobody shouts: Tin, tin, come in!
Because they all stare at the foreman instead.
Who licks the slit in his crooked head.

"You stayed there after twilight came?"
"The twilight did not come;
The steel net shone like a russet flame
At the touch of the watchman's thumb;
The men went home and the watchman walked
His rounds slowly and dumb."

"All right, the twilight did not come;
You stayed, what happened then?"
"I saw the foreman stealing back,
He climbed to the top again,
He moved in the misty girder net
And he sang like many men."

"Court please, I'll ask the witness more:
What did this foreman sing?"
"He sang the strength of steel and steel
In days past measuring;
He tapped the beams with a monkey wrench;
I could feel the high crane ring."

"You're sure it was a monkey wrench?"
"He sang of a snare for love;
He called to the silver hounds of love
In the wooded moon above,
And I heard him cry 'The hounds are dead.
What am I dreaming of?'"

"Go on, you heard this foreman sing?"
"I heard him sing like a ghost,
How a man gone down was a man to lead
The van of a falling host:
'Let my green steel stiffen in the frost
To snare what men love most!'"

"What men love most? He sang of that?"
"I did not understand,
For he sang of the living lives of men
As if the steel had spanned
Their lives with something true and cold
That nobody had planned."

"Did your family know that you were there?"
"Your honor, I object!"
"Sustained!"
"That's all."
"Go down the hall to the last door and collect
Your fee . . . the last door on the right."
"Poor chap, his mind is wrecked."
Two figures loitered down the hall,
And each signed for its fee.
"I could not understand your song,
Explain the hounds to me."
"Not here, fool! Climb the steel tonight,
The moon goes down at three!"

From the poems submitted in The Nation's annual poetry contest the editors have chosen "This Foreman" to receive the first prize of $100. The second prize of $50 is awarded to "Puye," by Mary Austin, and the third prize of $25 to "I Was a Maiden," by Clinch Calkins. Honorable Mention is given to Hal Saunders White, Pierre Loving, Allen Tate, and Charles Wagner. "Puye" will be published in the next issue of The Nation.

H. L. Mencken

By ELIZABETH SHEPLEY SERGEANT

COMING toward me, very swiftly, as I walked in the direction of Fifth Avenue on Forty-fourth Street, I saw a rather short, stocky figure of a man whose blue eyes shone ahead of him like a sort of searchlight. He leaned a little forward, stooping his shoulders, as if to hasten his pace, and he was strongly careened to the right: a boat under full sail. But what bore him down and forward was not a spanking breeze; it was an obviously weighty traveling bag, suspended from a long and almost simian arm. This pedestrian seemed more alertly intent on his way and his business than any other man within range; those china-blue eyes were not preoccupied with Forty-fourth Street at all, but with some inner objective toward which they were heading. It struck me with a shade of surprise that a prosperous bourgeois American should be carrying his own handbag instead of voyaging in a taxi. So, as he passed, I took rather special notice of a short, square, pleasant, determined face. The man was in his prime, yet there was something boyish about him. He belonged to the business world, yet there was something of the thinker in his mien. He was very much at home in New York—indeed, I thought I had seen him before myself—yet he had the air of a visitor. A provincial professor, of some very living subject, on his way to a congress? I fear I have spoken an insult. For the man I had noted was H. L. Mencken, on his way from Hollins Street, Baltimore, via the caves of the Heckscher Building, to the Hotel Algonquin.

I tracked him down at last, you see, in Alfred Knopf's waiting-room. I sat somnolently on a deep couch; in the shaded light Mencken was dismissing, very kindly, a young aspirant who would have liked to be told exactly how to write his article for the American Mercury. Mencken knows his influence with the youth of the age, and it has reached his ears that the writers in his magazine are prone to imitate him. He explained that he had now made it a rule to know nothing about any article until it reached his desk in finished form. So dismissing, he collided with a tall glass vase of red flowers. The vase fell over; young ladies with bobbed hair came running at the crash. Mencken was for a moment aghast. He made sounds and gestures of compunction and dismay. Then he came to himself. "Anyhow it was an ugly vase," he said, with that blue-eyed laugh which has something remote and mirthless about it, vanishing in the direction of his private lair while the secretaries picked up the pieces.

But he does not wish to be thought of as a "slayer," so he told me, very earnestly, on another occasion, in his rooms at the Algonquin, after an absinthe cocktail had been dispensed, and a perfect bottle of Moselle placed handy, and a well-chosen jellied bird—this befell on a hot summer day—set on the board. He need not have said it, for even in these impersonal hotel rooms he moves in an atmosphere of amenity. Only a gentle host, in the old-fashioned sense, a host who is also an artist—and surely artists are seldom slayers at bottom—could take so much trouble about gastronomy and vintages. I had expected to meet an artist and an epicure, but I was hardly prepared for the sentimentalist — the solid, Germanic sentimentalist — who emerged when he talked of Baltimore, its stable and familiar scenes: the red brick house with white trimmings, where he had lived for forty-odd years; the quiet domestic life that has gone on there; the classical orchestral music that is produced by the Saturday Night Club, where, with a group of tried old friends, doctors and professors, Mencken plays the second piano part. Even when Mencken is "slaying," it is, I think, to the great roll of the Eroica. In his daily friendly intercourse one hears another, less fateful, more fitful strain of music. From the moment of this first real talk I have associated with our most terrible and earth-shaking critic a word which he often uses in his writing, though few remember it when they, in turn, come to criticism of him. It is "charm." Like a lost flower, charm is carried away on the flood of his invectives.

When these invectives began, I felt confronted not by the sword of the slayer but by a mighty tide—a literal flood-tide of speech, rolling in, wave after wave, rising to a crest, subsiding, rising again, from the inexhaustible Great Lake of Mencken's absorbed and all-inclusive knowledge of what some might call (not he) the "folkways" of his country. The American scene, the American lot, the common American life, the faulty and fictitious American democracy. I speak of a Great Lake rather than of an ocean, for the waves were America-bound—except, perhaps, when he commended the fine tyrannical government of Frederick the Great—and they had, to my disaffected Puritan eye, used to the rocky northern seaboards, something a little featureless and uniform in their variety. Votes, senators, common decency, Bryan, Doctor Coolidge, boobs and yokels, button manufacturers, comstocks, wowsers, snouting and preposterous Puritans, "made for satirists as catnip was made for cats." H. L. Mencken rolled them all on the beach—on his tongue—like so much wreckage, for my fascinated eyes.

But suddenly a word was spoken that had another echo. It was LIBERTY. When that simple word resounds about Mencken's head, the waves of fluent speech recede. You see him, in the midst of a silence, posing with rapt blue eyes for the picture of a revolutionist of '48, or of an adolescent who has just won a contest with an autocratic father. To use another image, it is as if the traffic signals had changed, and a new light of faith had come out in a doubter's face. This abstract good, this Liberty, is what my Algonquin host was in need of. A fig for wine, women, and song! As Diogenes searched for an honest man, so does the editor of the Mercury search for a free Americano. In drawing the portrait of William Jennings Bryan at the Scopes trial he also drew the self-portrait of a lonely observer:

> When I first encountered him [Bryan] on the sidewalk in front of the office of the rustic lawyers who were his associates . . . the trial was yet to begin, and he was still expansive and amiable. The old boy professed to be delighted with the argument, and gave the gaping bystanders to understand that I was a publicist of parts. Not to be outdone, I admired the preposterous country shirt that he wore—sleeveless and with the neck cut very low. We parted in the manner of two ambassadors. . . . The next day the battle joined. . . . By the end of the week he was simply a walking fever. . . . What the Christian Scientists call malicious animal magnetism seemed to radiate from him like heat from a stove. From my place in the courtroom, standing upon a table, I looked directly down upon him, sweating horribly and pumping his palm-leaf fan. His eyes fascinated me; I watched them all day long. They were blazing points of hatred. They glittered like occult and sinister gems. Now and then they wandered to me, and I got my share, for my reports of the trial had come back to Dayton, and he had read them. It was like coming under fire.

It would have been worth a long journey to see the apostle of Liberty, standing on his table and staring down with curious, sea-blue eyes into the sinister orbs of the apostle of Fundamentalism. I believe that Mencken would sacrifice much for liberty, has indeed, with his strong courage, sacrificed much. Yet do not imagine that a trip to Dayton was a sacrifice. "Here am I, a bachelor of easy means, forty-two years old, unhampered by debts or issues, able to go wherever I please, and to stay as long as I please—here am I contentedly and even snugly basking beneath the Stars and Stripes." Staring at Bryan is one of Mencken's ways of "basking." He would not exchange it for ten trips to Rome. "This eternal struggle is sordid, but . . . it is also extremely amusing. It brings out, as the moralists say, the worst that is in human nature, which is also the most charming." The italics are mine, but mine is not the Catechism that I quote from the end of the Fifth Series of Prejudices:

> Q. If you find so much that is unworthy of reverence in the United States, then why do you live here?
>
> A. Why do men go to zoos?

A journalist cited to me, apropos of the two Menckens—the comedian of youth, whose tone is not so different, except that it is mature, from that of the Harvard Lampoon or any similar college paper, and the sardonic and solemn critic and pamphleteer of our life and letters who has made himself a great national force—the story of the man who went into a restaurant and first consumed a meal of sausage and sauerkraut: that was for his tape worm. Then he ordered the meal of an epicure: that was for himself. This solid and sentimental family man of Baltimore, argues my friend, the Mencken who believes in monogamy and proclaims that women should nurse their babies, and is sure that marriage is not a licensed week-end; this puritanical skeptic, with his bookish and even scholarly tastes and his need of a familiar solitude in which to formulate in highly wrought phrases his scheme of fatalistic valuations—he is doubled by a discursive and immensely curious journalist, a man of broader ways and humors, who must keep in touch with the worst that is known and thought in his country in order to ply the trade he entered upon as soon as he could escape from the family cigar factory: the trade of destructive and ironic critic of his day and hour.

New York, even from Mencken's standpoint, is less pernicious than the hinterland of the rustic. But it is a place where the gifts that he esteems least—his gifts as a business man and a high-class journalist—can draw their provender. Stimulated and repletely amused, the comedian makes a jump for the Pennsylvania Station, and by the time he has reached Hollins Street and entered into that solitary tomb of the serious writer which he has described so feelingly—the place where even Mencken has to fight with words and phrases to make them salient and responsive to his thought—he is again the civilized iconoclast, the almost tragic critic.

> There was something [he said of Beethoven] Olympian in his rages, and there was a touch of hell-fire in his mirth. . . . He concerns himself, not with the puerile agonies of love, but with the eternal tragedy of man. He is a great tragic poet, and, like all great tragic poets, he is obsessed by a sense of the inscrutable meaninglessness of life. . . . In his gorgeous music there went all of the high skepticism of the eighteenth century, but into it there also went the new enthusiasm, the new determination to challenge and beat the gods that dawned with the nineteenth century.

Mencken is not appraising himself when he thus appraises Beethoven. He is not appraising himself when he quotes Conrad as saying that his mission is "not to edify, to console, to improve, or encourage but simply to get down on paper some shadow of his own eager sense of the wonder and prodigality of life as men lead it in this world, and of its unfathomable romance and mystery." But men shall be known by their admirations as well as by their hates, and Mencken's outspoken praise, his deep intuitive sympathies for these great fatalistic artists is a kind of self-revelation. As from his championing of the Dreisers and the Willa Cathers and the Hergesheimers and the Cabells among native novelists one can draw a vision of the kind of American he is.

A non-Anglo-Saxon American—that is, a non-Puritan, a man of European rather than of British lineage. There is, as he says, undeniably > a difference in their primary instincts, in their reactions to common stimuli, in their ways of looking at the world, and that difference has, of late years, come to the estate of conflict, with the "Anglo-Saxon" striving to keep what he has—his point of view, his cultural leadership, his political hegemony—and the non-"Anglo-Saxon" trying to take it away from him. . . . To admit the conflict is to admit his clear right, nay, his bounden duty to battle for his side, passionately, desperately, and with any weapon at hand.

When I spend two or three hours with Mencken I become subtly aware that he is the descendant of gregarious, agnostic, scholarly, musical, extraverted Germans, saturated for centuries in the common life of the cafe and the marketplace and the popular classical concert, while I descend from lonely New England farmers and doctors and divines who meditated on eternity and morality and the state of their souls as they pursued their introverted and difficult lives. Mencken, though so much of a romantic Nietzschean individualist, hates and loathes his solitude as a writer, rages against it as he rages about his amenities, and worries not at all about his soul. Theoretically he loves to stand alone, a superior individual whose mission it is to resist and survive. Practically and actually he is a very gregarious human who enjoys a drummer or a Babbitt much better than a cultured man, studies his customs and his ideas and even his speech—remember that remarkable work "The American Language"—with close attention, though he cannot endure being governed by his opinions.

Henry Louis Mencken was born in the year 1880 in Baltimore. His life may already be found in extenso—such is our biographical age—in the compendious volume of Isaac Goldberg, Ph.D. If Mencken ever laughed at himself (I am not sure) it must have been when he saw those despised professorial stigmata on the cover. He himself, being an exceedingly personal writer—"What is in the head infallibly oozes out through the nub of the pen"—has told us practically everything we want to know about the mature Mencken, even to possibly undesired details of manicuring and pajamas. That he does so, rather consciously and objectively, and, when the comedian's manner is upon him, brazenly, I gather from sentences like this:

> An author, like any other so-called artist, is a man in whom the normal vanity of all men is so vastly exaggerated that he finds it a sheer impossibility to hold it in. His overpowering impulse is to gyrate before his fellow-men, flapping his wings and emitting defiant yells. This being forbidden by the polizei of all civilized countries, he takes it out by putting his yells on paper. Such is the thing called self-expression.

So Mencken does laugh at himself, sardonically enough. I wonder whether the editors of the Yale Review, the New Republic, the Saturday Review of Literature, or even the New Yorker would relish themselves, as this Mercurial editor does, in the guise of strutting fowls.

It is from Goldberg, rather than from Mencken, however, that I have learned his family history. His grandfather Mencken came to Baltimore in 1848 (not, we are assured, as a revolutionary patriot), entered a tobacco factory—for the German Menckens, earlier of the professional classes, had become men of commerce—bought a general store, then founded a tobacco factory of his own, a solid business which was continued by Mencken's father. The grandfather, in the childhood of young Henry, was a domineering old patriarch in a long-tailed black coat and "archaic" collars, who dosed his twenty grandchildren and drove them out in his swarming buggy. The father, another hard-headed, autocratic business man, destined his eldest son, Henry, for the tobacco business. Mencken often tells us that he inherited his agnostic habit of mind, as well as his liking for practical jokes, from his male ancestors. He would not, perhaps, allow as easily that inversely he may have drawn from this same dominant source his strong dislike for business as a profession and his male view—clear in the general and particular tone of his works—that women are very secondary to the constructive lives of men.

Henry had intentions of his own about his career. Having read "Huckleberry Finn" when he was six, beginning "seriously" to write by his twelfth year—he has characteristically preserved his first very creditable work, on A New Platinum Toning Bath for Silver Prints—having been, mirabile dictu, confirmed at the age of fifteen in the Lutheran church, having turned to poetic and musical composition, while at the Baltimore Polytechnic having adopted Huxley as his god, he determined to become a journalist. His time in the factory was brief. His father died, he took over the headship of the family, and once and for all settled down to live with his mother, and got an assignment on the Baltimore Morning Herald.

By 1903 he was city editor. By 1905, at the age of twenty-five, he was editor-in-chief. The next year he moved to the more famous Sun, where he stayed until 1917. His most notable work there was done for his free-lance column—the origin of the "Maryland Free State," of which he is so justly proud. He became literary critic of the Smart Set in 1908, to Nathan's dramatic critic; and thus began his long and affectionate association with the new literature and the new authors, like Dreiser, whom he helped so materially to show their heads above the walls of Puritan prejudice. Editor of the magazine in 1912, then owner, with Nathan, and finally editor of the American Mercury; this is the outline.

Add to this bare chronicle a vast number of allied activities in the field of critical letters, including the publication of many books, and you have a career multifariously active, aggressively successful, robust and exuberant; undoubtedly one of the most significant careers of contemporary America. Here is a vigorous trained mind, with sensitive literary and artistic perceptions and strong scientific interest, propelled by a temperament at once ruthless, fearless, and militant. Mencken disclaims idealism, scholarship, evangelism, yet he is really a sort of sadistic evangelist, a Puritan with a scalpel instead of a Bible, who is all the people he condemns. "It is difficult," he admits, "for an American to contemplate an American without something comparable to moral indignation."

Mencken's indignation and his isolation grow with the years. When he had gathered about himself a fairly numerous group of creative literary spirits—about his earlier self, the critic as artist, who smashed the old idols of wholesomeness and respectability—he turned away from them. They no longer needed him. Their cause was won. The parlous state of the democratic state called him to new and more bitter social action. The American Mercury takes less interest in the arts than the Smart Set of old, and more in social phenomena. The partnership with Nathan, which belonged to the aesthetic years, was here dissolved, and one finds the social critics, the historians, the doctors, and scientists taking the floor. Mencken admits that he can scarcely now read a current novel. "He will be Mayor of Baltimore in five years," remarked Nathan sagely.

Just then Mencken stuck his head, with its goblin ears, through the door to summon his delicate friend to lunch. "I hear you are to be Mayor of Baltimore?" "No, I refused the office. But I may run for Senator."

Take it as a joke or a prophecy, but be assured that "Notes on Democracy," that fierce, surgical diagnostic and dissection of our democratic scheme—"I am not engaged in therapeutics but in pathology"—is regarded by the author as his most important work. It is based on the theory that men are not alike, that politics is not soluble by the seraphic intuition of the boobs,

"The end of all true education is to produce genuinely independent individuals capable of taking intelligent charge of their own lives."
—Harry Emerson Fosdick

"These Handbooks are of value to any person who wishes to obtain facts on the subjects included."
Outlook

"As a means of establishing an orientation in the fields covered, nothing equals these Handbooks."
Survey

"Read them and your present opinions may not be changed, but you will have better justification for holding them."
Herbert Adams Gibbons

"I believe that if the more intelligent portion of the public knew of these Handbooks on the leading topics of the times, they would have a very large sale. Collected and carefully selected discussions of public questions are rare and few people have the patience, if the intelligence, to do such work for themselves."
Detroit News

". . . shares the thoroughness and scholarship of the rest of the Handbook series."
Bruno Lasker
Woman Citizen

The Wilson Handbooks

Compilations of Representative Arguments on Both Sides of Vital Issues. Concisely presented for busy people.

WAR—CAUSE and CURE by Julia E. Johnsen $2.40
Reprints of articles setting forth the major movements of recent times which have been launched in behalf of peace as well as the influences which are considered responsible for the wars of the past. Brief, bibliography, representative reprints.

STATES RIGHTS by Lamar T. Beman $2.40
How far can Federal power be extended without infringing on the rights of the state? Will increased Federal power advance more rapidly the progress of the individual? Brief, bibliography, representative reprints.

MARRIAGE and DIVORCE by Julia E. Johnsen $2.40
The growing instability of the marital relation and the home has become a matter of grave social concern. What underlying conditions are responsible and will uniform laws be a remedy? Brief, bibliography, representative reprints.

FUNDMENTALISM vs. MODERNISM by Eldred C. Vanderlaan $2.40
A source book of the discussion between the "Modernists" and the "Fundamentalists" in the American Protestant churches. Gives both points of view, from all angles, in the words of leaders on both sides, on Creeds, 'Inerrancy" of the Bible, Science and Religion, Evolution, Miracles, Virgin birth and the Bodily Resurrection, Position of the Modernists in the Churches. A selected bibliography is included.

"A helpful guide and reference work."
—Southern Evangelist.

"The volume does much in clarifying the situation so that one may really see what the controversy is all about."—Religious Education.

EVOLUTION by Edith M. Phelps $2.40
Like "Fundamentalism vs. Modernism," this volume is a source book of materials. Articles are selected and arranged to show what the theory of Evolution is and to present the evidence and arguments for and against it. Part II takes up the question of teaching the theory of Evolution in schools and colleges. A history of the opposition to the theory, including the Scopes' trial, is followed by articles defending or opposing the teaching of evolution. A selected bibliography is included also.

"A timely and useful book."

"Presents in well organized form and well chosen words the summary of the arguments pro and con."—Christian Statesman.

Complete list of subjects on request

The H. W. Wilson Company New York City
971 University Avenue

> that the world is a vast field of greased poles flying gaudy and seductive flags. Up each a human soul goes shinning, painfully and with many a slip. Some climb eventually to high levels; a few scale the dizziest heights. But the great majority never get very far from the ground. There they struggle for a while and then give it up. The effort is too much for them: it doesn't seem to be worth its agonies. Golf is easier; so is joining the Rotary; so is fundamentalism; so is osteopathy, so is Americanism.

Democracy is the government of the envious, of those who cannot allow their superiors—the ideally educated modern men, who have put away the immemorial fears of the race and are sure of themselves in this world—a chance to rule them. Democratic man hates the fellow who is having a better time than he, as the Puritan and the Prohibitionist do.

Is Mencken going by his invectives to swell the company of the governing aristocrats, as he undoubtedly swelled the company of the free writers? Is he, by his words of scorn, bringing out of their holes men of "common decency" who do not buy votes or office, or compromise with ideas for jobs? He seems to doubt it.

> The free man is one who has won a small and precarious territory from the great mob of his inferiors, and is prepared and ready to defend it and make it support him. All around him are enemies, and where he stands there is no friend. He can hope for little help from other men of his own kind, for they have battles of their own to fight. He has made himself a sort of god in his little world, and he must face the responsibilities of a god, and the dreadful loneliness.

The passage, as much as any in Swift's satires, seems to spring from a tragic source.

Mencken, it is well known, is a dominating contemporary influence in our universities. Yet he is not, in any daily human sense, close to the young. He still stands on a table of isolation, above these young collegians who stretch out their hands to him. Life, says Horace Walpole, is a comedy to those who think, a tragedy to those who feel.

It is easy to see whence the legend of Mencken the slayer arose. Straight from the books. Looking toward the human being I see a man with bright blue eyes and a gentle mouth, listening to a strain of music and surrounded by old and even elderly friends—mostly doctors and musicians and journalists, the happiest boon companions Baltimore has to offer. Mencken's friends know him as a man of originality, "hence of genuine charm." A man with a wine cellar. A man extraordinarily free. A man who has had a rare time in that silent study which is his tomb and his solace, charging innocent words with his own powerful brand of dynamite and arranging them in his own dangerous pattern. They know him as a man who likes to do a good turn to the very underdogs he affects to despise, and who would ill endure himself the iron rule of a Kaiser or a Mussolini. They know him as a romantic adventurer in the field of sex who feels love to be the business of the cool of the evening. They know him as one who has furnished more ideas to other men than any other living American critic. Perhaps he has failed to live up to the traditions of his substantial, patriarchal tribe, good citizens of the Free State, by remaining a bachelor. But the descendants of an original and generous artist are not always children of flesh and blood. They are sometimes, like Mr. Babbitt—Mr. Boob—the children of other men's brains.

Unchanging Spain

By HAVELOCK ELLIS

IT is common to regard Spain as one of the most unchanging and conservative of European countries. The common belief is here not altogether wrong. But Spanish stability allows of considerable flexibility, even of a decided taste for novelty. Spain was eager, rather than backward, to adopt electricity, the gramophone, the cinema. There is no need to read Gautier's narrative of his tour through Spain to realize how much Spain has changed its aspects in less than a century. Any one who, like the present writer, has been many times to Spain during a space of thirty or forty years can realize the rapidity with which the external Spain changes. Thus when first I stayed at the ancient shrine on the mountain height of Monserrat, twenty years ago, ascending indeed by the little mountain railway, I yet seemed to have escaped from the modern world. The days of calm exhilaration I spent there count among the finest moments of life, and the record of them appears in my book "The Soul of Spain." A few years later I went again, not expecting to repeat the experience, for I have always known that one can never bathe twice in the same stream, but desiring to investigate several points left over in my first visit. I found the atmosphere of Monserrat even more changed than I could have believed possible in so short an interval. The advertisements I had been so glad to miss were now duly emblazoned on the rock-walls. The hideous hoot of the automobile made impossible any realization of the nearness of the sky. And all day long workmen were noisily hammering at the task of erecting a tawdry pavilion on the little plateau in front of the monastery for the reception of the members of the International Cotton Congress. Sadly I came away, with no desire to ascend Monserrat again, and there is no record of that visit.

Yet, however much the temporal Spain changes—and some may give good reasons why the change should be still more rapid—there will always remain an eternal Spain. For the spirit of Spain represents one of the fundamental notes in the harmony which underlies the merely superficial conflicts of Europe. It is a note which has not only been struck deep in the spiritual history of man, but has had an incomparable physical resonance. The empire "on which the sun never set" has left a mark on the world which cannot be effaced, and it is a significant fact that of the four books before us now three are in one way or another associated with America.*

The exception is the first. Mr. Trend writes as an Englishman, and he has on more than one occasion emphasized the sympathy and affinity which in some respects bring the Englishman near to the Spaniard. It is indeed notable that from an early period the English, usually so slowly receptive, welcomed Spanish literature and Spanish art, being pioneers in the international appreciation of Cervantes and of Velasquez, while the most intimate and penetrating attempts to understand Spanish genius and Spanish life have often been English. Mr. Trend is today probably

* "Alfonso the Sage and Other Spanish Essays." By J. B. Trend. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

"Contributions to the Restoration of the Poema del Cid." By H. R. Lang. Revue Hispanique, Vol. 66.

"Spanish Folk Songs of New Mexico." Collected by Mary R. Van Stone. Chicago: Ralph Fletcher Seymour.

"El Vigia: Ensayos." By Jose A. Balseiro. Madrid: Mundo Latino.

the most conspicuous though by no means the only representative of this English spirit. In his numerous and varied little essays on Spanish subjects, of which this new volume contains a typical selection, we must not expect to find balanced, comprehensive, or judicial estimates. He is engagingly swayed by his feelings, he has his prejudices and his special tastes. He possesses an intimate knowledge of Spanish music but seems to have little interest in Spanish painting. In his mind, as in his manner of writing, there seems to be a certain inequality and caprice; he perhaps writes best where he can write most easily, of people, like the poet Campoamor, whom he neither loves nor hates, but who chance to possess a fragrance he can flutter around and inhale and happily capture for us also to inhale. His admiration for Pio Baroja, interesting as that novelist's work sometimes is, seems rather excessive, while his condemnation of Blasco Ibáñez is equally excessive. On that point, indeed, I can sympathize with Mr. Trend, who evidently feels that in gaining a popular international fame Blasco Ibáñez has lost his soul; but while the work of that writer has long ceased to possess any literary interest, it is wrong to dismiss his powerful early novels of the Valencia he knows so well as "crude stories of violence," and to fail to see that their author even today is a genuine and impressive representative of the Spanish spirit. When this has been said, however, we may take what Mr. Trend has to give us and be thankful. He gives us much; there can be few lovers of Spain who will not find something new in his pages, or fail to gain a fresh enjoyment of things they already know.

With Professor Lang of Yale we enter another world. He is not concerned with the Spain of today; he is not writing for the general reader; he is a scholar addressing scholars. Here he is concerned with one of the eternal monuments of Spanish art, the poem of the Cid, and the whole argument of his minutely elaborate work is that that poem was really written as a finished piece of art and not in the often irregular and crude versification in which it has come down to us. He seems to make out an excellent case for this argument—"that the task of rescuing a considerable portion of the verse from its present state of disorder is not so desperate as is often supposed." On such a matter scholars alone are entitled to pronounce a decided judgment. But there can be no doubt that he has achieved a fine and impressive piece of work.

With "Spanish Folk Songs of New Mexico" we are brought to what for most readers will be a remote and novel field of Spanish verse, made all the more interesting because the music as well as the words of these songs has here been transcribed, with an introduction by Alice Corbin, to whose sympathetic encouragement the book owes its origin. In Old Spain the art of folk song has always been a popular possession, and songs are still made or remolded among the people, "the Spanish people"—as Balseiro has remarked in quoting a Spanish folk song—"one of the greatest poets that ever lived." They have been diligently brought together by enthusiastic collectors and are well known. Now it is interesting to find that the same art was carried over to America by Spaniards, and is still today exercised, often with reference to recent events, even to bootlegging. But many of them are ancient, and some are virtually identical with real Spanish cantares populares, while in others we constantly find old Spanish echoes. Let us hope that there will be still further gleanings in this field, which cannot fail to concern not only those of more or

I'LL HAVE A FINE FUNERAL

PIERRE LA MAZIÈRE

I'LL HAVE A FINE FUNERAL

By Pierre La Mazière

This is a brilliantly ironic novel of a Senator of the French Republic. A book that caused a sensation in France and met with the unqualified approval of the French critics.

ROMAIN ROLLAND, says
"I'LL HAVE A FINE FUNERAL has a wistful and daring irony which I relished heartily." ($2.00)

THE DIARY OF ELBRIDGE GERRY, JR.

In the Spring of 1813, Elbridge Gerry, Jr., son of the distinguished statesman who had just assumed the Vice-Presidency of the United States, set forth on horseback on a journey over the Eastern mountains of Pittsburgh into Virginia and on to Washington. Day by day he jotted down his observations on the country, towns, and the people he encountered and this diary, just published through the courtesy of Annette Townsend, to whom it has descended, is an attractive miniature of a long-dead year. ($2.50)

BAKST

A Monograph of Some of his Unpublished Works.

With essays on Bakst by Louis Reau, Denis Roche, V. Svietlov and A. Tessier.

This new edition contains 50 reproductions of Bakst's works, 35 in full color that have never before been published. Limited de luxe and numbered edition. ($20.00)

TRANSFORMATIONS

By Roger Fry

Critical and speculative essays on Art.

The book discusses Aesthetics, Art and the State, Culture and Snobbism, Chinese Art, J. S. Sargent, London sculptors, Book Illustrations, Modern Drawing and Plastic Color. Profusely illustrated with full page plates. ($10.00)

THE HISTORY OF HEBREW CIVILIZATION By Alfred Bertholet

This book gives the luminous background of the literature of the Old Testament, and describes the ancient life of the desert, and of the successive civilizations that flourished in Palestine. The book closes with a brilliant sketch on the religions of Israel. ($4.50)

WRITE FOR OUR NEW SPRING CATALOGUE

Publishers BRENTANO'S New York

less Spanish descent but all who are interested in the foundations of American civilization.

With "El Vigía" we are in the most modern Spain. José Balseiro, now settled in Madrid and one of the most brilliant of the younger poets, novelists, and essayists of Spain, had his origins in America, in Porto Rico, and it was indeed at the University of Porto Rico that some of the essays included in this volume were delivered as lectures. Balseiro is thus enabled to gain a standpoint which is at once genuinely national and widely international. He has all the Spanish fervor and eloquence weighted with the reflection and knowledge of a singularly comprehensive, cultured, and vigorous mind. He not only is at home with Unamuno or Hernandez-Cata, but can discuss the latest books of Mencken and Nathan, and is familiar with English writers, ancient and modern. He can accept as a motto the saying of D'Annunzio that "Art is the precious food that makes of man a god," and at the same time emphasize the harmony between art and science. Like Mr. Trend, he is intimately attracted to music but with a wider outlook; he finds Russia and France to be the interesting musical countries of today, and he must surely be almost alone among critics outside France in his ability to speak with knowledge and critical insight of the music of Dukas, who to most people is known only by a single piece. For Balseiro life is an adventure, a voyage across a great sea with perpetual revelations for him who stands at the lookout post. We realize as we read this eloquent and stimulating book that the spirit of old Spain still lives, even though it may no longer retain the old energy on the material plane.

Books

First Glance

"THE Work of Stephen Crane" (12 vols., Knopf: $90), all of which now is published, stands a lovely monument to one of the most startling of modern writers. To say that he still startles is perhaps to pay him sufficient compliment, since in ordinary cases such a knack wears out with the first change of literary fashion. Even though the fashion since Crane's brief day has been somewhat with him, even though he was ahead of his time and helped to make our own, almost thirty years have passed since he died, and this is enough to have laid his ghost if it was to be laid. That it was not, and is not, can be explained by saying that the peculiar intensity with which he wrote had nothing to do either with his time or with ours, or indeed with any. The perfect compliment that will eventually be paid him will take the form of an analysis of his need to live—at least as an artist—in the midst of all but unbearable excitement.

Thomas Beer, introducing "The O'Ruddy" in the present edition, says of the later Crane: "He was plainly drifting from the intense studies of excitement which made the force of his early period; the social critic was beginning to appear in 'The Monster' and in passages of the Whilomville tales." The analysis I speak of will have, then, to confine itself to the early Crane—which means, of course, nearly all of the Crane we have. It will take only the first and terrible part of "The Monster," the best part; in general it will deal with the most interesting Crane, leaving the man he might have become—and I for one grow a little sad at the thought of his having ever tended to be a conscious social critic—to specialists in comparatively unexciting fields.

The outstanding fact about Crane as a communicator of terror is that he does the thing coldly. When he himself grows scared, or when he remembers his reputation as the poet laureate of fear, he introduces a kind of warmth—the wrong kind for him—and fails. "The Red Badge of Courage" takes effect purely in the mind, and so do all of the good stories which followed it. There is no goose-flesh in Crane. One is distinctly a spectator; the scene is far off, cut off, isolated; one has plenty of time to note the beauty of the day in which the thing happens. And there is always the cool hand of humor managing details. Midway in Three Miraculous Soldiers, the best I think of all the shorter pieces, and certainly the most exciting, we get this detail concerning the Southern barn in which three hunted Confederates are about to be hidden by a thoroughly scared girl:

> Santo, in his stall, was tranquilly chewing and chewing. Sometimes he looked benevolently over at them. He was an old horse, and there was something about his eyes and his forelock which created the impression that he wore spectacles.

A moment later, having stuffed her heroes into a feed-box, Mary starts for the house before which some Northern cavalrymen have halted.

> She made two attempts to walk dauntlessly from the barn, but each time she faltered and failed just before she reached the point where she could have been seen by the blue-coated troopers. At last, however, she made a sort of rush forward and went out into the bright sunshine.
>
> The group of men in double-breasted coats wheeled in her direction at the instant. The gray-bearded officer forgot to lower his arm, which had been stretched forth in giving an order.
>
> She felt that her feet were touching the ground in a most unnatural manner. Her bearing, she believed, was suddenly grown awkward and ungainly. Upon her face she thought that this sentence was plainly written: "There are three men hidden in the feed-box."

Courage, like fear, was to Crane both awful and grotesque. Purpose in general, in a world which for him was chiefly dark, was strangely bright; it fascinated him, he wanted to study it. To that extent he was a social critic from the beginning. Without perhaps knowing it he was also a philosopher; a barn could be the universe, an orchard the unknown.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Serbian Crime

Serajevo: A Study in the Origins of the Great War. By R. W. Seton-Watson. London: Hutchinson and Company. 18s.

THE Balkan question—the turbulent leavings of Turkish conquest and misrule—has disturbed Europe for a century past, and to a Balkan question was due the disaster that has befallen civilized mankind. No one who cares for humanity can avoid the Balkans, and I think it unfortunate that whoever studies the Balkans and knows them well is almost sure to adopt one or other of the Balkan races as a kind of favorite or pet. Thus James Bourchier adopted Bulgaria, and may almost be called its father. Noel Buxton has also adopted Bulgaria, though not quite with such paternal affection. So has Charles Roden Buxton, and in Bulgaria one has only to pronounce the word "Booxtoon" to be received with special favor. Miss Edith Durham adopted Albania, of which she became the acknowledged "Kralitza" or Queen. And well it would have been for the Powers if they had made her Mpret instead of the incapable Wied; for in Albania the name of "Dourharm" will win you protection wherever you go. Harold Spender adopted Greece and Montenegro. I have not heard of anyone adopting Rumania, unless it be Lord Thomson, but I know at least two men who still adopt the Turks. For myself, I incline to the Albanians for their picturesque manners and unusual honesty, but to the Bulgars for their silence, their dogged persistence, and their passion for knowledge.

People may dispute about one or another of these adoptive leanings, but no one will dispute about Dr. Seton-Watson. He has long taken the Serbs and the other Jugoslavs for his own. He might be called the father of Jugoslavia. For years before the war he had lived among its various peoples, had studied their languages and their histories, was intimately acquainted with their leading men, and had promoted the Jugoslav interests at a time when the very name of Jugoslavia was almost unknown in this country. If ever there was a man capable of writing the complicated history of the variegated peoples now nominally united under the wide extension of the Serbian kingdom, it is he. And that, he tells us in the preface to this book, is the task upon which he is now engaged—a stupendous task, which I do not envy.

The present volume is but one chapter in that immense and difficult history, but its subject is so obscure, and yet so vital for the history of all Europe, that he has wisely determined to separate it from the rest, in order that proportion in the main work may be kept. So he has devoted the whole of this volume to a minute and documented examination of the atrocious crime that was the occasion, though far from being the inner cause, of the war which sent about a score of millions of the finest young men in the world to premature death. The questions that he sets himself to solve are: What were the international conditions that led up to the crime? What were the motives of the assassins? Was the Serbian Government involved in the crime? Did they instigate it, or connive at it? Did they "compound a felony"? And were they guilty in bringing about the war at this particular moment by refusing one or two points in the Austrian ultimatum of July 24, 1914? Or was that ultimatum framed in provocative terms for the express purpose of making war inevitable?

Those are the main questions that Dr. Seton-Watson sets himself to answer, and he has attempted to decide them in a judicial spirit, though, owing to that peculiarity in Balkan affairs above mentioned, I find it hard to forget his resolute position as champion of the Serbs and Jugoslavs. It seems to me possible that he would not have entered into these questions in such detail—outside the scope and proportion of his main work—but for the recent appearance of what he rightly calls the "amazing article" by M. Ljuba Jovanovich which appeared to involve the Belgrade Government in connivance at the murder of the Archduke and his wife, if not actually in its instigation. That amazing article was published on the tenth anniversary of the war in a Belgrade magazine called Blood of Slavdom, and was first brought to notice in England by Miss Edith Durham, who is always fiercely attacked by Dr. Seton-Watson for her anti-Serb opinions, but who was certainly justified in her quotations from that document, and in her demands for explanations which the Serbian Government has never given.

M. Ljuba (call him so to distinguish him from the numerous Jovanoviches) wrote with authority. At the time of the murders he was in the Pachich cabinet as Minister of Education, and he was president of the Skupschtina when he wrote the article. In it he stated that "at the end of May or the beginning of June," 1914, Pachich told the Cabinet that certain persons were preparing to go to Serajevo and murder the Archduke Francis Ferdinand when he visited the city on St. Vitus's Day (the celebration of Kosovo). Pachich added that orders had been given to the authorities (presumably the police) to prevent the young men from crossing the Drina, but the authorities had told Belgrade the men were already across and it was too late.

"If the American public does not realize that in this new edition it has a great book on its hands, it will prove itself...devoid of judgment..."

says the N. Y. Herald Tribune of

The Autobiography and Memoirs of BENJAMIN ROBERT HAYDON

1786 - 1846

With an introduction by Aldous Huxley

Long out of print, this work is both one of the most revealing documents in the language and quite the most comprehensive account of the literary and artistic life of its period. It ranks incontestably beside Pepys and Boswell. The favorite book of Henry James's boyhood, it will always be read with passionate interest.

"Haydon mirrored his age as faithfully as Pepys. He has given us such a Life as few men have ever written." N. Y. Herald Tribune.

"It will interest you as do Benvenuto Cellini and Samuel Johnson." N. Y. World. 2 vols., $7.50

New Novels

GREEN FOREST - by Nathalie S. Colby $2.00

EAST SIDE, WEST SIDE by Felix Riesenberg $2.50

THE MARRIAGE BED - by Ernest Pascal $2.00

MR. GILHOOLEY - - by Liam O'Flaherty $2.50

For Young Folks

Yesterday and Today: A comparative anthology of poetry. Edited by Louis Untermeyer. Illustrated. $2.50

Adventures of a Younger Son by Edward John Trelawney. Edited by Clarence Stratton. Illustrated. $2.50

Harcourt, Brace & Co., 383 Madison Ave. New York

After Miss Durham had drawn public attention to the "amazing article," the feeling of England, America, and especially of Germany was naturally aroused. Explanations were demanded from Serbia, and the Belgrade Government promised a Blue Book, which Dr. Seton-Watson complains never appeared. It is useless for him to describe Miss Durham as "a credulous writer, with whom hostility to everything Serb has become a positive obsession." Miss Durham holds the trump card, and that is Ljuba's amazing article. Dr. Seton-Watson tries at times to overtrump in various ways. He says that Ljuba may have been merely boasting; that Pachich always showed an astonishing indifference to public opinion, or for political reasons failed to produce the proofs of his Government's innocence and ignorance. But in the end one doubts whether Dr. Seton-Watson himself can put faith in such pleas in favor of his clients. By a long series of documents and arguments he shows, probably quite truly, that, owing to the fears or ambitions of monarchs, politicians, and diplomats, the war must have come very soon, murders or no murders, and he attributes the ultimate guilt chiefly to Count Berchtold, who then, unhappily, controlled Austrian foreign policy. But on the immediate question of Serbian guilt the Serbian Government stands condemned, no matter what their champion has brought forward. The murders of Serajevo were not the far-reaching causes of the war, but they were the terrible occasion, and one cannot as yet acquit the Serbian Ministers of allowing that occasion to arise.

HENRY W. NEVINSON

A Greater Than Daniel Boone

George Croghan and the Western Movement. By Albert T. Volwider. Cleveland: Arthur H. Clark Company. $6.

THE study of history in America has developed much strength in the last few decades, particularly along two lines. Not only are the rich sources in archives more carefully searched—a procedure in our universities unknown two decades ago—but also private papers of all kinds from personal correspondence to accounts of merchants are collected, and their evidence weighed. The second development is a widening of the area of research, which is best illustrated by the extension of the field of study to the West, until recently regarded as too young to possess a past. The book under consideration is an excellent example of both departures from the traditions of the fathers. The subject is the opening of the transmontane territory by the British as illustrated by the career of George Croghan. The author has been obliged to seek his material largely in unprinted sources, though he has used three or four well-known collections of documents. The results of his labors are amply justified, and a Western publisher has given to them a fitting setting.

The name of George Croghan is scarcely known to Americans, even to those who pride themselves on their knowledge of the history of their country. Yet as an instrument in opening up the West to exploitation first by the fur traders and then by the settlers he was so far superior to Daniel Boone that there can be no comparison. His services to the British West overshadowed those of the youthful Washington. The latter's name is always mentioned in the story of General Braddock's expedition and defeat, but the no less conspicuous support of Croghan has been forgotten. The explanation is simple. The stream of patriotic fervor, the inspiration of all good historians, has flowed toward the American Revolution and away from the scenes of Croghan's labors, wherein popular ignorance and caprice were granted full liberty to apotheosize the relatively unimportant Boone. At last the stream of research has turned westward, and many new names are being added to American hagiology. Among them must stand the name of this racy, uncultivated, unscrupulous pioneer of Big Business, George Croghan.

This new candidate for canonization was an Irishman, but his name will not be exalted by my good friends of the Catholic Historical Society, for he was raised and died within the fold of the Church of England. He came to America in 1741 and took up land near Harris Ferry, one of the Pennsylvania gateways to the West. Immediately he became prominent in the fur trade, and he led the way further and further into the wilderness beyond the mountains, the no-man's-land between the French and English possessions. Croghan's skill as a negotiator with the Indians of the Ohio Valley shook the foundations of the French empire. This is not an exaggeration. During the closing years of King George's War the commandants of Kaskaskia and Detroit trembled from fear of his intrigues. It was Croghan's trading enterprises rather than the projects of the Ohio Land Company of Virginia that compelled the French to make their last great effort to save their empire by building the line of forts from Lake Erie to the forks of the Ohio. Mr. Volwider suggests that Croghan instead of Washington would have been sent to protest against the French encroachments upon disputed territory had not local politics in Pennsylvania—even so early fertile ground—prevented his appointment. Thus Virginia land speculators took the lead.

During the period that he was pursuing primarily the trade in furs, Pennsylvania frequently employed Croghan in negotiating with the Indians. After the defeat of General Braddock he served again and again as agent. It was he who prepared the way for the successful capture of Fort Duquesne by Forbes. In 1760 Sir William Johnson appointed him to the permanent position of deputy Indian agent. His territory was the most important in the Northern superintendency, the Old Northwest. Within this region it was his duty to keep the Indians quiet. Unfortunately private business called him to England in the year of the Conspiracy of Pontiac, but he returned in time to bring the war to an end. These services of his are not altogether unknown even to the most Eastern historians. After all military attempts to reach the Illinois country had failed, Croghan made a spectacular expedition down the Ohio, met Pontiac at Vincennes, and negotiated a peace which opened the Ohio Valley to the army and consequently to fur traders and land speculators. The history of the West in the year 1765 was melodramatic; and George Croghan was its headliner.

Exigencies of imperial finance—the Stamp Act was repealed—required economies; and the Indian Department, which from 1760 to 1768 passed through a period of expansion, was reduced almost to extinction. Croghan's ambition had at the same time led him into new enterprises requiring his personal attention. He now resigned his imperial job to become one of the greatest land speculators of the old West. Probably Mr. Volwider's exposition of Croghan as the protagonist of Big Business will be found the most interesting part of his book. Certainly he has exhibited unlimited industry in following the devious and obscure path of this dealer in futures. His maps of Croghan's holdings are illuminating and present a vivid picture of many adventures in high finance at the close of the colonial period. Croghan's influence extended into all the colonies where get-rich-quick schemes were being hatched; and even in England his advice and assistance were solicited. He held shares in the great speculative companies known as the Illinois, the Vandalia, and the Indiana. Two of these attempted to found new colonies. Besides these larger schemes he bought land in New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, at one time holding clear title, save for mortgages, to 250,000 acres. He secured on his own account Indian titles to over seven million acres. In these far-reaching plans he came into direct competition with George Washington, who was reaching out in the same direction. Between the methods of the two there was a significant contrast. Washington looked for support to colonial Williamsburg, Croghan to imperial Westminster. The revolt of the colonies decided the issue.

Financial conditions were chaotic during the revolution. Croghan was ruined. His capital was too small to carry him through the crisis. Then, too, he was not popular with the patriots. His son-in-law was an officer in the British army; many relatives and intimate friends were tories; he himself was suspected, but not convicted, of giving assistance to the enemy. His land was sold by himself or heirs to pay his debts. He died in poverty in 1782. Forgotten by his fellow-countrymen and ignored by historians though he has been, Mr. Volwider's final judgment of him is sound: "Judged by material standards he was a failure; yet he was one of the most persuasive, persistent, and influential of the great American pioneers of the period and he typified, not the abnormal but the normal development of society."

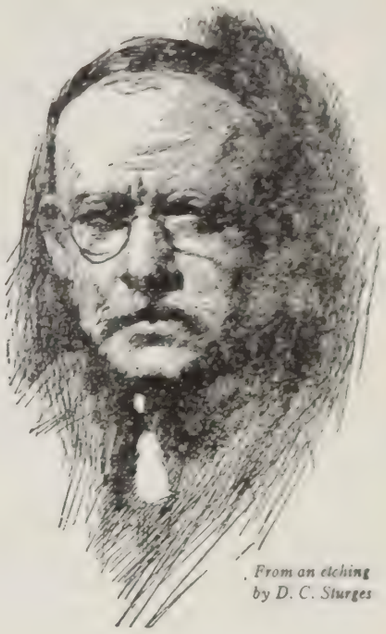
CLARENCE WALWORTH ALVORD

French Commonplace

The Thibaults. By Roger Martin du Gard. Translated by Madeleine Boyd. Boni and Liveright. Two volumes. $5.



A FEW months ago I had occasion to buy a new hat in a shop near the Sorbonne. Wishing to procure one that would be in every way suitable, I consulted a young student of philosophy who in a gold-braided academic cap happened to be standing near the counter. Having taken advantage of his courtesy I ventured to remark that I had recently been talking to the greatest living philosopher. "And who may that be?" asked my new acquaintance. "Herr Sigmund Freud," I answered. The youthful scholar shrugged his shoulders with a gesture that brought home to me, more than any number of words could have done, the provincial arrogance of this brilliant and sophisticated race who approach life with the vitality and predatory greed of a shoal of gudgeon. "Je ne le connais pas. Il n'est pas Français."

In the same way I have an idea that the Parisian critics esteem "The Thibaults" as highly as they do for no better reason than that it is so essentially French in its treatment. And, indeed, the technique of the book is far more competent than the technique of any novel that Theodore Dreiser or Sherwood Anderson or Sinclair Lewis could have written; and yet for all its adroitness these two volumes remain for me at least essentially commonplace. The wide sweep of Dreiser's strokes are more authentic, the spiritual renascence implicit in Anderson's style more convincing, and the plain realism of Sinclair Lewis more acute. The hereditary advantage of Du Gard renders him incapable of the kind of literary faux pas which so often mars the work of the novelists I have named, but at the same time his pages lack evidence of that intellectual intensity, of that spiritual passion, which gives a rugged value to much of the fiction produced today in England and America.

To compare Du Gard with Marcel Proust reveals a grave misconception of the aims and function of great writing. The genius of Proust differs completely from the talent of Du Gard; the former presents Parisian life in all its infinite variety from without its "flaming ramparts," the latter accepts the scene on its surface value and constructs his tale with the supreme confidence of any of his own self-conceived bourgeois citizens.

Occasionally, it is true, by a sentence, a word, the book shows itself to be better than the average yellow-back to be bought by the thousand on the Rue St. Michel, but readers will look in vain for the finesse of a Jules Romains or the intellectual acumen of a Paul Valéry. Here is an excellent description of an old reactionary Catholic business man at home, though I suspect that the merit of the passage depends very largely on Mrs. Boyd's brilliant translation. "His apparent inertia was like the waiting spider's: he was waiting for the oscillation of his thought to give him the solid solution to some administrative or social problem. He had always worked in that way passive and petrified, his eyes half shut, only his brain being alive." Writing of that kind is obviously admirable, but even admitting that such passages do occur the book does not, and never can, in my opinion, take its place among really inspired work.

It is far from my purpose, however, to indicate that it is

From an etching by D. C. Sturges

The publishers announce a second large edition of

THE COPELAND READER

A 1700-Page Anthology of English Poetry and Prose, selected and edited, with an introduction, by

Charles Townsend Copeland

Boylston Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory in Harvard University

"The book is handsome, red-bound, and guiltless of that excessive avoirdupois which is the curse of so much American bookmaking. . . . We look forward to getting a lot of pleasure out of Professor Copeland's treasury, without moving our lips. No man save him shall read aloud to us and live."

—Editorial in New York Times

$10.00

A few copies remain of the special limited edition of THE COPELAND READER, in two volumes, limited to 260 copies. Additional information about this edition will be sent by the publishers on request.

Sixth Printing

THE SUN ALSO RISES

By Ernest Hemingway

"Some of the finest dialogue yet written in this country. . . . A vividness and sustained tension that make it unquestionably one of the events of a year rich in interesting books."

— Saturday Review of Literature

$2.00

Struthers Burt's

THE DELECTABLE MOUNTAINS

"That man can write, and he knows something about human life, and he has that very rare quality—wit that cuts beneath the surface of words."

EDWIN BJÖRKMAN

$2.00

These books are on sale at all bookstores

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, NEW YORK

dull. Its preoccupation with sex is too constant. Here's a brave topic to prevent the eyelids of somnolent citizens from drooping, and it recurs and recurs and recurs in these pages with the same insistence and power of rejuvenating attention as in life itself. All the men and women, all the boys and girls in its pages bring with them their own "dainty experiences." In truth there is no extravagance of the wild and intractable instinct that is not dragged in—homosexuality, lesbianism, sadism, and the attraction felt by European women for Africans whose smooth silky skins feel to their touch "like the warm body of a bird under its feathers." Small wonder that the dangerous woman of the story is made to declare that "her body has no memories"!

At the present day when our interest in this aspect of life is so lively it is often a hard matter for a conscientious critic to gauge exactly how far the fame that gathers about any particular volume depends upon its artistic quality and how far upon the relief that so many of us feel in having these country matters dealt with honestly and openly. In the case of "The Thibaults" I believe that the wide notice it has been given by the reviewers has little to do with any originality or distinction of style to be found between its covers. It is the work of a clever, accomplished young Frenchman treating of a subject that he finds especially interesting and which has—who would care to deny it?—a very particular appeal for all of us.

LLEWELYN POWYS

Heredity and Variation

The Theory of the Gene. By Thomas Hunt Morgan. Yale University Press. $4.

THE story of the transformation of a venturesome and abstract theory, despised and rejected of a large proportion of men of science, into an established body of concrete scientific knowledge of the highest importance; a story told by the man who has done most to bring about that transformation; an interesting and instructive chapter in the history of science. "The Theory of the Gene" is an account of the basic processes of heredity and variation; of the "particular go" of those phenomena. It summarizes perhaps the most fundamental contribution made to biological science within a century. The matters with which it deals are of the greatest intrinsic interest to every human being; to all the arts and sciences that deal with living things.

In his early chapters Mr. Morgan states the theory in its abstract form, with the grounds which made it a plausible guess. Then in successive chapters are detailed the discoveries which brought about gradually the overwhelming confirmation of the theory, its extension and elaboration. The story is told as clearly and simply as the nature of the material and a regard for accuracy render possible. But at the best this sort of thing does not make easy reading. The book is packed with detailed facts, relating to things not familiar to most readers; facts all tending to support and make concrete the general theory. This has its fascination to vigorous minds; but the overwhelming volume of these confirmatory facts tends to fatigue. The book is distinctly one to be chewed and digested; one to be studied with pencil and tablet in hand.

Concretely, it is an account of the role played in development, inheritance, variation, and perhaps evolution by the chromosomal apparatus—that embodiment in small of the hereditary constitution of the organism. Parts of this account, notably the clear summaries of the great mass of recent investigations on the observed changes in the chromosomes—changes in their number, their distribution, and their constitution, with the effect of these changes—will be helpful even to special students in this field; as all of it will be to the courageous general reader. It cannot be too much emphasized that the material treated in this work is foundational for all understanding of the working out of inheritance and variation in the later characteristics of organisms—matters not dealt with in this book, save for typical instances.

Mr. Morgan deals not only with the settled questions of genetics, but also in large measure with the problems that are still open, that are now under examination. To the serious student these parts of the work are as full of interest as the rest. Here we have, from a competent hand, a statement of the matters now under investigation; here are the riddles whose answers we may watch for as further studies are made.

In placing in the foreground the abstract theory, and presenting the discovered facts as adjuncts to it, Mr. Morgan incurs the danger of carrying over to the facts that attitude of distrust, of skepticism, which bizarre and high-flying theories arouse in many minds—as if the facts might be rejected if one dislikes this type of theory. There are many advantages in simply presenting in their own right the facts, with all their qualifications and limitations; when this is done thoroughly and systematically, a body of knowledge results that is perhaps indistinguishable from the theory, yet consists of confirmed discoveries that cannot be neglected. This appears the better method for general purposes, though less instructive for showing the way science develops. There is now a mass of positive knowledge in genetics, independent of any preconceived theories, that stands as firmly as any part of biological science; it is essentially the basic parts of this knowledge, not a mere theory, that Mr. Morgan's book presents.

On no subject is there a greater printed volume of loose and irresponsible speculation than upon heredity and variation. A certain excuse for this existed in the past; in the absence of positive knowledge, one man's fancies seemed as good as another's. But those days are gone forever. Here we have a body of material that for the future must limit and underlie such speculations; with this material they must begin. Discussions which neglect it—as many still do—have no claim to serious consideration.

H. S. JENNINGS

An Economic Interpretation of Modern History

Thirty Years of Modern History. By William Kay Wallace. The Macmillan Company. $4.

IN his "Passing of Politics" Mr. Wallace expounded the thesis of the decay of the national state owing to the growth of interests and ideas which overshadowed politics. Here, again, in a brilliant interpretation of the events of the last thirty years, he drives home the same lesson. The truism, that economic influences mold modern politics, is illustrated by a rapid but extremely able survey of critical events in the generation prior to the World War, the rising Weltpolitik of Germany, the diplomatic scheming of reviving France, the advent of the United States into foreign politics, the rise of Japan, the role of Russia, the new relations of East and West, the armed peace. This formal setting for the war is accompanied by an analysis of causes which discounts the importance of diplomacy and statecraft, making them the servants of the economic forces that were the new expressions of the "will to power" in the several nations. The rapid advances in industrial productivity, with the development of shipping and banking, made the struggle for colonies and foreign markets even more intense. Germany was the first to yoke politics to economics, alike in her internal and external statecraft. Others followed. Economic activities more and more engaged the attention of politicians. But the modern state system was fundamentally unfitted to exercise the role and furnish the social institutions which modern industrial society demands. The war was a dramatic expression of their inadequacy, a declamation of the bankruptcy of the state.

The real rulers of tomorrow (even of today) are the great banks, cartels, railroad and shipping combines, and the other organized instruments of great industry. The safety and progress of humanity depend upon the provision of economic institutions which shall convert these organs from profit-seeking businesses into modes of social service.

> Under the institutions of the future, the individual will not be called upon to express, through his vote, his views on problems of administration or public policy, as today he is not called upon to express his views regarding technical problems in industry. These will be left to the expert in the one case as in the other. In the new institutions the private interests of the individual will coincide with his public function. This function is to contribute to the productive efficiency of the community, which in turn will afford him an immediate reward for his labor.

Democracy is set aside, the state remaining as "an administrative mechanism for the maintenance of public security," shorn of all the economic functions it has been accumulating during the past century. The post-war revolutions in Europe and elsewhere are interpreted in terms of the passing of politics. This general statement of Mr. Wallace's thesis does no justice to his unusual skill as an interpreter of history. Some will think that he overstresses certain economic factors, and underestimates the survival value of the state. But his work deserves the attention of all students of public affairs.

J. A. Hobson

Toward Objectivity

The Happy Marriage. By Archibald MacLeish. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.
The Pot of Earth. By Archibald MacLeish. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.
Streets in the Moon. By Archibald MacLeish. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

In each of the last three years Mr. MacLeish has issued a volume of poems. While he has not yet exhibited his power in complete perfection and variety, his work at present yields a clue to an important solution of the contemporary problem. His chief character as a poet is his seriousness, which includes, through the fact of this attitude itself, an intellectual grasp of his position in the contemporary situation. He moves toward the formation of a set of objective values upon which his poetry can lean. The importance of these values, once articulated, will depend upon the degree to which their successive contexts (separate poems) are valid as aesthetic experience.

On the technical side, it is noteworthy that Mr. MacLeish's first volume represents, in its relative spiritual complacency, an aesthetic skepticism. That is to say, Mr. MacLeish in "The Happy Marriage" continued the familiar Meredithian situation with the attempt at universalizing it through merely personal terms. These values were internal to Mr. MacLeish; they never emerged in clean outline in the poems; there was a futility in the nice technique because it erected no stable significances in the end. The realization of this defect must have been the starting-point, the skepsis, of a more fundamental attack upon his problem.

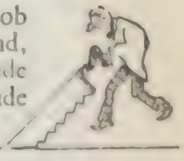
"The Pot of Earth," however, brings Mr. MacLeish to its center. The framework of this poem is a vegetation myth out of "The Golden Bough," where the humane properties of the myth are reduced to historical law. The poet's rational intelligence moved in the right direction, in the effort to restore to the myth a quality of experience of which the historical method of Frazer had deprived it. He therefore delineated, as a content, as a quality of the myth, definite and *un*abstract, the sexual growth of a young girl. The poem fails because the myth is for some reason buried too deep in the modern consciousness to be revived with a full sense of its implications: the experiential quality which Mr. MacLeish

NAPOLEON THE MAN OF DESTINY
by Emil Ludwig. Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul

"We have been shown Napoleon in all sorts of attitudes—heroic, melodramatic, ignominious. But somehow I find here for the first time an account of him in all his phases, from which he emerges great, human and explicable; that is to say, the real man of destiny." —Ernest Boyd, The New Yorker. 63rd thousand. Octavo. 732 pages. 21 full-page plates. $5.00

GEORGE WASHINGTON
THE IMAGE AND THE MAN
by W. E. Woodward
"Mr. Woodward has given the most brilliant, cynical, and clever portrait." —Claude G. Bowers, The Nation
Octavo, fully illustrated. 5th edition. The price remains $4.00

TAR
A Midwest Childhood
by Sherwood Anderson
"A tremendously imaginative epic of childhood."—William R. Langfeld, Philadelphia Record.
2nd edition. $3.00



THE GOLDEN DAY
by Lewis Mumford, Author of STICKS AND STONES
"The best book about America, if not the best American book I have ever read."—George Santayana.
"An acute, profound analysis of the American mind and the conditions under which it has developed." —John Macy, author of THE STORY OF THE WORLD'S LITERATURE. 2nd edition. $2.50

MORE MILES
by Harry Kemp
Author of TRAMPING ON LIFE
"When a century has passed a scholar will come across these books (More Miles and Tramping on Life) and there will be a great shout that an important human document has been discovered. Harry's two volumes will be placed beside Casanova and Pepys and Evelyn and Gallemont."—Walter Yust, Philadelphia Ledger. 2nd edition. $3.00

SEX EXPRESSION IN LITERATURE
by V. F. Calverton
Introduction by Harry Elmer Barnes
"Thus the book is doubly interesting, as a contribution to the young literature of sociological art-criticism, and as a study in class attitudes toward sex."—Floyd Dell, The New Masses. Large 12mo $2.50

and NOVELS
AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY By Theodore Dreiser
6th large edition. 2 vols. boxed $5.00
THE HARD-BOILED VIRGIN by Frances Newman
6th edition. $2.50
SWEEPINGS, THE STORY OF THE PARDWAYS
by Lester Cohen 6th Edition. $2.50
TIN WEDDING, by Margaret Leech 5th edition $2.00

New Books by
Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Jacob Wassermann, Hermann Sudermann, Paul Morand, Edgar Lee Masters, Stendhal, Sarah Gertrude Millin, Robinson Jeffers, Eugene O'Neill, Gertrude Atherton, Marie Conway Oemler, etc.

BONI & LIVERIGHT, 61 W. 48th St. New York
Please send me copy of your new Spring 1927 catalog.
Name _____
Address _____

wished to bestow upon the remote symbol remains external, parallel to the symbol. The poem exhibits once more the dissociated contemporary mind.

Another and more interesting instance of Mr. MacLeish's progress toward objective schematizations is his Einstein, the most ambitious poem in the third volume. He tries to infer, from the abstractions of Relativity, the qualitative experience which Einstein must have had in formulating them. The poem fails, on the same principle as "The Pot of Earth" fails: the poet does not assimilate the abstractions, and his style is a mixture of scientific restatement and image.

But the lyrics in "Streets in the Moon" represent an enormous advance since "The Happy Marriage." This can best be explained, I believe, in terms of the author's pursuit of objective, non-psychological values, in "The Pot of Earth" and in Einstein. The problem involved in these poems shifted his emphasis from the personal emotion conveyed to the pattern of its arrangement, to its framework. Of the fifty-two poems in the book fifteen, in my judgment, are completely successful—an astonishing achievement. We may hope for still greater purity of structure and of diction. For at present the course of Mr. MacLeish's stylistic development lies bare. He is obviously indebted to T. S. Eliot, possibly to Cummings; and undoubtedly to Joyce and Gertrude Stein, who have affected the prose writers of our time and the poets as well.

ALLEN TATE

Cardboard Greatness

The Plutocrat. By Booth Tarkington. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

THE American business man, as everyone knows, has been the butt of recent American writing. His backslapping, his complacency, and his belief in money as the root of all good have been fair game for satire. After the punishment he has taken he is entitled to a defense, and in "The Plutocrat" Booth Tarkington appears as the barbarian's knight. With plenty of stabs at the self-conscious aesthetes, he plans to reveal the boisterous, unself-conscious Illinois manufacturer, who has made himself a power in his city, as frankly a barbarian but a great one. He will reveal him, in fact, as more than that: as a modern Roman, who builds cities, gives commands, and is careless of the world's opinion of him. This was a fruitful idea, but it demanded masculinity in its development; and it is fortunate for the plutocrat himself that Mr. Tarkington has preferred to play safely with the easiest aspects of it.

He ingeniously presents his hero, taking a Mediterranean tour with his family, through the contemptuous eyes of Laurence Ogle, a recently successful New York playwright who is desperately anxious to be thought sophisticated. Before the trip across North Africa is over he has been gradually humiliated into realizing his own smallness before the unaffected magnificence of the man he had looked down on as a boor. But the dice are heavily loaded: Ogle is an insignificant snob whom no reader will believe capable of having written an intelligent play, and from his first appearance the reader's sympathy goes to the hearty, poker-playing Rotarian. The latter sweeps across North Africa, buying souvenirs and amazing the natives, while the story unrolls mechanically until the would-be sophisticate marries the plutocrat's daughter and learns to be proud of his father-in-law. The Great Barbarian has been reduced to a movie-proof hero in a scenario where the laughs are properly timed and the characters are stock types. Neither Ogle nor the plutocrat ever becomes a three-dimensional individual. It needed heat to make the plutocrat's greatness convincing, as Miss Cather once made Antonia's greatness unquestionable. Instead of heat Mr. Tarkington has supplied a verbal fire which shines but gives out no warmth.

LAWRENCE S. MORRIS

TWO NEW AND VITAL BOOKS

By Philip Guedalla
Author of "The Second Empire"

PALMERSTON
THE STATESMAN WHO DEFIED A QUEEN

"Mr. Guedalla has developed an entirely new historical technique and has triumphantly proved its value."—J. St. Loe Strachey in The Spectator.
Handsomely bound—illustrated. $5.00

By W. L. George

CHILDREN of the MORNING

The breath-taking narrative of fifty-nine stranded children who learn to live on a desert island. Mr. George has worked out their development with humor and understanding. $2.00

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS
New York London

PURPOSIVE EVOLUTION
The Link Between Science and Religion
By EDMUND NOBLE

Covering the disputed no-man's-land between science and religion in a truly philosophic spirit, Mr. Noble's discussion of purposive evolution is more rational and convincing than any theological presentation of the subject and more humane and moving than the more strictly scientific world pictures. A book as original and profound as Bergson's Creative Evolution.
"It is certainly a remarkable book in the force of the argument and in its literary style. Mr. Noble writes with a sustained force and dignity few authors have attained."—David Starr Jordan. $5.00
Students' Edition $4.00

LIGHT FROM THE NORTH
THE DANISH FOLK HIGHSCHOOLS
Their Meanings for America
By JOSEPH K. HART
Author of Adult Education, etc.

Do you know that the Danish peasant, in 1865 inured to the agricultural practices of neolithic times and today the most scientific and prosperous farmer in the world, attributes his extraordinary transformation to the teachings of his Folk Highschools?
In Light From the North Dr. Hart describes in vivid detail not only how these Folk Highschools originated and gradually developed to their present importance, but also how schools of like purpose may be successfully established in our own rural districts.
"Dr. Hart's book is tonic and stimulating to the utmost."—E. C. Branson, University of North Carolina. $1.50
Students' Edition $1.25

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY
One Park Avenue New York

There Is a World

The Realm of Mind. By F. J. E. Woodbridge. Columbia University Press. $1.75.

METAPHYSICS, ostensibly an attempt to get at the ultimate principles which all experience involves, is frequently a recourse to notions which would be relevant to no experience whatsoever. The great merit of Mr. Woodbridge's book is its simplicity and its appositeness to the world in which philosophy is one among many other occurrences. Its doctrine is almost absurdly simple and almost suspiciously sound. It will, therefore, beyond a doubt puzzle or astonish philosophers. Its net conclusions are that there is a world, that thinking goes on in and about that world, and that the fact that thinking does go on implies that the world is an intelligible structure.

All this may seem to need no argument, and Mr. Woodbridge's argument is in all conscience short enough. It would need no argument at all if there had not already been so much controversy by philosophers who, without confronting the facts, tried to explain them. Mr. Woodbridge does not explain the world; he points it out. He starts with the fact that thinking goes on, as anyone else might point out the no less reverberant fact that walking goes on. He proceeds to note the implications of the kind of a world in which thinking occurs as one might note the implication of a body to do the walking and a ground to walk on. Thinking involves a logical order as walking implies something solid upon which to tread. Thinking implies a body as an agent to do the thinking, as talking implies a tongue to utter speech. "Implies" is used in no high speculative sense. Mr. Woodbridge is speaking of implications enforced by experience, not corollaries enforced by words.

The heart of the doctrine is the closing paragraph of the first of three short chapters:

> We point to the fact that our thinking is motivated, tested, and controlled by experience, that one fact or event in experience implies other facts or events and is implied by them, that, in short, there is a system of logical connections in experience which we do not invent, but which we discover by long searching. So we use the term mind to denote the fact that while experience is a matter of space and time, of objects, qualities, and relations, it is also a matter of implications and inferences. There is a logical structure in it. The realm of being is a realm of mind.

Mr. Woodbridge then proceeds to follow the fact of thinking in two directions. In one direction he finds—as who does not?—that thinking is a bodily activity, and depends on the body for its vigor and sustaining. Exploration in that direction is an affair of the physiologist and the psychologist. The freest and most comprehensive of thinkers is often enough called rudely home by "aches, indignities, and pains" to convince him of the bodily condition and limitation of thought.

But the metaphysician moves in another direction, too, and finds that "thought, wise, sane, and correct," is "limited not simply by the body, but by the world which that body inhabits. It is limited by the genuine coherence of the things we think about. This coherence is not something we create but something we discover. It is a realm of mind. Thus beginning with thinking we find not two worlds, body and mind, but two modes of being, physical and logical. These are not parallel or interacting; they are two aspects of the universe. One aspect concerns things, and the other propositions about things. The universe is a realm of mind, so to put it, because it is logically talked about, because it can be rendered in logical discourse." Rendered in less austere language, Mr. Woodbridge is saying what was said at the beginning of this review, that there is a world, that it lends itself to logical discourse and is by that token logical. There can be coherence in conversation because there is a coherence in things.

Mr. Woodbridge has one further point: he makes it in a brief chapter, and he is done. Mind is the name for the order

Zona Gale writes

"For the first time in America so far as I know such writing, here is a biography of the Universe, bodied in beauty—colored and lit by the brilliant common sense of America."

The New Universe

By BAKER BROWNELL

A philosophy of living which reveals the parts of modern knowledge. A magnetic story of evolution from the birth of the Earth to the life of the present day, written out of a genius for making scientific truths sparkle with the liveliest human interest.

Professor John Dewey: "A most valuable contribution to the coordination of present specialized knowledge."

Professor E. A. Ross: "A truly remarkable book. A slow, close perusal of it brings one's education down to date."

Carl Sandburg: "Of all the outlines covering various fields of knowledge in recent years, this is my favorite. It merges document and poetry."

New York Times: "The book goes back to the eternal things: it inspires new hope for the future of philosophical writing in America."

Chicago Post: "It is as interesting a book as any we have seen this year. 'The New Universe' and the 'World of William Clissold' together would almost give one a complete education."

Second large printing. At bookstores $4.00

Popular Volumes in the Library of Modern Sciences

Edited by E. E. Slosson, Ph.D.,
M. Luckiesh, M. S., H. E. Howe, M. S.

Stories in Stone, by Willis T. Lee, Geologist, U. S. Geological Survey. A fascinating explanation of the earth's development. Stories of the Petrified Forest, the Grand Canyon, the Flaming Gorge, etc. Illustrated. $3.00

The Earth and the Stars, by Charles G. Abbot, of the Smithsonian Institution. A remarkably entertaining volume on the fascinating science of Astronomy. Illustrated. $3.00

Animals of Land and Sea, by Austin Clark, Curator, Smithsonian Institution. An unusual story of man's relation to and dependence upon all forms of animal life. Illustrated. $3.00

The Mystery of Mind, by L. T. Troland, Professor of Harvard. A book which reveals the fundamental workings of our minds. Illustrated. $3.00

Chemistry in the World's Work, by Harrison E. Howe, Editor Industrial and Engineering Chemistry. A non-technical treatment of the relation of chemistry to industry. Illustrated. $3.00

Chemistry in Modern Life, by Svante Arrhenius, Director of the Nobel Institute. The romance of chemistry's contribution to human progress is the theme of this entertaining volume. Illustrated. $3.00

At all Bookstores or by mail from the Publishers

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY
8 Warren Street New York

of coherence in things expressed in the coherences of discourse. But this coherence is discovered by many individual minds which are the localized expressions of many individual bodies. These localized bodies with their special perspectives—"Many men, minds, many bodies"—"translate the universal logic of things into their own private but communicable discourse. The language of each man is his particularization of the order of things. The logic of each man is his provincial dialect of the language of nature. Many minds move in a common world, but there are many ways of rendering its character. No one way of translating the order of things is ultimate; the order of things is ultimate, however, and it is that order which gives a canon for measuring the relevance of any provincial human ideology."

Mr. Woodbridge's book might well have been longer. It is packed with metaphysical common sense. It reinstates the metaphysical imagination in the body of which it is the expression and in the world to which it refers. The book, thanks perhaps to Aristotle, is written with undecorated distinction and nobility. It confirms the opinion of any number of Dean Woodbridge's former students that he owes it to philosophy to desert or neglect administration, and write more. IRWIN EDMAN

The Moscow Road

The British General Strike. By Scott Nearing. The Vanguard Press. 50 cents.

Must Britain Travel the Moscow Road? By Norman Angell. London: Noel Douglas. 5s.

WILL British Labor take the Moscow Road toward Socialism? Scott Nearing answers Yes. The General Strike was a sign that the turning had been made. His book is a useful but inadequate and one-sided account of the strike. It does not claim, however, to be a history, but merely "an economic interpretation of its background and its significance." The interpretation being of a Marxian character the background is a picture of the growing decay of British capitalism, with the coal crisis as the outstanding symptom. While capitalism has declined Labor has risen. Organized industrially and politically, it has relied hitherto on political action to give effect to its ideas of social change. The Labor Government proved this reliance futile, for, says naive Nearing, "after nine months of Labor Government British capitalists were still exploiting workers and British workers were still the bondsmen of capitalists." The General Strike drove the lesson home and pointed an alternative method. It "smashed the idea of evolutionary and constitutional development in Great Britain." The strike was direct action—revolutionary in fact if not in intention. Moreover, the actions of the Government showed that the state was merely a strike-breaking capitalist instrument, useless for the achievement of Socialism even if controlled by a majority Labor Government. And so the future will bring forth bigger and better general strikes; society will be paralyzed; and then . . .

But before revolutionary ardor carries British Labor to the barricades perhaps it will consider what Norman Angell has to say. He does not think that revolution is impossible. Should the Tories try to obstruct the constitutional highway, Labor might well attempt the revolutionary short cut. But he mistrusts the sign-posting on that route. Does it really lead directly and rapidly to Socialism or is there a bend somewhere, invisible from the start, which brings it back to join the old road?

Norman Angell's book is an answer to Trotzky's "Whither England?" Trotzky has a profound dislike for the present methods of British Labor. Parliamentarianism, he argues, is hopelessly slow. While the MacDonalds and the Webbs pursue cowardly tactics of compromise, persuasion, conciliation, they merely bolster the outworn fabric of British capitalism. If Labor wants socialism it must push aside these exponents of "gradualism" and prepare for revolution. Where Russia suc-

The first million years were the hardest. They have been spent in arraying the facts that explain the forces of the world. But this generation is fortunate. It has within its grasp the great truths emerging at last from a slowly accumulated mass of information. Interpreted and transformed by skillful minds, the unwieldy lump of scientific data is taking shape and is becoming before our eyes a clear, connected, reasonable explanation of all the physical world and man's place in it.

The Nature of the World and of Man is the answer of science to the persistent curiosity of this generation. It is the work not of one but of sixteen eminent scientists at the University of Chicago: astronomer, biologist, psychologist, and the rest have collaborated to tell the whole story. Each has written his own part of it to fit a well-defined plan; the result is in every sense a really cooperative enterprise. It is a book to put on your shelf beside The Story of Philosophy. It sets the stage for all that has been said or done since the world began. $4.00

For sale at all Bookstores

The University of Chicago Press
5807 Ellis Avenue Chicago

Important Books from Our Spring List

CONGAREE SKETCHES
By E. C. L. Adams
Artistic and authentic sketches of Negro life in the big swamps of the Congaree. Here is vital stuff. "The stories are distinctive . . . a fine addition to your list."—Paul Green. Ready April 30. Probably $2.00

STUDIES IN RECENT AESTHETIC
By Katherine Gilbert
A survey of contemporary theories of aesthetic. Mrs. Gilbert discusses the doctrines of Bergson, Bosanquet, Croce, Lalo, and Santayana with so acute a sense of criticism that the chapters devoted to these authors practically amount to original contributions in the various fields in which these men have been working. Ready April 15. Probably $1.50

SOUTHERN LITERARY STUDIES
By C. Alphonso Smith
Studies and lectures collected from magazines and unpublished manuscripts on Poe, O. Henry, Joel Chandler Harris, Jefferson, Southern Oratory before the War, and similar topics. Includes a study of the late C. Alphonso Smith by F. Stringfellow Barr. Ready April 20. Probably $2.00

AMONG THE DANES
By Edgar Wallace Knight
Field notes of an American teacher in Denmark. Studies of the remarkable civilization achieved in that little kingdom and of the effective system of education which has transformed Danish life. Ready March 5. Probably $2.50

SOCIAL DIFFERENTIATION
By Cecil Clare North
A thought-provoking study of social differences among the population and the relation of such differences to social welfare. Now Ready. $2.50

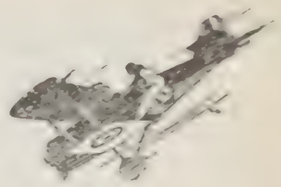
THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS
CHAPEL HILL, N. C.

ceeded Britain can follow. But, asks Norman Angell, has Russia succeeded? "Has civil war, coercion, force, no compromise, no gradualism, proved successful in Russia in destroying capitalism and private property and substituting a workable socialism?" He goes on to suggest that the really fundamental change wrought in Russia by the revolution is the transfer of the land to the peasants. This is a change away from socialism, and hardly one the Bolsheviks were working for. They wanted to bring the village within the orbit of Communism. In the early years they endeavored to bring about a "compulsory organization of production." The refusal of the peasants to cooperate and the breakdown of the attempts to coerce them resulted in the New Economic Policy. The fact that the Bolsheviks have been unable to impose an economic system by force does not condemn them, as Angell is careful to point out, but it does mean that they "have not been successful in their attempt to avoid 'gradualness,' to skip the intervening stages between capitalism and complete socialism."

Would British Bolsheviks be more likely to succeed? The answer to that question depends upon the attitude of the technical and professional workers. These form a very considerable portion of the population and are as essential to the mechanism of an industrial state as the manual workers. For the most part they depend on their salaries and theoretically should side with the workers against a common exploiter. In fact, however, they form part of the bourgeoisie, and although the Labor Party by methods of persuasion has won many recruits from their ranks, the majority would be found in the reactionary camp in the event of a revolution. The seizure of power by the workers might be accomplished without their aid, but for the reorganization of industry their cooperation would be indispensable. After the bitterness of a civil war would they cooperate? And if not could they be coerced? Norman Angell answers both questions in the negative, and if he is right one must agree that the chances of a rapid transformation of British industry by a revolution are exceedingly slim. British Bolsheviks, like Russian Bolsheviks, even if successful in maintaining a dictatorship, would have to fall back on "gradualness," persuasion, conciliation; reinstate capitalism in many directions; build up their new world brick by brick.

Norman Angell's book expresses with admirable logic and clarity the views of the majority of British Socialists. They are not yet convinced that civil war would accelerate their program. The Trotzkys and Nearings must persevere. They can count, at least, on the wholehearted cooperation of Churchill and his friends.

KEITH HUTCHISON



The Creator of Modern Opera

Monteverdi, His Life and Work. By Henry Prunières. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.

M. PRUNIÈRES, well known to musicians as the editor of the Revue Musicale of Paris, has written what will doubtless take its place as the standard book on Monteverdi. It does full justice to the many-sided activities of the man who was so great a master of the older polyphonic style that he wrote madrigals of great technical skill as well as passionate expression, and at the same time was so innovating a spirit that he did more than anyone else to develop from the early Florentine operas of Peri, Caccini, and others a vivid and expressive type of music drama. The book is in three parts, one devoted to the early years at Cremona and in the service of the Duke of Mantua, one to an analysis of the earliest dramas, "Orféo" and "Arianna," and one to the later years at Venice. There are also well-documented notes, a catalogue of Monteverdi's works, and a copious selection from his letters, printed in the original Italian, as well as a bibliography and index.

Together with his thorough scholarship, M. Prunières has the sense of musical and human values needed by a biographer

Four Editions in Ten Days

WAR BIRDS

Diary of an Unknown Aviator

Acclaimed by aviators as their story. . . .

True in its every vivid, laughable, tragic detail. . . .

Told with the candor and simplicity of a soldier's intimate diary. . . .

This is the book of flaming youth, the men who fought and lived and laughed and died at the swiftest speed life could offer.

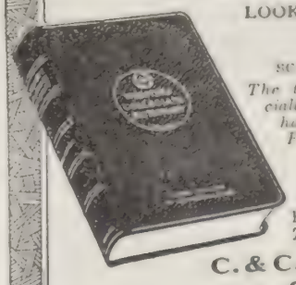
Clayton Knight Illustrations in color and black and white

$3.50

At all booksellers

DORAN BOOKS

When You Puzzle



—over a definition or derivation
—over the pronunciation of a New Word
—over questions of geography or the identity of historic characters
—over points of grammar, spelling, or punctuation

Look them up in

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE

Based on WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY

Contains a wonderful Vocabulary, including hundreds of New Words, such as vitamin, novocaine, rada, balalaika.
Derivations or Etymologies treated with Merriam-Webster accuracy.
Definitions are clear with abundant use of Illustrative Examples.
Synonyms an outstanding feature of excellence.
Illustrations selected to aid the definitions of complex objects.
A Glossary of Scottish Words and Phrases. Vocabulary of Rimes. A Pronouncing Gazetteer. A Pronouncing Biographical Dictionary. Foreign Words and Phrases. Common English Christian Names. Abbreviations and Arbitrary Signs used in Writing and Printing.
1700 Illustrations. 1256 Pages

LOOK FOR THE MERRIAM TRADE MARK
SIGN OF HIGHEST SCHOLARSHIP AND ACCURACY

The thin-paper edition is especially handsome and convenient handle. Art Canvas binding, $ Fabrikoid, $6.00; Leather, $

Purchase of your bookseller; or send order and remittance direct to us; or write for information. Free specimen pages if you mention The Nation.

C. & C. MERRIAM COMPANY
Springfield, Mass.

of so vivid a personality as Monteverdi's. He makes the court life of the time real to us as we read, and gives by artfully composed detail rather than by a special eloquence of presentation a sense of the incongruously mingling brilliance and primitiveness of the period, the strange chaotic Italian scene. Monteverdi, for example, heart-broken at the death of his wife in September, 1608, is nevertheless ordered by his patron, the Duke of Mantua, to prepare an opera for the occasion of the marriage of the Duke to Marguerite of Savoy. He composes his "Arianna," containing the famous Lament of Ariadne (the only part that has been preserved), and after some delays it is finally given in May in the castle, before an audience of from four to six thousand. The Lament "drew tears from the whole assembly" we are told. M. Prunières justly says: "This is incontestably Monteverdi's finest dramatic passage. Grief is expressed with a majesty which recalls the masterpieces of ancient Greece. Heart-rending as it is, this grief is without grimace or convulsion. This is no mere recitative: words have become song, and this passage remained unparalleled in its intensity until the advent of Gluck." The Duchess, however, finds the subject "a little gloomy for performance at a wedding," and commands a denouement in Act V in which Bacchus is to appear as a liberator God and "marry the blushing Cretan." Everybody is pleased (save perhaps Monteverdi) and a contemporary informs us that "Fifteen excellent dancers, dressed as soldiers of Bacchus, executed a dance composed entirely of caprioles." So little does the world of opera change through the ages, even for a genius like Monteverdi.

DANIEL GREGORY MASON

The Better Side of the Senate

The American Senate. By Lindsay Rogers. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

WHETHER or not the Senate is in need of the defense which Professor Rogers offers in this able book is a question regarding which readers will probably differ according to their political persuasion. However unlike the role which the framers of the Constitution cast for it the Senate has in practice become, the upper house of our national legislature has contrived to resist successfully the resounding attacks that have been launched against it, chiefly, it would seem, by paying no keen attention to them; while the latest assault, directed by Vice-President Dawes at the custom of unrestricted debate, appears to have fallen pretty flat. On the other hand, the eternal vigilance which is said to be the price of liberty makes it worth while to evaluate again and again even the most sacred institutions, and the skilful fashion in which Professor Rogers performs the task for the Senate, joined to the fact that his illustrations are drawn mainly from recent years, gives his book a freshness which many political treatises sadly lack.

The main theme of the book, of course, is the closure. "Abolish the closure," Professor Rogers declares, "and the Senate will gradually sink to the level of the House of Representatives, where there is less deliberation and debate than in any other legislative assembly." What makes the Senate the most powerful upper house in the world is its procedure, an intricate subject to which little attention has been paid, but while the United States "possesses a Senate which is undemocratic in its composition, and which enjoys enormous powers for the exercise of which it cannot be held responsible," the Senate remains "the single American institution that can enforce some measure of responsibility and mitigate the autocracy and security which may be synonymous with the dogma of the separation of powers."

Unfortunately, the Constitution affords no method of determining that the President and two-thirds of the Senate actually represent public opinion, but the very want of constitutional prescription would seem to be, for the country, a saving grace. Unrestricted debate has undoubtedly wasted a good deal

The Cure of Imperfect Sight By Treatment Without Glasses

By W. H. BATES, M.D.

In this book the author, who is well known for his discovery of the properties of the suprarenal extract (commercialized as adrenalin) as well as for a lifetime of ophthalmological studies, presents evidence to show that most of the accepted theories about the eyes are wrong. It contains:

A RESUME of animal experiments and clinical observations which demonstrate that the lens is not a factor in accommodation and that all errors of refraction (nearsight, farsight, astigmatism and even old-age sight) are functional and curable.

METHODS OF TREATMENT whereby such cures have been effected in thousands of cases. By means of these methods not only physicians, but parents, teachers and others who themselves have normal vision, can cure all children under twelve who have never worn glasses and many children and adults who have worn them, while persons with minor defects of vision can often cure themselves.

Although thoroughly scientific, the book is written in language which any intelligent layman can understand.

Numerous Illustrations Price $3.00 postpaid

All leading Bookstores

and

CENTRAL FIXATION PUBLISHING CO.

383 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK CITY

NOW READY

The American Labor Year Book

1927

"THE HANDBOOK OF THE LABOR MOVEMENT"

Complete record of Labor's activities during the past year: Industrial and Social Conditions—Trade Unionism—Strikes and Lockouts—Political Action—The Courts and Labor—Workers' Education—Co-operation—Labor in Other Countries—New Books and Pamphlets—International Labor Directory.

Price, $1.50

250 Pages Octavo Cloth Bound

RAND BOOK STORE

3-7 East 15th Street, New York, N. Y.

of time, fastened upon the nation a certain amount of bad legislation, and prevented the enactment of some laws that might have turned out to be good, but quite as often it has defeated proposals later seen to have been objectionable. The Senate has manhandled treaties, as John Hay found to his irritation, yet it would be hard to point to any treaty which has been rejected that the country gave any marked indication later of having wanted. Had the Senate never done anything except to reject the Treaty of Versailles, it would have justified its existence and been entitled to forgiveness for a multitude of sins.

This is not to say that the Senate, any more than the House, ranks high as a legislative body. "The fact of the matter is," according to Professor Rogers, "that the American Congress performs its three major functions most incompetently," and this notwithstanding that "the ability and honesty of the House and the Senate are far greater than the average of the country." There remains, however, the priceless power of investigation, and although Senatorial investigations, which far outnumber those of the House or of the two bodies jointly, are often meddlesome and seldom complete, they help to keep the Executive in hand. Incidentally, too, the free-talking Senate does something to offset the predatory influence of White House propaganda, of whose operations under the present regime Professor Rogers gives a devastating account.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Books in Brief

Aristotle. The Nicomachean Ethics. Translated by H. Rackham. Aristotle. The "Art" of Rhetoric. Translated by John Henry Freese. Eusebius. The Ecclesiastical History. Vol. I. Translated by Kirsopp Lake. Saint Basil. The Letters. Vol. I. Translated by Roy J. Deferrari. Plato. Laws. Vol. II. Translated by R. G. Bury. Horace. Satires, Epistles, and Ars Poetica. Translated by H. Rushton Fairclough. Cicero. Philippics. Translated by Walter C. A. Ker. Livy. Vol. IV. Translated by B. O. Foster. The Loeb Classical Library. G. P. Putnam's Sons $2.50 each.

It is excellent to see Aristotle in this great collection at last, and to see the early Christian writings extended to take in Eusebius and Saint Basil. Professor Bury's translation of the "Laws," now completed, promises to rank with the most readable in the series. Mr. Fairclough's Horace, like all that have gone before it, is less penetrable than it might have been—though the way of Horace's satires is hard.

Lucian, Satirist and Artist. By Francis G. Allison. Aeschylus and Sophocles, Their Work and Influence. By J. T. Sheppard. Modern Traits in Old Greek Life. By Charles Burton Gulick. Our Debt to Greece and Rome. Longmans, Green and Company. $1.75 each.

The first of these new volumes in an engaging series, now issued from another than its original house, is the most critical and informing—though the omission of Fielding's name among the English debtors to Lucian amounts to a major crime. Mr. Sheppard struggles valiantly with a divided subject; and Mr. Gulick, though he tells a good deal about old Greek life, does not make good his title.

Edwin Arlington Robinson. By Ben Ray Redman. Robert M. McBride and Company. $1.

Mr. Redman lacks any critical method, and so descends into itemization of the beauties and blemishes in Mr. Robinson's successive volumes. But he is always sound and sensible in these separate judgments, and in general he conveys a clear notion of what his hero—for the book is frankly worshipful—has been doing through the thirty years of his authorship. A much more useful and illuminating essay than Lloyd Morris's, published a few years ago.

A Bill of Rights for Samoa

¶ Naval autocrats have ruled American Samoa since it was annexed in 1900.

¶ A retired navy captain is now their "supreme ruler."

¶ Natives are sentenced by illegal "kangaroo" courts without right of appeal.

¶ Americans who protest are forcibly deported from the Islands.

¶ Samuel S. Ripley of Richmond, Cal., an American citizen, was "shanghaied" at Pago Pago under order of Capt. Waldo Evans, then naval commandant, because he helped expose conditions on the Islands.

¶ His suit for damages against Capt. Evans, now pending in the Circuit Court of Appeals at Chicago, is the first step in the fight for civil rights for the Samoans. All the intolerable abuses of naval rule are revealed in the court record.

¶ This case is sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union—"than which there is no more useful or necessary or patriotic organization." [The Nation's Roll of Honor for 1926.]

$2,000 IS NEEDED TO CARRY IT THROUGH THE HIGHER COURTS. WILL YOU HELP?

Use the form below to send with your contribution.

American Civil Liberties Union,
100 Fifth Ave., New York City.

I enclose herewith $..... as a contribution to support the Ripley case and the cause of civil liberty in Samoa.

(Name) .....

(Address) .....

.....

Humoresque. By Humbert Wolfe. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

Mr. Wolfe has his moments, but they are few. And we have experienced them before, in the poetry of the nineties generally; in the verse of Ernst Dowson in particular. Mr. Wolfe's dandyism is wholly of the surface—which, perhaps, explains the insensitive rhythms, the machine-turned imagery, the unintelligent invocation of worn-out poetical properties. Whatever else Mr. Wolfe may be, he is not a poet.

The Practical Book of Learning Decoration and Furniture. By Edward Stratton Holloway. J. B. Lippincott Company. $4.50.

A great deal of information for the collector and the furnisher, presented enthusiastically.

Fogs and Clouds. By William J. Humphreys. Baltimore: The Williams and Wilkins Company. $4.

The photographs, hardly anywhere to be matched for beauty and completeness, are more important than the text.

River Thames. By F. V. Morley. Illustrated in Color and with Maps by Laurence Irving. Harper and Brothers. $6.

An agreeable tour of a famous stream. Mr. Morley knows the literature with which the Thames is drenched, and makes excellent use of it, both poetry and prose.

The Black Death. A Chronicle of the Plague. Compiled by Johannes Nohl from Contemporary Sources. Translated by C. H. Clarke. Harper and Brothers.

Light for the layman on the causes, incidents, and social results of the most terrible of Western epidemics.

The Gang. A Study of 1313 Gangs in Chicago. By Frederic M. Thrasher. University of Chicago Press. $3.

Few more specific and useful, not to say fascinating studies of American society have been made.

Spenser. By Emile Legouis. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

An abridgment of the author's larger work in French, this essay pleasantly makes out Spenser to be not the great moral poet some would like to think him, but a painter in verse.

Robinson Jeffers: The Man and the Artist. By George Sterling. Boni and Liveright. $1.

The only distinction of this book is that it is the first in the field. Readers of Mr. Jeffers will learn a few facts about his life and his already fabulous house at Carmel, but the critical part, while generous to a fault, it not of importance.

Poppies and Mandragora. Poems by Edgar Saltus. With twenty-three additional poems by Marie Saltus. Harold Vinal. $2.

Mostly unpublished poems by this romantic pessimist of the nineties.

A Year Among the Persians. Impressions as to the Life, Character, and Thought of the People of Persia. By Edward Granville Browne. With a Memoir by Sir E. Denison Ross. The Macmillan Company.

A welcome reissue of a travel classic which remotely rivals "Arabia Deserta."

The Minor Poems of Dante. Translated into English Verse by Lorna De' Lucchi. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

This first venture upon an important task is conspicuously successful.

The Mind of Rome. Contributions by Cyril Bailey, J. Bell, and Others. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

Extracts from Roman literature, arranged under pertinent heads and illustrated by photographs of places and works of art.

Collections and Reprints

A Complete History of the Lives and Robberies of the Most Notorious Highwaymen, Footpads, Shoplifts, and Cheats of Both Sexes. By Captain Alexander Smith. Edited by Arthur L. Hayward. Brentano's. $7.

The Outline of History. By H. G. Wells. New Illustrated Edition, revised and rewritten. With maps and plans by J. F. Horrabin. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $15.

Upstream. By Ludwig Lewisohn. With a new Introduction by the author. The Return of the Native. By Thomas Hardy. New Grub Street. By George Gissing. Introduction by Harry Hansen. Dubliners. By James Joyce. Introduction by Padraic Colum. The Modern Library. The Modern Library Publishers. 95 cents each.

Golden Tales of Anatole France. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.

An Anthology of Catholic Poets. Compiled by Shane Leslie. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Three Plays. By Edna St. Vincent Millay. Harper and Brothers. $2.

The Letters of George Eliot. Selected with an introduction by R. Brimley Johnson. The Dial Press. $2.50.

Collected Poems of Thomas Hardy. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

The History of the Life of the Late Mr. Jonathan Wild the Great. By Henry Fielding. To which is added The Life and Actions of Jonathan Wild. By Daniel Defoe. With an introduction by Wilson Follett. The Borzoi Classics. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

The Best Poems of 1926. Edited by L. A. G. Strong. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

Collected Poems of John G. Neihardt. The Macmillan Company. $4.

Art

A Lively Sculptor

HER name first attracted me to Tennessee Mitchell Anderson, whose humorous and beautiful show of sculpture recently divided honors at the Whitney Studio Club with paintings by Leon Hartl. "You wouldn't dare name a baby for a woman like Tennessee Claflin," a timid neighbor had said to her mother, but her mother, who approved of adventurousness in women, dared do it immediately.

When she was seventeen Tennessee Mitchell, who had been to school a little but studied violin a great deal, found her home made intolerable by a stepmother, so she took her little sister and went to Chicago to earn a living. Her music teacher had told her she had a perfect ear, which suggested to her, not the romance of the concert stage but that she might get work as a piano tuner. The managers of piano stores thought her ambition absurd; the piano-tuners' union was shocked. But she did become a specialist in tuning pianos just before the big concerts, and worked at her trade some time before she adopted the profession of teacher.

She became a sculptor by accident. During a winter near Mobile, Alabama, she began to play with the varicolored muds and clays that paint the gulleys of the country round. With a hairpin she fashioned the lumps into heads, not precisely intending to make portraits; but her companions began to recognize them as such. Photographs of those first types will be vividly

NEW SCHOOL for SOCIAL RESEARCH

Spring Term: February 21-May 13

MONDAY	TUESDAY	WEDNESDAY	THURSDAY	FRIDAY
5:20—6:50 P. M.
EDUARD C. LINDEMAN The Processes of Adult Learning. IRA S. WILE Conduct Disorders of Childhood and Adolescence	STARK YOUNG The Theatrical Season, 1927.	HARRY E. BARNES Intellectual History of Contemporary Times. BERNARD GLUECK Applications of Psychoanalysis.	E. R. A. SELIGMAN Economic Interpretations of History and Doctrine.	ARTHUR T. PAYNE The Organization of Systems of Vocational Guidance.
8:20—9:50 P. M.
HARRY A. OVERSTREET Newer Clues to Human Behavior. PAUL SINGER Current Problems of International Finance. FRANKWOOD E. WILLIAMS The Possible Significance of Psychoanalysis for Certain Social Relationships. LETA S. HOLLINGWORTH Individuality.	MORRIS R. COHEN Romantic Currents in Contemporary Thought. NORMAN J. WARE Recent Developments in Economic Thought and Practice. GORHAM B. MUNSON American Literature 1900-1927. NATHANIEL PEFFER The Present Status of Adult Education.	HARRY E. BARNES The World War: Its Causes and Aftermath. EVERETT D. MARTIN Fundamental Problems in Adult Education. ARTHUR F. PAYNE Psychology of the Worker. WILLIAM Z. RIPLEY Present-Day Problems in Industrial Organization.	NATHANIEL PEFFER Imperialism and Its Practical Implications. SILAS BENT Modern Journalism. CHARLES M. JOSEPH Labor and the Law. DUDLEY D. SHOENFELD Interpretation of Conduct Disorders.	FREDERICK R. MACAULAY Business Forecasting. PAUL ROSENFELD Modern Composers (Lectures and Piano).

Twelve lectures in each course: course tickets $15

Write for catalogue

465 West 23rd Street New York City

THE LAW OF THE JUNGLE

by Coburn Allen

With an Introduction by John Haynes Holmes

Readers of The Nation who, like Dr. Holmes, "have found a truth and caught a vision in this troubled age of human history" will share his enthusiasm over this book. This "masterly portrayal" of the present world wide social disorder "stabbed" him "wide awake." "This book," Dr. Holmes writes the author, "is suffused from start to finish with a moral passion and spiritual idealism which lift it out of the realm of economic discussion into the realm of genuine prophetic literature." Nothing published in years has made a more certain appeal to Nation readers.

$2.50

Greenberg, Publisher

112 East 19th Street New York

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

EVENINGS—SPECIAL PARTIES ONLY.
ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS. SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.
OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management
by THEODORE KEMM
GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

The course is open to graduates of colleges and universities of recognized standing.

Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.

Special courses will be arranged for social workers in accordance with their needs.

For information, address the

Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL
For
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)
210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

recalled by all readers of Sherwood Anderson's "The Triumph of the Egg," in which they were included half as illustration and half as decoration.

Some of those first mud pies were not altogether good modeling. I remember an ear that did not quite fit, and they were not exactly beautiful. The people in the "Spoon River Anthology" were most of them lacking in loveliness, but like them and the characters in "Winesburg, Ohio" Tennessee's clay people have always been believable. They bring poignant moments of understanding for folks met long ago, half noticed and forgotten.

The catalogue of the recent show was arranged chronologically. There has been steady growth since the accident of five years ago. "Club Woman," "At the Opera," "Seen at Bertrand Russell's Lecture" are done with heightened irony. "In a Street Car" is as bold as any of George Grosz, an estimate in miniature of contemporary common life. The small plaster figures ("Two Lives") of two women leaning back to back, the large breasts of the one balancing the pregnancy of the other, though literary in appeal, are a departure toward more abstract arrangement. The bas-relief called "Faces" flows like a classic frieze. There is a mask, "Good Living," not to be missed, and "The Flapper," a statuette executed in nickel, is a joke all her own.

I do not know how the stars and garters are given out in sculpture or just what merits the word "important." I once heard a collector call it absurd to make sculpture like this, and a member of the conventional trade union of sculptors say that Mrs. Anderson's portrait of Arthur Aldis was "dreadful." But this is mere repetition of her piano-tuning days. The truth about her show at the Whitney Club is that it had the breath of everyday American life in it. ERNESTINE EVANS

Drama

Contemporaneity

ONE might suppose that no characters would be easier to create than those cast in the mold of the people about one, and that no dialogue would be easier to write than that which employs the idiom of the moment. Such, however, is far from the case. Both motivation and language are more easily imitated from books or from plays than from life, and only those possessed of a very rare gift are capable of producing a representation of the contemporary scene which is completely free from merely literary echoes in the language and the sentiment. Of the plays which deal with modern life in its more familiar aspects, not one in a score escapes an occasional shattering of the illusion by the introduction of some sentiment (usually exalted) or of some turn of phrase (usually formal) which reflects the traditions of the stage rather than the manners of the day, and which thus destroys the effect of all those pieces which have naturalness as their chief aim.

Doubtless contemporaneity as such is not one of the highest artistic virtues. We can never know any time not our own well enough to know just how accurately a work of the past reflects the accent and the mood of the society which it reflects, and hence absolute fidelity in such matters plays no part in assuring that permanence by which art is usually judged. Yet however ultimately trivial it may be, it is not only highly difficult to achieve but absolutely necessary for stamping essentially ephemeral works with that cachet which gives them their current importance.

Such complete contemporaneity is the most striking characteristic of Maxwell Anderson's absorbing and moving comedy-drama "Saturday's Children" (Booth Theater). Its theme—the year of adjustment which follows marriage—has been a favorite one, at least since the success of "The First Year," and even the three scenes about which the action is centered—the proposal, the new home, and the rooming-house to which the discontented wife has fled—are familiar, but never has the theme been treated or the scenes represented with a more absolutely convincing fidelity. The language, without being exaggerated after the manner of those plays like "Is Zat So?" which create a speech of their own out of popular elements, never once misses both the form and cadence of contemporary speech; the range of ideas and sentiments attributed to the characters maintains the same verisimilitude; and from the beginning to the end of the piece the perfection of the illusion is never disturbed by any echoes. Again and again the laughter which recognition provokes bursts from the audience but it is always everyday life, not the convention of the stage, which is recognized.

Nor is this contemporaneity something which affects the surface alone, for it is a characteristic not only of the personages themselves but of the point of view from which their creator has regarded them as well. Without ever completely leaving the plane of comedy, he has grappled sincerely with their problem as it appears both to them and to him, and refusing the merely sentimental conclusion of the John Golden school, he leaves it in that state of confusion characteristic of the times. Here is no mere question of a lovers' quarrel to be made up over a crib. The two young people concerned are too sophisticate and too keenly aware of their own situation for that. Love brought them together and it is love that they desire. They wanted each other, they did not want the responsibilities, the discords, and the difficulties which marriage, the conventional sequel of love, entails; and when they get them all they are frank enough to admit where the difficulty lies. Upon the stage of the theater a little exalted preachment furnished by a convenient deus and touching upon the social duties of parenthood and citizenship would usually be sufficient to bring down the curtain upon a happy end, but it is not so here and not always so upon the larger stage. In the first place no such deus is provided because the father of the girl is not himself sure that his respectable life, which has accomplished nothing except to provide two girls to start the whole thing over again, was worth while and because the young people, naively wise with the naive wisdom of the modern city, would not have heard him had he been there. Without realizing it they are playing their parts in a gigantic struggle—the struggle between Nature which insists that we live our lives for others and Human Nature which yields less and less easily to those demands—and because, though they know no way out, they are, like so many, no longer sure that Nature is right, no longer convinced that there is anything worth giving up the happiness of their own lives for, they end with a mere temporization. Beneath Mr. Anderson's comedy is a mood, not of cynicism, but of something akin to the melancholy of despair. He has envisaged frankly the fact that marriage and children and the humdrum life of the family are not what most young lovers want, and no mere facile sentiment is enough to reconcile him to the fact that the stability of society requires that is what they shall get.

Doubtless this comedy has no enduring value. Twenty-five years from now the minute verisimilitude which makes it so real today will be no longer recognizable and the aspect under which its problem is presented will no longer be at once so familiar in daily experience and so rare upon the stage. At the present moment, however, I know no play which seems to me to reflect so exactly the manners and the souls of that section of "the younger generation" with which it deals. In every respect the accent of Mr. Anderson is absolutely contemporary.

"Yours Truly" (Shubert Theater) is an elaborate spectacle vacillating between the slight continuity required of musical comedy and the utter unconsecutiveness of the revue. It is presented by a former aid of Mr. Ziegfeld in much the Ziegfeld manner. Leon Errol keeps it amusing.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1927 No. 3216

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 195
EDITORIALS:
China—Vaccinated 198
The War on the Theater 199
Drastic Farm Relief 199
Spinoza Today 200
DIPLOMACY—BEFORE AND AFTER. By Hendrik van Loon 201
PUYE. By Mary Austin 202
THE INTERNATIONAL NAVAL RACE. By J. M. Kenworthy 203
COAL, STEEL, AND "SEDITION." By Harbor Allen 205
FOR EUROPE—FREE TRADE OR RUIN. By R. R. Kuczynski 206
CHINA'S LIBRARIES. By Arthur E. Bostwick 208
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 209
CORRESPONDENCE 209
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 212
Boccaccio and Aretino. By Joseph Wood Krutch 212
As Mr. Asquith. By R. L. Schuyler 213
Mrs. Deland's Flank Attack. By Alice Beal Parsons 214
Expressing America. By Alter Brody 214
Confusion and Suffering. By Helen Woodward 215
Books in Brief 215
Drama: Fireworks. By Joseph Wood Krutch 216
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Russian Censor Relents. By J. C 218

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY
Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S CALL for a new naval disarmament conference is welcome. The League's commission, seeking to solve air-, land-, and sea-armament problems all at once, has been almost hopelessly entangled in a maze of details; as Commander Kenworthy shows elsewhere in this issue, the Washington Conference pointed the way but left cruisers and submarines almost untouched. Mr. Coolidge's passion for economy has in this case led him in a direction which we heartily approve. We hope that he and his advisers will be ready, when the conference opens, with as concrete proposals as those with which Mr. Hughes startled the 1921 conference. England will of course accept his invitation; Japan announces her readiness to confer, although the rumors of an unwillingness to accept for cruisers the 5:5:3 ratio are ominous. France, with her submarine program, is likely to be most recalcitrant. But surely even France, with debts unpaid and thousands unemployed, cannot afford to flout the rising tide of peace sentiment at home and in the world.

THE TRADITIONAL IDEA that warfare in Central America is musical comedy with more face powder than gunpowder is not borne out by the dispatches from Nicaragua. An Associated Press correspondent who visited Chinandega, captured first by the Sacasa forces and then retaken by the troops under Diaz, describes the city as a "horrible picture." Twelve blocks of houses had been battered and burned. Women and children and other civilians were among the victims of the machine-guns and bombs. "Dozens of dead were piled here and there, while buzzards hovered overhead." More than four hundred soldiers were known to have been killed and as many wounded had been removed, but "the death toll of the battle probably never will be exactly known." The city was virtually without food, water, or medicine. All this slaughter—in which American aviators in the Conservative army dropped bombs on soldiers and civilians without discrimination—is the direct result of our intervention to set up Diaz as President. Even with all the impediments we have thrown in the way of the Sacasa forces, they have put up an aggressive fight; it is obvious that without our assistance the Diaz Government would have collapsed long since. At this writing even Diaz seems to question his power to hold out.

> The rebels early occupied the arsenal and telegraph offices. . . . Many civilians fired from house tops and street corners and made the passage of pedestrians dangerous. In fact, it became impossible for any one to leave the houses in the fighting area. . . . The men of the southern railways . . . struck in sympathy with the rebels, hoping to hinder the movement of loyal troops. . . . The American Legation . . . has been struck repeatedly by gunfire . . . and had to be abandoned. . . . Estimates [of casualties] vary largely, but the aggregate is likely to be more than 1,000 killed or wounded. . . .

THIS, BOYS AND GIRLS, is the tale of the wicked Rebels and their Horrid Revolution. It is taken from the New York Times and so we know it is true. Can any little boy tell me what the United States will do in this Emergency wherein the Lives and the Property of American Citizens are at Stake? No, Cuthbert, I warned you that it was a catch question. No, the United States will not send marines to Protect the Lives and Property of American Citizens, Restore Order, and Establish a Stable Government, because this revolution happens to have taken place in Portugal, and Portugal, even though it has had twenty-one revolutions in the last seventeen years, is not in Central America, Mexico, or the neighboring islands. Europe has its own watch-dogs and would not like interference from this side of the ocean. We'll leave that job to England, Cuthbert; British investments in Portugal are heavier than ours.

THIS PORTUGUESE REVOLUTION, if the New York Herald Tribune is correctly informed, followed the conventional pattern of Central American uprisings; behind the enraged populace were interested foreign banking groups. Let the Tribune tell its own story:

> The uprising is believed to have been staged at this moment as a sequel to the success of the war-debt commission sent to London by the Carmona Government, which obtained from England a settlement by which Portugal's debt was cut down from $125,000,000 to about $25,000,000. The settlement was followed by negotiations for a loan to be floated in London.
>
> Linked up with these there were also negotiations for a concession to an English syndicate as security for a loan of a tobacco monopoly. This for the last forty years has been in the hands of a Paris financial group as security for a $50,000,000 loan, but the French concession expired in April of last year. . . .

GOR... PUEBLO

The French tobacco monopoly is exceedingly unpopular in Portugal, due to the belief that it made immense profits for Paris concessionnaires, but little for Portugal itself. The leaders of the uprising were thus able to mobilize public support with the charge that Carmona was seeking to restore the hated French monopoly instead of coming to terms with Great Britain, whose traditional popularity as Portugal's oldest ally is increased by a favorable debt settlement. The threads of the latest and bloodiest Portuguese upheaval thus lead back to bankers' parlors in Paris and London.

BLACK SHIRTS FOR SCHOOLCHILDREN is the latest Fascist decree. This may have some merits on the ground of economy but will be awkward for those children whose fathers are in prison or who have been the victims of Fascist strong-arm methods and castor-oil persuasion. Parents who object to the ruling are politely reminded of the alternative—they may remove their children from school, and themselves, no doubt, from the face of the earth. The tax on bachelors is another recent regulation. A head tax is imposed on all unmarried male citizens except priests, officers in the army, and war cripples; in addition all men who pay income taxes are subject to a further tax in proportion to the size of their income. Fathers whose sons are dependent on them will be required to pay a tax for each son over twenty-five years of age. Are not these the kind of laws which wreck dictatorships? Regulations, no matter how stringent they may be, which deal with abstract matters—politics, the state, the vote, even local government—are not felt so deeply as is petty control of the individual. This is government in the role of schoolmarm—always an unpopular part. Mussolini so far has contented himself with grand gestures and his success with them has been astounding. It would be ironical but not without precedent if his fall, when it comes, should be brought about because of one of the most insignificant and least onerous of his attempts to make a completely integrated state.

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH BOULDER DAM? This project for a 700-foot dam, twice as high as any other in the United States, which would generate a million horse-power of energy, provide water for the arid city of Los Angeles, hold in reservoir enough water to cover New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Jersey a foot deep, and save the Imperial Valley from its periodic devastating floods—all at such a profit that in fifty years the immense project would more than pay for itself—is held up in Congress again. Why? There are local reasons in the disputes of the seven States concerned; but the primary reason is the greed of water-power interests. They do not want Uncle Sam to operate an efficient power plant; they want to continue to argue that private interests are entitled to all the profits to be made out of the flow of American rivers. It is difficult to understand the reasoning of Big Business except as sordid hypocrisy; when private interests were unable to make a profit out of the Cape Cod Canal the whole army of business lobbyists demanded that Congress agree to buy out the poor, dear bankers; but when it comes to the profitable task of harnessing the Colorado River they denounce public ownership as a crime.

THE DECOMPOSITION of England's Liberal Party continues. Wedgwood Benn, one of its ablest and most independent parliamentary leaders, has followed Commander Kenworthy into the Labor Party. Meanwhile the squabble among the survivors continues. A distinguished remnant of Asquithian leaders remains in splendid isolation from the hurly-burly of the day; David Lloyd George has the bulk of the party funds (largely the product of his auctioning of honors), the allegiance of the mass of the dwindling party membership, and an uncanny capacity for sensing the public mood and expressing it. His human understanding of the general strike won for him a sympathy which the Victorian aloofness of the Asquithians could never muster; and their attempt to read the fiery Welshman out of the party has resulted instead in their own isolation. Were Lloyd George not smeared with his own war-time record he, too, might find a new opportunity for leadership in the more and more diluted Labor Party, and he could give it an adroitness in parliamentary debate which it sometimes lacks. As it is, the human decency which was the genius of British Liberalism in its prime now finds its natural outlet through the moderate Labor Party.

RESERVATIONS TO OUR RESERVATIONS have ended the immediate possibility of American adherence to the World Court. We wouldn't join unless given a special position; and Europe wouldn't have us except on equal terms. A vast and well-meaning propaganda thus comes to naught. To us it had seemed prenatally doomed to sterility. This World Court at the Hague did not alarm us as it did some isolationists; but it seemed a pitiful ideal for a great peace movement. There was no suggestion of a binding pledge to outlaw war, to accept arbitration of all disputes—only a demand that we share in one alternative form of arbitrating some disputes. Will the women's clubs and peace societies continue to fight for this particular brand of peace-machinery? Or will they come at last to a great demand to arbitrate all disputes of whatever nature, never to engage in war—beginning with wholehearted condemnation of our aggressive policy toward Mexico, Nicaragua, and China?

THE BOGY-MAN is working overtime these days. Secretary Wilbur finds him in the Third International, "this new form of attack which seeks to destroy the foundations of this government, namely, the home and the sense of religious obligations. It would destroy home and government and God." This sounds serious enough, to be sure, and anybody would be justified in diving into bed and pulling the blankets over his head for protection. In Toledo the goblin at present is Sherwood Eddy, who, it is said, goes about the country corrupting our young men by inducing them to sign pledges to become conscientious objectors to military service. The American Legion in that city made such an effective protest against a speech that Mr. Eddy was to have delivered to high-school students that the Board of Education first forbade the speech and then decided it might be given if no religious, political, or controversial subject was discussed. In Los Angeles the army and police are afraid of The Nation! Karl Spies Robinson was arrested for selling copies of this magazine next to a recruiting booth, in the logical but evidently mistaken notion that propaganda for peace might be offered at the same time as propaganda for war. Mr. Robinson was actually sentenced to thirty days in jail for "obstructing traffic" and given a suspended sentence of ninety days for "advertising in the streets," although the recruiting booth was well-advertised by machine-guns, hand-grenades, and rifles with fixed bayonets.

AND THE ARCH-PLOTTER, the super-menace, the biggest and blackest bogy of all is none other than Judge Ben B. Lindsey of Denver! For more than two years Judge Lindsey has been defending his election to the bench of the Denver Juvenile and Family Court, where he has been since 1901. His enemy is the Ku Klux Klan; his opponent, the Klan candidate, committed suicide in 1925, but his widow has been continuing to contest the election, and by a ruling of the Colorado Supreme Court on January 24 Judge Lindsey was technically ousted from office, although he will serve pending an appeal of the case. In more than a quarter of a century of the most confidential relations with persons in domestic difficulties of one sort or another, Judge Lindsey has learned much which is not generally admitted by officials of the church or the government. As a result of his long and peculiar experience, he believes that something is wrong with domestic relations, and with marriage in particular. He knows that many marriages are not successful; he knows that many parents are not fitted to take care of their children; he knows that extra-marital relations occur among ordinary people as well as among the wicked, degenerate, and lost; he knows that for want of information about birth control thousands of abortions are performed every year. These are matters which are not spoken of in public. Judge Lindsey has dared to speak of them and to discuss as possible remedies for them availability of contraceptive information, easy divorce for childless couples, and a sort of trial marriage dissolvable after a year by mutual consent; and this has brought upon his head a storm of reproach and vituperation—led by the super-moral Ku Klux Klan!

IT IS GOOD NEWS FOR NEW YORK that the Scripps-Howard organization has bought the New York Telegram. Despite the announcement of the purchasers that they contemplate "no radical changes" the vigor and enterprise which they have thrown into their twenty-five other newspapers mean that they cannot help change the characterlessness of the old Telegram. The Nation has often regarded newspaper consolidations with a jaundiced eye; generally they have stunted editorial personality, deadened individuality, reduced newspapers to expressions of Babbittism. The Scripps-Howard papers have dared to lead; when Carl C. Magee's brave independence got him into difficulty with his New Mexico State Tribune the Scripps organization went to his aid; its Cleveland Press supported La Follette in 1924 and helped carry that city for the Progressive leader; its Washington Daily News puts a little color into the journalistic desert of the capital. In New York, as in Denver, it has boldly cast the Associated Press franchise overboard, refusing to agree to its monopolistic news policy; it is satisfied that the United Press and United News are now adequate to supply any metropolitan newspaper.

STEAMSHIP PASSENGERS have so much done for them nowadays that they are inclined to take it all for granted when it is forthcoming and to act like spoiled children when it isn't, blaming the chief steward if the sun doesn't shine and complaining of the captain if the soup is cold. So it is pleasant to learn that the passengers on the President Harding behaved otherwise when that vessel was the victim of an unusual accident in mid-Atlantic on its recent trip from Europe to New York. Buffeted by a tremendous storm, the hull of the President Harding was so wrenched that sea-water seeped into some of the oil carried for fuel, making it unusable. The vessel thus found herself in the dangerous position of having to drive through a sea of terrific ferocity with a shortage of fuel. Both heat and light were cut off to conserve every ounce of oil for making steam for the propellors, and the wooden hatch-coverings were chopped up to make fires for simple cooking. The passengers cooperated finely, and when they were met at Halifax by an agent of the United States Line, who offered to send them on to New York by special train, they declined and stuck by the ship.

READERS OF BOOKS in the United States are at once more numerous and more interesting, we believe, than any publisher has yet had opportunity to realize. Recent sales of superior novels and of serious works in history, philosophy, and science have often been commented on because of their seemingly inexplicable size. New machinery is being set up with the design of distributing to this large book-hungry public as much literature as it can hold. The Literary Guild of America, which announces that it will publish or otherwise distribute twelve new books yearly to as many persons as will subscribe to the undertaking, is doubtless only the first of several such organizations destined to be formed; similar guilds in Germany have enormous memberships. The Book-of-the-Month Club, whose members have been reading volumes selected for them from the current output, differs from the guild chiefly in that while it does not cut prices its books are returnable; ingenuity will discover still other schemes. The significant thing is the size of the public approachable on this basis and its willingness to accept twelve books a year selected for it as the contents of twelve issues of a monthly magazine are selected. The booksellers of the country are said to be worried over the new enterprises, particularly over the low prices which the Literary Guild thinks its mass sales will justify. In the long run we believe that the buying of books will be stimulated, and the interest in them deepened and increased.

FOR FRIENDS OF PERCY STICKNEY GRANT the real tragedy came less with his recent death than with the fate which sent him, broken in health, into quiet retirement more than two years ago. Dr. Grant's colorful controversies, first with Bishop Burch and then with Bishop Manning, on questions of economic, social, and theological orthodoxy, gave him in many quarters a reputation for a far more definite radicalism than he actually held. His deepest belief was a faith in freedom, and his finest characteristic a courageous honesty. In this spirit he established the forum—one of the first to meet under church auspices—which was killed by the restrictions placed upon it by the bishop of the diocese of New York. He supported the Great War with the frank declaration that to do it he had to declare a moratorium on his Christianity; but he was the first clergyman of any established communion in New York City to open his church for a public meeting in behalf of conscientious objectors, and was himself among the most vigorous of the speakers.

China—Vaccinated

CHINA today is riven by a host of civil wars; the cables report the tramp of hostile armies in Honan, Chekiang, and Szechuan. Canton denounces Peking as the tool of foreign imperialism, and Chang Tso-lin from the North declares a holy war against the "Bolshevist" South. But Chu Chao-hsin, the Chinese representative at Geneva, announces that he and his colleagues in the other European capitals have arranged to represent both factions, and begins by preparing to continue his campaign of protest—now made in behalf of both China's governments—against the British troops being sent to Shanghai.

In attitude toward the foreigners China is one. North and South, East and West, no Chinese official today would dare compromise on the abolition of the unequal treaties. Whatever may happen to the Southern armies, their soul goes marching on. Nationalism has won on every front; to gain, or even to hold, adherents Canton's opponents have been obliged to assert their devotion to the Canton program of reestablishing China's sovereignty. When the Cantonese drove the British out of their concessions in Hankow and Kiukiang, the Peking Government countered by formally demanding return of the Tientsin concessions which are within its territory—and began, in true Western style, by ousting the weakest of the foreign Powers, Belgium. While the Cantonese are struggling to win Shanghai, the Chinese within the city are demanding that the British give immediate effect to Austen Chamberlain's declared readiness to revise the terms on which the settlements are held. A committee headed by C. T. Wang, former Foreign Minister, a Yale graduate; David Yui, executive of the Y. M. C. A., a Harvard graduate; and a group of bankers and business men—these, representing the Chinese Ratepayers' Association which pays 80 per cent of the International Settlement's taxes, are demanding that the Chinese be given equal representation with the British on the Shanghai Municipal Council at once as a first step, with more to come. Christian and non-Christian, banker and coolie, foreign graduate and native-trained Chinese stand shoulder to shoulder, all demanding that the foreigner give up, at once, all his special privileges.

If there be any differences it is the foreign-trained men who clamor most against the foreigner. Eugene Chen, the Canton Foreign Minister who has been most bitter against the aliens, is himself of alien birth and training. He is a native of Trinidad and was educated in England; it was the British who taught him his present race consciousness. His predecessors in that office were also foreign trained—Fu Ping-sheung, graduate of the British University of Hongkong, and C. C. Wu, who went from the public high school at Atlantic City, New Jersey, to the University of London. The Peking Minister of Foreign Affairs, who forced Belgium to negotiate new equal treaties, Wellington Koo, is a graduate of our own Columbia University; his predecessors hold their academic degrees from Virginia and Yale. Chu Chao-hsin, who uses the League of Nations as a sounding-board to broadcast his attacks on British policy, holds degrees from New York and Columbia, and most of his colleagues are foreign trained.

This is no accident. The Nationalist movement is strongest where foreign influence has been most intense. Canton is its natural center because it has been the center of intercourse with foreigners for more than a century. From Canton millions of Chinese have emigrated to the Straits Settlements, to the Dutch East Indies, to the West Indies, to the Philippines, to California, and they have returned fired with a political nationalism learned from the West. Sun Yat-sen's long years of revolutionary activity were financed, largely, by emigrant Chinese. Chinese who had made their fortunes under the British flag in Singapore and Rangoon were happy to send substantial contributions—probably more than a million dollars—to maintain the long Canton boycott of Hongkong and Great Britain. Always it is the students, trained by Western methods, and the factory workers, also thrust rudely in contact with Western "civilization," who have been the vanguard of China's Nationalist uprisings.

Chinese Nationalism today is not the blind anti-alienism of Boxer days, strongest in the remote interior. Those who charge the missionaries with responsibility for it have a measure of justice on their side; those who blame the penetration of foreign business are equally right; those who say the tens of thousands of returned students have brought back the revolutionary spark are also justified. Western influence in China has acted like a vaccination; it has first made the patient ill, while at the same time inoculating him with the germs of resistance to the disease. The more troops the British ship to China, the more bitter will be the resistance to the foreigners. They can hold Shanghai today; but what good will Shanghai do them if a nation of 400,000,000 people is roused against them, filled with hate, determined to boycott their products?

This is no time to demand the calm and leisurely processes of negotiation. There were no leisurely processes when the British took Hongkong, enlarged their territory after burning the Summer Palace in 1861, added Weihaiwei and the New Territory in Kowloon in 1898. The Powers have promised much and done nothing. Today the Chinese are acting.

Much hinges on the British course at Shanghai. It is often said that the British in China always act with an eye upon India; it is true. To the British the concessions already made seem great. A year ago they might have seemed great even to the Chinese. But there is such a thing as the psychological moment. The British let that moment slide; today the Chinese regard their successive retreats as evidences of weakness, and they are such. The American "return" of the Boxer indemnity in 1908 was a step in time; it gave America a perhaps unmerited prestige; similar British action in 1925 came too late to have any psychological effect. Compromises and concessions made after mobs and militarists have already seized the points conceded cannot appease the Nationalist fire. Bonny troops—Scotch, British, Irish, and Indian—parading through the streets of Chinese cities may awe for the moment, but they will only deepen the determined hostility in every Chinese who sees them or hears of them. Unless the Powers are ready to act without delay, to make sweeping concessions before the Chinese force them, the effect will indeed be felt, not in China and India alone, but in all the Eastern colonies of all the white empires.

The War on the Theater

THE War on the Theater has been developing with great rapidity. Governor Smith has given evidence once more of the genuineness of his liberalism by reiterating his opposition to the establishment of a censorship, but a few days later, on the evening of February 9, the New York police department raided three current plays—"The Captive," "Sex," and "The Virgin Man." Producers, actors, and managers, forty-one persons in all, were arrested after the conclusion of the evening's performances, conveyed to the station house, and later all released on bail. The police announced their intention of making rearrests as often as the plays should be reopened, but the next day all three managers secured temporary injunctions restraining them from further interference and performances have been resumed. The cast of "The Virgin Man" is to be held for trial, and there, for the moment, the matter rests.

The three plays proceeded against are not all in the same category. Two are frankly sensational, but "The Captive" is, despite its theme, a quiet and decorous piece which has been highly praised by most of the New York dramatic critics. All have been running without previous molestation for periods which range from three weeks in the case of "The Virgin Man" to ten months in the case of "Sex" and both the latter and "The Captive" had been approved by the Citizens Play Jury, by whose decisions District Attorney Banton had previously pledged himself to abide. The raids were the occasion of the usual absurdities. "The Virgin Man" had been expected to close as a failure at the end of the week, but now will doubtless have its life considerably prolonged, and the prosperity of the two others will be still further increased if the injunction secured by the managers is made permanent. According to a newspaper account, Lieutenant Mulligan, who arrested the manager of "The Virgin Man," greeted his victim with the words "Young man, your fortune is made."

The Nation does not pretend to believe that police raids will have any permanent effect upon conditions which are merely a part of the general traditions of present-day society. It approves of a sincere frankness in life and letters, and it believes that in so far as mere sensational obscenity may be popular in public entertainment such popularity is the symptom of the existence of attitudes and appetites which will not be greatly improved by the closing of a few plays. Yet it does believe that the activities of the police department are preferable to those of any official censor, because though the unexpected and erratic character of the raids causes them sometimes to work hardships upon individuals, their general tendency is less dangerous than the secret autocracy of a censor. They are by nature sporadic, they are generally the outcome of some temporary agitation which soon subsides again, and they do not, like the establishment of a censorship, involve the introduction of a new principle foreign to our theory of government and likely to develop dangerously in new directions. The very fact that they do not depend upon the addition of new laws to the already overburdened statute-books is in itself an important consideration in their favor, and the fact that they generally result in a trial by jury is another. Doubtless a censor is quiet and more "efficient"; and so also a star chamber is more quiet and "efficient" than a court organized upon the English or American model, but the trial by jury provides guaranties against bureaucratic autocracy which are not to be sacrificed for any other consideration.

It is legally possible for the arrested actors and managers to be sentenced in a police court for misdemeanor, but in the case of the "God of Vengeance" a jury trial was requested and granted and we hope that the same will be true in the present cases. If the stage is to be regulated by law, let such regulation have the full benefit of the protection against high-handed methods which our law provides and which the importance of the issues involved makes desirable. Are convictions difficult to obtain? Does trial by jury make it hard to decide a case according to the opinions, prejudices, or passions of some particular person or group of persons? Yes; but it was just for these reasons that trial by jury was established. The unanimous opinion of twelve men is necessary to convict another of a crime; why should any less unanimity be required to convict of an offense which is by its very nature indefinite and so dependent upon subjective factors that what seems beautiful to most people may seem obscene to others?

In addition, however, The Nation believes that the chief business of the law is less with manners and morals than with crime, and it is inclined to suspect that there is some relationship between the fact that America is at once the most lawless of civilized nations and the one in which the police are most commonly regarded as the guardians of public morality as well as of public safety. For the District Attorney's office to be so much concerned as it is with the state of the theater in a city where crimes of violence are of daily occurrence seems to reveal a certain inclination to strain at gnats while swallowing camels. It must be comforting for a thief, engaged in cracking a safe, to know that the police are busily employed in arresting actresses around the corner.

Drastic Farm Relief

THE McNary-Haugen farm-relief bill is a genuine attempt to assist American agriculture. Whatever else may be said against it, it cannot fairly be described, like most of the other farm bills now or recently before Congress, as a mere political gesture intended to conciliate and hoodwink the agricultural vote. The measure has undergone important changes since it first arrived in Washington half a dozen years ago, but the purpose remains the same, although finally set forth in one of the blindest bills ever devised in that mole-hill of legislation known as the United States Capitol.

Provision is made for a Federal Farm Board consisting of the Secretary of Agriculture and twelve other members, the latter to be appointed by the President from the various federal land-bank districts from nominations made chiefly by farmer organizations. The important powers of the board are in connection with five products—wheat, corn, hogs, rice, and cotton—designated as "basic agricultural commodities." In the traffic in these products the board is empowered to overrule the usual laws of supply and demand. The McNary-Haugen bill doesn't describe it that way; the text calls it "orderly marketing." But that is only one of the many phrases in the bill which conceal as much as they tell.

The heart of the bill is the "equalization fee." When the Federal Farm Board decides that there is so much of a surplus of any one of the five "basic agricultural commodities" as to make it probable that growers will not get a fair return, it may declare an emergency to exist and place an "equalization fee" upon each bushel, pound, or bale of the product that is sold. The "equalization fee" is collected directly from the railroad, miller, or wholesale buyer, but indirectly, of course, it is inevitable that it be passed on to the consumer. The board itself does not buy or sell any product. It works with cooperative farmers' marketing associations, and previous to putting into effect an "equalization fee" it must assure itself that a competent selling organization is in existence. The farmers' organization takes charge of the selling, the Federal Farm Board assisting it financially by loans from a $250,000,000 revolving fund authorized by the bill. Assisted by such loans—which are supposed to be covered by the "equalization fees" when they come in—the marketing association is in a position to obtain what it considers reasonable prices by holding the crop, or any part of it, off the market for such time as seems desirable, and by dumping any surplus abroad for what it will bring in order not to lower prices in the domestic market.

The bill does not compel a farmer to sell through a cooperative, but it offers him a decided incentive to do so, and no matter how the sale is made the "equalization fee" has to be paid. This removes a present difficulty from the operations of farmers' selling organizations. At present the members must bear the expense of operations intended to improve prices, but outsiders share equally in the benefits.

The supporters of the McNary-Haugen bill insist that it does not provide for price-fixing and avoid the use of the word subsidy in describing its contemplated results. Technically and legally they are probably correct. But the primary purpose of the McNary-Haugen measure is to raise prices, and its benefit to the farmer depends upon that result. Nor is there any reality in dodging the word subsidy. In so far as such a measure raises prices, it represents a subsidy from the consumer to the producer. From the standpoint of theoretical economics the measure is a bad one. But from the point of view of a farmer faced with a political situation there is a great deal to justify it. For many years farmers have not been getting a reasonable share of the national wealth; agriculture has been on the decline. The farmers are certainly as much entitled to assistance from the community at large through artificial prices as the manufacturers ever were, and far more so than the latter are today. The manufacturers still enjoy an enormous subsidy from the consumers through the operations of the protective tariff; and a Republican Administration which justifies a tariff is in no position to protest against the assistance to the farmers contemplated by the McNary-Haugen bill.

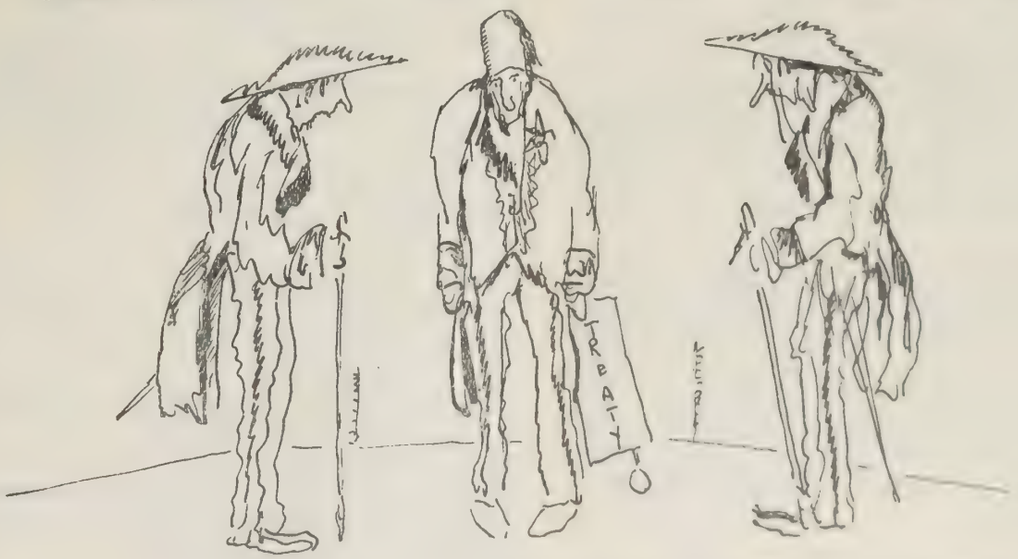
The Nation is opposed to the artificial regulation of commerce and opposed to class legislation. It is fundamentally opposed to the principles behind the McNary-Haugen measure; but if the protective tariff is to stay on the statute-books the farmer has an equal right to his subsidy. Whatever may be said of the ultimate merits of this bill, the fact remains that there is no other proposal before the people which gives the farmer any hope of a lift. This plan may be worth trying.

Spinoza Today

BENEDICT, born Baruch, Spinoza has been dead two hundred and fifty years. For a philosopher, he retains a singular place in the affections of mankind. His philosophy, reviled during his lifetime, has become an honored possession even among those remotely connected with it and, among those familiar with its liberating doctrine, a positive passion. His name is almost synonymous with philosophical detachment and spiritual serenity. His fundamental doctrine of the unity of all things and the necessity of everything in nature is accompanied in his thought by a patient insistence on taking the vicissitudes of time under the emancipating perspective of eternity.

Though he was excommunicated by his own Jewish community, and suspected by the Protestants, a few philosophers and scientists—Henry Oldenburg of the Royal Society, Leibnitz, the Elector Palatine—sought Spinoza's advice and services. He had an admiring group of disciples in Amsterdam. His plea for religious liberty and political freedom was widely read, but his essential philosophy was so simple in its essence, so difficult in its expression, that it long remained obscure. Its apparent pantheism appealed to the romantic spirits of Novalis and Goethe in Germany and Shelley in England. Increasingly, the freedom and passion of the geometrically stated philosophy have fascinated minds seeking emancipation through reason.

It is possible, said Spinoza, to see all objects and all events in terms of their essential unity in the universe of infinite substance, their essential necessity in the relations of universal law. Body and mind, instead of creating for him the puzzles of the epistemologists, became two parallel attributes of one nature or God. Happiness consists in peace; and peace is attainable through complete knowledge—not knowledge of all details of the universe but awareness of its essential structure and necessity. To become completely aware of the universe, that sea of infinite knowledge in which the waves of life and passion by necessity move, is to become serene, to escape from the passion of the particular to the peace of the eternal.



Spinoza stands also for two ideas peculiarly relevant to the modern liberal temper. His doctrine of political and religious freedom makes his famous tract on thought part of the great tradition which includes Milton and John Stuart Mill. His psychological doctrine makes life almost identical with the impulse to persevere in one's own being. What the psychoanalysts call "libido" Spinoza calls "desire," and it is the core of his ethical doctrine that all beings behave as they do out of the necessities of their own nature. He does not counsel the quenching of passion, but suggests that one passion may be replaced by another. He counsels reason in behavior because through reason one may see oneself in the contacts of that infinite nature of which one's own is the limited and partial expression. To become completely aware, completely reasonable, is to become at once clear and definite and tolerant. It is to recognize the necessities of nature, to escape from the bondage of passion by which people act falsely to their own natures and achieve the freedom of reason by which they act according to their readings of eternal necessity. Spinoza is a hard philosopher to read and a hard one to live by, but according to his own statement the best things are as difficult as they are rare.

1913. "Remember, Your Excellencies, these negotiations must be kept a profound secret . . . "

Then we fought a terrible war to bestow upon a much-harassed world the blessings of "open agreements openly arrived at."

And then, in 1926, "Remember, Your Excellencies, these negotiations must be kept a profound secret . . . " And so on ad infinitum.

Herbert Miller in Boston Globe 1926

Diplomacy—Before and After

Puye

By MARY AUSTIN

[Awarded Second Prize in The Nation's Poetry Contest for 1927]

Here, say our fathers' fathers,
Out of the Womb-world, out of Sipapu, climbing
By the roots of the royal pine,
Came the First People

Mother naked, sandal shod,
Hollowing their homes in the cliff side,
Fencing them with junipers.
In those days they were instructed of the juniper,
Whose boughs springing back taught them the bow play
While the reeds by the waterholes sang to them of arrows,
For whose feathering they gathered
Eagle plumes on Puye.

In those days the rains were plentiful,
The deer also, with their spotted fawns
Feeding on yellow flowers;
And the tall bucks cropping the young growth
At the ends of the blue spruce branches.
Here then, as now, was silence,
And the wide outlook whence the rains came,
With their wing feathers edged with dark cloud,
With the far-flung lightnings over their heads
And green, flowery footprints.
Where are they now, those Ancients?

Where are the wapiti, the round horned elk
They watched moving in the deep arroyas,
Like a bare wood, walking?

II

After these came the Small-House People,
Say the old men.
Very wise this People, People of the Seed,
Having received it from the Six Corn Maidens.
They laid up walls four-square, roofing them with aspens,
Kivas they built, underground, remembering the Womb-world,
Dark Sipapu and the Black Lake of Tears.

Not ours, but kin to us, the Small-House People,
Giving honor to Awányu, the great plumed serpent,
Guardian of the water springs, to whom the rains are friendly.
For them corn sprouted in the open spaces,
The fragrant bean plant and the gaudy squashes.
Wise were they of guile; came the deer to their singing,
While their women made them pots of painted borders,
And bore many children.

III

Here came our fathers,
Say the song priests,
Came the Tewas, came the Queres,
Moving south and ever south, so the clans may prosper,
Say the old men.

Not as the Small-House People came our fathers,
Every man to his own roof and the field between them,
But as a mother-hive, bound by the hearth keeper;
Wall touching wall and all the smokes commingling.
Still at Tyuoñi, cut above the door holes,
Are the clan signs of the Queres.
But our fathers built at Puye.

Happy were our fathers, greatly did they prosper,
Dancing to the tombes and the deer hoof rattles
Till they brought the rains over Jemez,
The he-rain and the she-rain on Chirígi;
Till they heard the runnels gurgling
Round the roots of the great corn plant
And the lovely melon flowers.

Friendly, very friendly were the Small-House People;
Learning Tewa wisdom, they drew their homes together;
Round the rock of Puye ranged the Tewa hearth holes;
So the towns were builded.
Very many towns; and we talked across the housetops
By the smoke signs and the tombes
Návawi and Shufiné, Óttowi and Tsánkawi,
Calling them to Puye.

Noble was our Pueblo, north house and south house,
Far across Chirígi stretched our temporales,
Round the tasseled corn blue butterflies were dancing,
As our fathers danced for rain and gave praises to Awányu.
Long was that time, very long,
Say the old ones,
Hip deep the trails between Óttowi and Tsánkawi,
Deep the trails on Puye.

Where are they now, those light stepping moccasins
Bit the rock walled trails between the happy Pueblos?
Where are the pronghorns that like shadow clouds in summer
Skimmed across Chirígi?

Faithless were our fathers,
Say the snake priests,
Pride was in their hearts and their thoughts left the straight road,
Pride of field and housetop, terraced ever skyward;
And no praises for Awányu.
Left they the dance and the secret Kiva vigils,
Sang they of love, and of war and wounding,
Black were their prayer sticks, raven plume and owl feather,
Black prayers for Puye.

In those days Awányu,
Say the old, old men,
Left the Tewa land where no longer sacred meal roads
Traced the spirit path to the four world quarters,
And men's hearts had left the straight road;

Left off honoring Awányu.
High across the heavens in disdain he flung him,
In the middle heaven white his ghost goes writhing
All across the midnight
Over Puye.

Then the rains walked not, and the water springs failed
And the hot winds danced on Chirígi.
. . . See that mound there that the herd grass scarcely covers
And the lean cactus cannot bloom upon?
That was once the Town of Yellow Flowers . . .
Even so with Puye.

Deeply lessoned, then our fathers
Built their towns anew by the rivers, built acequias
For the watering of the corn and the squashes;
Vainly beat the tombes,
Calling on the rain by the magic of their singing,
Calling on Awányu, who from heaven where he flung him
Seldom hears them.
Shrunken are our fields, shrunk the Tewa people,
And our hearts are withered.
While again the lizard darts
And the raven blackly stalks
And the Whiteman comes to stare
On Puye.

The International Naval Race

By J. M. KENWORTHY

THE only practical step toward a reduction of armaments since the end of the World War was taken at Washington in 1921 at the initiative of an American President. The situation is curious.

During the war President Wilson made his famous declaration to the effect that the American navy must be second to none in the world. Even if this declaration had not been made, a great shipbuilding program would surely have been embarked upon by the United States as soon as that country intervened in the World War; and during the whole war period shipbuilding for the British navy was pushed to the utmost.

The war ended satisfactorily for the British in this at least: Germany was put out of action as a naval Power. The peace treaties prohibited the reconstruction of the German navy, sunk by its own crews at Scapa Flow, and forbade for all time the construction by Germany of submarines.

Satisfactory as was this elimination of Germany as a naval Power, the early months of the peace saw a new rival armada in course of construction. In spite of war additions to the British fleet, and the comparatively small loss suffered in capital ships, the naval building program of America was so formidable as to threaten Great Britain's sea supremacy. To the British Admiralty the American challenge seemed serious. The war had weakened Britain financially; and we found ourselves faced on the one hand with a supposed threat by Japan to our Australasian Dominions and on the other with this vast battleship fleet in course of construction on the other side of the Atlantic. Fortunately the British people refused to see in the American shipbuilding program any threat to British security. Wiser than their rulers, they laughed at the Admiralty's propaganda. Nevertheless by making use of the momentum of its own war preparations and the laxity of parliamentary control during the war and just after, the Admiralty was able to push on with a program of battleship construction nearly as large as that of the United States. Japan also began to speed up naval construction. By 1920, in spite of public opinion in Britain and America, a new shipbuilding competition between England, America, and Japan was in progress.

Nor was France behindhand. The weakness of the French financial position had not yet been fully exposed. During the war the French Admiralty had ceased all construction work on large warships in order that the engineering resources of the country might be entirely at the disposal of the French army. Because of this the French admirals were able to make out a strong case after the armistice for a large building program for the French navy.

The super-dreadnoughts designed for the principal navies of the world were of great size, costing $35,000,000 each. These new giants were to mount guns of sixteen-, seventeen-, and even eighteen-inch caliber and to be so powerful as to outclass all their predecessors.

This, then, was the situation when President Harding called the Five Power Conference at Washington in 1921. Only five nations were concerned—the United States, Great Britain, Japan, France, and Italy. Compared with the results of other conferences on armaments, the Washington Agreement was of immense value. The construction of capital ships, i. e., battleships and battle cruisers, was to cease until 1932. It was agreed that in 1932 a new conference should be held with the object of limiting the construction of warships for a further period. The number of aircraft carriers, vessels larger than battleships and actually more costly, was limited by agreement. The ratio of battleships, battle cruisers, and aircraft carriers was fixed for the United States, Japan, and Britain at 5-3-5. Japan accepted a position of inferiority to Britain and America, while Britain accepted American equality.

The taxpaying publics of all the Powers concerned heaved a sigh of relief. The honest diplomatists of all the Powers concerned felt that a great triumph had been achieved. Lovers of peace, then in a great majority in all countries, were satisfied. On paper it seemed as though the conventions agreed to at Washington had made naval rivalry between the three chief Powers impossible for a period of ten years, and it was believed that if these agreements were kept there would be no difficulty in continuing the naval shipbuilding "holiday" for a further period.

Unfortunately there were defects in the Washington Treaty which are only now being fully realized. In the first place, the naval staffs of the Powers were unanimously opposed to the Washington Conference from its inception; and none of the high naval functionaries favored any limitation of armaments by agreement. For the older admirals it was tragic to contemplate the actual scrapping of surplus warships, some of them just off the stocks. Added to this was the quite honest fear that the agreements would not be kept. (A similar sentiment has prevented America from ratifying the convention against the use of poison gas in warfare.) The attitude of the naval staffs concerned was human and honest. But behind them were powerful interests—the naval-shipbuilding firms, the armor-plate manufacturers, and a whole galaxy of industries which receive contracts every time a battleship is laid down.

On the main question of the building of capital ships the naval staffs and their allies in the armament interests were beaten, but no agreement was reached with regard to cruiser building. It is true that the large protected cruiser and the armored cruiser were limited, but those types had become obsolescent in all the world's navies. Agreement with regard to the so-called light cruisers was prevented principally by the opposition of Great Britain. The refusal of the French to support the British proposal that the submarine be declared illegal was used by the British admirals at Washington as an excuse for placing no limit on the number of light cruisers. The British delegates also argued that the sea-borne trade of Britain is so vital to her national existence and her trade routes are so scattered and lengthy that Britain could not accept equality with other Powers. The discussion on cruisers took place toward the end of a long-drawn-out conference when all the participants were weary; and this vital defect in the treaty—the absence of any limitation on the building of cruisers—was allowed to slip through.

We now see the results.

A limitation of 10,000 tons for each vessel was agreed to. This seemed little enough in comparison with 35,000 tons for a modern battleship or with 50,000 tons for a modern aircraft carrier. But it was actually bigger than any of the cruisers of this type then built or under construction for any of the navies of the world. The general staffs of the Powers concerned at once began work on designs of 10,000-ton vessels; before one keel had been laid down, this type of cruiser, now known as the Washington-type cruiser, became the fashion in the world's navies. The Japanese designs were the first to be published, though appropriations were held up by the Japanese Diet, principally owing to the financial effects of the earthquake. The French admirals then produced their designs and began to project programs.

By the time the British Admiralty was ready the first Labor Government in Britain was in power. Owing to influences which have never been clearly identified, Labor's first Prime Minister, Ramsay MacDonald, was induced to appoint as the first Lord of the Admiralty one of the Conservative elder statesmen, Lord Chelmsford. The First Sea Lord and executive head of the navy was Admiral Lord Beatty, a man of great force of character and immense prestige. Hardly had the Labor Government taken over the seals of office than a raging, tearing propaganda opened in the press and the country, demanding a large shipbuilding program of the new type of cruisers.

Partly because the Conservative Party is by tradition in favor of a strong navy, and partly as a means of embarrassing the Government of the day, the Tory leaders supported the Admiralty's demands to the full. Taken by surprise, inexperienced, without an independent majority in Parliament, the Labor Party acquiesced, and five of these new ships were laid down.

Now, this new 10,000-ton type of cruiser costs as much as a battleship did before the war. The cruisers being built for the American and British navies cost about $15,000,000 each. By a triumph of the shipbuilders' art they are so swift and powerful as to outclass any vessels built before them. While the Washington Agreement "limited" the guns to a caliber of eight inches, this was actually larger than the guns mounted on many of the British cruisers.

This success of the British Admiralty was the signal for an agitation in favor of a similar program by the Navy Department at Washington and the Japanese Admiralty.

The British Admiralty's propaganda was renewed in 1925, after the Labor Party had given way to the present Conservative Government. But although the Conservatives had shouted loudly for a large shipbuilding program when in opposition, it was a different matter when they were in office and had to find the money. Winston Churchill, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was pledged to economy. His peace-and-economy section of the British Cabinet put up a valiant fight in the councils of the Government and were aided on the floor of the House by the weakened Liberal and Labor oppositions. The Admiralty won again, though they did not obtain all they asked. It was freely stated that the whole Board of Admiralty threatened to resign unless their demands were met.

The answering programs of the other Powers to the naval shipbuilding plans agreed to under the Labor Government were used as a reason for extracting further appropriations from the Conservative Government. By the autumn of 1925 a compromise was reached, under which during the next four years no less than sixteen cruisers of the latest type were to be constructed, in addition to submarines, torpedo destroyers, and one aircraft carrier—costing, in all, some $290,000,000.

There was in 1925 no justification whatever for such a program. Plain hints had been received from America that the United States Government was reluctant to embark on a new race in naval shipbuilding. More than one semi-official suggestion of a new conference had been made by the present President of the United States. At the time when the British Board of Admiralty forced this program upon the British people Great Britain had at its disposition forty-nine modern cruisers, Japan eighteen, Italy twelve, the United States nine, and France seven. Many of the forty-nine British cruisers are small, having been built for work in the North Sea, but none the less Great Britain's cruiser strength was very great.

The effect of England's program on America and Japan was immediate. At Washington the question of America's naval appropriations has been hotly debated and the demand is being reiterated for equality with Britain in cruisers as in other craft. Japan is following suit. France and Italy are building few cruisers but both Powers are concentrating on the submarine; and France at this moment has more submarines under construction than Germany had at any time during the up-building of the German fleet.

The debates in the United States Senate and House will be answered in March in London when the British naval estimates come up for discussion and the Admiralty will demand still further appropriations. These demands and debates will be answered in the summer in the Japanese Diet. There is only one way out. Another conference must be brought together promptly to make good the defects of the last. With the two great English-speaking peoples in harmony again this mad race can be ended.

Coal, Steel, and "Sedition"

By HARBOR ALLEN

IN twelve cities and towns of Pennsylvania police have recently raided the homes of workers, arrested left-wing union speakers, charged members of the Workers' Party with sedition, driven organizers out of town, broken up meetings, locked up halls, and intimidated hall owners. The cause of these pogroms is the growing unrest of workers, the spreading power of the Communists, the increased pressure for unions in non-union plants, and the rise of a militant left wing within the miners' union.

Who has been pulling the wires that make the police of Pennsylvania pounce? The puppet master is not hard to find in the western part of the State where the Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation rules a cluster of towns known as the "J and L private kingdom." "The majority of raids of this kind," Governor Pinchot conceded to the protests of the American Civil Liberties Union, "are probably prompted by the self-interest of large corporations." In the mining district of northeastern Pennsylvania the controlling hand is, oddly enough, that of the United Mine Workers' district officials intrenched against the Brophy left-wing opposition and cooperating with the churches, standpat political bosses, and the American Legion.

Trouble in the sovereignty of Jones and Laughlin began last summer when Hamilton Brown, police chief of Aliquippa, raided a Marxian Socialism class in a private home. Four men were marched handcuffed through the streets, held six hours in jail, and discharged without complaint or hearing. Permits even for dances of any radical group in Aliquippa have been regularly denied. One applicant was told bluntly that J and L would fire any borough councilman who granted such permits. Chief of Police Brown is now being sued for $30,000 damages by the American Civil Liberties Union in the name of three workers who charge false arrest. In the trial, which began February 8, a bust of Lenin was introduced as damaging evidence against the plaintiffs. One witness was thoroughly quizzed on her belief in God and in punishment after death. The postmaster of Woodlawn, called as witness for the defense, testified that he was formerly a J and L employee, is now chairman of a special American Legion committee to extirpate communism, and watches the mails for radical literature sent to workers in the town from the Workers' Party headquarters. Some of it he has stopped on his own authority. Continuation of the hearing has been postponed until later in February.

Midnight of Armistice Day found some Communists celebrating the birthday of a sixteen-year-old girl in a Woodlawn home. Into this home burst a troop of State, city, and J and L police. They ransacked the house from top to bottom; they filled grips with "red literature" and buttons. A neighbor, hearing the racket, rushed over to take his daughter home. He was arrested. Before morning two other dwellings had been raided, union records had been carted off, seven men had been locked up for "sedition." They were held in jail in default of $1,000 bail each.

Urged by the Civil Liberties Union, Governor Pinchot and Attorney General George W. Woodruff started an investigation. The Governor wrote that the State police had joined the midnight party only when they were convinced that the warrants for the raid were proper and that they were needed to "avert bloodshed." The Attorney General wrote a two-page, single-spaced eulogy of free speech. The charges were quashed.

> The "red literature" upon which the sedition charges were based [reported a Civil Liberties Union investigator] is sold publicly at Workers' Party headquarters throughout the country, including those at Pittsburgh. The buttons, sold at a celebration of the ninth anniversary of Russia's revolution, were inscribed USSR (United Socialist Soviet Republics). The Associated Press broadcast the concoction of the police that the sinister initials stood for "Unite for a United States Soviet Republic." For the Governor to say that such an array of State, city, and steel police was needed to "avert bloodshed" at a birthday party is highly disingenuous. The warrants were blanket warrants for searching any home at any time if radical activities are suspected. . . . Yes, the Workers' Party meets in private homes. This is because they are terrorized. They are constantly being blacklisted and driven from town. One of the men arrested and released was fired from the plant the next morning and told to pack up and clear out of town before 3 o'clock. Recently the company discharged every local reader of foreign or English communist papers. They must have got the list from the post office.

While the Governor's investigation was in full swing four more homes were raided in December and eight more workers arrested. Practically all the testifying was done by a J and L police lieutenant. Testimony consisted of a picture of Lenin and a grip full of "red" literature, thrown open to the court but not examined. This material was seized in the previous raid. The men are now under bail for violation of the Flynn anti-sedition act.

I have heard it said that conservative labor unions in America are more vindictive in hounding radicals than State officials. Conditions in the anthracite zone around Scranton and Wilkes-Barre bear this out. During the recent election in the United Mine Workers' Union, the Brophy left-wing slate, the first energetic opposition to the Lewis regime, was harassed by a combination of the American Legion, churches, Fascists, police, and district officials of the union. Hall owners were terrorized. Police permits for Brophy, Brennan, Howatt, and Keeney meetings were denied. Speakers were barred on the excuse that they would "advocate violent policies." One speaker was warned that he would never leave the hall alive.

At Sharon police raided a meeting under the auspices of the International Labor Defense, arrested Martin Krasic, secretary of the Slavic Section of the organization, and fined him $100 "for not displaying the American flag on the platform." At Daisytown Powers Hapgood, leader in the anti-Lewis faction, was arrested, taken to the Vesta Coal Company police station, searched, and released. At Brownsville the chairman of a meeting for H. C. Wicks of the Workers' Party was arrested and fined $10 for failure to display the flag. The crowd waited till he returned. Then the meeting went on.

The caretaker of the public schools at Shamokin stated that the president of the miners' local had forbidden meetings for William J. Brennan of Scranton. A meeting, however, was held in the same town the following day. At Edwardsville two detectives told Julia Poyntz that her "meeting can't be held, lady." In Dunmore and Plymouth permits for meetings, dances, picnics are denied any group that savors of radicalism. In Wilkes-Barre and surrounding towns hall owners were notified: "No halls for John Brophy." A Communist member of the Polish Parliament attempted to speak in Wilkes-Barre to a number of Ukrainian clubs, none of them Communist. His subject was political and economic conditions in Europe. The police scattered the four hundred listeners in the middle of the talk. "No damned Bolshevik meetings allowed in Wilkes-Barre"—they said.

Scranton is even tighter. Sacco-Vanzetti meetings, anti-Fascist meetings, anything short of National Security League standards of virtue and patriotism is met with thumbs down. In this work the Legion, the churches, Fascists, and political bosses act hand in hand with Rinaldo Capellini, district president of the miners. Recently the Legion and the Constitutional League threatened to run all radicals out of town. They kept out Vincente Vacirca, Socialist ex-deputy of the Italian Parliament. As an opening wedge in this air-tight compartment, the American Civil Liberties Union will shortly hold under its auspices a free-speech test and anti-Fascist meeting in Scranton.

Meanwhile, Rinaldo Capellini acts as toastmaster at Vare banquets; and Pennsylvania remains the only State in the republic where political heretics are hunted at night for "sedition."

For Europe—Free Trade or Ruin

By R. R. KUCZYNSKI

MANY persons on both sides of the ocean imagine that before 1914 the economic order in Europe had reached a stage of intelligent collaboration; that each nation, as a rule, produced those goods which it could produce at particularly low cost and exported the surplus, if such existed, while it imported such goods as were produced more cheaply abroad; and that in the economic struggle between the various countries the nation which was more industrious or technically more highly developed went ahead, with beneficial results for the entire world.

In reality, the basis of trade between European countries was not nearly as fair and as reasonable as these people now like to believe. Dumping was a common practice. Wherever an industry was protected by tariffs against foreign competitors, the very industrialists who had requested those tariffs for the benefit of their country sold their goods cheaper abroad than at home. They frequently sold in a foreign country even below their own cost of production in order to ruin the industry of that country, the losses thus incurred to be compensated later by correspondingly higher prices. Thus the German Steel Association before the war sold steel bars at 130 marks per ton in Germany, at 105 marks in Switzerland, England, and Holland, at 75 marks in Italy. The Frankfurter Zeitung at that time estimated the losses of the Steel Association from its Italian business at 800,000 lire per year. This price policy, which, of course, was not followed by Germany alone, created economic difficulties at home and bitter feeling abroad. The more economic relations between the various countries became interwoven the more intense became the friction. While division of labor within a country was generally recognized as the basis of economic and technical progress, international division of labor, which for a century had been the goal of the most intelligent economists, was rejected and ridiculed. International cartels which pretended to serve the economic peace had no other aim than to keep up prices at the expense of the consumer.

The political reorganization of Europe following the war has increased the points of friction in two respects. First, the number of sovereign states has materially increased. Three former empires—Germany, Austria-Hungary, Russia—have now become eleven republics—Germany, Danzig, Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Austria, Hungary, the Soviet Union, Lithuania, Latvia, Esthonia, Finland. Moreover, parts of those three empires were ceded to Belgium, France, Denmark, Italy, Jugoslavia, Rumania. The result is an almost complete Balkanization of Central and Eastern Europe. The total number of states has doubled, the number of states with fewer than fifty million inhabitants has trebled. The new frontiers in some cases, like that of the Polish Corridor, have been absurdly extended and multiplied regardless of economic needs. This splintering in itself is a serious handicap to international traffic. On a journey between two cities like Strasbourg and Königsberg or Prague and Temesvar, which before the war were not separated, one must pass three frontiers. And today each frontier is a real barrier. One needs a passport and a visa. One is not allowed to enter a country if one has too little money and one is not allowed to quit the country with too much money. Tariffs are unstable and tariff provisions are interpreted arbitrarily. Import prohibitions and restrictions are customary.

These are, of course, only conspicuous symptoms of a disease from which the world has suffered for decades. The difference between post-war and pre-war conditions is merely that the impediments have become more numerous and the governments make less effort to conceal their real object. The pre-war German cattle tariff granted a reduction to "large dappled mountain cattle or brown cattle reared at a spot at least 300 meters above sea level and which have at least one month's grazing each year at a spot at least 800 meters above sea level." The German Government today would certainly not go to so much trouble in order to debar any but Swiss cattle!

All this leads to one conclusion. International economic rivalry was so bitter even before the war that if the Balkanization of Central and Eastern Europe had taken place in 1914 through peaceful methods rather than through a world war, the resulting economic chaos would soon have made necessary a large-scale economic unification. But the situation is, of course, more strained in every respect as the result of the war.

First, the purchasing power of many nations has been seriously reduced; their capacity to absorb foreign goods is much smaller than in pre-war times.

Second, economic nationalism, strengthened by political nationalism, the mania to become wholly independent of foreign countries even when the necessary conditions for a domestic industry are lacking, leads the newly created states in particular to adopt a commercial policy often in conflict with their own economic interests. Their import restrictions and prohibitions and their exclusion of foreigners in many cases result in high production costs, thus diminishing the purchasing power of their consumers and directly hindering not only the importation of goods which they wish to debar but indirectly the importation of other commodities as well.

Third, the World War weakened the economic position of Europe in favor of other parts of the world. American industry has acquired a predominance almost equal to that which England had a century ago. The industrialization of South America has made that continent largely independent of European industry. The same is true of Canada, India, China, and Japan. European industry not only finds it difficult to sell its products to those nations, but it meets them as competitors on the markets of the rest of the world.

The effects of these three factors may be illustrated by two examples.* The export of British cotton piece goods to India declined by 57 per cent between 1913 and 1923. About three-fifths of this decline may be attributed to diminished consumption, about a quarter to increased local production, and about one-seventh to increased foreign competition. In 1923 British exports of pig iron to France, Italy, and Japan showed decreases, compared with 1913, of 63, 38, and 87 per cent, respectively. In the case of France the predominant cause for the decline was increased local production owing to the recovery of Alsace-Lorraine; in Italy, decline of local consumption; and in Japan, the competition of imports from other sources, i. e., from China and India. And that occurred in spite of the fact that British trade is treated at least as favorably in foreign markets as that of any other exporting country.

From these facts it is clear that even if the former large economic entities in Europe were reestablished, even if the interallied and reparation debts were canceled, even if domestic purchasing power again reached pre-war levels, Europe's chance of competing successfully with America and other rising economic powers would be far smaller than before the war.

Where then is salvation to be found? Everyone who has studied this problem will answer—in the economic unification of Europe. Some understand economic unification to mean the creation of international cartels to rationalize production, limit output, and restrict competition. But those cartels, in the long run, will be only another form of checking international trade, and it is doubtful whether the consumers (who, in the case of the steel cartel, for instance, include all manufacturers using steel) will be better off than under the present system of checking commercial intercourse by excessive tariffs, import restrictions, and similar governmental means. Others understand by economic unification intergovernmental agreements regarding tariff classifications, customs formalities, and the like, but this again would fail to touch the root of the evil. Still others advocate customs unions between small states, like that recently arranged between Latvia and Esthonia. But desirable as such unions may be, they can at best be valued only as a modest start. Even if all the Baltic states formed such a union, and if all the Danube states and all the Balkan states followed their example, the number of independent economic units would still be far too large. In order to realize this, it is only necessary to study the causes of the economic superiority of the United States of America. They lie in the fact that those forty-eight states, which cover almost as large an area as the thirty-three states of Europe, constitute one economic entity. It may be urged that this does not account for the economic success of America, that the principal causes are America's greater natural resources and smaller population. But if the natural resources of Spain, Italy, France, Great Britain, Sweden, Germany, Russia, etc., be combined it will be found that they nearly equal those of the United States—even if the colonies are not taken into account. And is a small population always an advantage? Do the most densely settled countries of Europe —Belgium, Holland, Great Britain, Germany—economically lag behind less densely settled countries like Russia or Spain? Is the United States with 115,000,000 inhabitants less prosperous than it was seventy years ago with one-fourth its present population? And will it be worse off in seventy years when at its present rate of increase it should have 400,000,000 inhabitants and be as densely settled as is Europe today? The cultivable area of the United States is certainly more than sufficient to feed adequately 400,000,000 people and with such an extension of the domestic market the increase in the production of manufactures might well exceed the increase of population.

Combining all the states of Europe into one economic entity and introducing universal free trade between them seems thus to be the only possible solution of the existing difficulty. And such a free-trade system should be introduced at one stroke. It would not do to lower the tariff barriers gradually, for many industries in the newly created states can hardly exist even with the excessive tariffs they enjoy at present and would be ruined by any material reduction of rates. Nor would it do to agree at once upon free trade and have it go into operation say in ten years, since the protected industries, with their powerful political influence would be almost certain to succeed in delaying the introduction of the new system. It might, however, be possible to relieve the hardship to certain manufacturers involved in such a change, by forming an international organization which would purchase at higher than world market prices the products of those protected industries, the quantity purchased and the premium paid decreasing every two or three years in order to enable and induce these producers to shift to industries for which their country is better adapted.

Such a scheme of universal free trade throughout Europe would have seemed utopian six months ago. It was considered so when the International League for the Rights of Man proclaimed it at its congress in Brussels last June. But when only four months later a group of leading bankers and industrialists representing sixteen countries made a similar appeal to the nations, protectionists all over Europe became alarmed. Unfortunately as soon as the signers of the manifesto noticed that, they also became alarmed. "The manifesters," says Richard Washburn Child, "retired with unnecessary docility, with timid explanations and on tiptoe, as if they had not voiced an incontrovertible fact and an incontrovertible trend."

The alternatives facing Europe are these: economic division and decline, or economic unification and prosperity.

* Cf. "Committee on Industry and Trade, Survey of Overseas Markets," London, 1925, p. 6.

China's Libraries

By ARTHUR E. BOSTWICK

THE conception of a library as an instrument of education for the masses is very recent. Mass-education itself is not old. Until modern times it was unheard of even in Europe; and in China it has had no part in her millennial civilization, which is in some respects superior to our own.

But recently there has been an educational revolution in China whose importance dwarfs the two-penny military movements in which most of us seem to be interested. That country has thrown overboard bodily her classical system of training and has adopted Western education lock, stock, and barrel. With it has come the idea of educating the masses, including women. Probably about 5 per cent of Chinese women can now read, whereas the percentage was recently nearly zero. The percentage of male literacy may be 15 per cent for the whole country. This is a great improvement, but it serves as an indication of what remains to be done. There are enthusiastic Chinese engaged in the "mass-education" movement who anticipate that China will approach complete literacy in the next generation, possibly thirty years from now. "Literacy" means the ability to recognize and write at least 1,000 ideographic characters—the number now regarded as sufficient for ordinary purposes. Plans to write the Chinese language with an alphabet are not favorably regarded by the majority of Chinese educators.

But even with 15 per cent literacy there would be about sixty million persons in China able to read—by no means a negligible number. Collections of books as instruments of popular education are being seriously considered by the Chinese. In 1924 the Chinese Association for the Advancement of Education, a body possessing great political and social as well as cultural influence in China, invited the American Library Association to send a delegate to China to survey the libraries of the country and advise regarding their extension and improvement. The writer was asked to undertake this mission, and spent two months in China in the summer of 1925 with an opportunity to see all the important book collections of the country and incidentally its educational institutions.

Printing was invented in China centuries before it was known in Europe, and manuscript collections were common even before this, so that the library there is a very old institution. But prior to the fall of the Manchu dynasty no library was a public collection in any proper sense. Libraries were owned by private individuals—princes, officials, or wealthy merchants, or by schools, temples, or monasteries. Conditions were thus much as they were in medieval Europe. With the advent of the republic and the adoption of Western education came the formation of the provincial libraries, some of which are now called "public libraries," supported ostensibly, but most inadequately, by the provincial exchequers. Most of these are assemblages of private collections acquired by donation and housed in some building turned over free of charge by the authorities —an old palace, an academy, or an abandoned temple. In one or two cases pretentious buildings have been erected by private donors. None of these structures is fitted for modern library use and all are firetraps, especially since the wide introduction of electric lighting, coupled with lack of regulations for proper wiring. Already disastrous fires have destroyed valuable collections.

All things considered, the best-administered and most satisfactorily housed libraries in China are those of the universities. Many of the librarians here, in the government as well as the foreign institutions, have been trained in American library schools. Contact with these men has had its effect also on the provincial librarians, usually scholars with no modern library training, and some of them are making an effort to supplement their libraries with branches organized and operated on more modern lines.

Certain considerations operate to make the introduction of modern administration difficult. The old Chinese book is an assemblage of what we should call unbound pamphlets, each printed on one side of a continuous strip of paper and folded zigzag. Each of these constitutes a "section" about a quarter of an inch thick, and assemblages of ten or twelve sections are placed in loose cases and piled flat on the shelves of cupboards. One or two librarians are binding their old books in European style, but this plan is not yet in favor. Modern Chinese publishing houses, however, which are turning out thousands of new titles yearly, are printing and binding in European style. A Chinese library therefore consists of two different kinds of books which must be handled and shelved in different ways.

Again there is no traditional order of the Chinese characters, as with our alphabet. Their great number precludes any merely arbitrary arrangement, to be held in the memory like ours. Various attempts at some kind of logical order have been worked out, the success of which can be estimated from the fact that it may take half an hour to an hour to find a word in a Chinese dictionary. Nearly every librarian in China has a system of his own for his catalogue, which does not make for ease of consultation.

If these collections, or any of them, are to be used for the spread of popular education it is also necessary that two features which have proved successful with us should be adopted and used. I refer to free access, by which the reader is allowed to go to the shelves and handle the books as he would in his own library; and home use, by which he is allowed to take books to his own house. These may be called the corner-stones of the library intended for popular use; and they are practically non-existent in China.

The provincial libraries consist largely of valuable old classical works. It would be as inadvisable to turn them into popular libraries as it would to treat the Vatican Library in this way. They have no funds to buy the modern popular books in the vernacular. It has been hoped that part of the returned Boxer indemnity might be used for this purpose. The commission having this in charge has decided on grants that will greatly further the library movement—one to establish a great national library in Peking and one to the Boone Library School in Wuchang, to provide professorships and scholarships. These will be of great value, but neither directly aids the mass-education program.

The present disorders in China, which place the country practically at the mercy of bodies of armed coolies hired at a few cents a day by unscrupulous and ambitious men, should vanish under the influence of just ideas, spread by proper educational means. When funds now improperly expended for the upkeep of useless armies can be devoted to education, libraries will doubtless receive proper attention and the action and reaction of these two factors will hasten the redemption of China.

In the Driftway

HENRY FORD is a great maker of automobiles, but is he as great a maker of history? Not that anybody objects because Mr. Ford equips his history with a self-blowing horn. Nobody does anything without such an accessory nowadays. Nor is there any reason why Mr. Ford should not paint all his history black. No up-to-date historian uses any other color. But it seems that history f.o.b. Detroit, although provided with sufficient horse-power for the comparatively low hills of Massachusetts, cannot make the steeper grades to be found in New Hampshire. At least the Drifter notes that the schoolhouse which Mr. Ford reconstructed in Sudbury in honor of Mary and her little lamb has not been able to climb the heights of Newport in the Granite State. The Drifter has before him a cutting from the Newport Argus-Champion which characterizes Mr. Ford's entire product in Sudbury—chassis, body, and tail light—as the "Sterling myth." The extract was sent by Chester S. Ehrman, who referred to the subject briefly in the correspondence columns of a recent issue of The Nation.

* * * * *

THE Argus-Champion says that the verses about Mary and her snow-fleeced lamb were written by Sarah Josepha Hale, a native of Newport, New Hampshire, for many years editor of Godey's Lady's Book. They were published in 1830 in a booklet entitled "Poems for Our Children," issued from the press of Waite and Davis, Boston. No actual Mary and no particular lamb were in Mrs. Hale's mind when she wrote her immortal lines, says the Argus-Champion. The Drifter is not disposed to dispute this statement. He thinks that if the writer had been describing an actual lamb its fleece could not possibly have been referred to as "white as snow." The Drifter grew up on a farm. But the Argus-Champion has better authority than the Drifter. It says that last year Mrs. Sarah Hale Hunter of Cambridge, Massachusetts, a granddaughter of Sarah Josepha Hale, wrote to Robert E. Gould, president of the Newport Board of Trade, saying:

> I am the granddaughter of Sarah Josepha Buell Hale. She lived with my father and mother for many years in Philadelphia, and I remember asking her, as a child, whether there was a real Mary and real lamb. Her reply was that she had made it up and there was no foundation for the existence of either. She certainly wrote "Mary Had a Little Lamb," however.

* * * * *

THE Argus-Champion then turns its attention to what it calls the "Sterling myth," of which it says:

> Now what is the basis of the claim of Sterling, Massachusetts, to Mary and the lamb? It is stated, and probably it is true, that in 1817 (thirteen years before Mrs. Hale's verses appeared) a girl named Mary Sawyer was a pupil in the little schoolhouse at Sterling which Henry Ford has purchased and transferred to Sudbury, Massachusetts. It is also claimed that she had a pet lamb. Doubtless this was true. Many little girls had pet lambs, and it may be readily conceded that Mary Sawyer's lamb followed her to school occasionally. It is also claimed that John Roulstone, a Harvard student, wrote some verses one day about Mary and the lamb and handed them, on a slip of paper, to Mary Sawyer. This doubtless may have happened. It is further claimed that the twelve lines that constituted these verses, were the same as the first twelve lines of the poem published by Mrs. Hale in 1830. But here is the weak link in the Sterling claim. The Roulstone verses, handed to Mary Sawyer, disappeared. Nobody has any record of them. They had apparently been entirely forgotten until Mrs. Hale's book appeared, and then Mary Tyler, of Somerville, Massachusetts, a relative of the Sawyer girl, recalled the incident, and, presumably, assumed that the Sterling Mary and the Sterling lamb were the basis of Mrs. Hale's poem. There is not a thing on record anywhere to substantiate this view.

* * * * *

THE Drifter does not feel qualified to pass upon this controversy. He is neither a historian nor a manufacturer of flivvers. Certainly he has no two billion dollars with which to back his judgment and impress the newspapers. But he concurs in the philosophy with which the Argus-Champion summarizes the discussion (it borrows the lines, it says, from an unknown source):

> Sweet Mary long has passed away,
> The poet, too, is dead,
> The children no more laugh and play,
> Afar they all have fled.
> At teacher's cold, unfeeling words
> The lamb no more can quiver,
> But still the gentle creature serves
> To advertise a flivver.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Poison or Protection?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the flood of propaganda about the so-called poison alcohol it has probably escaped your attention that the fact of the matter is that this process of denaturing alcohol, far from being an invention of the Prohibition Bureau, has been in use for fifteen years as a measure of industrial protection. This is only another example of the extraordinary perversion of the truth in the propaganda of our Wet opponents.

New York, February 3 MARGARET NORRIE

Democracy in Illinois

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There is no charge made that Frank Smith was not legally elected as Senator from Illinois. The facts regarding the Insull contributions to his primary campaign were fully known to every voter and were in fact the main campaign issue. In spite of this the voters elected him by a large majority. Personally I detest everything that Smith and his ilk stand for, but that does not blind me to the principle involved, viz., the rule of the majority.

If Victor Berger can be ousted because of his opinions and Frank Smith for the method used in securing his nomination, it opens the door for unseating future elected officials on the ground of race, religion, and the Lord knows what.

Chicago, February 1 EDW. D. LOEWENTHAL

Moderns—Male and Female

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We have two cats. Punch, the male, is larger and stronger, a wee bit more sportive, coal-black. Judy is black and white, more sedate, smaller but as quick. When Punch catches a mouse or gopher he places a powerful possessive paw on it and eats it himself, meanwhile uttering warning growls in the direction of Judy, who watches enviously from as close as she dares venture. Her envy is not augmented and made poisonous by ancestral voices telling her she must not try to catch a mouse but should find her keenest delight in the enjoyment and triumph that are Punch's; that if Punch leaves a tail or an ear she may help herself to that; and, anyway, why isn't she tending to her toilet, or washing the catdish, or having kittens, which would keep her from thinking of mice or being hungry. No, Judy knows that Punch does not expect her to be a "womanly" cat—he acknowledges and respects her equal Catness.

What makes these women modern? Every woman knows—women are human beings.

On the California Front, January 24 UNKNOWN WIFE

The South and "Al" Smith

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I've been over a large part of the South within the past few years and I'm willing to bet Governor Hays or any one else that if the Democratic Party nominates Governor Smith not only will the "Solid South" be broken but the Democratic Party will meet one of the worst defeats in its history. Smith may carry the Bourbon States of Dixie, but he will lose Tennessee, Kentucky, and Oklahoma, and probably also Texas and Florida.

Governor Hays is away off if he thinks that religion will cut no figure in the election with Smith as a candidate. It will, not only in Dixie but in the farmer-labor States of the Northwest. But one man in the Democratic Party can carry these Northwestern States and the "Solid South"—Senator Burton K. Wheeler of Montana. The farmers of the South are slowly but surely awakening to the fact that the Democratic machine leaders have done no more to aid them than the Republican machine leaders to aid the farmers of the West. McAdoo's strength was not all in the support given him by the Klan; in Texas the farmers and workers were for him because they believed "Wall Street" did not want him.

Mena, Arkansas, January 31 COVINGTON HALL

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Democracy in the South, which is, as Mr. Hays writes, "the party of our fathers and our fathers' fathers," is without aim or object, form or fashion, plank or platform, save "Keep the Nigger down." It was made the Solid South by cowardly white men with gun and torch in hand, pursuing fear-stricken Negroes who but the day before, comparatively speaking, had emerged from two hundred years of bondage.

Mr. Hays's premise, that "the Solid South will be for the Democratic nominee for President," is correct—irrespective of any shortcomings of which the nominee may be guilty. The Solid South would as religiously vote for a Sing Sing convict, if nominated for President on the Democratic ticket, as for a second Woodrow Wilson. "Al" Smith need have no fears.

The Southern white man prefers to continue to exist on his deserted as well as depleted acres of antiquated farm lands, on which even the grass refuses to grow, in order that he may continue to hold sacred the institution which brutalized millions of human beings; he refuses to throw open the gates to industrialism and to a system of agriculture in which independent men and women can engage—for that would make the country prosperous but destroy the solidity of the old South.

Seattle, Washington, February 3 H. R. CAYTON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: All intelligent persons, even those who vote the Democratic ticket, very well know that the Democratic Party is as free from ideals as a fundamentalist preacher is from intelligence. They also know that it comes no nearer than its twin brother to representing our (the peasantry's) interests. And the average Southerner's instinctive distrust of the Republican Party is not half so dynamic as his hereditary suspicion of the Pope. Actually, he does not distrust the Devil so much as he does the Pope. He traditionally takes refuge in religious bigotry from all disturbing ideas. He is incredibly stupid; witness his concerted attack on the fundamental law of evolution. Of course, he will evolve out of all this, in time, as will his Northern brother. But hardly in time to support "Al" in 1928.

El Dorado, Arkansas, February 6 BRYAN FULKS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The only evidence that George W. Hays gives that the South is for Smith is that as the South is always Democratic, it will continue to vote that way even if Smith is nominated. This is extremely doubtful. Lifelong Democrats are openly saying they will not vote for him. I venture the prediction that no State south of Maryland will favor him in the national convention.

The South knows no reason to adopt him. Mr. Hays pronounces him "the most important statesman of our time," but to most Southerners that will cause a laugh. We know nothing about Governor Smith as a national leader except on one point, and that is the association of his name with the movement to discredit prohibition. The outstanding issue before the American people at this moment relates to the foreign policy of the present Administration, especially with reference to Mexico and Nicaragua. By a series of almost incredible blunders we have been hurried along toward war with Mexico, or its equivalent, and it is high time individuals and associations should lift up their voice in protest; but what have we heard from Governor Smith? How does he stand on the foremost issue before the American people?

Lubbock, Texas, February 1 JOHN C. GRANBERY

That World Court

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Advocates of the World Court as constituted under the League of Nations should note the current of present-day events:

1. Mexico. Uncle Sam is defending the rights of oil companies against the government founded as a result of the Mexican Revolution of 1910. In this case, says the President of the United States, there is nothing to arbitrate.

2. Nicaragua. "The proprietary rights of the United States in the Nicaragua canal route" are being protected by the presence of fifteen war vessels and a large contingent of troops.

3. Panama. "The Republic of Panama will consider herself in a state of war in case of any war in which the United States should be a belligerent." So reads the pending treaty between the United States and Panama.

4. China. Great Britain, the United States, Japan, and other Powers are rushing war vessels and army divisions to the defense of their "concessions." Millions of Chinese are demanding equality among the nations. By way of making their demands heard they are taking the law into their own hands and resorting to direct action. Machine-guns provide the answer.

All four of these cases involve the exploitation of weak, undeveloped countries by powerful capitalist empires. Three of the countries are members of the League of Nations. Theoretically, their troubles should be handled by the World Court; practically, they are treated like international criminals in a world policed by predatory empires.

World courts and other world schemes based on world cooperation and a community of interest among the various peoples will play their part sometime in the not-distant future. So long as capitalist empires remain, however, they will settle their difficulties with tanks, machine-guns, and battle cruisers. When the crisis is over they will talk about it to the World Court. As well expect world courts to function under capitalist imperialism as to expect water to run freely in zero weather.

Ridgewood, New Jersey, January 26 SCOTT NEARING

Roosevelt, Trust-Buster

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your article on the Merging of 12,000 Miles of Railway moves me to reminisce.

You speak of the proposed merger of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific railroads. You will recall that the dissolution of the merger of these two roads and the C. B. & Q. was sought and obtained in the Northern Securities case in 1903, and that Roosevelt wrote of the case in 1904 as a great achievement of his Administration. You call attention to the fact that the Northern Securities case invoked the powers of the Sherman anti-trust law to keep alive competition between two common carriers. Now the Interstate Commerce Commission seems likely to give its formal approval to the merging of these carrier properties.

In those days I was an ardent and alert correspondent in close and friendly touch with the Roosevelt Administration. I was enthusiastic at Roosevelt's championship of the cause of the Northwestern farmer-shippers and happy when Philander Knox, his "crackerjack" Attorney General, won the case. As I remember, it was an injunction proceeding and the court handed down "a decree" prohibiting the Northern Securities Company holding the voting stock of the two roads.

The bands played and the shouting died away.

I was in Chicago later, talking to Charles Gates Dawes, now Vice-President, who damned the applause which Roosevelt had won by the Northern Securities case. He said it was all a blankety fraud; that the decision in that case was not what it appeared to be; that Knox had consented to the writing of a decree which permitted the bondholdings of the two properties to remain in the same hands, and that it was immaterial what the decree said about one corporation holding the stock of another. He likened the bonds to a step-ladder and said the step-ladder was still straddling the two properties, and that the Northern Securities was only a "moot case."

All of which I put away in the back of my head.

Later Roosevelt went out of office and among those ambitious to succeed him was Philander Knox. The then great Collier's Weekly, under Mark Sullivan, commissioned me to do a piece about Knox as a possible successor to Roosevelt, and to this end I studied Knox, his life and public doings. I was troubled about the Northern Securities case and resolved to see Knox and talk to him about it. I found him in the evening alone in his study on the top floor of his residence on K Street. I was frank and told him what Dawes had said. He admitted it was a moot case in so far as the two railroads were affected; but contended earnestly that the decision established a precedent that one corporation could not hold the stock of another corporation and so wipe out competition.

The article on Knox was never published. He became worried and had Roosevelt send me a message to be careful in handling the Northern Securities matter. And Knox and Root were soon in the discard as Presidential possibilities in favor of the less frank Mr. Taft.

That was twenty-three years ago. The Sherman Act did not restore competition either in railroad or other business. Always, in my judgment, it was more or less of a fraud. Mr. Kellogg wrote a decree which did no harm to the Standard Oil trust; Mr. J. C. McReynolds wrote one which did nothing to the tobacco trust; Mr. Moody enjoined the beef trust. There is hardly a trust which has not had the benefit of a suit and decree, unless it is the "good" steel trust. It is the old fallacy of putting statute against economic law. It can't be done.

Washington, D. C., January 29 GILSON GARDNER

A Shocking Exhibit

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: At the New Gallery, 600 Madison Avenue, there is, until February 26, an extremely shocking exhibition of American painting by Thomas H. Benton. Shocking to the aesthete and the gallery-hound with eyes cocked toward Paris; shocking to the hundred-percenter who resents an America shown so harshly; shocking to the architect who finds no skilful and pleasing arrangement of historic symbols; shocking to the young communist who regards it as capitalist propaganda; shocking to the painter, "modern" or "academic," because it's neither "modern" nor "academic"; and shocking, most pleasantly so, because so unusual, to the lover of finely balanced, closely coordinated, sharply characterized, lucidly wrought, rhythmically arranged structural design. These pictures represent several years' work upon American themes—historical subjects, trains, people, decorations for spacious places (the smallest of them would destroy the peace of a drawing-room), without sentimentality or "charm." The earlier canvases are least successful, lacking that fine balance between planes and rounded forms which the latest works are beginning to show. But—go and see it.

New York, February 14 BOARDMAN ROBINSON

What Made These Women "Modern"?

The ninth article in the series of personal revelations by well-known women will appear next week. John B. Watson, behaviorist, and Beatrice M. Hinkle, psychoanalyst, will analyze these articles for The Nation, in an attempt to discover the underlying causes of the modern woman's attitude toward men, marriage, children, and jobs.

NORTON BOOKS

Just published—three more volumes in the popular

THE NEW SCIENCE SERIES

Edited by C. K. OGDEN

This series, written by leading scientists, aims to present the latest scientific trends and discoveries from all parts of the world.

A Short Outline of Comparative Psychology

By C. J. WARDEN Ph.D., Columbia Univerity

An historical sketch of what we know of animal life and behavior, beginning with an account of ancient animal lore and of Aristotle's knowledge of the mental life of the animal world, and continuing down to the modern experimental movement.

Types of Mind and Body

By E. MILLER, M.A. (Cantab.) M.R.C.S.

Psychological types are much discussed today. Which is your type? This book gives the latest classifications into which representative medical scientists have divided human beings and helps us to correctly place ourselves and those we know.

The Father in Primitive Psychology

By BRONISLAW MALINOWSKI, Ph.D., D.Sc.

What place does "The Father" occupy in primitive life? What is marriage like in savage society and how does it affect their attitude toward sex? The distinguished anthropologist gives the results of five years spent in the South Sea Islands searching for the answers to these and similar questions.

VOLUMES PREVIOUSLY PUBLISHED

Myth in Primitive Psychology—By Bronislaw Malinowski
Science and Poetry—By I. A. Richards
Fatalism or Freedom—By C. Judson Herrick

Price $1.00 each

Leading booksellers everywhere carry this series. If your bookseller cannot supply you write to the publishers

W·W·NORTON & COMPANY·INC· 70 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK

Books and Plays

First Glance

BENJAMIN ROBERT HAYDON, whose "Autobiography and Memoirs" is fortunately once more available (Harcourt, Brace, 2 vols.: $7.50), was not the painter he thought himself to be even in his lowest moments. Aldous Huxley, the writer of the introduction to the new edition, may be a little too hard on Haydon's canvases, most of which he admits he has never seen; he is a little too eager to make his point that Haydon had every gift except the "gift of expressing himself in form and color." But Mr. Huxley in general must be right; Haydon undoubtedly was insignificant—though much might be said for his head of Wordsworth in Christ's Entry into Jerusalem.

In one sense his book is insignificant. Haydon, who was chronically wrong about himself, considered that at least his memoirs would constitute an important, because typical, record of artist life. "The state of a young mind progressing in the art," he said, "the sanguine nature of its temperament, the hopes, the fears, the anxieties, the agitations which beset a youth on entering life, especially in a refined art, by a path pronounced by all to lead to certain ruin, cannot but be interesting, at least to others making the same steps with equal ardor and more talent, but not more sincerity, than I possessed then, for there I will defy any man, let him be Rafaelle himself, to beat me." But if Haydon was not a good artist, how can his life have been typical? How can one be sure that his anxieties and his ecstasies were not merely ridiculous? Must not one indeed conclude that this is the way genuine painters do not feel? "The true way to preserve my health is to lie on a hard mattress, sleep six or seven hours, jump out at first waking, wash instantly in a cold bath, study for eight hours, drink nothing but weak tea and water, eat the most simple food, no suppers, no hashes, no fricassees. When I do this I feel braced for the day and ready for any exertion, mental or corporeal." Poor Haydon! He was always ready. But what of those happier artists who surprise themselves with masterpieces when they are least expecting them, who do not need their bodies at all, perhaps, in order to work well? It is a sad fact that we know how second-rate art is produced, and in many cases have complete documentation in the matter, but know next to nothing about the progress of good work into the world.

In another sense, of course, the book is of the highest significance. Mr. Huxley insists that Haydon, whatever he was not, was certainly a writer of magnitude; and no one can doubt it who starts reading these many pages. I have found few books more absorbing. Haydon had the power of seeing the world brightly, of describing it richly and with humor, of giving the impression that it is very deep and full. Better still, he knew how to make himself count in the scene. He becomes the center, if the tragic center, of a great and complicated action. The story, merely as story, of his coming up to London to be a great historical painter, of his devoting heroic nights and days to the perfection of a feeble talent, of his relations to friends, landlords, patrons, creditors, and critics, of his debts, his despairs, his momentary elevations, and his final resort to suicide by razor and pistol a few minutes after the last entry in his diary—the story is one of the best I know. And it can be recommended to those who know nothing and care nothing about artists. For Haydon, as Mr. Huxley makes clear, was only a great writer.

MARK VAN DOREN

Boccaccio and Aretino

Amorous Fiammetta. By Giovanni Boccaccio. Revised from the only English Translation with an Introduction by Edward Hutton. Albert and Charles Boni. $6.

The Works of Aretino. Translated into English from the original Italian, with a Critical and Biographical Essay by Samuel Putnam. Illustrations by Marquis de Bayros. Chicago: Pascal Covici. Two volumes. $17.50.

THE historical study of literature and the interpretation of writers in terms of the "spirit of the age" is passing out of fashion. The newest aesthetic jealously maintains the independence of art and artist and generally resents any attempt to consider either as a mere function of the life of a time. Yet in the case of a writer like Boccaccio it seems futile to attempt to comprehend him completely except in relation to that culture which quickly proclaimed him a classic. However banal the statement may be, it is nevertheless true that like Dante and Petrarch he stood for one of the three elements which made up the complex of the early Renaissance, that he spoke for the moyen homme sensuel exactly as they spoke, respectively, for the mystic and the scholar and that it is the success with which he spoke which has made him remembered. It is true also that his life as an artist was a continual struggle to find the form and the accent which should express neither more nor less than what he felt, and that the only one of his numerous works which achieved genuine immortality is the one in which he succeeded in doing just that.

Boccaccio was a modest man, quick to admire others and in his innermost self distrustful of his own worth. He worshiped the memory of Dante as he might have worshiped a god, he sat at the feet of Petrarch like a humble scholar in the presence of a great master, and, distrusting the worth of the sunny paganism of his own temper, he wasted many years in trying to keep from being himself. "Amor è quel che mi guida e conduce," he wrote at the beginning of his "Ninfale Fiesolano," but love was an inexact word, then as now, and Boccaccio was afraid to look his love in the face. He was more than half ashamed of the simple, joyous, and uncorrupted sensuality of his nature; he tried to convince himself that the love which burned in his veins was identical with the intellectual idea of Dante and the tepid warmth of Petrarch; and though in his "Life of Dante" he revealed how incapable he was of comprehending his subject he insisted upon trying to be Dantesque. In nearly everything that he wrote there are passages which are bright with a fresh, springlike sensuality, but the harmony of the whole is generally spoiled either by laborious pedantry or by a wholly, ludicrously inappropriate attempt at allegorization like that which transforms the "Ameto" into an unintentional burlesque upon the theme of sacred love. By no means a thinker and little gifted with the power of self-analysis, Boccaccio probably never realized that his greatness consisted in his power to see the world through the eyes of the sensual man. Instinct rather than reason led him to the form of his two most important works.

"Fiammetta," a long prose monologue of a deserted woman, full of genuine feeling and acute psychology, may be read with pleasure today, and it stands second only to the "Decameron." The "Heroides" of Ovid obviously inspired it; in spite of the artificiality of the frequent classical illusions it is completely "worldly," and its author had but one step further to go before producing in the "Decameron" the first great work of modern literature in which the world of the senses is represented as complete and self-justifying. From the "Decameron" no lines of reference go out either to classical antiquity or to eternity. In it the flesh and the intellect are sufficient to establish all values and judge all actions. Man and nature are complete, God and revelation unnecessary.

And to realize how truly he spoke not for himself alone but for his age one need but remember both the eagerness with which he was hailed and the rapidity with which Italian literature and society plunged downward from the "Decameron" to Aretino. His life, indeed, ending as it did in a repentance, represents in petto the Renaissance as a whole. His skepticism, like much of the skepticism of the Renaissance, was instinctive rather than reasoned, the protest of warm blood against ascetic doctrines rather than the result of logical conclusions; the fear of hell which he had dismissed rather than conquered came upon him again in exactly the same way that the Catholic Reaction came upon Italy as a whole. The only difference was that while Boccaccio never plumbed the depths of sensuality but remained till the time of his conversion hardly more than youthfully ardent, Italy completed the cycle which ends in the jaded and brutal ferocity of Aretino.

The Navarre Society edition of "Fiammetta" is thoroughly satisfactory. The translation used as a basis is the Elizabethan one made by Edward Young, whose long, picturesque, and syntactically loose sentences are a fairly satisfactory equivalent for Boccaccio's elaborate humanistic style, and there is a sound if not brilliant introduction by Edward Hutton, a recognized authority. Against the Aretino, though beautifully printed, certain cavils may be made. It is preceded by a swaggering introduction in the style of the enfant terrible of the nineties, in which Aretino is referred to as "the poison flower of the Renaissance," and it is illustrated by a series of delicately indecent pictures which suggest the age of Beardsley much more than they do the coarse brutality of Aretino. Though the selections are comprehensive in scope —from "La Cortigiana" and from the letters as well as from the more famous "Ragionamenti"—there is no indication of the fact that what is presented as "The Dialogues" is really only a series of very brief extracts and the so-called translation of the "Sonnetti Lussuriosi" is no translation at all. These poems, written to interpret a series of indecent paintings by Giulio Romano, are in the plainest and most brutal language, and whoever supposes that he can form any idea of them from the periphrastic innuendoes of the present version is completely mistaken.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

As Mr. Asquith

Fifty Years of British Parliament. By the Earl of Oxford and Asquith. Little, Brown and Company. Two volumes. $8.

THE fifty years referred to in the title of this book begin with the general election of 1868 and end with the dissolution of Parliament in 1918. For considerably more than half of this period the distinguished author (as Herbert H. Asquith) sat in the House of Commons, and for a good part of it he was a member of the Cabinet—as Home Secretary in the last Gladstone and Rosebery ministries (1892-1895), Chancellor of the Exchequer under Campbell-Bannerman (1905-1908), and Prime Minister during a time of grave domestic and foreign crisis in his country's history (1908-1916). He has had a longer parliamentary career than any other living British statesman except Lord Balfour, and he was a principal, not to say a storm center, in political transactions of the first magnitude. It cannot be questioned that he has the qualification in personal experience necessary for making what he promises us in his preface, "a contribution to history written to a large extent from first-hand knowledge."

And when Lord Oxford permits himself to become autobiographical, to record his own impressions, to express personal opinions on men and measures, what he has to say is always interesting and sometimes important. But too often he writes on public questions of which he has inside information as any fairly well-informed outsider might be expected to write. The first of his two volumes, which comes to the South African War, adds almost nothing to our knowledge of English parliamentary and political history. The account of affairs during the Gladstone and Rosebery ministries is disappointingly unoriginal. He does tell us that in the debates on the bill of 1895 for the disestablishment of the Welsh church, of which he was in charge, one of the Welsh members, "a natural frondeur," gave him "a certain amount of trouble"; but one would never guess from anything in these volumes that Lloyd George ever caused him more serious trouble than this. In the memorable controversy over Tariff Reform and Imperial Preference precipitated by Chamberlain in 1903 he rose to the height of a great argument and did more than any other Liberal leader to justify free trade to the British electorate, but beyond a casual reference to a pamphlet containing some of the speeches which he delivered at the time Lord Oxford seems to have no recollection of Mr. Asquith's participation in this campaign. For a full generation he was a member of the House of Commons and for nearly nine years he was its leader, yet in the general observations which he makes concerning the House he draws scarcely at all upon his own rich experience. It is interesting to know that speeches are not so long as they were in the days of Gladstone and Disraeli, and that the practice of classical quotation has fallen into disuse, but any student of Hansard could have told us this. What Lord Oxford has to say of the office of Prime Minister is based almost entirely on what others have said; and he will not be accused of any indiscretions in disclosing what he knows of the proceedings of the Cabinet.

The most substantial chapters in the book, regarded as history, are those which narrate the conflict between the Lords and the Commons that resulted in the passing of the Parliament Act, and those on Ulster in the days when Carson was leading it along the road of loyalist treason. The World War and its causes are left out of consideration, because this subject has been dealt with by the author in his "Genesis of the War," and by Lord Grey in his "Twenty-five Years." Lord Oxford makes it clear that he has no regret for the course which his Government took with respect to the House of Lords. He believes it to have been constitutionally correct, and he even ventures the hazardous prediction that the Parliament Act, in its essential provisions, is likely to remain law for a long time to come. He writes, however, in a spirit of quite remarkable detachment, and it is evident that he bears no grudge toward those who at the time denounced him as a destroyer of the constitution. The policy of his Administration toward Ulster during the years 1912-1914 has been severely criticized on the ground that it is demoralizing for a government to tolerate preparations for armed resistance to its authority. Lord Oxford does not question that the Ulster leaders could have been prosecuted under the criminal law, but he observes that it is never wise to prosecute if failure to convict is a foregone conclusion, and he is convinced that no Irish jury would have convicted. Moreover, the Irish Nationalist leaders were strongly opposed to resorting to criminal proceedings against the Ulsterites, because "it would inevitably secure for the victims an invaluable and much-coveted place in the annals of Irish martyrology."

The present three-party system in England is regarded by many Englishmen as a transitional stage in party history and as destined to no long duration. Lord Oxford does not share this opinion. He believes that the present situation, despite its drawbacks, has come to stay, because there are real, living issues between the parties. He thinks that a party division into moderates and extremists would be a calamity.

In his characterizations of statesmen who were once his political opponents Lord Oxford exhibits in a conspicuous degree the British spirit of fair play. Balfour once said that Lord Hartington was the most persuasive speaker he had ever known "because he never attempted to conceal the strength of the case against him." Lord Oxford never commits the vulgar error of underrating men because they differed from him in politics.

R. L. SCHUYLER

Mrs. Deland's Flank Attack

The Kays. By Margaret Deland. Harper and Brothers. $2.

"I," George Kay said satirically, "am modest enough to refrain from deciding what is 'right' or 'wrong' for my country! All I do is to offer her my blood."

To which his wife replied that his reason would be a nobler gift.

No wonder everyone in Old Chester disliked her and that this dislike grew to open animosity, that the butcher sold her tainted meat, and that children jeered at her in the streets, and that the windows of the room in which a poor crazy inmate of her house lived should be broken in when President Lincoln's Declaration of War was read and lists of the dead began to be tacked up in every post office. To be sure the town had also disapproved of her when she helped fugitive slaves escape into Canada. But the two disapprovals did not seem inconsistent to it because it did not think of the war as being fought to put an end to slavery. In fact, it thoroughly disapproved of those headstrong Boston Abolitionists who wanted to free the slaves. When you came right down to it Old Chester wasn't any too sure just why the war was being fought; but it was intensely sure that anyone who questioned the wisdom of settling human disputes by mutual murder must be a coward, and it applauded the patriotism of its coarser spirits who sang with relish:

> Come let us chant in perfect tune,
> The South shall be the North's spittoon.

Their songs and their fervor and their animosity and her husband's departure for the war and her son's social disgrace because he refused to depart for it—the novel turns chiefly on this son and what happened to him—all fail to shake Agnes Kay's obstinate belief that war is murder.

With skill and inventiveness and humor Mrs. Deland has given a lively and veracious picture of the irritable animosity induced in human beings by the spectacle of an individual ordering her life by reason when the rest of the world is luxuriating in emotion and belligerence. Her picture of the once beautiful young woman whose native intensity was tremendously increased by a sexual shock that drove her for refuge to a literal and dreadfully unsettling Christianity is given almost wholly through the unsympathetic eyes of the harassed and saddened town, and those of her handsome, sensitive, easy-going, dissipated husband whom everyone liked as much as they disliked Agnes Kay, even though they didn't like losing their money in his lottery, and even though they disapproved of his predilections for wine and women. But although the picture of Agnes Kay is unsympathetically presented, although her cool, reasonable voice falls icily on our ears, in the end, when the tangled threads of the story are drawn together, she wins even her husband to her view.

There is this, among other possible disadvantages, in embodying general ideas in individual characters, that all the idiosyncrasies of the individual come to be associated with the general idea. One might, in the present instance, conclude that pacifists and literal Christians, though divinely right, are necessarily rather unimaginative and exasperating and humorless in their relations with other people. Doubtless some pacifists and literal Christians are, just as some militarists are; but there is nothing in either belief that would necessarily make them so; and the man who was possibly the most conspicuous American exponent during the late war of the twin heresies of pacifism and Christianity is noted for his genial tolerance and humor.

This exception noted, Mrs. Deland's novel is an extremely able dramatization of the emotional irrelevancies and contradictions and cruelties of war psychology. In addition it contains an interesting study, only partially developed, of the relations of a man who thinks through his emotions with a woman who feels through her mind. Carrying gifts to all the pleasant qualities of the average men who make the average mob that fights, Mrs. Deland has nevertheless executed a clever flank attack on man's reluctance to leave his animal state, and on war.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Expressing America

East Side West Side. By Felix Riesenberg. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE Great American Novel: How Not to Write It would be a helpful course for many of our contemporary fictionists who are busy giving us animated charts expressing the souls of New York, Chicago, the plains of Dakota, the mesas of Arizona, and America in general. We would thereby be deprived of a great many Americas, New Yorks, Chicagos, and Dakotas; but perhaps we would get a few Americans—that is to say, just some local specimens of that universal genus of forked radishes whose antics, whether on Nevsky Prospekt or on Commonwealth Avenue, despite all pretenses to the contrary, are strangely alike.

But how about all these national, topographical, and municipal souls that are clamoring so for expression? Let them wait. Consider the Russian novelists who collectively and cumulatively seem to have succeeded rather well in expressing the "soul of Russia," yet were none of them bold enough to undertake such a job individually. Dostoevski's novels are largely localized in Petersburg; but what book blurber would be crass enough to say that "Crime and Punishment" expresses the soul of Petersburg? Or, to turn to Anglo-Saxondom, who will accuse Hardy of having expressed the Wessex soul as definitively as our Middle-Western novelists have expressed the twin souls of the Mississippi Valley and the Great Plains? Suspicions are abroad, in fact, that the desire for utterance among our States and municipalities is not nearly so urgent as our novelists would have us believe. Judging by the average straphanger, the soul of Greater New York, for instance (not excluding the Ghetto), is more easily allayed by such an indigenous work as "Beau Geste" than by "Manhattan Transfer." One is inclined to think that expressing America is only a popular alibi among our novelists, who find it much easier to handle synthesized characters like New York, or Chicago, or the Mississippi Valley than to be bothered with the vagaries of troublesome, irresponsible individuals. This, rather than any awakening of national consciousness, may account for the avidity with which they have taken to studying American geography and history and Austrian psychology. Thanks to such labor-saving devices as history, geography, and psychoanalysis it is now possible to prove characters by the circumstantial evidence of heredity and environment, instead of inventing them by the fiat of genius—a dogmatic, perilous act, for who is quite sure of his genius?

These are lengthy reflections on a lengthy and terribly flabby novel. But "East Side West Side" is a convenient example. This story of a Fifth Avenue scion who is spawned on the East Side waterfront via the servant girl, and who works his way west again via the Ghetto, the Bowery, and Morningside Heights is supposed to show a very important cross-section of Manhattan. Unfortunately, Mr. Riesenberg's researches into Freud have been too rudimentary for him to make the usual excavations for character-building with the steam-shovel of psychoanalysis. In default of this one needs a gift for rhapsodic expressionism, a gift which Mr. Riesenberg most woefully lacks. His hero, John Breen, alias Fighting

Lipvitch, alias Van Horn, is a premature birth of the author's fancy deposited in an incubator called New York and kept alive through four hundred pages by such artificial respiration as:

> City, lyric city, lovely city of millions and millions of tame tenants. City of folding beds, kitchenettes, bathinettes, gas jets, and mansions. City of leased shelter and freeholds on jeopardy. Great city visited by intellectuals. Metaphysical, mellifluous city. . . . City of removals, of niches without statues, of songs without words, of husbands without wives, families without children. City of one-room apartments. Astonishing city of free microbes and captive elephants.

And intensive reflections on the inevitable rise of Manhattan real estate. More's the pity, for despite the ineffectuality of the novel as a whole there is something in the blank bewildered receptivity of John Breen that reminds one pleasantly of that omnivorous-minded boy of Gorki's autobiographic novels. It is to be regretted that Mr. Riesenberg, who brings to American fiction a personal background as rich in its own way as that of Gorki, should have seen fit to scrawl a map of Manhattan on such a promising slate.

ALTER BRODY

Confusion and Suffering

I Have This to Say. By Violet Hunt. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.

MISS HUNT seems to have been a woman of too much education, many friends, and no special place in life when she met the English Review and Ford Madox Ford together and found relief and passionate delight in working for both.

She describes the first meeting and tells how Mr. Ford wore a brown velvet coat that had belonged to his uncle Rossetti and was working at a Chippendale bureau on which Christina Rossetti had written her poems. It was all very literary. This is the beginning of the book, in nineteen hundred and something; and in the end Miss Hunt is still hunting le mot juste. Her relationship with Mr. Ford grew into what she and he thought was a marriage, but the British courts interpreted a question of international law differently, and both Miss Hunt and Mr. Ford seem to have been victims. There was an ill-natured scandal, which got so bad that Henry James felt it necessary to ask the unhappy woman not to call again at his house. This is not really important, except to consumers of literary gossip of another age. What is important is the importance which Miss Hunt still attaches to this judgment of Henry James.

She really has had four great passions in her life, for Henry James, for Joseph Conrad and Ford as writers, for Ford as a man, and for the World War for reasons she does not understand. Indeed the whole book is the story of a woman who is lost in a world she does not understand. The daughter of a novelist, the wife of a novelist, the friend of many novelists, Miss Hunt got the idea that she also is a writer. Equipped with emotion but free from insight, thought, and style, she has apparently suffered for all her adult years from a maladjustment she does not even suspect.

Miss Hunt seems to be a kindly soul who had the misfortune to think herself complex. As a consequence she adapts the style of Henry James to a rather simple mind. The result is disastrous. The book is almost unreadable. It is modernly vague about dates and places. You are supposed to know . . . you are in the literary swim . . . it would be an insult to tell you rudimentary facts. There are pages which contain as many as four quotations and there is hardly a page without quotation marks. Her gift is for feeling, not thinking. She seems to have no conception of the inner meaning of anything. Like most people who think with their feelings she is capable of shocking atrocities like her treatment of Mrs. D. H. Lawrence when Mrs. Lawrence as a German was not Britishly patriotic at the beginning of the war.

Apparently here is a woman with a gift for emotional intensity and generous affection. She is probably one of the few women in the world who need about eight children on whom to pour out a boundless love and enthusiasm. Eager to worship, to be both maternal and childishly clinging, she had to play a grown-up part in an intellectual world in which she did not belong. It is a tragic waste of a generous nature bringing love to the world and being forced to pay instead in futile intellectual effort.

HELEN WOODWARD

Books in Brief

American Criticism, 1926. Edited by William A. Drake. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

The essays in this volume, from the competent academic journalism of Professor Tinker to the acute but disordered diagnosis of the literary situation by Mr. Edmund Wilson, suffer from the same elusive yet quite pervasive disease. The disorder of the material at Mr. Drake's disposal was so obvious that he could not eschew the task of explaining it. This, we feel, he has not succeeded in doing, but he has written the most interesting contribution to his anthology; the most ambitious, it is necessarily one of the most deficient. "By exposing the causes," says Mr. Drake, "why so youthful and so rich a nation as America should have been so tardy in expressing itself artistically, we break the seal of our muteness." This sentimental metaphor, in various forms, constitutes the pseudo-principle of a school of critics ranging from Mr. Van Wyck Brooks down to Mr. V. F. Calverton. The product of disorder itself, the method further conduces to disorder, and it largely explains the confusion of values in this anthology. Says Mr. Drake: " . . . the instinctive selection of . . . taste is more surely to be trusted than any prescribed and anciently proven dicta"—which yields its own commentary.

Eugenics. By A. M. Carr-Saunders. Home University Library. Henry Holt and Company. $1.

An introductory discussion of "the part played by inheritance in human affairs"; a deliberate, and to some extent successful, attempt to treat eugenics objectively by separating the scientific problems, solvable by facts, from applications depending on opinions. Unhampered by many data, yet too critical and unimpassioned for general popularity. But the narrow nationalistic point of view flares out at the end. In a passage referring to England's opportunity to expand in Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, until these countries are full of Englishmen, the cat escapes from the bag in the remark: "If this comes about, as is earnestly to be hoped, men of our race (English race!) as a whole will come to form a much larger proportion of the total inhabitants of the world than they do." Parenthesis ours.

The Political Ideas of the English Romanticists. By Crane Brinton. Oxford University Press. $5.

Mr. Brinton writes with much wit and brilliancy, but it nowhere detracts from the soundness of his scholarship. He has an irrepressible leaning to epigram, but he does not allow it to mar the seriousness of his thinking. His interest in the politics of the English romanticists is that of a student of government rather than of literature. Moreover, he is a philosophic student of government, bred on the teachings of Mr. Harold Laski. This assures a pertinent quality to his discussions. For it is not merely what Coleridge or Hazlitt thought about politics and society that Mr. Brinton considers but the significance of their thought in relation to what comes before and after. The influence of the men of letters on the general trend of English sentiment he does not emphasize, though it was obvious in the case of Byron and made itself felt more subtly in the case of Coleridge and Wordsworth; what he does insist on is their representative character, and in that light their importance is unmistakable. The romantic poets and prosemen reflect not only the impulse of their age toward individual freedom but equally its reaction toward order and authority. Shelley was the only pure and consistent revolutionary among them all; in the others the British sense of the practical asserted itself and produced that compromise with sentimental, middle-class morality which we know as Victorianism. Mr. Brinton traces with great acuteness the steps by which the Rousseauistic doctrine of natural goodness developed into the cult of nationalism and the doctrine of perfectibility was transformed into materialistic optimism. He makes us feel the continuity between the problems of a hundred years ago and of our own society.

Yellowstone Kelly: The Memoirs of Luther S. Kelly. Edited by M. M. Quaife. Yale University Press. $4.

A rambling, ramshackle autobiography, considerably revamped by the editor's caressing hand, of the last of those frontiersmen (the "author" is still alive) whose brightest lights were Boone, Carson, and Buffalo Bill. Mr. Kelly experienced nearly all those hairsbreadth adventures which were commonplaces of wilderness life; he slew the usual quota of Indians, bears, and buffaloes, and he poisoned unbelievable quantities of wolves. Briefly, he takes his place among the unnumbered thousands who were unconscious instruments in the "civilization" of the Wild West—who rescued it from the coyote and the catamount and made it safe for the railroad and the radio. His memoirs may have some slight value as a document of late pioneer days or as a gift for boys, but one finds it hard to agree with the editor's belief that the style is "in essence profoundly poetic."

Drama

Fireworks

AT the Neighborhood Playhouse modernism now runs riot. Upon the frequently pedestrian and generally insignificant text of a play called "Pinwheel" all the resources developed by the newest insurgency of the theater have been lavished, and they have served at least to justify the title by the production of a genuinely pyrotechnic effect. Nothing that is new or startling has been omitted. Constructivist settings, fantastic costumes, stylicized gestures, broken rhythms, and discordant melodies—all the technical devices calculated to shock and surprise—are called into play. The whole bag of tricks—expressionistic, impressionistic, constructivistic, and what not—is opened at once. The spirits of Pantomime, Ballet, Parody, Satire, and Jazz are invoked, singly or together, and all consent to lend their aid. The result is an unusually impudent and noisy carnival, something always surprising enough to keep the spectator wondering what will come next and something which is occasionally genuinely effective. One is amused, one is titillated, one is piqued, and one is occasionally thrilled. One is not always, to be sure, certain whether to be moved to compassion or merely entertained by the action set forth, whether "Pinwheel" is an American tragedy or merely an American Scheherazade; but one is never bored.

Every scene is at once familiar and strange, an everyday event which has undergone a fantastic sea change. The heroine, a conventional stenographer who "goes wrong," pounds upon a futuristic typewriter located in one of those skeleton structures of bare steel which are the Russian theatrical version of the skyscraper; in the morning she and her companions jig jazzily to work in multicolored costumes and in the evening a comic-strip sort of butter-and-egg man takes her to supper in a night club which looks about as it would be imagined by a regular reader of the Graphic. After murder has been done the heroine considers her press notices critically, and there is a presentation of Coney Island which suggests the enthusiastic imagination of a German who has read all the books published about America in Berlin. Distortion, always employed, does not seem to be upon any consistent principle. Sometimes reality is merely conventionalized and simplified, sometimes it is used as a theme for fantastic variations, and sometimes it is presented subjectively—that is to say, as one would imagine it seen by some particular person of oblique vision. The piece as a whole is neither tragedy, nor comedy, nor farce, nor satire, but all these mixed together; and it is given such unity as it has largely by the fact that it is always fantastic.

When the tumult and the shouting have died, when the last strange lighting has faded and the last odd sound echoed away, one is left with somewhat mixed conclusions. First of all one is impressed anew by the virtuosity of the Neighborhood company which undertakes and which masters all styles —for it Seneca it not too heavy or Plautus too light. With the possible exception of the Theater Guild's "Processional" no piece in a similar genre has been done so well in New York. The manipulation of the puppet-actors and of the more or less mechanical devices is amazingly expert, and the designed effects come off with a sureness and a regularity by no means usual with such experiments. There are no sudden and painful lapses from the style like those observed in some recent productions where the resources of the director seemed suddenly to give out; chaos is controlled and directed as in art even chaos must be. And yet, in the second place, one is not wholly satisfied, one does not feel that the elaborateness of the means is wholly justified by the result. Expressionism —or whatever one may choose to call the style of drama here under discussion—has one thing in common with classicism, it tends to represent life under its general rather than its individual characteristics, and, like classicism, it is continually in danger of having at its center mere commonplace. The plot and theme of "Pinwheel" are excessively ordinary; and for all the novelty of the saying the thing said is banal. Here is a technique of expression more striking than any of the things which it has to express. One gets the impression of devices waiting to be employed upon adequate material, and in this respect this particular wing of the insurgent theater reminds one of all that has been said so many times of the movies. If expressionism is indeed like the cinema in this respect one may be at least permitted to hope that it will not, like the cinema also, continue merely to promise until all are weary with waiting.

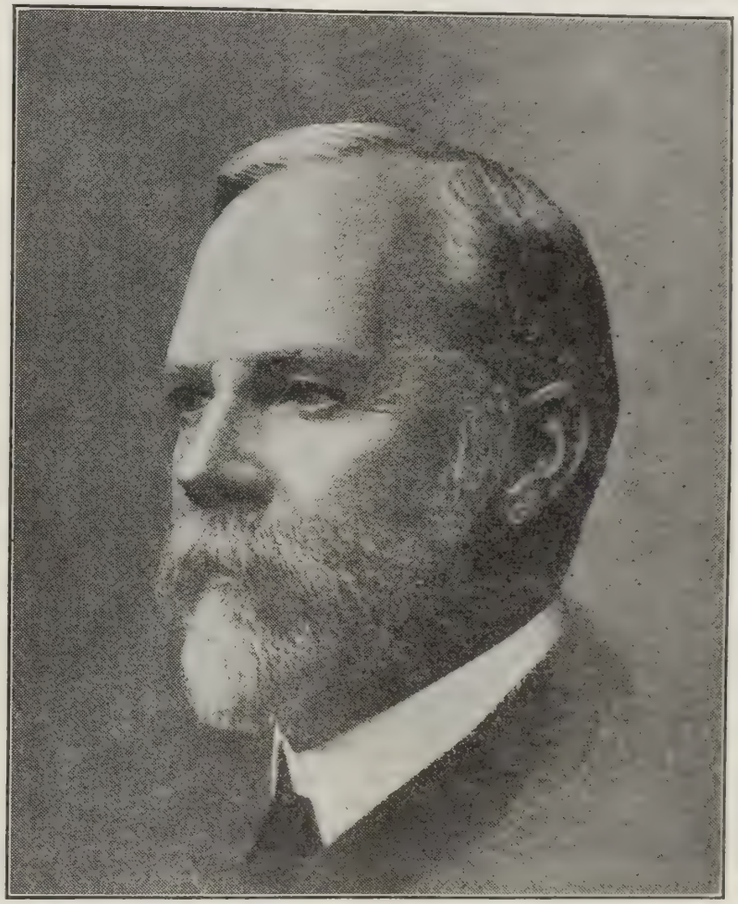
The indefatigable Martin Brown has had two plays produced during the past week, both of which have the mark of his heavy hand. The first is a drama, "The Dark" (Lyceum Theater), which is based upon a violent and not particularly convincing situation but which nevertheless manages to keep one wondering how it will turn out. The second, "The Strawberry Blonde" (Bijou Theater), is a comedy of apartment-house life which is about as delicate and as subtle as a truckload of bricks but which is nevertheless funny. At the Mansfield Mrs. Pat Campbell, with little of her charm left, is appearing in an anemic comedy called "The Adventurous Age" which suggests nothing so much as a commencement-day effort. "Fog" (National Theater) is a conventional comedy mystery play full of the usual spooky hocus-pocus. "Trapped" (Garrick Theater) is a rather maladroit war tragedy of the ambitious young artist who is trapped by matrimony. Mr. Ziegfeld has opened his gorgeous new Ziegfeld Theater, designed especially to house musical shows, with "Rio Rita." It is not either funnier or more tuneful than others of its class, but it stuns the eye. The sixteen stars, including John Drew, Pauline Lord, Estelle Winwood, Rollo Peters, and Mrs. Whiffen, who nightly appear in "Trelawny of the Wells" at the New Amsterdam Theater cannot make a good play out of Pinero's cup of old custard; but their performance, wherein no one stars because all of them do, is a perfect delight.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"I have not the slightest desire to go to heaven!"

SAYS R. F. FOSTER in one of the most daring books ever published. "The Coming Faith" has created a sensational storm of interest. Everywhere people are discussing this astounding book. Read why the author does not believe in Heaven and Hell—why he considers orthodox religion as nothing more than ignorant superstition—what he prophesies the religion of the future will be.

"WHAT do I care about a harp and a crown, or a pair of golden slippers to walk the golden streets?"



With such utter frankness as this, R. F. Foster dares to face the dogmas of Christianity. He turns the cold light of logic upon our religious beliefs and reveals them in all the glaring inconsistency, their disregard for fact, their childish superstition. In his startling new book, "The Coming Faith," he sounds a challenge that is ringing round the world.

Twenty years ago this book could not have been published. Ten years ago no magazine would have accepted this announcement. But now, with the present day freedom of thought Mr. Foster feels the time is ripe to give his message to the world.

It is an amazing message, a mighty message—a message that has set the whole world agog, that is being discussed everywhere, that must command the attention of every thinking person, whether he be an orthodox Christian or an out-and-out atheist.

What Is "The Coming Faith"?

Mr. Foster does not simply tear down our present religion and give us nothing to take its place. He gives us a religion in accord with the laws of nature and the truths of science, a religion that reveals the true place and destiny of mankind in the magnificent order of the universe, a religion founded on unassailable logic.

R. F. Foster, whose astounding book, "The Coming Faith" has created a world-wide sensation

Has R. F. Foster indeed wrested from the universe its Great Secret? Has he found the Truth for which mankind has sought through all the ages of time? How does he answer such tremendous questions as Where did we come from? What are we here for? Whither are we going?

Some of the Chapter Titles

The Four Infinities
Space and Time
The Creation
Mind and Matter
Mind Without Matter
Other Worlds
Ideas of God
Immortality of the Soul
Heaven and Hell
Physical Evolution
The Universal Mind
What Are We Here For
Birth Control
Vice and Crime
War and Peace
Marriage and Children
The Individual and The Race
The Future

It Took Forty Years to Write This Book

R. F. Foster is not a theologian. He is the internationally known authority on bridge and other games, on which he has written no fewer than seventy-eight books which are accepted as standard works in their field.

Now his keen, analytical mind focuses upon the subject of religion. Early in life his interest in this great question was stimulated by his mother, herself well known as the author of several controversial works on religion, including "The Word, Not the Book," "The Gospel, Not the Creed."

Forty years ago Mr. Foster began to write down the conclusions to which he had inevitably been drawn. But because his ideas were too startling, too revolutionary, he withheld them from publication up to the present. "The Coming Faith" is brutal in its frankness, it calls a spade a spade, but it is absolutely honest. Its devastating expose of orthodox religion is founded not on prejudice but on relentless logic.

Is This Blasphemy?

"If you will be candid with yourself and get down to a concrete conception of what you call God, you will probably admit that while you speak to Him as a Spirit, your mental vision shadows forth something on the order of a venerable old man with a long beard."

* * *

"We explain the apparent impossibility of creating something out of nothing by saying that God can do anything. Who or what gave God this wonderful power that we call omnipotence?"

* * *

"Our present beliefs, collected under the name of Christianity, were absolutely unknown two thousand years ago, and will probably be unheard of two thousand years from now."

* * *

You may be shocked by such statements as these. You may call it blasphemy, you may cry out in protest. But whatever your personal feelings may be, you MUST read "The Coming Faith," if only that you may defend your own beliefs intelligently when it is discussed before you.

Here is a mighty searchlight upon the greatest mysteries of existence. Here is a tremendous challenge to sham, hypocrisy and superstition. And here is a definite, logical, clear-cut answer to the momentous questions of life and death that concern each one of us more deeply than anything else possibly can.

Examine It Without Obligation

Because "The Coming Faith" is a book that should be in the hands of every thinking person, a special offer has been arranged that enables you to examine it for yourself without obligation to keep it.

You need send no money in advance. Simply mail the coupon below. "The Coming Faith" will be forwarded to you by mail. Deposit the price of $2.50 with the postman. Then read. If it does not immediately grip your attention; if you do not want to read this enthralling book through from cover to cover, you are at liberty to return it and your money will be refunded in full without question.

Send for your copy now; the demand is already overwhelming: the present edition must soon be exhausted.

The Personality Press, Dept. 1332
71 W. 45th Street, New York, N. Y.

The Personality Press, Dept. 1332
71 West 45th Street, New York City, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Please send me a copy of R. F. Foster's daring new book, "The Coming Faith." 500 pages bound in rich green cloth. I am enclosing no money, but will pay the postman $2.50 plus the postage on delivery. If I care to return the book within 5 days you agree to refund my money in full.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

If you prefer to send $2.50 with this coupon, the book will be mailed postage prepaid. Same return privilege. (Remittance should accompany Canadian and Foreign Orders.)

International Relations Section

The Russian Censor Relents

By J. C.

AT the recent Thirteenth All-Russian Congress of the Russian Communist Party a significant resolution was passed concerning the so-called "literary front." The party has decided to relieve the pressure on this front and to grant a limited freedom to those writers not included in the circle of the napostovtzi (men at the post) patronized by the authorities. Hitherto, besides the severe official censorship, there has been another even more formidable censorship exercised by "voluntary" guardians of proletarian ideas. The role of these guardians is well known to all readers of periodicals published in Russia. Now the party is forced to control its ardent but for the most part ungifted champions by a series of timid censures.

The journal Zhurnalist presents some of the more important points of the resolution, together with some comments from the poputchiks—which means, "fellow-travelers up to a certain point" and consists of writers who do not openly oppose the Soviet Government and who, in Prince Mirsky's phrase, "pay at least lip-service to the wisdom of Marx and the greatness of Lenin." The question of how to treat these poputchiks has long divided the Communist Party; its "liberal" wing, headed by Trotzky and the critic Voronsky, has been in favor of encouraging them as long as they were not openly harmful to the Communist education of the people. On the other hand, the left wing, consisting chiefly of talentless young writers, for the most part members of the MAPP—Moscow Association of Proletarian Poets—maintained that only those writers who are directly useful for Communist education should be admitted to state periodicals. The question had previously come up before the Central Committee in 1924, and a resolution adopted in favor of Voronsky's policy, which enabled the state press to use in its columns the work of the poputchiks, who made a tolerable living by their writings.

Some of the more important points of the resolution just passed are given here:

> 9. The correlation between the different classifications of writers according to their social or class position is defined by our common policy. It is, however, necessary to remember that the direction of all literature, with all its material and ideological resources, belongs to the working-class. The hegemony of proletarian writers does not yet exist, and the party should help these writers to earn the historical right for such a hegemony. Peasant writers should meet with a friendly welcome and have the benefit of our unconditional support. The problem consists in the constant need of switching their increasing numbers on to rails of proletarian ideology, by no means, however, depriving them of their important peasant literary-artistic images.
>
> 10. With regard to the poputchiks, it is necessary to have in view: (a) their differentiation; (b) the significance of many of them as qualified "specialists" in literary technique; (c) the effectiveness of fluctuations among this class of writers. The general policy here should be one of tactful and cautious relations with them, i. e., an approach which will establish the most promising conditions for their rapid acceptance of the Communist ideology. . . .
>
> 11. With regard to the proletarian writers, the party should take up this position: it should in every way help their growth and support them and their organizations, but at the same time it should exert all its power to prevent that presumption in their midst which may have most fatal consequences. Precisely because it sees in them the future intellectual guides of Soviet literature, the party should make every effort to prevent a frivolous and contemptuous attitude toward the old cultural heritage and toward literary specialists. . . . The party should also oppose every attempt to establish a purely hot-house "proletarian" literature. A comprehensive grasp of phenomena in all their complexity—not the frame of the factory alone; a literature not of a trade organization but of a great struggling class with a following of millions of peasants—such should be the bonds holding proletarian literature together.
>
> 12. The above in general defines the problem of criticism, which thus appears to be one of the most important educational weapons in the hands of the party. . . . Communist criticism should expel from its household the tone of literary command. Only when it depends on the superiority of its ideas will this criticism have a deep educational significance. Marxist criticism should determinedly drive out of its midst every pretentious, half-literate, and self-satisfied assumption. . . .
>
> 13. . . . The party cannot bind itself to any particular tendency in the sphere of literary form. In its guidance of literature as a whole, the party can as little support any particular faction in literature (classifying these factions according to distinction in form and style) as it can by resolutions solve questions of the forms of family relations, although, in general, it should undoubtedly guide the construction of the new domestic order. . . .
>
> 14. Therefore the party should express itself as in favor of free competition between the various groups and currents in literature. Any other solution of the question would be an official bureaucratic pseudo-decision. While supporting materially and morally the proletarian and the proletarian-peasant literature, and supporting also the poputchiks, the party cannot present a monopoly to any particular group, not even to the proletarian: this would mean, before all, disaster to proletarian literature.
>
> 15. The party should use every means to root out attempts at self-appointed and incompetent administrative meddling in literary affairs; the party should make a careful selection of persons in those departments which deal with publication, in order to secure a really proper, useful, and tactful guidance of our literature.
>
> 16. The party should point out to all workers in creative literature the necessity for a fixing of limits to the functions of critics and creative writers. For the latter it is essential to concentrate their efforts on creative literary production, using for this purpose the gigantic material of contemporary life. . . .
>
> The party should emphasize the necessity of producing a creative literature intended for the proletarian reader, the workman and the peasant; it is necessary boldly and decisively to break with the preconceptions of the gentry in literature and, making use of all the technical achievements of the classics, to work out a corresponding form, understood by the millions.
>
> Only then, when this great problem is solved, will Soviet literature and its proletarian advance guard be able to carry out their cultural-historical mission.

The responses of the writers themselves to this unusual resolution are more interesting than any external comment could be.

Andrey Bely, a writer whose considerable fame dates from before the war and who, in a "mystic" sense, threw in his lot with the Bolsheviks at the time of their coming to power, thinks the new policy of the Communist Party with regard to literature is "flexible and humane" and that its conditions in practice should provide for "a normal growth and healthy development of creative literature." He adds, however, that in passing to the details of the program he sees many obscurities. He objects to the limitation of Russian literary groups to three, "workmen, peasants, and poputchiks," which list by no means exhausts the existing groups. He protests against being called a poputchik; he does not see why he should be called a "fellow-traveler," having accepted the revolution at its inception. At the same time, he argues, "I am not a party man, and neither a proletarian nor a peasant writer."

A. Veresaev, whose "Memoirs of a Physician" is known to the English-speaking public, makes a reply so rich in irony that it is worth quoting almost in its entirety. He says:

> The debates which so strongly agitated well-defined literary circles during the past two years have seethed around the questions: Can a small group of talentless writers pretend to dictatorial plenipotentiary powers in the sphere of Russian literature? Is it right that we, so-called poputchiks, should be chastised? Should literary criticism be simply criticism or stern supervision in the nature of an official regulation? The Central Committee has replied: No dictatorship; no chastisement; criticism should be criticism. That's very comforting! But if the whole business limits itself to this, if the resolution has no practical consequences, then the disease which has eaten into contemporary Russian creative literature will remain not only uncured but unmitigated.
>
> This basic disease consists in the absence in the contemporary writer of artistic honesty. This disease is caused by absolutely impossible demands presented to the writer in official forms, on obedience to which depends the publication of his work. The censor says to the novelist: "Make this unsympathetic Communist a man without a party; into the soul of this partyless heroine bring a little more confusion; make this sympathetic Communist a little more clever—then I will pass your novel!" . . . A poet brings to the editor something sincere, something profoundly original, his own poem. "It is necessary, comrade, to write on actual themes. Consider, for example, the heroic struggle of the Chinese proletariat—what a splendid theme!"
>
> The common groan along the whole front of contemporary Russian literature is: "We cannot be ourselves, our artistic conscience is forced, our creativeness more and more is becoming two-faced; we write one thing for ourselves, another thing for publication."
>
> In this consists the greatest injury to literature, and it might well become irremediable. Such a systematic violation of the creative conscience can have the most dire consequences, both for the writer and literature.
>
> What is to be said about artists who are ideologically alien to the party in power? Notwithstanding this alien quality, is it normal that they should be silent? And silent are such writers as Feodor Sologub, Maximilian Voloshin, Anna Akhmatova. It is painful to admit, but if at this moment Dostoevski appeared, a writer so alien to contemporary tendencies and at the same time so necessary because of his consuming fire, he would be forced to put away in his writing table one manuscript after another, each bearing the stamp of the literary censor.
>
> Let us hope that the fifteenth paragraph will be wisely and decisively carried into effect and that if "guidance"

"This limited dividend corporation (City Housing Corporation), utilizing the best expert advice and employing efficient methods, has for several years now been erecting housing of high standard in New York at a price which is equivalent on the average to $12.50 a month a room, has been meeting its first mortgage payments, has been paying a 6% dividend on the remainder of the investment, and has been putting aside a surplus which is ample to provide safety in the future. The houses which it erects are so far superior to what can be obtained elsewhere for anything like the same price that the demand for them seems to be virtually unlimited. Many a preferred stock yielding no greater return is no more safe than the common stock of this limited dividend concern."

Editorial in The New Republic, February 2, 1927

Is 6% an adequate investment return?

Leading authorities agree that housing built on a large scale by limited dividend companies is one of the best ways, if not the best way, that have so far been devised to relieve the acute shortage of medium and low-priced homes in most of our big cities. City Housing Corporation, a limited dividend company organized to build better homes and communities, has a three-year record of successful operations. Larger amounts of capital, satisfied with a 6% return, are required to increase the scope of the Corporation's building program.

A safe, conservative investment

Stock in City Housing Corporation is issued in $100 shares, and is sold at par. Dividends are limited by charter to 6% per annum in order that stockholders may receive an adequate return and home buyers the greatest possible value.

Six per cent. dividends have been paid since the beginning. We offer this stock as a safe investment performing a double service—bringing in a 6% return and building better homes for people of moderate incomes. EVERY PURCHASER OF A $100 SHARE AT PAR INCREASES THE EXTENT OF THE OPERATIONS OF THE COMPANY. For further information send in coupon below.

City Housing Corporation

587 Fifth Avenue, New York City

A limited dividend company—
Organized to build better homes and communities

Authorized Capital, $5,000,000 in shares of $100 each

Directors: Alexander M. Bing, President; Dr. Felix Adler, John G. Agar, Leo S. Bing, Charles S. Bird, Jr., William Sloane Coffin, Thomas C. Desmond, Douglas L. Elliman, Prof. Richard T. Ely, Arthur Lehman, Frank Lord, V. Everit Macy, John Martin, Mrs. Joseph M. Proskauer, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Robert E. Simon.

City Housing Corporation N-15
587 Fifth Avenue, New York City

Please send me further information with the understanding that it entails no obligation.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____

is really necessary to our literature, it will, at least, become "proper, useful, and tactful."

A gifted young writer, Andrey Sobol, is of the opinion that "guardianship and artistic creation are incompatible." Tutors, he asserts, "are necessary for children, but tutors for writers are worse than sad." The self-appointed "tutors of literature" demanded that literature should be didactic, tendentious. "They were incapable of understanding that such a literature could not live, that its age is not beyond a single political day. Authentic literature does not live in the present day alone, according to today's school program, but catches and reflects the changes of days; it is not made common by a narrow tendency of a given minute, but by some universal idea, some universal movement. . . ." The resolution of the Central Committee, he avers, relieves the situation, but has still some serious defects, for while it censures the "tutors," it still regards certain writers as somewhat defective children. He concludes: "It seems to me that the writers of Soviet Russia have long since grown out of their swaddling clothes—they have shown it by the fact that in spite of many years of suffering and chaos they have preserved literature, and have even raised it to great heights. . . ."

Like other authors, Ivan Novikov approves of the resolution and the relief it should afford to true authorship. He argues that creative writing can only be a force if it comes from within and breathes with that fulness of life which is born of natural organic processes and not of any preconceived and reasoned theory, tendentious and didactic in its nature. "Every real artist," he declares, > knows how exacting and self-willed his heroes can be at times if they are born truly alive, how they can protest against any untoward contact and any effort to give them exact measurements, how they begin to talk and act—to the simultaneous sorrow and joy of the author—in opposition to a planned scheme; quite as in life, which is in itself wiser than the wise. That being the case, even an author, giving ear to the artist in himself, would hesitate to assume the role of "guide." . . . The business of the author is to be creatively true and just to himself to the end; this is the only path for the creation of priceless things. . . . "

What would really happen if the horde of artists were let loose in full freedom to do as they liked? Novikov asks this question and answers it: "There is a sage answer to this in the resolution: there is the function of criticism, 'if it depends on superiority of ideas,' and by this means exercises 'a deep educational significance.'"

Victor Shklovsky, one of the most brilliant of young authors, whose "Sentimental Journey" has won plaudits abroad as well as at home, says that the years 1924 and 1925 were marked by a lowering of qualifications in Russian literature. Both critical and creative writing took a turn for the worse. This was chiefly to be explained by literary politics. The quarrel created two groups, the napostovtzi and the poputchiks, and upset the boundaries of various literary groups. Literary judgment vanished in the process. Literature grew like a weed, and quick results were anticipated. No longer, says Shklovsky, will one write about the poputchiks as about the sick. "For us formalists," he concludes, "the resolution gives us a chance to work and to experiment. . . . For me personally it means the freedom to work as a specialist."

A particularly lengthy response has come from B. Pasternak, who is acclaimed the most brilliant of the younger poets. Pasternak is frankly pessimistic. He notes the lack of enthusiasm in the resolution, its utter futility as a measure for creating real literature. He says in part:

> It is not a cultural revolution which we are living through but a cultural reaction. The forces of the proletarian dictatorship are insufficient to be realized in culture. . . . In bourgeois forms we have allowed the most mediocre talents, just as in revolutionary. It cannot be otherwise, such is the logic of big numbers. . . . All my thoughts become secondary before the one thought of primal importance: Am I to be admitted or not? Am I sufficiently worthless to try to write and rejoice in the composition of the golden mean? The control of authorship has recently belonged to the censor. Now he has divided this control with the contemporary publisher. The philosophy of drawing lots cooperates with the philosophy of sufferance. They have seized the whole horizon. There is nothing for me to do. The style of the epoch has already been created! That is my answer.

Count A. Tolstoi, some of whose work is known to the English-reading public, is more optimistic as to the ultimate outcome. He begins by admitting the downfall of the bourgeois civilization and the need of creating a literature corresponding to the requirements of the new proletarian order. He confesses that eight years of the Bolshevik regime have not yet produced the thing called "proletarian art." He tells of the difficulties. "Artists have been accused of having secret leanings toward the bourgeoisie and of refusing to understand that the revolution is an incontrovertible fact." The process of arriving at an art for the masses, he declares, is bound to be long and complex. "On us, Russian writers, falls a peculiar responsibility. We are the first. Like Columbuses on frail sailing-ships we traverse the unknown seas toward a new land. After us will follow great ocean liners. Great artists will come from the proletariat. But the paths will be laid down by us."

It was of this Count Tolstoi that Prince Mirsky wrote in his "Contemporary Russian Literature": "The most salient feature in the personality of A. N. Tolstoi is a very curious combination of great natural gifts and a complete absence of brains." Which makes one rather suspicious of his prophecy.

Contributors to This Issue

MARY AUSTIN has contributed to American poetry not only a number of poems but a volume of criticism and prophecy called "The American Rhythm."

COMMANDER J. M. KENWORTHY, recently reelected to Parliament as Labor member for Hull, was from 1902 to 1920 in the British navy.

HARBOR ALLEN is publicity director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

R. R. KUCZYNSKI, statistician and economist of long experience in Germany, is now attached to the Institute of Economics in Washington.

ARTHUR E. BOSTWICK visited China in 1925 by invitation of the Chinese Association for Advancement of Education, to inspect Chinese libraries.

R. L. SCHUYLER is professor of history at Columbia University.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS is a frequent reviewer of novels for The Nation.

ALTER BRODY is preparing a volume of one-act plays for publication.

HELEN WOODWARD is author of "Through Many Windows."

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1927 No. 3217

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 221

EDITORIALS:

- Can Seasickness Be Ended? 223
- Kellogg Must Go 224
- Basing a War on Rumors 225
- The Pace of the Auto Industry 225
- The Scope of Georg Brandes 226

BRITISH FOLLY IN CHINA. By Bertrand Russell 227

WOMAN ALONE. Anonymous 228

MILK—A PUBLIC UTILITY. By William Jourdan Rapp 230

SOME MEN RUN FOR OFFICE: CALVIN SITS. By Frank R. Kent 232

CHILDREN AND ART. By Katherine Anne Porter 233

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 234

CORRESPONDENCE 235

BOOKS, ART, PLAYS:

- Bacchus. By Edgar Lee Masters 238
- A Popular Napoleon. By Louis R. Gottschalk 238
- Neither Short Story nor Novel. By John Cournos 239
- Gold and Tinsel. By B. H. Haggin 239
- The First English Press. By Frederick Tupper 240
- Thought About Thought. By Mortimer J. Adler 240
- Books in Brief 241
- A Chinese Miscellany. By L. S. G. 241
- Art: Good and Bad Negro Art. By Thomas Munro 242
- Drama: "The Cradle Song." By Joseph Wood Krutch 243

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

- Sun Yat-sen on Pan-Asia 245

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

JAPAN'S UNQUALIFIED ACCEPTANCE of President Coolidge's invitation to a new conference to limit naval armaments is profoundly encouraging. The friendliness and wisdom of this action ought to move England to the same brave position. In this connection we recall with gratitude that an admiral has at last been found who has the common sense to wish to do away with all battleships. This honor belongs to England. It is Admiral Sueter, who declares that no warships should be allowed of a greater size than cruisers of 10,000 tons. He would also have submarines internationally limited, their activities defined, and new rules made for them by an international conference held under the auspices of the League of Nations. This is in pleasant contrast to the spirit of the heads of the five chief American veterans' associations, who, having learned nothing from the futility and folly and non-success of the World War, have signed a joint manifesto calling for a navy equal to that of any other country and further armament on land. We remain the most aggressively militaristic of ations, and our press will hardly, therefore, take much notice of the fact that the latest European countries to sign a peace forever banning war between them are Sweden and Belgium. It is noteworthy that this treaty is not weakened by the usual exceptions of "vital interests" and "national honor." Similar treaties making war illegal under all circumstances are in force between Sweden and Denmark, Sweden and Finland, and a similar treaty between Sweden and Norway is under way. This means that war is practically outlawed in the north of Europe.

GLORIOUS AS WELL AS TERRIBLE THINGS are happening in China. Behind the bloody haze of civil war and rioting mobs and angry foreigners the new generation is coming triumphantly into its own. It was no mere military victory than won Hangchow, and will win Shanghai, for the Nationalists. It was a victory of what the cables call "propaganda"—a victory of the spirit. Against the growing conviction that the Cantonese represent the people of China no Chinese general can stand. His forces dissolve away from him. Something is happening in China which every coolie, every hireling soldier can understand. A half century ago Britain hired Ningpo Chinese to fight her battles for her against their own Government in the North; times have changed—today a Briton can hardly hire a Chinese to cook for him. It seems to us a tragedy that the two nations which in the West have been the historic protagonists of democracy should at such a moment stand fearfully and hostilely by, under arms—that England and America, instead of greeting young China with a cheer, should be meeting it with mercenary troops and battleships. Thus far in all the turmoil no foreign life has been lost; even the general strike in the foreign settlements of Shanghai has been conducted with exemplary orderliness. Despite the provocative show of force by the British and Americans, there is still hope that a clash may be averted.

SECRETARY KELLOGG threw about one candle power of light upon his Department's attitude toward Mexico in his response to the Norris resolution. He gave a long list of American corporations and individuals claiming title to Mexican oil lands which refuse to accept the Mexican petroleum laws, and said he knew of only four American companies which had applied for confirmatory concessions according to the law. He refused to publish the Department's correspondence with the rebel oil companies, but insisted that it had given no advice or instruction with regard to the petroleum law.

> It has [he said] supplied interested American citizens or their counsel with full information regarding the general position of the Government of the United States with respect to the rights of American nationals owning property in Mexico, so that any action taken by such nationals might be based upon a complete understanding of the position of the Government of the United States in the premises.

Such information, it seems to us, might easily sound like the kind of advice which Mr. Kellogg is reputed to have given the oil companies. Mr. Kellogg added that the Department understood that the rebel oil companies produced "about 70 per cent of the oil produced in Mexico."

POLITELY BUT FIRMLY the Mexican Government replied to Mr. Kellogg. It listed some twenty rebel companies, whose names do not entirely agree with Mr.

Kellogg's list; told precisely what was their oil production in 1925 and in the first eleven months of 1926, and reported that they totaled a little above 40 per cent—far from Mr. Kellogg's 70 per cent—of Mexico's oil production. Some of the rebel companies listed by Mr. Kellogg, it said, have registered some of their oil lands while rebelling as to others. And Mr. Carleton Beals, in the New Republic, lists more than a dozen companies complying with the law—far more than Mr. Kellogg discovered, and, analyzing these, finds that while the Standard, the Sinclair, and even the Mellon oil interests have at least partially complied with the law, the Doheny interests alone have stood out 100 per cent rebel. The validity of the Doheny titles, he points out, has been challenged, and he suggests that the whole fuss and pother arises out of fear of investigation of Mr. Doheny's right to his exceedingly rich oil lands. Nothing in Mr. Kellogg's statement contradicts that suggestion; and his presentation of facts suggests that he has something to hide. Senator Borah drew the moral effectively in his splendid address on February 20. "It ought to be regarded as a crime," he said, "to defend by force and with American Marines a claim for property which cannot stand the inspection of an arbitrator."

IN SO FAR AS PUBLIC OPINION can influence business management the report of three great religious bodies criticizing the Western Maryland Railroad for its policy toward employees should be effective. The religious bodies are the Research Department of the Federal Council of Churches, the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and the Social Justice Commission of the Central Conference of American Rabbis. The report deals with the strike of engineers, firemen, and hostlers that began in the autumn of 1925, the investigators saying that the trouble arose because the company, alone among Class I railroads, refused to pay the standard wage increase. On top of this the company decreed that every man who wished to remain in its service "must sign an individual agreement which was in effect a non-union contract." The conflict, says the report, "is not between wage settlement and bankruptcy but between a wage settlement and dividends on stock." The largest stockholders are John D. Rockefeller and the Alien Property Custodian. The latter has remained "conspicuously silent." The Rockefeller interests, while known to be out of sympathy with the labor policy of the railroad, have taken no effective action to change it. The findings were submitted before the recent acquisition of control of the Western Maryland by the New York Central, Nickel Plate, and Baltimore and Ohio, accompanied by a spectacular rise in the stock quotations of the former. It is to be hoped that the change in ownership will lead to a just settlement of the dispute.

FOR THE FIRST TIME since September 1, 1924, when the Dawes Plan went into effect, a German statesman has declared publicly that Germany cannot go on paying reparations, that the default may come in 1928, and that the German economic situation is serious. This contradicts the conventional optimism. The alleged indices of German prosperity are abundant money, high stock-market values, and regular reparation payments. These are largely explained by heavy borrowing in New York, the interest on which alone already amounts to $250,000,000 annually. Borrowing, furthermore, necessarily entails more imports, thus further prejudicing a favorable trade balance. The indices of the real German crisis are 1,800,000 unemployed, who cost the government as much as reparations; low industrial output, resulting in the inability of industry to use the money available on the Bourse; and a trade balance which warrants neither debt and reparation payments nor repayment of Wall Street loans.

THE NEW GERMAN CABINET is dominated by industrialists and agriculturists and can therefore afford to reveal the true state of German affairs which the bankers prefer to obscure. The landowning Junker also objects to a commercial agreement with Poland because it would pave the way to importation of competing Polish farm products. So the negotiations for a Polish-German commercial agreement, opened more than eighteen months ago, have been broken off—although blame for the rupture may be Poland's as well as Germany's. The Poles do not want an agreement with Germany before they get a loan in the United States. Unhampered trade with Germany would mean heavy imports into Poland and perhaps a fall of the anemic zloty—not a good recommendation for the Polish loan delegation now en route to the United States. A Polish loan is not the best sort of business, but banking adventurers may step in where the established houses fear to tread, and supply Pilsudski with the wherewithal for militaristic schemes against Poland's Eastern neighbor.

> I do not believe in censorship in any of its forms, and I think the producers will clean their own houses without interference from us. But, of course, the police have been ordered to interfere whenever a play offends public decency.

THIS STATEMENT, made by Mayor Walker in Miami, is an excellent example of the muddled thinking that the question of censorship seems to provoke. It is on a par with the remarks of Mr. Frank Crowninshield at a luncheon to discuss the matter in New York City. Mr. Crowninshield, according to the New York Times, declared that the author of "Oedipus Rex" was an artist and the author of "The Drag" was not; " 'The Drag' ought to be suppressed; 'Oedipus Rex' ought not to be suppressed." Censorship is not as simple as that. Not even a censor, probably, would say that the greatest dramatist of all time—Sophocles—was filthy, disgusting, or obscene; but the English censor has said just that of a play by the greatest dramatist alive—"Mrs. Warren's Profession." Nobody and nothing is really safe from the censor. Meanwhile, Horace Liveright is attempting to take over the production of "The Captive," which Gilbert Miller and the Frohman Company renounced to avoid prosecution. The other plays attacked by the police are reported to be flourishing. The plan for a super-play-jury, with two members representing the theater and five the "public," the latter to be selected by the American Arbitration Association, seems to be well received by all sides. But if the public pays its money to see "The Virgin Man" and "Sex," will the American Arbitration Association truly represent it? And if the new play-jury decides that plays like "The Captive" are not obscene—as the old play-jury did—will the persons who bay for purity be any more satisfied than they are at present?

NOT THE SET FACTS but the living processes of history were the aims which Lucy Salmon held before her students during her long and distinguished service at Vassar College. She was one of the first in the academic world to see and to use the substance of daily living which lies about the historian—the newspaper and the village street as well as the bound volumes on library shelves. Her collection of material dealing with the press and with common everyday subjects such as the cook-books of past and present generations, the account books, laundry lists, and the like, which she kept and considered seriously as historical material, is a unique witness of the point of view which she held before her students with tranquil ardor. Her death has taken a great teacher and a spirit eager and untiring in the exploration of new educational and historical fields.

BROOKS ADAMS, dead in Boston at 79, was quite as interesting as his more famous brother who wrote "The Education of Henry Adams." The lives of the two men were similar in more than one respect, though their temperaments were different enough. Brooks, like Henry, went abroad as a young man to be a diplomatic secretary under his father, Charles Francis Adams. Like Henry he engaged throughout a long life in many intellectual enterprises, mingling these with practical ventures into business and the law but retaining always a profound curiosity concerning man, and particularly American man, as a social animal set down in an age of science. Both Adamses brooded over the fate of democracy and the meaning of that fate, and although Brooks wrote with less evenness than Henry did, and with a less organized learning, he was equally provocative when he put his pessimistic thoughts on paper. His introduction to Henry's "Degradation of the Democratic Dogma" is essential to that remarkable book; "The Law of Civilization and Decay" is as full of ideas—bitter ones—as the "Education"; it is interesting to compare Brooks's first book, "The Emancipation of Massachusetts," with his last, "The Emancipation of Massachusetts—the Dream and the Reality." Amateurs of the intellect, these two scions of old New England reflected in their own probing doubts the self-distrust of a confident young nation awakening to the fertile skepticism of self-awareness.

Can Seasickness Be Ended?

THIS is a hard winter for the kings. Those who are mere men have been on the run ever since the close of the World War, and now even those who are gods may have to hop it. A revolt has begun against no less impregnable and absolute a ruler than Neptune himself, to whom hitherto all the waters under the firmament have been conceded. The head of the anti-Neptune junta is a quiet, scholarly man in a cap and gown bestowed recently by Stevens Institute along with a doctorate of engineering. Having invented and put into successful use the gyroscope compass and an automatic device for steering ships known as "Metal Mike," Elmer A. Sperry is now working to perfect his gyro stabilizer, which he believes will do away with the rolling of a ship, thus ending for ocean travelers the ages-old plague of seasickness.

Bad weather at sea, says Mr. Sperry encouragingly, is only a myth; storms are a bluff. Neptune's trident is tissue paper and his power is pouf. Mr. Sperry has old scientific backing for his contempt for waves. Science knows that in spite of Byron the deep and dark blue ocean does not roll on; there is no progression of the waves. They are a surface upheaval, with narrow limits of horizontal motion and a vertical action that reaches only to a shallow depth. The bottom of a ship, says Mr. Sperry, is generally in still water. Why, then, does it roll and wallow among the waves? This great expanse of ship's bottom is of itself a submarine, pure and simple, Mr. Sperry explains in an interview printed in the Nautical Gazette. By itself this submarine is just as happy on edge or vertical as it is horizontal, and while in this calm and undisturbed water will with indifference assume any position that other parts of the ship take. This gives even small changes in the surface angle an opportunity triflingly to shift the ship's buoyancy center with reference to its gravity center, and the accumulation of many of these small-angle shifts of the surface finally gets in its work because of practically no restraint or counterforce. Rolling therefore finally ensues with all the attendant shipping of seas, groanings and duress, slowing down and impeding of headway, bad steering, and general discomfiture.

Upon this Mr. Sperry bases his belief that we have to counteract only the force of the ocean at or near a vessel's water line in order to keep it vertical, and this he believes can be accomplished by the power of his gyro stabilizer in motion in a ship's hull. A vertical ship would not only insure passengers against seasickness but it would ship little water, Mr. Sperry believes; the decks would be practically dry even in heavy weather. Besides, the vertical ship, relieved of its present lost motion and wasted energy, would be capable of greater speed. The ship which now does twenty-five miles an hour could do thirty-five, and it would be simple to achieve a four-day passage between America and England. A ship could be given increased power and speed without endangering her hull from the strain and pounding which take place today.

Naturally some practical questions arise. For instance, granting the soundness of the principle of using the earth's rotation to steady a moving mass, is it possible to operate a gyro stabilizer sufficiently large to be effective without employing an amount of power and space too great to permit of successful or profitable use of the vessel? Supposing you achieve a vertical steamship, will there be power enough left to drive it across the ocean or sufficient room to carry any considerable load of passengers or cargo? Experiment alone can resolve such questions. Mr. Sperry's gyro stabilizer, in its early phases, has been used on a number of yachts for several years and has been installed on a few larger vessels.

> The most striking example of steadiness [according to Mr. Sperry] has only recently been reported, although the stabilizer has been in use for four years. A ship belonging to the Japanese Government, and equivalent to a 16,000-ton trading ship, was equipped with a Sperry stabilizer. In a heavy sea her normal roll was nineteen degrees in each direction, or an arc of thirty-eight degrees. With the stabilizer released, the roll was checked down to two degrees, practically negligible, for no one is conscious of such a small motion. On this ship the stabilizer was running 12 per cent below maximum, and everything indicates that, running "all out," 100 per cent stability would be assured. The performance on this Japanese vessel was consistent throughout the four years, and many smaller vessels have shown complete stability.

Anyhow the upright, non-rollable, seasickless ship is a beautiful hope. And maybe it is—or sometime will be—true.

Kellogg Must Go

MR. COOLIDGE, having made a worthy appeal for another conference to reduce armaments, finds himself turned down by both France and Italy. Apparently he and his inept Secretary of State failed to follow the usual procedure of sounding out in advance the several governments through our ambassadors and so laid themselves open to this contretemps. In addition it has been explained for them that their letter of invitation was "misunderstood"—as if it were not the first duty of a statesman in a matter of this kind to make his meaning clear and straightforward. The result is primarily the humiliating reply from France, whose Foreign Minister, M. Briand, apparently took a vicious pleasure in reminding the United States that it was not a member of the League of Nations and protested solemnly that his country could not join in a special conference to limit navies when the League was at work on a general disarmament program. If this answer seems in part a disingenuous and deliberate French effort to shelve anew the question of disarmament—some of the arguments advanced could have been equally well used in connection with the Washington Conference—Mr. Kellogg invited it by insufficient forethought and preparation. He even gave the impression that he was deliberately striking at the League. This is what is called great statesmanship by our noble President and his Secretary of State.

This blundering is only characteristic of the Coolidge-Kellogg diplomacy in every other field. In China the plan for the neutralization of Shanghai was turned down by all three of the Chinese groups. It was absurd on the face of it to ask the Nationalists calmly to agree to abandon a chief aim, control of one of their own large cities. Here, too, Mr. Kellogg got hold of an excellent idea and jumped to use it without adequate understanding. Both his gestures to China have failed utterly. He has now no independent American program, but is apparently merely playing second fiddle to the British. The English Government is at least frank about its militaristic policy, which is so properly characterized by Bertrand Russell elsewhere in this issue of The Nation. It is rushing thousands of troops and many warships; we are shipping in marines little by little and preparing more and more for hostilities in such a way that the individual movements of troops and ships attract less attention. But there is every indication now that if the Cantonese arrive before Shanghai and the big guns go off we shall be foremost in the "policing." Anything may happen when there is no clear-cut principle or policy behind our actions, when we merely drift, failing to notify the world just what we are up to. Putting forth promises to do what the Chinese wish "if, but, and when" gets the United States nowhere and will eventually win for us the same hatred which now accrues to the British and threatens them with the complete ruin of their trade and position in the East.

If we look to the south of us there is the same amazing record of blunders. As for Mexico, we are marking time; we are apparently in a deadlock which will last until Congress is safely out of the way, when the President and Secretary Kellogg will, we very much fear, begin drastic action against the Republic of Mexico. Secretary Wilbur's harping on the bolshevist menace in his speech at the New York Republican Club indicates that that fake issue is still to be kept before the public. We do not believe that the outpouring of public protests has as yet been sufficient to deter the Administration from its program to "discipline" Mexico and any other country to the south of us which does not do our will. To Nicaragua, where the Sacasa forces, which Washington opposed, are sweeping the country, we are rushing additional thousands of marines to deprive the constitutional party of the victory which it has clearly won—all on this under pretense that we are protecting American property. In Panama Mr. Kellogg's offensive and defensive treaty which we were to have put over so easily has been rejected by the legislature. In Tacna and Arica we have scored a monumental failure because of the blundering in Washington. In the matter of the World Court, Mr. Coolidge was passionately for it and forced it through the Senate; now he takes his defeat on that issue lying down. He will not even state whether he will do anything about it or whether he intends to leave matters as they are.

As for the debt settlements, our Administration has achieved no action from France on the agreement with that country. It may have been good policy to make those settlements with Italy and Belgium at a few cents on the dollar, but the net result is that the American public has been deceived and Europe merely irritated. As for Russia, we are still pursuing the ostrich policy of pretending not to know that that great country is there, while we tremble at the slightest word of any bolshevist leader or group which points at us. And what is the net result of it all? Why, we are uniting all Latin America against us as a nation of sinister and hypocritical imperialists and are destroying American business and business opportunities from here to Cape Horn. In Europe they think us a blood-sucking miser, and are slowly being driven into union against us. In Asia, as we have said, we are becoming a mere tool of Great Britain in the estimation of a great people who felt that they had a right to the sympathy, cooperation, and moral support of a nation which also once threw off a foreign yoke. We have no friends left anywhere.

Now, if the Government could show some actual achievements, some record of having accomplished something, to offset its blunders, that would be another matter. We cannot discover that it has achieved a single genuine success of moment. And yet the business men of the country and even a part of the press which has not yet altogether abdicated the critical faculty, still pretends that Mr. Coolidge is a great President, that he is wise, sagacious, farsighted, and the best friend of business that we have ever had in the White House—he who is destroying our prestige and influence in the market of South America. If public opinion were alive and awake today as it was before the war the Coolidge Administration would stand condemned throughout the country. Only the absence of an intelligent opposition in Washington—the Progressive leaders are too few to be effective—prevents the complete exposure and condemnation of Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Kellogg. That only makes it the more desirable that those Americans who believe in old-fashioned honor, integrity, and decency should be insistent in their demands for a new Secretary of State. No matter who succeeds him the time has come to say that Kellogg must go.

Basing a War on Rumors

TRADITIONAL Coolidge cautiousness has been tossed overboard by the President in his haste to execute his latest hostile move against Central America. Hereafter he will first ship his marines and airplanes (equipped principally for bombing purposes) to Nicaragua and elsewhere, and then inquire into his reasons for doing so. The guilt of the accused party will be subjected to examination after the accused party is dead. How can any other interpretation be placed on the President's explanation, given orally to the press on February 18, that in sending 1,600 additional marines and six DeHaviland bombers to Corinto he was acting upon information which to him "looks like a reliable report." If this policy is generally followed by the Coolidge-Kellogg regime in the future, marines will be sent on wild expeditions all over the world, not to protect American lives and property but to run down the innumerable reports of dubious reliability which steadily pour into the ears of important Washington functionaries.

Eight hundred additional marines landed at Corinto, Nicaragua, on February 20; the transport Henderson left Newport, Rhode Island, on the same day with 565 marines, planning to pick up 1,500 more at Philadelphia and Norfolk, for Caribbean service. The railroad is to be guarded, the chief cities of Nicaragua occupied, by marines and bluejackets. When the new orders are carried out 5,750 armed men will be stationed on Nicaraguan soil under the American flag or aboard the United States naval vessels now lying off the coasts of the Central American republic. This military force, of a size to satisfy the ambitions of the most outspoken imperialists, will provide eight protectors for each of the 700 American citizens who, according to the most authentic records available, have established their residence in Nicaragua! The Washington correspondents have expressed the guess that these armed men will be used either to "neutralize" the entire country—a euphemism for turning it over to Diaz—or to establish a military protectorate identical with that in Haiti.

Two hundred marines and six airplanes left San Diego for Corinto on February 16. Lesser naval officials explained that while the planes were ostensibly intended for observation purposes, they were in fact equipped with stores of 25-pound bombs, presumably to be dropped for "moral effect." On February 17, however, Rear Admiral Latimer, in command of the special United States service squadron in Nicaraguan waters, expressed surprise at the Navy Department's action in sending him reinforcements. He had not asked for the additional marines, he declared, adding that "there is really no need for them, as there already is a sufficient number of marines and bluejackets in Nicaragua to fulfil requirements."

The joke obviously was on the admiral. He is on the scene of action, but obviously the "apparently reliable" information which reached Washington, and made necessary the tripling of his force, had not reached him. On the same day Secretary Wilbur, probably with his mind on naughty Nicaraguan bolshevists and their contemplated seduction of little American children, announced that not only were 200 marines and six airplanes being rushed to Corinto but that the additional force of 1,400 marines was even then being made ready for a trip to Nicaragua. When his attention was called to Admiral Latimer's statement that reinforcements were unnecessary, Mr. Wilbur smiled sweetly as though to say: "Well, that's a good one on Latimer." Then he added that if the admiral were unable to find work for the extra leathernecks, he was at liberty to send them back.

The White House Spokesman, coming to bat for a moribund State Department, got into action on February 18. He frankly assured the assembled Washington correspondents that this Government did not intend to permit other foreigners to send rifles and bullets into Nicaragua; that privilege, he implied, was reserved for Uncle Sam. Nothing was said, of course, as to what right the United States had to take such action. The Spokesman maintained a profound silence as to the right, vigorously maintained by the United States during the World War, of citizens of a neutral country to sell munitions wherever they pleased —a right which would seem to belong to Mexico as well as to the United States in the absence of a declaration of war.

What the Spokesman—who was, we may reveal, Calvin himself—said, according to the short-hand notes of a skeptical correspondent, was:

> It is difficult to get any information upon which you can rely absolutely, but in case of peril of this kind it is assumed that anything that looks like a reliable report should be acted upon, and [we should] be prepared to meet that serious effect that could accrue from such a situation.

It looks as if the marines were going to be busy.

The Pace of the Auto Industry

THE automobile industry is the most spectacular business development of our age. Thanks largely to a new era of high-speed salesmanship, there are already more automobiles in our country than telephones, although something like two out of every three car-owners earn less than enough to pay federal income taxes.

In the closing months of 1926, however, automobile production and sales fell off at an accelerating rate, to such an extent as to mark an important change in trend. After reaching new highs last summer, 1926 production fell off at such a rate that December marked the lowest level since December, 1921, and the 1927 figures thus far do not indicate any material change in the situation.

This slowing down is not so astonishing when one considers how rapid has been the recent evolution of the automobile. For several consecutive years engineering research and the progress of the art have succeeded in making the car models of the preceding year seem old-fashioned. Three or four years ago the great swing in popularity from open to closed cars was under way, made possible by large reductions in the manufacturing cost of closed cars. Everyone who could afford it turned in his touring car for a sedan. Many who had postponed buying felt that the time to do so was particularly opportune. A little later appeared new closed cars with low, rakish lines, so that even those who did own closed cars found themselves quite out of fashion. Then came new cars with Duco and other lacquer finishes, with such obvious advantages over the old, polished finish as to constitute an important new sales appeal. And then four-wheel brakes became standard equipment. We seem at last to have reached a period of stabilization. The latest models are much the same as those of a year ago. For the first time a middle-class man can go to the local automobile show without feeling an irresistible urge to exchange his car for the latest model.

Another factor tending to reduce sales is the fact that the instalment business has probably reached its fullest development. While the instalment plan was being introduced and was growing, sales increased proportionately. Now that the percentage of instalment sales to total sales is stabilized, this source of growth will be removed.

Those connected with the automobile industry point out that in the last four years the production in each year has fluctuated less than 10 per cent from the average—a record of stability that any industry might envy. If we go beneath the surface, however, we find this argument deceptive; it holds true only with respect to the production of the four calendar years in question; and there is no reason why statistical comparisons should be made in terms of calendar years in preference to any other twelve-month period. Every twelve-month period includes summer and winter, as well as all other seasonal fluctuations, and analysis shows that automobile production during the twelve months ended October 1, 1926, was 39 per cent above that of the twelve months ended March 1, 1925. The magnitude of this change was almost as great as during the 1921 depression, when production for the twelve months ended October 1, 1921, was 41 per cent below that of the preceding twelve months. The fluctuations with respect to individual companies are greater still. The sales to dealers by General Motors during the twelve months ended October 1, 1926, were 73 per cent above the sales of the same company in the twelve-month period immediately preceding. It is only by accident, then, that the calendar-year figures reflect a degree of stability which is not warranted in fact. These other figures reflect a degree of speculative uncertainty even during the stable years just elapsed which is disconcerting for the uncharted future.

The term "saturation-point" has been discredited since it has failed to materialize in accordance with the predictions of so many experts. The fact that the time of its coming has been mistakenly predicted, however, does not mean that it will never come. After all, a fair definition of the term "saturation-point" does not imply that sales will not increase, but only that the time will come when they will no longer increase more rapidly than the nation's growth in population and in economic resources.

Our generation is so convinced of the position of the automobile in our civilization that we can scarcely conceive of a decrease in its use. Let us not, however, forget the history of the bicycle. Our economic system is sound and will not rapidly change; but the form of our pleasures is transient. So far as the automobile serves an economic function its future is assured; but so far as its use represents a pastime, so far as it is a means for advertising one's social position, and so far as it is a craze, its future is uncertain, although such changes in popular taste are slow processes.

If it turns out that the automobile industry has difficult problems to meet, no industry is better equipped to cope with them, for in no other field are the leaders more resourceful or more competent in the technique of modern business. If the leaders of today's automotive industry had been in charge of the bicycle industry a quarter of a century ago, and had applied today's super-salesmanship, bicycles might have remained popular for many more years. But if the youngest and most resourceful of our great industries is facing a crisis, the whole structure of our prolonged and much-vaunted prosperity requires attention.

The Scope of Georg Brandes

GEORG BRANDES was a living refutation of the theory that it is no longer possible for a single man to take all literary knowledge as his province. In an age of particular specialization he refused to confine himself within the limits of a period, a school, or a nationality. Beginning sixty years ago at Copenhagen as a student of French aesthetics, within half a dozen years he had published his "Main Currents in Nineteenth-Century Literature," a monumental work which dealt with far broader subjects than aesthetics—it was in fact an attempt at a history of European thought and emotion during half of a great century. Thenceforth his output, at least on its literary side, was to consist of a long line of monographs, critiques, and extended biographical studies. It is safe to say that no critic has applied himself on such a scale and at the same time with such intensity. We in England or America think of his "Shakespeare," France thinks of his "Anatole France" and his studies in Voltaire, Germany of his "Goethe"—all ambitious works, and all valuable. In Scandinavia he will be remembered not only for these but for his many volumes elucidating and evaluating Northern literature. He discussed Tegnér and Holberg as well as modern authors; he was Ibsen's pioneer defender both at home and in Germany. The parallel, incidentally, between his stand on Ibsen and that of Bernard Shaw had a sequel during the war, when both men conspicuously kept their heads.

Like Ibsen he lived for many years away from his native country, making himself the center of intellectual activity in whatever capital he chose for his temporary home; and like Ibsen he both considered and proved literature to be a thing of enormous importance. He was a fighter for liberty, reason, and nature who only by chance, perhaps, found his issues on the field of literature. Even then he by no means found them in belles-lettres merely. The storm which preceded his being refused the professorship of aesthetics at the University of Copenhagen in 1872 was raised over the ideas he had been insinuating into his lectures. He was of course a Jew; and it became known quickly enough that he entertained modern, naturalistic notions of morality and art.

Doubtless it was well that he abandoned academic life and became for years a wanderer. As a glorified free-lance he came upon bigger game than he would ever have aimed at in the lecture hall; in search of ideas he learned that ideas have every sort of application—political, social, and practical as well as metaphysical. One of his first tasks had been a translation into Danish of John Stuart Mill's "The Subjection of Women"; he was to write books about Disraeli and Ferdinand Lassalle; during the war, in a brilliant controversy with Clemenceau, he stood above the battle, serving with Romain Rolland as spokesman of the European spirit; and in his last essay he sought to interpret the Jesus "myth." Doubtless at his death he seemed no longer radical to the most advanced Danes, and indeed there had long been a rather futile movement to dislodge him from his eminence as leader. He will stand as a critic whose courage and scope demonstrated what always needs to be demonstrated, the exciting significance of the imagination. His faith in America as the bearer of Western civilization gives him peculiar significance for us.

British Folly in China

By BERTRAND RUSSELL

London, February 8

IN all the long history of British blunders it would be difficult to parallel the present governmental policy in regard to China for immoral ineptitude. I say governmental policy, for the nation is emphatically not behind the Government as yet. One supposes that it will in time be influenced by means of a suitable diet of atrocities. It will be taught to believe that the Chinese eat corpses and mutilate children, and those who ask for evidence of these practices will be put in jail. As yet, however, feeling against China is confined to the Die-Hard section of the Conservative Party, and the Conservative Party, though a majority of Parliament, was a minority in the nation even in the "Red Letter" election.

From the Canton Gazette

The Mouthpiece of Militarism

Labor, with the exception of a few leaders who have been hobbled, is vigorously and determinedly opposed to the policy of sending troops, and is demanding their recall in spite of discouragement from their own headquarters. Labor quite understands that what our Government dislikes about the Chinese Nationalists is their policy of favoring trade unionism and aiming at an increase in wages. Enormous and enthusiastic meetings are being held in every part of the country demanding the recall of the expeditionary force. Even the Liberals, taking their cue from Lloyd George, are exceedingly critical of the Government's action.

From the mere standpoint of British interests what has been done is so foolish that nothing but a lust for blood could have made anyone suppose it wise. The concessions which our Foreign Office has offered to the Nationalist Government go beyond anything that would have been required to secure agreement if no forces had been dispatched. But because these forces are on their way, Mr. Chen rightly refuses to negotiate until this threat is withdrawn. The forces are being sent nominally to protect the International Settlement, but the Japanese, whose diplomacy is never caught napping, have intimated that they will not permit the troops to land in a region where their rights are the same as ours, and where their citizens are not finding the need of armed protection. If the troops land on pure Chinese territory, this of course will be in itself an act of war, and will give legal validity to the protest of Dr. Wellington Koo on behalf of the Peking Government, which relies upon the Nine-Power Treaty and the Covenant of the League of Nations.

This protest and the dismissal of Sir Francis Aglen as Inspector General of the Maritime Customs Administration are the first signs of the one good result to be expected of British folly, namely, the reunion of North and South in resistance to foreign aggression. It is to be expected that the reactionary generals, whom in spite of their illegalities and extortions the British Government is attempting to keep in power, will be abandoned by their own troops unless they make peace with the Nationalists. The British in China, absorbed as they are in bridge and polo, have not noticed that China has become a political nation, and have not stopped to reflect upon the asset which their policy affords to the Kuomintang in its party strife with Chinese conservatism. They have a curious inability to understand what sort of conduct people like and what sort they dislike. I listened the other night to an hour's address given to the Society for the Study of International Affairs, by a British diplomat lately returned from China, in the course of which he professed to explain why the British are not popular in China. He never even mentioned the massacres of Shanghai, Shameen, and Wanhsien, and when afterwards I asked him the reason for his omission he said that he did not consider they had been an important factor. The British in China are apparently unable to realize that Chinese civilians take no pleasure in being shot down treacherously without warning. Psychology is not taught at our English public schools or at Oxford.

The situation is of course one of the utmost gravity, for if once the troops land at Shanghai it is difficult to see how war can be avoided, unless by American or Japanese intervention, either of which our Government would presumably regard as an unfriendly act, though it would be welcomed by every sane man in Great Britain. If war breaks out it will entail the complete militarization of China and a prolonged struggle leading to the immediate cessation of the British-China trade, and an ultimate humiliation, even in a military sense, for though it may be easy to defeat Chinese armies it will be absolutely impossible to maintain control of China or any portion of it not within reach of naval guns.

The men to whom our Government is listening recall with pride our exploits in the Opium War, and point to the trade advantages thereby secured. They do not seem to realize that the republic of 1927 is different from the tottering Manchu empire of 1840. I could hardly have believed in the existence of such anachronistic ideas among persons with large interests in China had I not myself heard them expressed by such persons in debate.

Nor is the issue confined to China. Our Government contemplates breaking off diplomatic relations with Russia, and there is reason to think that the Poles are being incited to repeat their war of 1920. Our attempt to suppress China will of course have repercussions in India, and will increase the unrest in that country. In Great Britain itself a large proportion of those who fought in the Great War are determined never to fight again, whatever the issue. China is distant, and cannot be made to seem truly menacing.

The nation will not therefore throw itself into a struggle in the Far East with the wholeheartedness which it showed during the Great War. Unless our Government quickly comes to its senses, I foresee the loss of our Indian Empire and the accession to power in this country of a Labor Party with a very different temper from that of our Government of 1924. For the world at large the insanity of our present Government is likely to be a boon, but for England it is a disaster of the first magnitude.

These Modern Women
Woman Alone

ANONYMOUS

[We print herewith the ninth of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of women with a modern point of view. The next article will appear in The Nation for March 16.]

THE founder of my mother's family came across with Lafayette and married a Massachusetts farmer's daughter with a tradition of Indian blood. By successive removals the family pioneered into Pennsylvania, the Ohio Valley, and the prairies of Illinois. There, in 1861, my mother married a young Englishman who had just won his captaincy in the first three months of the Civil War. A few years after the close of the war I was born as the third of six children. My mother's people were mostly farming folk, though my father was admitted to the bar; he died when I was about ten, of a long-drawn-out war disability. None of the family attained any distinction beyond that of being—the men, good fighters, and the women, notable housewives, rather more forceful and inventive than the men. To account for myself, who turned out to be that blackest of black sheep to a Middle Western family, a radical-minded literary artist, I can record only that my grandfather played the flute and that a member of the French collateral branch was distinguished as a physicist and chemist.

I scarcely know why my being a radical should have proved such a cross to the rest of the family, since they were themselves shouting Methodists, black Abolitionists—my grandfather was known to have entertained Negroes at his table—and my mother a suffragist and an ardent member of the W. C. T. U., which at that time represented the most advanced social thinking among women, saving itself from ostracism only by remaining well within the orthodox religions and confining its activities to moral crusades. There were also "purity leagues" for achieving a single standard of sex behavior, and in connection with the temperance movement what would now be called "eugenic" propaganda, though that word had not then come into use. My mother saw to it that I read the pamphlets and heard the lectures pertaining to all these matters, without in the least realizing that she was thus preparing me for a radical career. I personally "sat under" Susan B. Anthony, Frances Willard, and Anna Shaw.

With this background it was inevitable that I should become a fighting feminist. But I cannot make clear my approach and method in regard to this problem of my generation without describing my own position in the family as an unwanted, a personally resented child. Probably few families in that age of enforced maternity were without some such member; but in fewer still did the intrusion take on such proportions of offense. Not that I ever blamed my mother, when I came to know them, for not wanting a child under the circumstances to which I was born. Nor do I, sorely as it hurt at the time, any longer resent that I should so early and so sharply have had my status as alien and intruder forced upon me. As you will see, it was my poor mother who lost the most in the conflict of irreconcilable temperaments never modulated by personal sympathy. Could she possibly have anticipated that I should end by being included in a list of prominent feminists, nothing would have pleased her so much; the trouble was that with that terrible pre-natal bias between us, she could never by any whipping-up of a sense of duty grow to like me, and the rest of the family took its tone from her. Long before I came to an intellectual understanding of the situation I had accepted as fact that I was not liked and could not expect the normal concessions of affection. By that adaptive instinct which still intolerably wrings my heart when I see it operating in young children, I had learned that it was only by pushing aside all considerations of liking and insisting on whatever fundamental rightness inhered in a particular situation, that I could secure a kind of factual substitute for family feeling and fair play. This began so early that though I can recall many occasions of mystified hurt at being rebuffed in the instinctive child's appeal, I can recall no time in which I did not have to conceal that hurt in order to bring all a child's wit and intelligence to bear on making good my right to be treated, factually at least, as a lawful member of the family. Out of this I developed very early an uncanny penetration into the fundamental ethics of personal situations which my mother was too just to refuse and not always clever enough to evade. By the time I was old enough to discuss our relationships with my mother the disposition to seek for logical rather than emotional elements had become so fixed that I had even made myself believe that being liked was not important. I had, at least, learned to do without it.

All this must be told in order that the bias and the method of my feminism may be understood. For life played an ironic trick on my mother. The pretty and darling daughters were taken away, and only the unwished-for ugly duckling left, between the oldest and the youngest sons. As if this were not enough, by the time the elder son was ripe for college there began to be signs that the daughter and not the son was the clever one. After my father's death my mother's affectional interests, as is often the case with widows, gathered and intensified around my older brother, who proved a good son and a good citizen, but without any distinguishing gifts. When in college he had, chiefly I suspect in response to my mother's passionate wish, displayed literary and forensic tastes which he was unable to support without liberal contributions from mother and sister. These he accepted at first gingerly, and finally with such freedom that many a theme, many a quip and paragraph which appeared in the college journal over his name had been wrung out of me by such concessions as sisters do to this day obtain from older brothers by ministering to masculine complacency. Although my mother was often a party to our traffic and occasional squabbles over it, she was always able, when the things appeared, to accept them as evidence of what she so much wished. After her death I found a scrapbook in which they were all carefully arranged with my brother's name in her handwriting underneath. And lest any of the generation for whom the woman's right to the product of her own talent is completely established should think this an unusual situation, I recommend the reading of the current if out-moded novels of that period, such, for example, as the novels of Madame Sarah Grand or May Sinclair's "Mary Olivier." For the greater part of the nineteenth century, in fact, it was not only usual but proper for parents openly to deplore that the sons had not inherited talents inconveniently bestowed upon the daughters.

I seem always to have known that I would write. Probably there was evidence of my having the necessary endowment, had there been anybody able to recognize literary talent, or tell me what to do about it. The attitude of the family was crushing. "What makes you think you can write?" In truth, I did not know. Looking back on the idea of a literary career which prevailed in the Middle West of that period, it was probably as well for me that nobody knew. I won a college degree by dint of insisting on it, and by crowding its four years into two and a half. My brother had the full four years. That I got so much was partly a concession to the necessity of my earning a living. With a college education I could teach, and teaching was regarded then as a liberal profession, eminently suited to women. Being plain and a little "queer," it was hoped rather than expected that I would marry. My queerness consisted, at that time, in entertaining some of the ideas that have got me elected to this list, in stoutly maintaining against all contrary opinion that I would some day write, and in the—to my family—wholly inexplicable habit of resting my case on its inherent rightness rather than upon the emotional reactions it gave rise to.

The summer I was out of college my mother decided to go West with my brother, so that he might "take up land" and grow with the country, taking me with her as being still too young for self-support. No use inquiring now whether this was a good move for me. Before the Pacific Coast filled up with Middle Westerners it was a gorgeous, an exciting place to be. Probably it proved a retardation of my literary career and a stimulus to radicalism. The immediate result was that I married. My mother had sunk all her little capital in giving my brother his start; there was no place in the home for me, and no money to prepare me for any happy way of supporting myself. I taught a couple of years, not very successfully. And, anyway, I wished to be married. Contrary to the popular conception about literary women, I like domestic life and have a genuine flair for cooking. And I wanted children profoundly.

I still intended to write, but never in my life having met a professional literary person there was no one to tell me that the two things were incompatible. Under ordinary circumstances they are not. What I did not in the least realize was that the circumstances were not ordinary. I married a man with social and educational background not unlike my own; a man I could thoroughly respect for his personal quality, quite apart from any achievement. There seemed no reason why, had I been what I appeared to my family, and to my husband no doubt, the marriage should not have proved successful in every particular. What I appeared was an average young person, clever and a little odd, but not so odd that a house to keep and a baby every two years wouldn't restore me to entire normality. True, my health was not good. All my mother's babies had been sickly; I as the sickliest had always been the first to "catch" every childish ailment, and as it was not the custom in those days to send for the doctor until you knew what was the matter with the patient I seldom received medical attention. But no one had ever suggested that this need interfere with marriage and having children. It was a superstition left over from my mother's generation that ill health in women was cured by having children. Nor did I realize how compelling the creative urge would become in me. Had I even suspected it I would not have supposed it a bar to marriage. I thought that two intelligent young people could do about as they liked with life. But, like myself, my young husband was without preparation for maintaining a household. At the end of twelve years we were still living in a town of about 300 inhabitants on an income inadequate to reasonable comfort, with an invalid child.

My first baby came in the second year and left me a tortured wreck. I know now that I did not have proper medical treatment, but at the time nothing much was thought of such things. My memory of the first seven or eight years of marriage is like some poor martyr's memory of the wheel and the rack, all the best things of marriage obscured by a fog of drudgery impossible to be met and by recurrent physical anguish. For before I had discovered the worst that had happened to me I had tried a second time to have a child, unsuccessfully. Brought up as I was, in possession of what passed for eugenic knowledge, it had never occurred to me that the man I had married would be less frank about his own inheritance than I had been about mine—much to his embarrassment, for nice girls were seldom frank at that time. I who had entered motherhood with the highest hopes and intentions had to learn too late that I had borne a child with tainted blood. I had to find it all out by myself. My husband's family exchanged glances, and remained silent. My mother said: "I don't know what you have done, daughter, to have such a judgment upon you." But I, brutally and indelicately, as I was given to understand, insisted upon uncovering family history until I found out. I said to my husband: "Why did you never tell me?" He said: "Because it never occurred to me." At home, he told me, they were all brought up never to refer to the obvious handicap. That was the well-bred Christian way of the 1890's. As for my own family, from beginning to end they never ceased to treat me as under a deserved chastisement.

In a way this tragic end of my most feminine adventure brought the fulfilment of my creative desire, which had begun to be an added torment by repression. Caring for a hopelessly invalid child is an expensive business. I had to write to make money. In the end I was compelled to put my child in a private institution where she was happier and better cared for than I could otherwise manage. My husband's family were good sports. They never forgot the birthdays and Christmases, and the probability that there might be normal human reactions. To my own family who demanded somewhat accusingly what they should say, I said: "You can say I have lost her." Which was true and a great relief to them. My mother died shortly after, but was never quite reconciled to my refusal to accept my trouble as a clear sign of God's displeasure. So for sixteen years.

Released thus to the larger life which opened to me with literary success, I found plenty of reasons for being a feminist in the injustices and impositions endured by women under the general idea of their intellectual inferiority to men. What I have just related are the facts that gave color and direction to my feminist activities. But I must go back a little to explain the kind of thing that got me called a radical, which was not what is called a radical today. I was neither a Bolshevik nor a Communist, not even a Socialist or free lover. I thought much that was said at that time about Home and Mother, sentimental tosh; I thought it penalized married love too much to constitute the man she loved the woman's whole horizon, intellectual, moral, and economic. I thought women should be free to make their contribution to society by any talent with which they found themselves endowed, and be paid for it at rates equal to the pay of men. I thought everything worth experiencing was worth talking about; I inquired freely into all sorts of subjects. I got myself read out of the Methodist church by organizing, along in the nineties, the first self-conscious enterprise of what has been called the Little Theater movement and acting in its plays. Worst of all, I talked freely of art as though it had a vital connection with living. One example of the sort of reactions an unbridled radical such as I was had to face must suffice. That was the beginning of various movements for applying the social wisdom of the more fortunate classes to the problems of the underprivileged—juvenile courts, probation officers, big brother and sister associations, and in particular, the activity finally objectified as the court of domestic relations, in which I was particularly interested. I had spoken freely and publicly about the necessity of bringing those unlearned in life into more or less compulsory compliance with our best experience. Just why this should figure as an offense to anybody I am still at a loss to know; but the next time I went to my mother's house, I discovered that there had been a family council, and it was put to me that, while the family did not attempt to dictate what I should say away from the neighborhood of the family, I must understand that in that neighborhood, and especially under the family roof I must refrain from all mention of so objectionable a subject as public remedies for private relations, or find my mother's door forever closed to me. Not a word, you see, about the incredible private tragedy which had come to me for lack of a public remedy! . . . Oh, yes, I took it, standing, for the same reason that I took it the day my pretty young sister was buried and my mother flung away from me and cried aloud on God for taking Jenny and leaving me. It wasn't until I caught the family—what was left of it—trying to put over on the younger generation the same repressions and limitations they had practiced upon me that I blew up. Suddenly I found the younger generation on my side.

As for not being under the necessity of being liked, which began as a defense, it has become part of my life philosophy. I see now that too many of the impositions of society upon women have come of their fear of not being liked. Under disguising names of womanliness, of tact, of religion even, this humiliating necessity, this compulsive fear goes through all our social use like mould, corrupting the bread of life. It is this weakness of women displayed toward their sons which has fostered the demanding attitude of men toward them. It puts women as a class forever at the mercy of an infantile expectation grown into an adult convention. So I have made a practice of standing out against male assumption of every sort, especially their assumption of the importance of masculine disapproval—more than anything else against their assumption that they have a right to be "managed." But it is the women I am aiming at, women and their need for detachment from the personal issue. At present the price for refusing to "manage" men is high, but not too high for a self-respecting woman to pay.

Milk—A Public Utility

By WILLIAM JOURDAN RAPP

IT is strange that in the United States, a country which prides itself on its high standards of public health, there is so little appreciation of the importance of a cheap milk supply to the health of a community; particularly its children. Most cities have elaborate and effective organizations to see that the sanitary quality and chemical contents of milk are maintained at high standards. But where is the city that interests itself in the price at which milk is to be sold?

In the long run the price of milk, which determines the amount that will be consumed, is a more important factor from the point of view of health than bacteriological or chemical content. Of course, it would be ridiculous to lower sanitary and chemical standards in order to reduce price. Fortunately sanitary methods of dairy management react favorably upon the milk-producing powers of cows. A cow will produce more and richer milk if housed in an airy and well-lighted stable and kept clean than if forced to live in filth in some dark hole. The problem of reducing the price of milk is primarily one of eliminating waste in collection, transportation, and distribution, and in doing away with the huge profits of the milk distributors. In short, the milk supply, like the water supply, should be operated as a public utility, for service and not for gain.

This article presents a plan for the reorganization of New York's milk industry, by which the city may achieve an adequate and cheap as well as a safe supply of milk. As the milk problem facing most of the large cities of the country is similar to that facing New York, although naturally not so immense or complicated, this plan may also point the way for other communities.

A survey in 1920 by the then Commissioner of Health of New York City which covered 11,000 families showed "that two cups and one ounce of milk" was the average received by each child daily, "an amount totally inadequate, markedly so at the ages of one and two years"; that in over 98 per cent of the homes investigated "substitutes in the forms of tea, coffee, cereals, and other drinks were used"; and "that many mothers are compelled by the reason of the high cost of milk to seek these deleterous substitutes." Visiting nurses and others in a position to known claim that today conditions are worse.

Largely as a result of this investigation there were introduced in 1920 into the New York State Legislature two bills, the purpose of which was to remedy these conditions. The first bill provided for a State milk commission with power to control the price paid for milk to the farmer and the price charged by the distributor to the consumer. This meant giving to a commission of political appointees tremendous powers with no corresponding responsibilities.

The other bill provided for the entrance of the city government into the milk-distributing business, but the amount of money which was to be appropriated for this enterprise made it impossible to hope for any but the slightest relief even if the venture proved successful.

Nothing came of either bill.

At the present time and for some time past there has been no real competition in the milk-distributing industry in New York City. A number of years ago all the distributors were organized in an association known as the New York Milk Conference Board, Inc. The ostensible purpose of this association was to enable the distributors to bargain collectively with their organized employees and the organized farmers, but it also served as a bureau for propaganda against any change in the status quo of the industry and virtually set the price of milk both to the farmer and the consumer. The selling price was sufficient to allow the smallest and least efficient distributor to survive. A company handling a half-million quarts of milk a day charged the same price as a company handling five thousand quarts, although the cost of operation per quart of milk of the larger company was much less. The larger companies found it more profitable to allow the smaller companies to survive and set a selling price based on their relatively high costs of operation than to undersell and drive them out of business. This system gave the distributors the one great advantage they could secure from a monopoly, the ability to set a high selling price, and at the same time it preserved the appearance of competition.

Today, although the Milk Conference Board is no longer the powerful organization it was, the same general situation exists. With the smashing of the power of the dairymen's union which conducted the strike of 1916, and of the milk drivers' and handlers' unions which tied up the city's milk supply in 1920, the two great distributing corporations, Borden's Farm Products Company and Sheffield Farms Company, no longer found it necessary to work so closely together. Both have formed company unions among their employees. Borden's buy their milk from the farmers through the Dairymen's League Cooperative Association, and Sheffield through the Sheffield Farm Producers' Association. Their wage scales, prices to farmers, and prices to consumers coordinate perfectly.

It is interesting to note that during the last few years there has been a rapid consolidation of milk and ice-cream companies in various parts of the country. The tendency toward monopoly is pronounced, but it is a monopoly whose economies result in added profits for the promoters and not in cheaper milk for the consumer. The National Dairy Products Corporation, which recently merged with the Sheffield Farms, Inc., of New York, and the Supplee, Wills, Jones Company of Philadelphia, is operating in more than 1,600 cities in thirteen States from New York westward to Nebraska and southward to Tennessee. The operations include both ice-cream and dairy lines.

The average price per quart of milk paid to the farmer in the New York milk shed is about 5½ cents. The average price to the consumer of loose milk is 11 cents per quart, and of bottled milk 15 to 16 cents. (Grade A milk, which is produced under higher sanitary standards, is 18 cents, and is sold only in bottles. The great bulk of the milk supply is made up of the so-called Grade B milk.) For the task of collecting and distributing, the milk companies demand from once to twice as much as the farmer gets. That this margin results in large profits is evident from a study of the financial histories of the two great milk companies. Their present enormous capitalization has been built almost entirely out of profits, and each year they pay their stockholders handsome dividends.

Every person who has studied the milk-distributing problem in New York City agrees that tremendous savings would result if the industry were operated as a monopoly. At present there are in many dairy communities from two to four creameries owned by as many different distributing companies where one would be adequate. There are forty pasteurizing plants in the city and 450 in the seven States and two provinces of Canada which make up New York City's milk shed. These could easily be consolidated into a score of plants in the city. In Brooklyn there are ten bottling and pasteurizing plants doing the work which the largest of them could do alone if developed to its maximum capacity. Only one plant in the whole city makes use of the latest labor-saving devices for pasteurizing and bottling milk. The methods used in some of the smaller plants were antiquated fifteen years ago. The waste involved in the city-delivery system is known to everyone. Monopoly would eliminate this duplication of work. On this point there is no disagreement. On the question of what sort of monopoly it should be and how it should be administered there are honest differences of opinion.

A private monopoly, privately operated under government control, and a government monopoly with government operation are the systems most often suggested as solutions for New York City's milk-supply problem. American cities have had experience with both in connection with gas, electricity, water, and transportation. Adapted to a milk supply they would present added difficulties, although either one would be a vast improvement over the system at present in operation. But there is another plan which combines most of the merits of those mentioned and eliminates many of their weaknesses. This plan provides that the city shall purchase the entire milk-distributing machinery through an issue of city bonds and the formation of a milk corporation to operate the city-owned monopoly. Legislation can be passed compelling the present milk companies to sell their properties at a price fixed by the courts.

The board of directors of the new monopolistic corporation will consist of seven members, one representing the workers in the industry other than executives and technical experts, one representing the farmers selling milk to the corporation, one representing the executives and technical experts, and four representing the public, two appointed by the mayor of the city and two by the governor of the State from lists submitted by the three members representing the workers, executives, and farmers.

This board will be responsible for the policies of the corporation. It will select a president who will be the chief executive in charge of all operations and responsible only to the board. The board will set the rate of wages and the price of milk to the farmers. The price of milk to the consumers, when the milk corporation takes over the industry, will be the average of the preceding year. Twenty per cent of the surplus, after operating expenses and interest and amortization on the bonded indebtedness are paid, will be divided among the workers, executives, and technical experts, each sharing according to their yearly salary; and 20 per cent among the farmers, each sharing in proportion to the amount of milk he has sold the corporation. The other 60 per cent of the surplus will go toward reducing the price of milk. If a sudden depreciation in the value of money should necessitate a rise in the price of milk to prevent the corporation from operating at a loss, the board of directors will have the power to order the necessary increase.

Such a plan will help the position of the farmers by giving them a voice in the management of the corporation to which they sell their milk. The board of directors will be in a favorable position to undertake an impartial study of the cost of milk production, thus enabling it to set a fair price to the farmers. All the figures available at the present time on this subject are either prejudiced for or against the farmer to such an extent as to make them worthless. By paying the farmers enough to make dairying profitable and allowing them to share in the surplus the city will be assured an adequate milk supply.

The corporation can do much to decrease the cost of milk production. The single largest cost item in milk production is "feed." The corporation can go into the feed business and substantially reduce the price by eliminating numerous middlemen and using its creameries as distributing centers. This policy could be extended to include other farm supplies.

The workers' status will also be improved. At present the employers, interested only in their own profits, fight every effort of the workers to improve their conditions, granting concessions only when compelled to do so. Under the plan suggested, the employer will be a corporation whose only object is public service, and in the formation of whose labor policy the workers will play a part through their representative on the board of directors. The workers' right to share in the surplus will be a continual incentive toward personal efficiency.

The technical experts and executives, other than those financially interested in the companies, are at present poorly paid and at all times subject to dismissal without a hearing, which in their case is a particular hardship since the field in which they can sell their services is extremely limited. The plan proposed offers them representation on the board of directors, and a share in the surplus for which their knowledge and efforts will be largely responsible.

To the people of the city the plan guarantees a milk supply operated for public service. Adulterated and bootleg milk result from the desire for profits on the part of the dealers. The Health Department can easily control the milk supply coming into the city through the milk corporation. The public will have a majority of representatives on the board of directors.

The people of New York realize the necessity of a reform in the milk-distributing industry. Milk was one of the leading issues in the recent gubernatorial campaign. Politicians have endeavored to make capital out of the situation while doing nothing toward remedying it. It is with the purpose of giving public opinion a definite program to consider that this plan is presented.

Some Men Run for Office: Calvin Sits

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, February 18

THE most interesting development of the past few days in Washington has been the extraordinary change in opinion, among the relatively small number of persons here capable of a detached view in such matters, concerning Mr. Coolidge and the 1928 Republican nomination. Three weeks ago the feeling in this class was practically unanimous not only that such is the power of the Presidency and such this President's particular and peculiar journalistic and financial support that he could, if he desired, be renominated without trouble and regardless of the third-term tradition. It was further felt with almost equal strength that not only did Mr. Coolidge conceal behind his pallid exterior a real craving to stay in the White House longer than any of his predecessors but that in his own quaint, armadillo way he was earnestly engaged in turning every little political trick he knows calculated to help him toward that desired end.

Convictions of judicious observers along this line were undoubtedly deepened by the general attitude of those here who keep in closest touch with the Coolidge circle and by considerable contributory political evidence, such as the insistent repetition in the Administration organs—but loudest in the Hearst string—that "his next will be Mr. Coolidge's 'second elective term' and no question of a third term can arise"; by the retention at Presidential request of the National Committee Chairmanship by the defeated but devoted Butler of Massachusetts, his intimate friend and adviser; by the reported resumption of cordial relations with the unfortunate Slemp, justly famous as a Southern Negro-delegate expert; by the statements that in their sections the desire for a continuance of Mr. Coolidge is enthusiastic and unanimous, given out by patronage-hunting Republican National Committeemen from the South and lame duck Senators and Congressmen doomed to pass out of the picture unless something is shortly done for them—and by other things.

When it was all summed up it seemed a pretty convincing case. Also reflection that the big Republican States with the dominating delegations were still in the hands of the business influences that have never been quite so happy as under the Coolidge-Mellon regime, made the chances seem remote for the Lowden or any other movement to gain real impetus no matter how strongly the Corn Belt revolts or how loudly the farmer organizations scream over the expected veto of the McNary-Haugen bill. Against a determined Coolidge in the White House with newspaper and business support unshaken it seemed impossible to question his convention control. Unquestionably that was the belief; but it has changed. It is conceded that Mr. Coolidge has himself neither done nor said anything to any one at any time to bring this about. It is further conceded that neither Dr. Butler's loudly intoned opinion that because of the third-term tradition Mr. Coolidge would not run nor the statement of the hard-boiled Moses that he had not believed for the last two years that Mr. Coolidge would run have been responsible for the change, though beyond doubt they started the thinking in the new direction. Also the reprinting in many newspapers of the emphatic language of Theodore Roosevelt when after his election he said that though it meant less than eight years for him he would consider the term to which he had just been chosen his second, as in his judgment the American people were concerned about "the substance, not the form" of this matter, certainly had enough effect to make it clear that the "second-elective-term" nonsense cannot be made to stick and that if Mr. Coolidge is again chosen it will be because the people want to disregard the third-term tradition in his favor.

But perhaps more than all these the change in viewpoint has been brought about by the general realization in Washington as this session of Congress draws to its close that the amazing feebleness of the man as a leader has once more been strikingly demonstrated. This time practically all the recommendations in the Presidential message of last December have been disregarded. Those that got through have done so casually and in a more or less accidental manner and are not important enough to be easy to remember. Two conspicuous Presidential appointments—Wood to the Interstate Commerce Commission and Tilson for the Georgia federal bench—were humiliatingly rejected by a Republican Senate. The disarmament gesture has been shown to be as meaningless and futile as the ridiculous tax-refund proposal of last November. It turned out to be not a well-thought-out plan on which, as is the invariable custom, the other important nations concerned had been confidentially sounded out through the usual diplomatic channels and their reactions known in advance, but merely another half-baked proposal which has resulted in nothing save a mortifying rejection. Finally, to cap the climax, the bitterly denounced McNary-Haugen bill, to which so far as he can be violently opposed to anything Mr. Coolidge was violently opposed, passed the Senate by a wide margin and has gone through the House by a vote of 214 to 178 notwithstanding every Administration effort to check it.

Altogether it is an astounding record of futility for so short a session—or rather it would be for another President. For Mr. Coolidge it is typical of every other session since he has been in his present place. In this as in the others he has run true to form so far as achievement is concerned. In the past he has survived these records of almost complete and at times abject failure without serious political damage to himself. However, each time makes it a little more difficult and it is probably true that the Administration's minus score at the present session has had more to do with the change of opinion as to his renomination than Butler, Borah, Moses, and McNary-Haugen combined.

Anyhow the change has occurred. An old Maryland boss used to say that twenty-four hours is a lifetime in politics; opinion may swing back again, but it is none the less true that the present view of "the talent" is that Mr. Coolidge will not be a candidate to succeed himself. It is not argued that he would not like to continue as President. It is not argued that he cannot be renominated if he makes the effort. The argument does not turn on that question. It is in brief that Dr. Butler is right and that Roosevelt was right; that no President and no party can afford to risk the anti-third-term tradition without a vastly more unanimous and insistent party and popular demand than now exists for Mr. Coolidge or is likely to arise; that a nomination for a third term made through the use of the Presidential prestige and power would, as Dr. Butler says, prove fatal; that Mr. Coolidge is far too clear-headed a politician not to see these fundamental facts or to take any such chance. He is, of course, flattered at the talk of him for a third term. He would like to go down in history as a President who could have had a renomination for a third term but was too wise to try for it. In all probability he will want general recognition of the fact that he could secure renomination before he makes his renunciation, but when it becomes plain that the nomination is his for the taking he will then state, as did Roosevelt, that it is the "substance, not the form" with which the American people are concerned, that the custom limiting the occupant of the White House to two terms is a wise one and bowing to it he eliminates himself as a candidate. That is the idea now. That is what the wise boys say he will in the end do, although it is admitted there is probably not a human being in whom he has confided. Further it is admitted that probably he does not yet know himself what he is going to do. Further, logical and reasonable as seems the argument, maybe he isn't going to do that at all. What he is doing now in reference to this personal political situation is what he has done all his life with every other political situation—simply sitting still with no ideas or plans or decisions or program, just waiting for events or persons or things to push him one way or the other. And it must be admitted it has worked pretty well—this "sit still" method—with him in the past.

Children and Art

By KATHERINE ANNE PORTER

IT began as an international show of children's drawing, painting, and clay modeling, but when I went to the Whitney Studio Club they explained that it had turned out to be a joint exhibition of the Mexican and American schools only. There were two rooms lined with delirious spotches of color. Being familiar with the work of Mexican children and knowing nothing about the new school of painting founded by American children, I said: "This is the Mexican room."

It was the American room. Children are the true internationals. They don't know the meaning of the word art. In Mexico the individual child learns the word in his own season. In this country the teachers are inclined to protect him from this knowledge as long as possible. For the past five years plastic art has been in the curriculum of every public school in the Mexican Republic, a serious item in their national program of education. This collection comes from schools in the country and in small towns.

The American pictures are largely the work of students in private schools, in experimental courses conducted by individuals. Among those represented are the Ethical Culture School, the Walden School, Elizabeth Irwin's classes in Manhattan Public School No. 61 and Bronx Public School No. 45, under the guidance of Angelo Patri, all in New York City. Others represented are the Rosemary Junior School in Greenwich, Connecticut; the Woodward School in Cambridge, Massachusetts; the Tower Hill School in Wilmington, Delaware; the Parker School in Chicago, and the Keith Country Day School in Rockford, Illinois.

I expected to make interesting comparisons between the temperaments of the two races of school-children. On examination, I saw differences of costume, distinct preferences in subject matter, a slightly stronger feeling for design and more patience in the Mexican pictures, a certain lack of detail and an ampler sweep of line in the American pictures. No other important differences. Of course we know that academic painters of all nations paint the human body in so uniform a style that it is hard to tell a German from an Englishman. The modernists of all countries also resemble one another to the extent that they all appear slightly French. But children, strictly speaking, are not artists and, unless they are trained, might be expected occasionally to strike upon a new notion of the human shape, or see it in some fashion approximating the vision of his elders. Not at all. Children all draw figures alike, and they all resemble gingerbread men a trifle warped in the baking. And this satisfies them until some one tells them it is wrong, or they grow up.

Looking at these jocund, delightful, perfectly irresponsible records of what a child sees and thinks, and what he feels about color, you can hardly blame certain grown-up artists for struggling to regain this paradise. They call it being primitive, and name it a virtue. But a primitive is one not fully equipped who does his best; he does not throw away a developed technique in order to be simple once more. These children are true primitives. There is an earth-shaking amount of energy, concentration, and effort in these pictures—cheerful, happy effort unvexed by aesthetic problems. Each one has done his gorgeous best, and it is an encouraging spectacle. Some of these paintings contain many elements of art. In one there will be revealed a fine sense of movement and rhythm, another has harmonious color, many have space and atmosphere. I might go on naming things it is natural to look for in a painting, but the teachers avoid placing emphasis on the thing produced, they do not criticize with the vocabulary of art and neither should I. They do not set a target of excellence for the child to aim at, he is not set to copying objects, but is left free to evoke his own images. This serves another purpose too, in revealing the range of interest in the individual, his sense of color and form, and what it is that catches his proper eye. All of them reveal a talent for human contacts, they imply a potential equipment for effective living. It is constructive work for the child and furnishes living data for the teacher.

If I feel that on the average the Mexican children have done a little better than the American in the Whitney Club show it may be because I know them better; I saw the very beginning of this work in Mexico, which amounted there to a revolution in educational methods; I saw their first exhibitions, and I know the type of tiny rural school they came from. I have seen the children. There is a certain hardihood in their pictures of fruits and plants and animals; in their small-town street scenes they do funerals with gusto; they write "soap" on the upturned box before the fruit vendor's stand. One child illustrates his physiology lesson, choosing digestion, a homely subject at best. He illuminates it with a charming picture of a boy and a girl eating ears of corn. This is his world, and he sees it in admirably clear terms. An American child records his loving memory of the beach and boardwalk at Atlantic City in a composition that in an adult would argue satirical gifts of no mean order. There is no death in the funerals, only a procession, and there is no real gloom in the little American boy's picture of people sitting carefully in church.

I believed that color was heaven's unique gift to the Mexican child. Give him three colors and he will invent a new rainbow. So, and I say it with triumph, will the American child. These young children who paint with such vigor and splash are not artists. They do not need to be; they are our future, and some of them are the artists of our future. It is not necessary to choose them in advance out of this exhibition.

In the Driftway

IN recording the successful concert in Paris of the ten-year-old violinist Yehudi Menuhen, the newspapers all acclaim him as "an American boy." If Yehudi should be "rounded up" in a "red plot," it is a safe guess that he would be "a Jewish boy of San Francisco."

* * * * *

UP to recently the Drifter always felt a certain resentment against Thomas A. Edison for knowing so much. But in looking at a photographic reproduction of one of the answers written by Mr. Edison to the questions asked him on his eightieth birthday it appears that he wrote "prevading" when he meant "pervading." In the question that provoked this answer the reporter spelled Jehovah with a "g"—a small one at that. The Drifter, who never was much of a speller himself, feels better.

* * * * *

IN The Nation of February 9 the Drifter alluded to a contest to determine the ten most beautiful things in New York City and set down some stray thoughts of his own on the subject. Some of the Drifter's choices were violently resented, as he intended they should be. A correspondent, signing himself—or herself more probably—"A Friend" writes:

> When my dear Drifter named the statue of Sherman, at the southeast corner of Central Park, as one of the ten most beautiful sights in New York, it was certainly one of those cases when Homer nods. I have prayed fervently for many years that the leaning woman would fall, relieve herself from her strain, and get out of her misery. And as for old Ruthless himself—the arch destroyer of homes and churches, the most despicable character in American history, who led his heroic van against helpless women and children—well, I'd better keep quiet! When I see him complacent and egotistical, I feel like saying: "So like Sherman—to sit while the woman stands!"
>
> Usually the Drifter drifts my way. But how one can pass up St. Thomas's, the Chapel of the Intercession, the Jumel Mansion, and choose the St.-Gaudens monstrosity—it argues the baneful effects of post-Volsteadism!

* * * * *

LET "A Friend" take comfort. That was not the worst mistake the Drifter made. He recalled a wonderful panorama of lower Manhattan, the East River, and the Brooklyn Bridge at night which he had seen from the back windows of a house on Columbia Heights, Brooklyn. But he did not want his two or three million readers to bother the landlord by ringing the bell and asking to see the view. So he said it was to be seen from the foot of Montague Street. Doubt and curiosity led him to the foot of Montague Street later to verify his statement. Only a pitiful fraction of the Brooklyn Bridge was visible, while the East River was obscured by docks and warehouses.

* * * * *

ANYHOW the contest has been decided and a jury has awarded prizes to the five school-children and five adults judged to have submitted the best answers. The name of John D. Drifter does not appear among either the school-children or the adults. This is not ununderstandable, as the Drifter forgot—as he predicted he would—to send in his list. The largest number of votes in the beauty contest went, in the order named, to the following: Statue of Liberty, the Woolworth Building, various spots in Central Park, the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, St. Patrick's Cathedral, various views in Prospect Park, the Brooklyn Bridge, and certain paintings in the Metropolitan Museum of Art. By this it appears that the Drifter was a pretty good prophet. He predicted that the Woolworth Building would be on almost every list submitted and that the Brooklyn Bridge would also be popular. But the Drifter never even thought of the Statue of Liberty, which is at the very top of the list. The Drifter surmises that it was the school-children carried Miss Liberty to victory. Few adults could have voted thus unless they were confusing the statue with the magazine of the same name. For among us grown-ups liberty, either in bronze or in life, has been so completely under a cloud in recent years that the Drifter may perhaps be pardoned for overlooking it.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Only of Christ's Race

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I came here from Czarist Russia, to graduate from the liberal arts college of an American university. I attempted to earn my living through my knowledge of foreign languages and literature—that proved thoroughly unsatisfactory. I learned stenography, for it, I had heard, was a sure way for any and every young woman to earn her living. With the assurance of my newly acquired knowledge, I proceeded to scan the "Female Help Wanted" columns of our dailies. The ads that say "state religion" or "Christian firm" I did not answer. I answered the ads of employment bureaus, and was told "Sorry, but they want Christians only."

Now, I am only of Christ's race. What is to be done?

New York, February 7 UNEMPLOYED

What Mexico Is Doing

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the summary of the Mexican-American oil and land controversy which you abstracted from the Foreign Policy Association Information Service appears the statement that "Article 27 of the Mexican Constitution of 1917 containing the new dispositions with respect to the rights of foreigners to petroleum deposits in Mexico marked a complete departure from regulations previously governing the rights. Under the old mining codes of 1884, 1892, and 1909, . . ." Literally the statement is true, but it tells only half the truth.

The "old" mining codes of 1884, 1892, and 1909 themselves marked a revolutionary departure from the centuries-old Spanish-American fundamental laws under which the state owned all subsoil deposits. The mining codes of 1884, 1892, and 1909 were passed under the notorious Diaz regime. In 1910 Diaz was overthrown. The Constitution of 1917 therefore merely tries to get back to the basis existing before the days of Diaz. Americans, steeped in the Anglo-Saxon conception of property rights, cannot understand the position of the Mexican Government until they appreciate that the Mexicans are trying to get back where they originally were. Whether they can do so by the proposed methods is merely a technical, legal question.

A similar criticism should be made of the summary of the land question. The impression is given that the Government is trying something new. Again it is merely trying to go back to old conditions. The Indian villagers held lands in common. These were wrested from them, sometimes by force, sometimes by fraud, just as were the old commons in England a couple of centuries ago. The present land laws are trying to reestablish the old ejidos. Whether or not they properly protect innocent owners of lands affected is of course a question to be properly threshed out.

There are other unfortunate turns of phrasing in the summary. For example, in the passage quoted reference is made to "the new dispositions with respect to the rights of foreigners to petroleum deposits," giving the impression that Mexican nationals were not equally affected. Of course this is not so.

Mexico City, February 1 WALTER FRANK

New Mexico? Coolidge? Doheny!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: New Mexico, suffering from a momentary inferiority complex, proposes calling itself "Coolidge." This sense of inferiority probably arises from the cloud that has recently darkened the name of its illustrious son, Mr. Albert Fall, that great authority on politics, oil, and morality. To change the name of the State from New Mexico to Coolidge is a left-handed way of informing the world that in spite of all that has passed the great native prodigy has been right all the time. Why not, dear New Mexicans, have the outspoken courage of your convictions, throw aside half-way measures, and name your State as it should be named—Doheny.

Mexico City, February 5 CARLETON BEALS

Referred to F. B. K.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I cannot sleep. In the Manchester Guardian is a report of a speech in Rome in which Mussolini made the following attack on our Constitution: "It is absolutely logical that the outside world of democratic liberalism and plutocratic clannishness should be against us. To the responsible authorities in foreign states we say: 'You will have to go through what we have gone through. If you want to live, you must do away with garrulous parliamentary institutions.'"

Is not that expression "plutocratic clannishness" proof positive that Mussolini is thinking chiefly of America? And are there not Italians living in Mexico? Is it not the plain duty of Secretary Kellogg and Mr. Doheny to annex Mexico before this plot can go further?

Brooklyn, January 31 HENRY NEUMANN

Through Flags to Freedom

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In Mexico, where few of the working class can read or write, a flag has been promoted into a workers' literature. The Mexican Federation of Labor is known as "C. R. O. M." In times of strikes the workers hang over their doorways the "C. R. O. M." flag, about a foot square, red, with a black diagonal stripe containing the initials CROM. The flag speaks a language read by all. Through this flag, evident in front of thousands of homes during a strike, the workers gain assurance of strength, "scabs" are impressed with the extent of unionization, and local politicians are warned of the political power in the hands of labor.

The American Federation of Labor should follow suit. The flag's color need not be red—that color might be considered taboo in this land where freedom is waived. I can imagine no more potent spiritual weapon for labor than the adoption of a union flag. During the garment workers' strike many streets on New York's East Side would have been decorated with flags from every window of every tenement. Consider the effect in West Virginia during a coal strike. Through a flag the workers might be restored to a feeling of power. By a symbol our workers might indicate to ward-heelers that labor can be articulate even in a literate land like ours.

Mexico City, February 15 ERNEST MORRIS

Noblesse Oblige

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: William Hard's article on the urge toward empire is a fine contribution to herd psychology. It seems queer that those who, because of oppression, left their old homes in Europe, should become empire-builders in their adopted country. May we not ask, Is the white race unable to follow a different course? Are we doomed to final extermination?

I am reminded of the great Russian who when passing some peasant boys took off his hat and greeted them. Whereupon his companion asked why he greeted those ignorant peasant children. To which he answered: "I am supposed to be on a higher intellectual plane than they. It is therefore my duty to teach them courtesy."

Ravinia, Illinois, February 3 JENS JENSEN

A Use for Tabloids

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: At last you have a rival! Cry down Mr. Macfadden and his pornographic sheets, but give the physical culturist credit for his trenchant editorials on China. His Philadelphia Daily News is unique in exposing the verbal fencing of Mr. Kellogg's memorandum and Mr. Coolidge's further explanations. Never have I seen such Nation-like editorials on China in a newspaper—and a tabloid at that! If Mr. Macfadden uses scandals to build up circulation and then puts it to such good use, I will boost for him!

Philadelphia, January 31 ARTHUR C. YOUNG

The Man Bruce Barton Doesn't Know

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Bruce Barton's book "The Man Nobody Knows" has been so widely read that it may not be amiss to call attention to a curious oversight on the part of the author. The advertising method of Jesus, he suggests, should be studied by every salesman; one should speak with sincerity, make condensed statements, avoid adjectives, and use words of one syllable. "Jesus used few qualifying words and no long ones." The first line of the Lord's Prayer is cited as an instance. "Not a single three-syllable word: hardly any two-syllable words. All the greatest things in human life are one-syllable things—love, joy, hope, home, child, wife, trust, faith, God." One is tempted to suspect that, in holding up Jesus as a model to advertising men in this respect, Barton has overlooked the fact that the prophet of Nazareth did not speak Tudor English. He spoke the Galilean dialect of the Aramaic. Like Hebrew, Aramaic was poorly supplied with adjectives; like several other languages, Aramaic put the article at the end. Love would be rachma or rachamutha; joy chedya or chayidutha; hope sibra; for home there was no word; child was olala or yanafa; wife antetha; trust tikla; faith haymenutha; God Elaha. "Father who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name" would be "Abba debashemaya yithqaddesh shemka." All of which is not without its importance. When a great prophet is chosen as a model, it is well to bear in mind the differences of the time and place, speech and manner of thought. "The letter killeth; it is the spirit that quickeneth."

Ithaca, New York, February 12 NATHANIEL SCHMIDT

Have Faith in Massachusetts

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your February 16 issue is worth the entire year's subscription. The Right to Confiscate is a clincher, especially enjoyable to the legal fraternity. I fear, however, that it will be necessary for you to continue to knock before we can gain entrance to the minds of our President and Secretary of State. You are rendering a real service. The influence of The Nation constantly increases. More power to you.

Boston, February 17 CHARLES WOOD BOND

Earn Your Own Living

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I disagree with your correspondent, William E. Sweet, about the proposal to endow men instead of "chairs." That is the same "fool's gold" which has bedeviled the whole system of education, philanthropy, and religion.

What is an endowment? Is it not merely a device for compelling somebody to earn a living for you? Living on the interest of some rich man's money, without a thought as to the real work that must be done to earn that interest or of the people who must do that work, is altogether too easy a solution of the economic problem. Isn't the real trouble now that too many men are "endowed" with special privileges to live by the sweat of other people's faces?

What the world needs is a few men like Saint Paul, who can earn their living and find time and inclination to kick the economic wolf in the stomach, and let him howl.

Alpine, New Jersey, January 31 WILBUR F. COPELAND

Man, Not Monkey

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You discuss the symposium published by the New Masses, in which fourteen writers discuss their attitude to their art. I am surprised to read that "not even Upton Sinclair answered with a direct affirmative to the crucial question, 'May society properly demand of the artist . . . the transvaluation of values.'"

My answer to this question was: "To say that the artist shall not be a creator, but merely a craftsman, is to turn him from a man into a monkey." I don't see how anybody can fail to consider that a direct answer. Did you understand that I was willing to be turned into a monkey? Please grant me the space to say that I wasn't and I am not.

Pasadena, California, January 27 UPTON SINCLAIR

News from Archangelskoye

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you allow me to correct some slips in my article on the Russian Reconstruction Farms which appeared in The Nation for January 12? The list of American groups was of course incomplete. The Seattle farm colony is not a religious organization—now that Louis Fischer has refuted Mr. Keynes as to the status of communism. Four large estates instead of two are being operated by the Americans at Archangelskoye. The third and fourth are about twenty miles away from the first two, which is inconvenient but gives the management a chance to work out improved methods of transportation and to prove that it is cheaper than separate overhead for each farm. The orphan boys are called bezprizorni; "hooligan" and hooliganstvo refer only to persons who behave that way. And the funds ($8,048) used by the farms for the care of the bezprizorni were collected and contributed by the American Committee for the Relief of Russian Children.

The old landlord whose cruelty gave Plakseika its name, back in the 1850's, not only made his serfs work in the canal in winter, but when on one occasion they refused, he is said to have had a hundred of them executed in front of the village church. To prove this the peasants point out the bullets still imbedded in the church wall.

Since last writing the farm has received a building loan of 30,000 rubles from the Government, and the building department under Donald Stephens has put up a home for the orphan boys, a large sklad to hold the tractors and other machinery during the winter, a pig palace, and a much-needed village bath-house, with other construction waiting to be begun in the spring. Harold Ware is now in Rostov arranging with government officials for the extensive stock-raising program the department of agriculture wants the farm to undertake.

Archangelskoye, Russia, February 1 MARIAN TYLER

What Kind of Equality for Women?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Miss Valeska Bari opens her article, Shall Women be Protected? with this warning:

> All the laws passed by the various States to shorten the working hours of women, to protect them from starvation wages and from strains of night work are threatened by the revived campaign for the Blanket Amendment.

The question arises, Where is the Blanket Amendment? Some years ago it was introduced in Washington and referred to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, where its slumber has been annually disturbed by a hearing. On these occasions accredited speakers for twenty or more of the strong, old-established, national bodies of women have stated why they oppose the amendment. The American Federation of Labor and other labor bodies have annually gone on record against it. It has never been reported out of committee.

There has, meanwhile, been a journalistic and oratorical campaign of the Woman's Party against Labor and for the Manufacturers' Associations, the Associated Industries, and kindred bodies (with whose legal counsel and for whose measures speakers from the Woman's Party appear at legislative hearings) rather than for the Blanket Amendment.

If, however, a campaign for that amendment is to be revived in these closing weeks of the dying Congress, this is a fitting moment to address to its proponents this question: Where do advocates of the Equality Amendment stand on the White Primary in Texas, which excludes Negro voters, men and women alike, in the greatest of those States where the primary is the election?

Do they expect Negro women to vote everywhere as political equals of white men and women, as they now vote in a large majority of the States? Or do adherents of the amendment expect that in the minority of States where Negro women are now disfranchised in defiance of the Nineteenth Amendment they are to remain so disfranchised after ratification of the Blanket Amendment?

Do Southern members of the Woman's Party seriously expect Negro women, with their ever-increasing education and economic independence, to continue disfranchised after ratification? And to go on living in the South? Do any members of the party expect any votes of Negroes in any State for their amendment if they defend the White Primary in Texas?

This question the Woman's Party can no longer ignore if it revives the campaign for its amendment. It will have to define equality at the polls, as thoroughly as it has defined, in the past four years, what it means by equality in the factory and the legislature; where it asserts that equality is identity and nothing else.

It is the courts, not the proponents of new measures, who ultimately interpret them. The present one has abundantly shown what confusion a pending amendment can create, even though in four whole years it has not been reported out of committee in either house.

Will the Woman's Party line up in Texas with the powers that disfranchise Negro women? As in the industrial States it has lined up with the industrial exploiters?

New York, February 8 FLORENCE KELLEY

Fessenden and Bettelheim

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In order to complete a volume on early Christian work in Japan, I want facts about Henry Fessenden of New York, who was in 1846 a merchant in Hongkong, China; and Dr. Bernard John Bettelheim, Christian-Jewish missionary to the Loochoo Islands; physician, graduate of Padua University, native of Pressburg, Hungary; resident of New York about 1854. He did considerable speaking on Japan, being introduced by Commodore M. C. Perry.

East Cleveland, Ohio, January 31 EARL R. BULL

The National Council of Jewish Women

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You referred editorially to the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods; did you not know that the National Council of Jewish Women had adopted resolutions against compulsory military training in land-grant colleges; in support of the work of the Preparatory Disarmament Commission; for arbitration; against the use of poison gases; for the World Court; for a program of study among its 52,000 members?

New York, February 1 DORA ROSENBERGER

The Science League

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Science League of America (Gillette Building, San Francisco) is the only organization formed specifically for the purpose of protecting the teaching of modern evolutionary science in our State-supported schools and colleges. As it is non-political and non-sectarian, it affords a means of fusion of all pro-evolution forces. It is actively fighting all the actual and potential anti-evolution bills, with very limited means, and asks the support of all friends of science and of freedom.

San Francisco, February 2 MAYNARD SHIPLEY, President

Not Unleavened

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I shall not quarrel with your editorial statement that "as a representative of conservative thought" Foreign Affairs "has a place to fill," except to add that the editors of Foreign Affairs believe it also has a place to fill as a representative of "liberal thought." They further believe that its record shows it to be filling the one as well as the other. Running through past issues, one's eye catches the names (among many others) of the following contributors who might be surprised to be labeled as conservative: Karl Kautsky, Joseph Caillaux, John Dewey, Georg Brandes, Alfred E. Zimmern, Senator Capper, Victor Chernov, Harold J. Laski, Arnold J. Toynbee, Oscar Jaszi, W. G. S. Adams, Harry Elmer Barnes, Edouard Herriot, Robert Morss Lovett, Yusuke Tsurumi, L. P. Jacks, W. E. B. Du Bois, Emile Vandervelde, Vladimir Zenzinov, R. R. Kuczynski, Gaetano Salvemini, Walter Lippmann, and Christian Rakovsky.

New York, February 4 HAMILTON FISH ARMSTRONG, Managing Editor

Books, Art, Plays

Bacchus

By EDGAR LEE MASTERS

Cadmus, of Thebes where sprang that Amphion
Who reared the pediment and the peristyle
With lyric music, brought at history's dawn
The alphabet from the Nile:
Whence came all chronicles and song.
And Cadmus fathered that Semele who Consumed by amorous lightning in the strong
Embrace of Zeus gave Bacchus birth, whereby
Was Bacchus' blood composed of song and fire.
Then as Zeus carried Bacchus in his thigh
So was his womb the flesh and the desire
Of the masculine and overruling god.
But Hera, the woman, raged at Bacchus' birth,
And maddened him, and with divine
Unrest she clothed him, and with dreaming shod.
So he began his wandering in the earth:—
This is the lineage and the spirit of wine.

So hunted by Hera, the spirit feminine,
Bacchus from pirates hired an Asian ship,
And linked his fame and fate to a libertine
And lawless crew; who with no loyal lip
Served Hera, yet unconsciously gave aid
To Hera's hatred. These with heavy ropes
Bound Bacchus to a mast. But Bacchus played
With their perfidious hopes:
First he transformed himself into a lion;
Then he made serpents of the masts and oars,
Venomous as the sting which killed Orion.
Then he sent ivy growing round the hull,
And over the sails; and from the magic shores
Of longed for land he caused the sound of flutes
To blow as memory amid the breeze's lull;
Till madness took the sailors whose attributes
Grown brutish by their crime and Bacchus' wish
Leaped in the sterile sea and turned to fish.

So is it with Bacchus ever and his foes:
Bind him and he becomes a lion; and those
Who bind him turn to serpents, and from fangs
Spit poison, where before the bursting grape
Poured healthful wine. The solemn ivy hangs
Where once were blossoms and the glistening shape
Of fruitful leaves. And those who praise,
And seek for water, find it, but as fish.
Music becomes the sound of viewless flutes
Blown from lost lands, or the broken gibberish
Of weary sailors, or the signs of mutes.
Cadmus the grandsire of the god withdraws
Song and the wisdom of the alphabet;
And men walk in a jungle of tangled roots,
The sprawl of crooked counsels and lawless laws,
Where reptiles foul the sylvan rivulet.

A Popular Napoleon

Napoleon. By Emil Ludwig. Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul. Boni and Liveright. $5.

IMAGINATION is not only a legitimate, it is a necessary tool of the historian. Except when dealing with survivals—monuments, originals of documents, relics, etc.—the historian is never handling facts, only mental images of them. He is trying to picture states of being, events, emotions, as they once actually were but can never exactly be again. For the perfection of his recreation he must depend not only upon his own imaginative sense but also upon his reader's. Ultimately, then, history is not a science, but a branch of art or of metaphysics, no matter how scientific its method may and ought to be.

And no branch of history is more metaphysical than biography. The biographer may repeat, time and again, that he is dealing with facts, but really he is trying to reconstruct what once was done, felt, or said, and can never be done, felt, or said again in the same way. When he has written four or five hundred pages of what his subject did, said, thought, felt, he calls it a "Life"; whereas the only resemblance it has to life, if it has that much, is chronological order. The best biographer can only approximate the "fact."

If it is impossible to reconstruct one's superficial life, how much more impossible to reconstruct one's "inner history," one's "inner life"! And yet this is what Emil Ludwig tells us, in an Envoy that differs from a Preface only in the fact that it comes at the end of his book, that he has tried to do with no less baffling a personality than Napoleon. To do it, he has made extensive use of Napoleon's letters and memoirs, and the manifold memoirs of people who knew Napoleon. At times he has squeezed the former so dry that one feels he has got more out of them than they had to give; and, despite a healthy skepticism in some cases, has frequently been much too gullible with regard to the latter.

Altogether, the book is unconvincing. It starts out with a romantic meeting in a tent, whose only witnesses were an infant and two adults who never left memoirs but whose every word is narrated in quotation marks by the biographer. They are not impossible words—and yet one wonders how the biographer knows, whose memoirs he used, and how the memoir writer knew. And all the way through the book the author quotes conversations as if he had stenographic reports of them before him. This is, after all, not a cardinal sin, even if it is an unscientific use of the imagination. But when he asks you to believe that he knows what was going on in Napoleon's mind, he asks too much. It may be logical to assume that Napoleon at Austerlitz thought this and that, and on St. Helena thought so and so. In fact, one might even say, if he did not think this and that or so and so, he ought to have. But if it were possible to know the truth in such a matter, if even Napoleon himself could have remembered what he had been thinking on momentous occasions, it might be found that he was thinking of nothing at all or perhaps only of the lady he had met the night before. The author admits as much. In his Envoy he says: "In this book, all the data are recorded facts, except the soliloquies." But one hundred pages of the book (I have not made an actual count) are not biography but soliloquy.

The effect of all this illegitimate use of imagination is to destroy confidence in the author. And so, when you find expositions of battles (as, for example, Marengo) or characters (as, for example, Louis Bonaparte) that differ from other accounts, you set it down to lack of knowledge rather than (as it may well be) more careful study of the sources; and when you find him actually believing that Napoleon's guiding motive was to form a United States of Europe, you feel that he has taken Napoleon's apologies without the necessary salt.

Furthermore, the author has concentrated too much attention upon his inner man, not enough on his outer environment. He has made him the central character in a drama in which there is practically no setting. The result is that his readers will believe that Napoleon created his circumstances, made his own opportunities, was responsible for his own rise and fall. The biographer does this deliberately; he says he considers the course of battles and the contemporary position of European states irrelevant. And yet he refers frequently to destiny, fate, and Napoleon's star. But what were destiny, fate, and star, if not the French Revolution, England, the Coalition, the spirit of democracy and nationalism, in dramatic guise? Furthermore, every drama that has a hero must have its villains; and so Talleyrand is cast for the part, with Barras, Fouché, Napoleon's brothers and sisters, Bernadotte, Metternich, Lowe, and the British government as understudies. And, one sometimes feels, they are badly cast.

But the book will have, and deserves, a tremendous vogue. It has the proper amount of question marks and exclamation points, spicy anecdote and humor, genuine understanding mingled with hero-worship, to make it a popular biography and to win hearty approbation from literary critics. The plodding pedant, the mere historian will leave it, however, with regret that so good a job has not been better done.

LOUIS R. GOTTSCHALK

Neither Short Story nor Novel

The Field of Mustard. By A. E. Coppard. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

CHEKHOV more than once asserted that it was his intention to write a novel and that he regarded his short stories as a kind of tuning up, a preparation for the longer form. I do not know whether Mr. Coppard has a similar intention; but certainly, compared with his earlier work, his every succeeding effort gives indications of expanding in the direction of the novel. It is not that the stories are in themselves longer than his earlier "tales"; some of them, indeed, are considerably longer; and, in the absence of any standard regulating length, one cannot raise any objections to his new volume on that score. Yet it would be useful if some critic could define precisely where the art of the short story stops and that of the novel begins. Still, we do have some idea of the distinction. A short story should not be diffuse, it should avoid rambling, it should have the concentric finality of a moment which is an accumulation of moments. It should have, as a form, something of that which we expect of a lyrical poem.

All this Mr. Coppard had, in good measure, in his first stories. And his new collection shows gain and loss. The gain is obvious. Mr. Coppard has the undeniable gift of telling a story. It is no small gift. He keeps us interested. He has humor too, and that inevitable pessimism and irony which, for reasons we need not enter into here, stamp the pattern of nearly every short-story writer worth his salt. But the pattern has visibly broadened. Details of character have entered more and more into the scheme, and, while not actually displacing circumstance, have served to envelop it as in a mist and to make its line fainter, and to give to the whole a sense of diffuseness belonging to another form.

Consider the longest tale in the book, Olive and Camilla, which covers some thirty-nine pages. "They had lived and traveled together for twenty years, and this is a part of their history: not much, but all that matters." So the story of the two middle-aged maiden ladies begins. But the "part of their history" that is told covers a considerable period, and leads up to the confession of one that her mind was not as pure as it was painted, and of the other that she had gone the whole way with some man. In short, the narrative is built up in the form of a chronicle, in the way a novel is built up; we do not feel that we have been, willy-nilly, whirled into the mood of a concentrated "moment," in itself final and ultimate; the denouement, for which we are being prepared, is too long in coming.

Consider, too, The Funnel, a title that is in its way symbolic. We enter, as it were, through the broad end, and by the time we have reached the narrow end we have lived aeons of experience. Little happens before the story begins, everything happens afterward. This is, to be sure, an accumulation of moments, but we live through every one of them. It is to be praised as a short novel. Now Judith is different. It is, by the limitation the author sets himself, a short story in every sense of the word. Its concentrated episodic content fully corresponds to the form in which it is cast. A little masterpiece, in its way. Fifty Pounds, though not so good, has all the earmarks of the shorter form.

It is ungracious, perhaps, to cavil at so fine an artist as Mr. Coppard, who, whether we are to regard him as a novelist or as a short-story writer, is deserving of respect. I, for one, should not wonder if he would come forward with a novel. In any case he has protected himself by calling his stories "tales," a good old English word which covers a multitude of narrative forms.

JOHN COURNOS

Gold and Tinsel

Orpheus, or The Future of Music. By W. J. Turner. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

My Adventures in the Golden Age of Music. By Henry T. Finck. Funk and Wagnalls. $5.

THE intrinsic value of a critic's judgments is not in their correctness—since this cannot be determined—but in their quality. Since we cannot have objective measurement, we want evidence of at least a personal ordering of artistic experiences—a taste or an aesthetic—and one which, if it does not command our assent, may at least command our respect. By this I mean an ordering, not, for example, according to the usual narrowing preconception or essentially alien prudery, but according to whatever empirical principles may be derived by the critic—each for himself—from those artistic experiences.

I should say, then, that Mr. Turner's musical criticism had intrinsic value and importance and Finck's had none. Mr. Turner, like Finck in the present volume, has written about ephemeral things such as performers and performances of music; but always what he has written has related itself to a comprehensive conception of music, and one that was evidently the product of a sophisticated ear and a keen intelligence ("Orpheus" is one statement of this conception). On the other hand, I can discover behind Finck's violent loves and hates only a reasoned aversion to music that required exercise of the mind, which I should hardly call an intelligent aesthetic; and a susceptibility to whatever was, or whatever performance made, luridly emotional, which I should hardly call a sophisticated taste. Finck was, therefore, a bad critic; and it did not make him less bad that he was sincere, courageous, provocative in his badness; or that, as the person revealed in this book, he commanded respect with his straightforwardness and honor, and inspired and held affection with his unusual charm, the charm of an adult child who believed in Hun and Bolshevik bogies. There is plenty of delightful entertainment in the book, but considerable bad criticism nevertheless.

Nor did Finck's criticism have even extrinsic importance, fortunately. Neither has good criticism; and it is not necessary or proper that it should have. For the personal taste or aesthetic which gives it its intrinsic importance is nevertheless not to be imposed upon music as law; and so it is proper that even a good critic should have no more power than Finck had to alter the trend of music, the status of a single one of its creators. True, we read of a critic battling for a composer and of the composer triumphing, and we infer that the composer triumphed because the critic battled; but the inference is clearly open to question, and I for one believe it is false. Consider Finck's own case. He thought himself responsible in part for the acceptance of Wagner in this country; but if we think how little the status of Brahms has been affected by his flaunted contempt, or that of Grieg or Liszt by his perspiring praise, we must conclude that Wagner did not owe his acceptance to Finck. I should say he owed it to Wagner, by which I mean that music is its own, and its only, advocate; that—to change the figure—in time it is bound to rise or fall to its proper level; that the effect of critical intervention can be only temporary; and that a critic, therefore, can decide the fortunes only of what is short-lived, ephemeral, and to that extent unimportant; the fortunes not of music but of musicians. The harm a bad conductor can do, like the harm a bad critic can do, has its importance, certainly; but it is obviously a limited importance, as it is a limited harm—limited, for one thing, in time. Finck's influence was devoted largely and confined entirely to these ephemeral matters: he claims that it was his suggestion that made Conried manager of the Metropolitan; he helped to keep Stransky at the head of the Philharmonic (Finck and the Philharmonic directors were unable to disentangle artistic failure from popular and financial success); he accomplished other things which today are as though they had never been accomplished.

And this, please observe, was one of the giants (Krehbiel was another such giant) who dominated what has been recalled regretfully as the golden age of American criticism—a giant reduced to insignificance by the first paragraphs that Ernest Newman wrote for the New York Evening Post. Are we now in what will be a silver age, one dominated, say, by Mr. Chotzinoff?

B. H. Haggin

The First English Press

Caxton, Mirror of Fifteenth-Century Letters. By Nellie Slayton Aurner. Houghton Mifflin Company. $6.

MISS AURNER'S pleasant volume, which richly illustrates, through its content, the output of the first English press, amply evidences in its format the present status of the art of bookmaking, for it is well bound, well paged, well typed, and well illustrated. But it is not with the outward and visible signs of the printer's craft, folios and broadsides, founts and woodcuts, that we have here to do. The book before us is designed neither for the student of typography nor for the bibliophile, the eager quester of incunabula, but for the lover of letters; since the theme is not Caxton the printer but Caxton the gleaner of literature, author and editor. Here we have the first English publisher, seeking his materials not among the living but among the dead, fashioning for his readers through translation and adaptation new books out of old manuscripts. Laborious writer, skilful printer, and shrewd merchant meet under one hat, and reasonable profits pass from right hand to left.

In the Caxton window of St. Margaret's, Westminster, clearly pictured in the frontispiece, the author-publisher stands between the images of the Venerable Bede and Erasmus. But his is the backward rather than the forward glance, for during his apprenticeship as printer at Cologne and Bruges and his mastership at the sign of the Red Pale near the almshouses of the great English abbey, in the eighth and ninth decades of the fifteenth century, the day of the New Learning or the Revival of Letters—call it what you will—had not yet fully dawned in Northern Europe. William Caxton is the last Englishman of the Middle Ages, the epitome of their tastes, the quintessence of their qualities. He is medieval in his themes, his traditions and conventions, his moralizings. As Miss Aurner shows in successive chapters of sketchy paraphrase, his choice of books is from many fields, morals and manners, allegory and symbolism, lives of saints, science and learning, history and politics, beast-tales, poetry, chivalry, and romances; and in all these renderings and reproductions he is always the conservative and never the humanist. He sees antiquity only through the eyes of his own century. That his "Troy," his "Jason," his "Eneydos" carry the authentic accent not of Greece and Rome but of France and England the next age, ever critically classical, was quick to perceive and proclaim with a contempt for Caxton and his generation that was both unmitigated and unmerited. The publisher's many prologues and epilogues, wisely included here in an appendix of over seventy pages, serve not only, like Dryden's prefaces, as a log-book of his life but as a record of traditional sentiment. Oft repeated here is the introductory formula which, Miss Aurner fails to note, is the starting-point of many medieval writers professedly moved to authorship by "the desire to eschew sloth and idleness, the mother and nurse of vices." And whether the book is of romantic supermen like Arthur and his knights or of roguish creatures like Reynard and his folk, the inevitable moral is written large at the outset. The heroes of Malory's book, for which we confess our chief debt to Caxton's press, teach the reader "to exercise and follow virtue"; the rascals of the beast-epic warn him "to keep from subtle shrews that he be not deceived."

Miss Aurner does not neglect Caxton's personal relations with those great figures of the time that inspire his amazing feats of reproduction. His first book, the collection of Troy tales, published at Bruges, is wrought at the command of an English princess, Margaret Duchess of Burgundy. Later volumes, from the Westminster press, are dedicated to ruling kings of England, Edward, Richard, Henry. In his work as translator and as publisher he is aided by mighty earls—Rivers, Worcester, Arundel. He writes and prints, as he tells us, not for "rude, uplandish men" but for "gentle" readers. Hence in the score of books and in the twoscore hundred of pages which he Englished for this courtly circle he avoids the old and homely diction of the folk and enriches his vocabulary with "the fair and strange terms" of his originals. How far Caxton's manner, like his matter, reflects the medieval is a question that should be asked and answered by the present-day student who views the author-publisher as a "mirror of fifteenth-century letters." Even after the great work of Blades and of Duff, there is ample room for Miss Aurner's volume—and for yet another.

Frederick Tupper

Thought About Thought

The Psychology of Thought. By Harry L. Hollingworth. D. Appleton and Company. $3.

Thinking About Thinking. By Cassius J. Keyser. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

PROFESSOR HOLLINGWORTH'S book is the first psychological treatment of human thought which combines the three exceptional merits of rendering the phenomena of thinking homogeneous with the rest of human behavior, of employing familiar psychological concepts rather than borrowings from neurology or logic, and of adducing sufficient experimental evidence to support the weight of a nicely elaborated theory. His approach to reasoning and judgment through the study of sleep, drowsiness, and dreaming introduces the functioning of symbols, the vicarious exercise of imagery, and the mechanisms of redintegration in what are customarily called subrational processes; and thereby abolishes the significance of the implied distinction. The relation of the phenomena of drowsiness and dreams to abnormal mental states gives the concept of redintegration (the notion of whole-part functioning in association, of which the conditioned response is a subcase) extra force in interpreting normal, awake thinking as a symbolic process in which the items have their meanings because they have been severally associated as wholes and parts. The meaning of a symbol is its redintegrative tendency. The symbol, moreover, is not an idea or an image in the sense of being an exclusively psychical entity; rather it is any physical entity engaged in a psychological context—that is, acting through its whole-part relationships instead of through its social or aesthetic, its molar or molecular relations. This is Professor Hollingworth's theory of the psycho-physical continuum, discarding the old substantial mind and body, and introducing a neutrality of stuff whose things are thoughts when they occur in thinking.

Whatever specific correction and modifications this theory must suffer at the hands of further inquiry, there is one general objection to be submitted. Professor Hollingworth extends his treatment to "logical thinking" with the conviction that the "so-called 'laws of thought' of logic are really not laws of thinking but laws of things, especially of those things called relations." Viewed in terms of his own psycho-physical continuum, it would not be true that "logic can be of little service to us in this enterprise." Professor Keyser's little book, inadequate with respect to organic and empirical thinking, so ably dealt with by Hollingworth, is the needed corrective, however, in the field of postulational thinking, in which the mind obeys the laws of logical structure rather than creates logic as a residue of its symbolic activity. Postulational thinking, imperfectly exemplified in Euclid and Spinoza, and perfectly in the non-Euclidean geometries, is the deduction of doctrines from sets of postulates and definitions. It is "if-then thinking," valid only in the sense that if the postulates are true, then the doctrine is true. The deductive relations here have no basis whatsoever in human nature; and a psychology of thought can only report how the mind is able to perceive, not organize, such relational systems. Logical thinking is a detection of logic in things, particularly things called propositions, and Professor Keyser optimistically describes the art of it with splendid clarity.

MORTIMER J. ADLER

Books in Brief

Civilization or Civilizations. An Essay on the Spenglerian Philosophy of History. By E. H. Goddard and P. A. Gibbons. Introduction by F. C. S. Schiller. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

The chief merit of this book is a careful separation of the historical from the philosophical aspect of Spengler's thought, and an exclusive emphasis on the former. Thus, Spengler is rendered intelligible to the reader untrained in technical philosophy. The advantages of this method are obvious, but they do not compensate for the violence done to the comprehensiveness and unity of vision of the master. Messrs. Goddard and Gibbons are not philosophers; they are teachers of history; and they have accordingly fitted a great deal of historical particularity to the general schematism of "The Decline of the West." Their elucidation of Spengler's theory of organic cultures in terms of the contemporary situation is illuminating and important.

The Laburnum Branch. By Naomi Mitchison. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.75.

Many of these poems are topical, or uninterpretative presentations of landscape; all of them are diffuse; only the briefest can be read all the way through. After appearing in England the volumes of poetry by English mediocrities for some reason have to be reissued in this country.

John Galsworthy as a Dramatic Artist. By R. H. Coats. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

A sensible if generally pedestrian and sometimes platitudinous analysis of Galsworthy's plays with special reference to the ideas contained in them. His "sincerity," his "sympathy," his "impartiality," his "irony," and his "artistry" are asserted and anatomized one by one; his views on family relationships, social injustice, etc., are discussed; it is even asserted that "he sees life steadily and sees it whole." Within its limits the book is readable and just.

Old Fort Crawford and the Frontier. By Bruce E. Mahan. Iowa City: State Historical Society of Iowa.

Fort Crawford was erected in 1816 at Prairie du Chien on the Wisconsin side of the Mississippi, and Mr. Mahan has written a chronicle of happenings there. The story is not exciting, but for local antiquarians the book will prove useful.

A Chinese Miscellany

The Long Old Road in China. By Langdon Warner. Doubleday, Page and Company.

The painfully beautiful story of a plodding journey far into the West of China to Edzina, Marco Polo's black city in the desert, and the Tun Huang caves, where Buddhas and Bodhisattas have smiled unchanging smiles for more than a thousand years.

A Girl from China (Soumay Tcheng). By B. Van Vorst. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.

The story of a Chinese girl revolutionary who became Shanghai's first woman lawyer, told in Sunday-feature style.

Lanterns, Junks, and Jade. By Samuel Morrill. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

Mostly junk.

A Griffin in China. By Genevieve Wimsatt. Funk and Wagnalls. $3.

The Chinese drama, the mud men of Tientsin, shark's fin soup, the Three Stars of Fortune, the Heavenly Lady who Scatter Flowers, phenix rugs, Peking shops, long-lived cranes made simple for the romance-loving traveler.

Farmers of Forty Centuries, or Permanent Agriculture in China, Korea, and Japan. By F. H. King. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

Few books on the East could stand reprinting after sixteen years. Dr. King went as neither tourist nor politician, but as a farmer, and his observations stand the test of time. He went to China as a frank admirer of the most effective agriculture in the world, which, while cultivating the soil with incredible intensity, has not in three thousand years exhausted its fertility. He found Chinese agriculture capable of sustaining 2,000 consumers and 400 farm animals on a square mile of farm land, Chinese farmers thriftily avoiding the destruction of a single earthworm, sweeping up the droppings of their silkworms to manure their mulberry trees, paying for the privilege of taking from the cities to the farms that human refuse which we pay to destroy, sowing cotton between their wheat-rows before harvesting the grain, and harvesting barley, rice, and soy beans from the same field in the same year. He hoped America would some day attain to the same high standards of agriculture.

The Vanished Empire. By B. L. Putnam Weale. The Macmillan Company. $5.

"Putnam Weale"—Bertram Lenox Simpson—is a brilliant and erratic Englishman who has in his day rendered service to China. The first eighty-six pages of this medley are a tour de force—a brilliant essay-sketch of the long history of China. This he follows with the story of the Nemesis from the Sea—contact with Western sea Powers sapping the foundations of the ancient empire. Here his national bias begins to appear: he remarks that in October, 1860, "the famous Summer Palace . . . filled with priceless articles, was thoroughly looted [by the French and British], an inevitable act." The italics are mine; the casualness is his. The third section, The Battle That Has No End, is Mr. Simpson's own revealing diary of the winter of 1925-26. Acutely penetrating comments are jumbled with imperial British nonsense—a yearning thought that "one good tank corps and one group of heavy batteries"—under foreign command—could "dominate all China north of the Yangtze"; apostrophes to General Dyer, who bravely massacred Indians at Amritsar, and General Sarrail, who boldly shelled Damascus; hunger for another General Gordon to clean up the Nationalists; and more stigmata that make plain the cause of the present hate of Englishmen in China.

L. S. G.

Art

Good and Bad Negro Art

WHEN a new artist or type of art achieves recognition, there usually follows a period of sentimental worship as uncritical as the hostility that preceded it. With regard to Negro art, the period of worship has begun, and everything with a Negro flavor, in literature, music, and the plastic arts, is riding on the crest of a popular fad. There is always danger at such times that important values will be lost sight of in a flood of cheap imitations and undiscriminating praise.

The Blondiau African Collection, now being shown by the editor of the Theater Arts Monthly at the New Art Circle in New York, deserves attention chiefly because it comes at this crucial period. It has a distinguished list of patrons, who have lent their names, it is to be hoped, as an expression of general sympathy for the Negro renaissance rather than of admiration for the particular objects shown. It is no disparagement of that cause to say that respect for Negro art is not to be advanced by the showing of notably inferior examples. If the exhibit were labeled Handicrafts from the Belgian Congo, and destined for some ethnological museum, nothing adverse could be said, for it is an instructive array of religious, military, and household utensils from that region. But it is put forward as Primitive African Art, and the expressed hope that it will be given to a museum presumably means to an art museum.

The exhibit deserves, as a whole, neither the word "primitive," nor "African," nor "art." The objects come almost entirely from the Belgian Congo, which means that only a limited part of the art-producing region of Africa, and by no means the most important, is represented. Instead of being genuinely primitive, they are in large part modern imitations. This is not to say that they are counterfeit (only the finer pieces, as a rule, are worth copying in European workshops); but that many of them have been made in recent years by unskilful African natives who are trying in vain to recapture the art of their ancestors. Since the market for African curios has developed, they are being turned out in considerable quantity, and backwoods villages are being ransacked for every stick that bears a trace of carving.

That this collection as a whole is not good Negro art, but consists chiefly of debased modern examples, cannot be adequately demonstrated in a short review. But to see the difference one has only to look at a photograph of one of the ancient masks or fetishes: it will have an immediately striking, powerful clarity of design beside which most of these pieces would look vague, weak, and superficial. It will show a face or figure radically distorted in such a way as to produce definite repetitions and contrasts of line, plane, and mass. The parts of the natural object, treated as separate units, will be reshaped and recombined in some bizarre and distinctive yet firmly organized structure.

The catalogue and circulars of the exhibit quote a sentence from the present writer's book, "Primitive Negro Sculpture," with the implication that it applies to the objects shown: "its way of building up a design from the dissociated parts of a natural object and the array of designs it achieved by this method" have thrown into modern plastic art a "ferment that must inevitably go on working." This statement applies not

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY
One Park Avenue New York

Early Spring Publications

PURPOSIVE EVOLUTION

The Link Between Science and Religion

By Edmund Noble

This discussion, covering the disputed no-man's-land between science and religion in a truly philosophic spirit, poses a problem of such vast scope, in a style so eloquent, that it will at once appeal to every intelligent reader. $5.00

A CALL TO ORDER

By Jean Cocteau

Translated from the French by Rollo H. Myers

The essays in this volume exhibit the author of Le Grand Ecart and Thomas l'Imposteur as a brilliant critic, and constitute a document of great importance on the intellectual life of Paris today. $1.75

NEWS OF THE DEVIL

By Humbert Wolfe

Author of "Humoresque"

A savagely satiric poem. "Will cause a sensation in the political as well as the poetic world in England. Nothing more savage has been printed since Byron's 'Lampoons'."—Louis Untermeyer. $1.50

UPPER NIGHT

By Scudder Middleton

A new collection of poems by the author of "Streets and Faces" and "The New Day," showing an increase of power and a singular awareness of the personal drama enacted behind the modern scene. $1.75

MODERN PAINTING

By Frank Jewett Mather, Jr.

Author of "A History of Italian Painting" and "Estimates in Art"

A study of aesthetic ideals and ideas which underlie the general movements in painting. The warmth and critical judgment with which the author pursues his task make this a truly communicative and stimulating book. Probable Price $7.50 ing African, and certainly not to carvings of the ... exhibition, but to the few surviving masterpieces by genuine artists, who were as rare in darkest Africa as anywhere else. There is nothing of much artistic merit, for example, in the African collection at the New York Museum of Natural History; and even in the British Museum, the Congo Museum at Brussels, the Trocadero at Paris, and the folklore museums of Germany the works of African art are far outnumbered by the pieces of merely ethnological interest. The former are now almost unobtainable in Africa itself, since the missionaries of white "civilization" have been for a century hurling them into bonfires and destroying the religion that inspired them.

Although most of the modern carvings are crude and weak, occasionally one of them catches some of the force of its ancient prototypes: for example, the "Bapende Tufted Ceremonial Mask" (No. 1 in the catalogue). Others in the exhibit show various degrees of decreasing skill, down to mere shapeless sticks of wood or ivory, feebly scratched to recall some traditional form. Among the several hundred pieces there is none of first importance, but some half dozen are fairly old and fairly worthy to represent Negro sculptural design. The masses are strongly blocked out, and surfaces nicely finished, in the Kasai fetish with copper and ivory ornament (No. 16), in the Bakuba mother and child (No. 19), and in the bearded Bakuba fetish (No. 18). These deserve a place in some art museum—when, by the way, will the Metropolitan open its doors to Negro art? It would be a pious act, and might appease the jungle spirits residing in these venerable "god-houses," if someone were to take them out of their present undistinguished company.

THOMAS MUNRO

Drama

"The Cradle Song"

IN spite of its quiet virtues one could hardly have predicted that Sierra's mild little comedy "The Cradle Song" would become, as it has, the most popular bill at the Civic Repertory Theater. Though the scene is a religious house for women, audiences which have come to expect that at least one act of most popular plays shall take place in a house of a different kind, are flocking to see it, and though the dialogue is all of a sort to which a nun might listen without impropriety these same audiences are charmed and delighted. There are, to be sure, touches of gentle satire, but only such as a true believer might permit himself; the prevailing mood is the mood of sentiment, and the lesson to be drawn from the play's success is, I suppose, that the simple chords at which it plucks are still, in most people, capable of responding, providing only they are touched with a sufficiently delicate hand.

In the first act a foundling is left at the door of a convent and adopted. In the second the infant, grown to girlhood, says goodby to the sisters upon the eve of her wedding, and that is all. Yet throughout the piece the interest is kept alive by a tenderly humorous picture of the simple lives of the nuns, by a sharp delineation of such mild differences of character as a convent may be permitted to include, and, above all, by the subtle diffusion of a simple sentiment. What this sentiment is "The Poet" who speaks an interlude between the two acts is careful to explain. Women, he says, whether they be mistresses or wives, are nuns, are essentially mothers. They are always rocking us at their breasts, and here we see how even those who have renounced physical motherhood clutch at the infant whom chance has thrown in their way and how they send her forth to experience for them the joys which they have denied themselves.

Doubtless it is only in Spain that a girl could still be found who, like the heroine, dreams of a married life in which she will sit quietly in a corner while her husband goes out to conquer and enjoy the world, and certainly only a Spaniard

"Here we stand in the presence of genius."
—N. Y. Times.

This is one of the most powerful characters in modern fiction——

Mr. Gilhooley

by

Liam O'Flaherty

"Greatness that resists classification as it resists analysis. . . . The energy that infuses it is intense. . . . It wells up in a wild and untired wave."—HENRY LONGAN STUART, N. Y. Times.

The story of a strange and unfortunate girl—and of a man on whose heart and soul a vicious and predatory love fixes tooth and talon. $2.50

Harcourt, Brace & Co., 383 Madison Ave., New York

THE NEW CHINA

You can appraise from the proper perspective the new awakening of the East which is today thrusting China into the limelight of public attention by reading

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

You will like its freshness of viewpoint coupled with the accuracy of its facts.

It is a store-house of information on international politics, European trends of thought, current English literature, and cultural developments the world over.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings and on new trends of thought in various countries.

——————MAIL THIS COUPON——————

To The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
220 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed direct from Manchester, England, to:

Name .....

Address .....

could successfully project the mood of the present play. Like the same author's "Romantic Young Lady," presented here last season by the company at the Neighborhood Playhouse, "The Cradle Song" is the work of a man to whom the incurable romanticism of Spain, though grown perhaps a little attenuated and wistful, is still the most precious thing in life. All the disillusion and cynicism of modern literature have left him essentially untouched. He still believes in innocence, still delights to create young girls of a type now generally supposed either never to have existed or at least to have completely disappeared, and still has even a lingering reverence for the convent and its inmates. He suffuses his plays with a sentiment as old-fashioned as lavender and yet, because that sentiment is not affected but perfectly native and sincere, it gives the effect not of something false but of something with a quaint and all but forgotten charm.

Miss Le Gallienne's company has staged the play, which affords no star part and requires tact more than any other quality, with skill and discrimination. I confess that toward the end I began to grow slightly restive under the influence of its almost complete lack of action, that I found myself counting the sixteen nuns to find out just how many the departing heroine was going to be compelled to kiss in turn; but until these last fifteen minutes I was held by its charm and it is, decidedly, one of the current plays worth seeing.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Charles Frohman Company's Successes
GILBERT MILLER, Managing Director
ETHEL BARRYMORE
in The Constant Wife
BY W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM
AT MAXINE ELLIOTT'S THEATRE
Published by George H. Doran
HOLBROOK BLINN
in The Play's the Thing
BY FERENC MOLNAR
Adapted by P. G. Wodehouse
AT HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE
Published by Brentano's

PLYMOUTH THEATER, West 45th Street. Eves. 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat.
WINTHROP AMES'
GILBERT & SULLIVAN OPERA CO.
PIRATES of PENZANCE
✓ Thurs. Eves. Only IOLANTHE

Longacre Theatre, 48th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:30 Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30
THEODORE DREISER'S
AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY
"A PLAY WHICH IS BOUND TO WRENCH A MILLION HEARTS." —Journal.
DRAMATIZED BY PATRICK KEARNEY.

New PLAYWRIGHTS Theatre
52d St. Theatre—306 West 52d—Col. 7393
(Emil Jo Basshe, John Dos Passos, Francis Edwards Faragoh, Michael Gold and John Howard Lawson) announce the opening, Wednesday, March 2, of LOUD SPEAKER by JOHN HOWARD LAWSON
and on March 9 of EM JO BASSHE'S play EARTH
in their season of repertoire

JANE COWL in
"The Road to Rome"
Playhouse 48th St., E. of B'way. Evs. 8.30 Matinees Wed. & Sat., 2.30

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE 105 W. 14th St. Tel. Watkins 7767
EVA Le GALLIENNE
Thursday Evening, February 24—"THREE SISTERS."
Friday Evening, February 25—"CRADLE SONG."
Saturday Matinee, February 26—"CRADLE SONG."
Saturday Evening, February 26—"JOHN GABRIEL BORKMAN."
Monday Evening, February 28—"CRADELE SONG."
Tuesday Evening, March 1—"TWELFTH NIGHT."
Wednesday Matinee, March 2—"JOHN GABRIEL BORKMAN."
Wednesday Evening, March 2—"CRADLE SONG."
Special Matinee, Thursday, March 3—"CRADLE SONG."
Thursday Evening, March 3—"LA LOCANDIERA."
Evenings and Saturday Matinees, 50c to $1.50. Wednesday Matinees, 35c-$1

The Theatre Guild Acting Company in Week of Feb. 21st—NED McCOBB'S DAUGHTER
Week of Feb. 28th—THE SILVER CORD
Week of Mar. 7th—NED McCOBB'S DAUGHTER
JOHN GOLDEN THEA., 58th St., East of B'way CIRCLE 5678 Matinees THURS. and SAT.

Week of Feb. 21st—PYGMALION
Week of Feb. 28th—THE BROTHERS KARAMAZOV
Week of Mar. 7th—PYGMALION
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Eves., 8:15 Matinees THURS. and SAT., 2:15

NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE
466 Grand St. Drydock 7516
Every Eve. (Except Mon.) Matinee Saturday
Pinwheel

Special FILM ARTS GUILD Subscription Performance
American Premiere of
"THE LIVING DEAD MAN"
Based on PIRANDELLO'S "The Late Matthew Pascal" Directed by MARCEL L'HERBIER Featuring IVAN MOSJOUKIN, LOIS MORAN
Also American Premiere of
"EMAK BAKIA" by MAN RAY Noted Modernist
An amazing cinematic experiment in screen futurism
Musical Settings by EDWARD KILENYI
ADDED ATTRACTION
[GEORGE BERNARD SHAW in his first screen appearance in a Special film]
Two Performances—3 P. M.—8.45 P. M.
SUNDAY, MARCH 6th, 1927
GUILD THEATRE, 245 West 52d Street, near Broadway
Reserved Seats, $2.75, $2.20, $1.65, $1.10 (including war tax)
On sale at Box Office (Columbus 8229) or by mail and in person at FILM ARTS GUILD, 500 Fifth Avenue. Longacre 4447-10434

□ DEBATE □

FOUR-CORNERED DEBATE!
STAGE CENSORSHIP?
For Censorship
JOHN S. SUMNER
(Sec. Society for Suppression of Vice)
and
REV. WM. S. CHASE
Famous Advocate of Censorship
VS.
Against Censorship
WILLIAM A. BRADY
Noted Theatrical Producer
and
ROBERT EMMETT SHERWOOD
Critic, Playwright, Author of "The Road to Rome"
SATURDAY, MARCH 5th, 1927, AT 8:30 P. M.
MECCA TEMPLE 133 WEST 55TH ST. NEAR 7TH AVE.
SEATS $3.30, $2.75, $2.20, $1.65, $1.10, including war tax, on sale at Box Office (Circle 8513), ticket agencies and by mail or in person from
LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION 500 FIFTH AVENUE LONGACRE 4447-10434

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

International Relations Section

Sun Yat-sen on Pan-Asia

SUN YAT-SEN was known as the Father of the Chinese Revolution of 1911; he was the first President of the Republic of China; he led the unsuccessful "Second Revolution" against Yuan Shih-kai's dictatorship in 1913; and he was the leader of the Canton governments which, declaring themselves the legitimate successors of the disrupted Peking Parliament, finally blossomed into the Nationalist movement which is today sweeping China. Of that movement, although he died in March, 1925, he is the patron saint, occupying a position strangely like that of Lenin in Russia. Meetings of the Kuomintang (Nationalist) Party and even school sessions in Nationalist territory are opened formally by making three bows before Sun Yat-sen's picture and reading his last will, a farewell message to the Chinese people; there is hardly a student's room in any college in China today in which Sun Yat-sen's picture does not hang.

This extraordinary position gives peculiar importance to his utterances which tend to become a sort of Bible of the Nationalist movement in China today. We print below part of the report of his speech on Pan-Asiatic Unity, delivered in Yokohama, Japan, on November 28, 1924, when he was on his final journey to Peking. The report was read by him before he died; Theodora Rhoades is responsible for this, its first translation into English.

When Japan abolished the unequal treaties with foreign Powers Asia's revival began. Since that time Japan has stood as the first independent nation in Asia. The other Oriental countries—China, India, Persia, Afghanistan, Arabia, Turkey—are at the mercy of Europe, being indeed but Europe's colonies. Thirty years ago Japan too was practically a European colony. But the Japanese people, farsighted and humiliated by their condition, strove to abolish the unequal treaties and make of Japan an independent nation. That struggle brought a new hope to the Asiatic peoples, who began to believe they might free themselves from the European yoke. Thirty years ago the Asiatic peoples believed that Europe, with its scientific and industrial progress, its highly developed weapons of war, and its strong armies, was so superior to enfeebled Asia that the latter was doomed forever to be the slave of the West. . . .

Ten years after Japan had abolished the unequal treaties the Russo-Japanese War broke out. Japan defeated Russia, the first triumph of Asia over Europe in the last several hundred years. . . .

This victory produced a profound effect upon the peoples of all Asia, not so much upon those in the heart of the continent, but upon those Asiatics in the West or bordering on European peoples who come daily into contact with Europeans and are daily oppressed by them. The peoples of Asia began to think of breaking the grip of Europe, and a movement for independence sprang up among them: in Persia, Turkey, Afghanistan, and Arabia, even in India, this movement has begun. Within less than twenty years the independence of Egypt has become a fact, and so has that of Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan, Arabia, while even in India the movement for independence grows daily stronger and stronger.

When this desire has reached its full growth it will be time for the Asiatic peoples to unite, and then the success of their movement for independence will be assured. In Western Asia recently the peoples have established sincere and friendly relations. In Eastern Asia, however, although the motive force of this Pan-Asiatic movement comes from here, the two great peoples, the Chinese and Japanese, have not reached such an understanding. But the inevitable tendency in the future is for us Orientals to unite, in order to restore the position which we of Asia formerly held. . . .

Within the last few centuries in Europe material civilization has advanced enormously, whereas in the Orient it has stood still. On the surface the European civilization is better than the Oriental. But when one lays bare the structure of Western civilization, of what does it really consist? Of science, with an emphasis on utilitarianism. When you apply it in human society, all you can see is material progress, such as airplanes, bombs, machine-guns—it is a civilization of force. Europeans, through the power of their material achievements, hold us Asiatics in subjection and in consequence we cannot of ourselves move forward. . . .

We Orientals have always despised the ideal of the rule of might. We have a civilization which is better than this, whose essence is benevolence and righteousness. . . . In recent years Western scholars who have made any study of the Orient have come to know that although the material progress of the East is inferior to that of the West, yet in this regard for moral values as the basis of human conduct the East is superior to the West.

When you compare the Oriental with the Western civilization, which of the best two promotes justice and humane relations? Which is of more profit to the human race and to the nations of the world? . . . In the period between five hundred and two thousand years ago China was the most powerful nation in the world, occupying a position such as Great Britain and America hold at the present time. But while Great Britain and the United States are only two among the several world Powers today, China was then the only powerful nation. The attitude of China at that time toward weaker nations, and vice versa, is worth examining. The facts are that these weak nations regarded China as a superior nation and paid tribute to her, asking China to take them as her dependencies. They felt that it was an honor to pay tribute to China and that not to pay it was a disgrace. The nations which thus paid tribute were not confined to Asia but also included some of those farther west. . . . These nations were drawn to the virtues embodied in China's civilization and willingly came to pay her tribute. Nor did they come once only, but generation after generation.

What I say can be substantiated by a recent case. There are two small states in the north of India. One is called Bhotan, the other Nepal. Although very small, these two states are strong, and their people vigorous and skilled and courageous in war. This is particularly true of one of the tribes of Nepal, who are called Ghurkas. The English authorities in India used to go to Nepal to recruit the Ghurkas for their army. England has subdued a big nation like India and treats it as her colony, but the English Government annually gives a large sum of money to Nepal in order to be allowed to station an official there. Great Britain is, of course, one of the most powerful nations in the world, yet it is forced to respect Nepal. You can see that Nepal is one of the strong nations in Asia, since although England has held India for more than a hundred years and Nepal is situated right next to this English colony, it not only pays no tribute to Great Britain but receives money from her.

Now China's international status is rapidly declining. China, too, is far away from Nepal and between the two countries rise the high Tibetan mountain ranges. But Nepal still regards China as a superior state and pays tribute to her. . . . This difference between Nepal's attitude toward Great Britain and toward China is a strange thing, is it not? It indicates that China, however weak, has not in the eyes of Nepal lost its civilization, whereas Great Britain, although very powerful and having material prosperity, is looked down upon by Nepal. It might be truly said that Nepal was under the sway of the virtue of Chinese civilization, regarding it as true civilization, while that of Great Britain she refuses to acknowledge as civilization at all.

What, after all, is the problem before us? It is the conflict of two civilizations, the Oriental and the Occidental. Oriental civilization emphasizes benevolence and righteousness; Occidental civilization emphasizes utilitarianism and force. When you believe in the practice of benevolence and righteousness, you convert people by those qualities. When you believe in the practice of force and utilitarianism, you conquer people by your machine-guns. Those who are converted by your justice, even if you become weak, will be like Nepal, which still willingly pays tribute to China and regards her as a great Power. Those who are overwhelmed by force will always try to be free from you, even when you are strong, just as Egypt and India are every minute striving to be free from Great Britain, although they cannot succeed in their struggle because of her overwhelming force. But if Great Britain ever becomes weaker, Egypt and India, I am sure, will within five years break away from her yoke.

The relative values of the Oriental and Occidental civilizations are clear. We Asiatics, in striving to achieve a Pan-Asiatic unity, should consider even in this modern age what should be the basis of the conception upon which we build that unity. We should use what has been distinctive in our Oriental civilization, its emphasis upon moral values, upon benevolence and righteousness. These must be the basis of Pan-Asiatic unity. Using them as a foundation, we should then employ European science to develop industry and to reform our weapons of warfare. But when I say we should develop our industries and improve our weapons of warfare in imitation of European nations, I do not mean we should imitate Europe in conquering other nations and oppressing other peoples. We imitate Europe only for self-defense.

Japan has been the nation most successful in adopting Western achievements along military and cultural lines. The Japanese in their army and navy organizations and equipment do not have to depend upon Europe, therefore Japan is really the only completely independent nation in Asia.

There is another Asiatic country which during the European War joined the Central Powers. This country was defeated and was almost partitioned. But after the war it drove out the Europeans and has now become completely independent. That country is Turkey. Japan and Turkey stand out like protecting walls to Asia. But Persia, Afghanistan, and Arabia also begin to awaken and imitate European military defenses. I have already referred to Nepal as a nation respected by Great Britain. China, too, at the present time has many soldiers and many weapons of war, and will become powerful as soon as it is unified.

In attempting Pan-Asiatic unity and in restoring our rightful position in the world we must use benevolence and righteousness as our foundations, and thereby unite the different peoples of Asia, so that together we may become a power to be reckoned with. But if we use benevolence and righteousness to convert the Europeans and ask them to give up the privileges they enjoy in Asia, it will be like conferring with a tiger over taking off his skin. If we wish to regain our lost privileges, we must resort to force.

Japan and Turkey already possess well-equipped and adequate military resources. Other nations like Persia, Afghanistan, Arabia, Nepal, have been skilful in warfare. We Chinese have four hundred million people and although we are peace-loving, when it came to a life-and-death struggle our strength would be great. If the Asiatic peoples unite, using what force they have, and bring things to a military issue with the Europeans, victory will be the result.

In mere numbers Europe and Asia compare thus: China has four hundred million inhabitants; India three hundred and fifty million; Siam, Anam, and the Southeastern countries together have several hundred millions; Japan has several tens of millions, and the other small nations of Asia have several

BOOKS

ARE you coming to England this year? If so don't fail to visit our Bookshop, which Christopher Morley calls "one of the most thrilling bookshops in the world."

IF you are not coming to England but are interested in Books, tell us what your interests are and we will send you Catalogues from time to time.

Just published

CATALOGUE 283. First and Limited Editions of 19th and 20th century Authors (1,354 items). Mailed free on application.

Four Petty Cury, Cambridge

W. HEFFER & SONS LTD., CAMBRIDGE, ENG.

Booksellers Cables: Heffer Cambridge

The Cure of Imperfect Sight by Treatment Without Glasses

By W. H. BATES, M. D.

The author of this book presents evidence that all errors of refraction are caused by strain—and cured by rest or relaxation.

The complete method of treatment is described so clearly that the reader can usually discard his glasses and improve his vision.

All leading bookstores. Price $3.00 Postpaid

Central Fixation Publishing Company

383A Madison Avenue New York City

SCIENCE, TRUTH, RELIGION and ETHICS

By HARRY MANN GORDIN

A vigorous and able defense of science, with trenchant criticisms of traditional orthodoxy as well as of "New Thought" and other current forms of mysticism. Cloth, 467 pages, $1.50 postpaid. Catalog free.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 EAST OHIO ST., CHICAGO

Will Durant's—The Story of PHILOSOPHY

127th Thousand

At All Bookstores—$5.00

Simon and Schuster, Inc., Publishers, New York

LECTURE

China and the Powers

a lecture by

NATHANIEL PEFFER

formerly acting editor of the China Press at Shanghai and Pekin correspondent of the New York Tribune.

Thursday, March 3, at 8.20 P. M.

Admission, $1.00

NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH

465 West 23d Street New York City

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.20 per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired tens of millions. We Asiatics represent one-half of the whole population of the earth. Europe has but four hundred millions, whereas we Asiatics have nine hundred millions. For a minority of four hundred millions to suppress a majority of nine hundred millions is against justice and humanity. And any action contrary to justice and humanity will ultimately result in defeat.

Fortunately among the Europeans there are some who have been won over by our ideals of benevolence and righteousness. In Great Britain and America there are a few who are now advocating them, in harmony with a world tendency. As for the other barbarous nations, there may also be some among them who are of the same conviction. The Western civilization of utilitarianism and force will ultimately bow before the Oriental civilization of benevolence and righteousness.

At the present time there is a new nation in Europe. This nation has been excluded by the whole white population of Europe, who regard it as a poisonous snake. In Asia, too, there are many who look upon it in the same way. The nation I refer to is Russia. Russia has now come to a parting of the ways with its white kinsmen. Why? Because Russia believes in benevolence and righteousness, not in force and utilitarianism. She is an exponent of justice, and does not believe in the principle that a minority should oppress a majority. Naturally, Russia comes to link hands with the Asiatics and breaks her family ties with the West. The Europeans, fearing that the Russians may succeed in carrying out these new principles, heap condemnation upon her as a rebel against the civilized world.

We talk about Pan-Asiatic unity. In the last analysis what is the problem we are trying to solve? Simply this: How can we Asiatics, who suffer at the hands of Europeans, resist their power? Or, to put it differently, our question is: How can we free the oppressed peoples from the oppressor? The oppressed are not only confined to Asia. They are also to be found in the very midst of Europe. Many persons regard any movement for the emancipation of the masses as rebellion against civilization. The civilization which we propose to uphold is that which strikes down tyranny. To seek the emancipation and equality of the oppressed is what we propose to do. . . .

Contributors to This Issue

BERTRAND RUSSELL, the English physicist and social philosopher, is the author of "The Problems of China" and "The A B C of Relativity."

WILLIAM JOURDAN RAPP is a New York journalist.

FRANK R. KENT, vice-president of the Baltimore Sun, writes regularly from Washington to The Nation. He will speak on Calvin Coolidge at the fifth Nation dinner.

KATHERINE ANNE PORTER is the author of "An Outline of Mexican Popular Art."

EDGAR LEE MASTERS'S latest book is "Lee: a Dramatic Poem."

LOUIS R. GOTTSCHALK, of the University of Louisville, is soon to publish a study of Jean Paul Marat.

JOHN COURNOS is a British novelist, author of "Miranda Masters" and other volumes.

B. H. HAGGIN has been contributing musical articles and reviews to The Nation.

FREDERICK TUPPER is professor of English at the University of Vermont.

MORTIMER J. ADLER is preparing for the press a philosophical work called "Dialectic."

THOMAS MUNRO is the author of "Primitive Negro Sculpture."

The author of Woman Alone is a well-known novelist and poet.

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

The course is open to graduates of colleges and universities of recognized standing.

Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.

Special courses will be arranged for social workers in accordance with their needs.

For information, address the

Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL
For
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)
210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

Holidays in Europe

Independent or group holidays for long or short periods planned. Quotations given. All arrangements and reservations in Europe made by the Workers' Travel Association Ltd.

a Society (Registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies' Acts) founded to encourage international travel as a means of promoting world-peace through understanding.

The Illustrated Programme prepared specially for Americans, which offers a wide choice of tours and visits in the United Kingdom and on the Continent, at absolutely inclusive rates, is now ready, and will be sent free on application.

The Workers' Travel Association Ltd.

Transport House, Smith Square, London S. W. 1.

OPEN SHELF

GOOD CHEER, COMRADES!

Daca sells books 20% to 80% off at the NEW DOOR BOOK SHOP, 4 Christopher St., N. Y. C. Come on over! Open evenings.

BOOKS ON EVERY conceivable subject. Also fine bindings, standard sets, first editions, and rare books. Browsers welcome. Correspondence invited. ARGOSY BOOK STORE—45 Fourth Avenue, Bible House, New York City.

FIRST EDITION CATALOGUE will be mailed upon request. An interesting collection of miscellaneous second-hand books will be found on our shelves.

JULIAN BOOKSHOP, 110 4th Ave., N. Y. C.

THAT BOOK YOU WANT!

We hold 1,250,000 vols., second hand and new, every conceivable subject. Books on approval. Also Rare Books, Out-of-Print Books, and Sets of Authors. Catalogues free (20 issued). Outline requirements and interests.

FOYLES, 121 Charing Cross Road, LONDON, ENGLAND

THE FRANK HOLLINGS BOOKSHOP, 7 Great Turnstile, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London W.C.2, has the most varied and interesting stock of Rare and Curious Books of all periods, Association copies, Victorian and Georgian First Editions, Modern Press Books, etc. Catalogues on application.

Booksellers!

IF you are not advertising in The Nation at present, you are ignoring a logical medium for the sale of your books.

The Book Review section of The Nation has a tradition of 61 years.

That readers of The Nation both read and buy books is evidenced by the space devoted to book reviews and publishers' advertisements in every issue.

Our representative will be pleased to call on you.

FOR RENT

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL, N. Y.
LIVE in a modern, fireproof hotel by the seashore for less than in the crowded city. Homelike comforts, moderate priced restaurant, maid, valet and telephone service. Winter rates:—$12 per week for two. 37 minutes from Times Square B.M.T. Phone, Sheepshead 8000.

APARTMENT, unfurnished, 457 West 24th Street. Facing Chelsea walk. Entire ground floor. Two large rooms and heated sleeping porch. Kitchenette and bath. Open fireplace. Separate entrance. Chickering 6227.

WANTED

WANT to rent for summer (with possible privilege later of purchase) small house* in country about 6 rooms, near lake, tennis court, privacy. Not too far from New York. Box 639, care The Nation. *Would be interested in 2 or 3 houses in same vicinity.

EDUCATIONAL

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE
Program Feb. 27-March 5
AT COOPER UNION
(8th Street and Astor Place, at 8 o'clock)
Admission Free

Sunday, Feb. 27—Lewis Browne: "This Believing World."
Tuesday, March 1—Frankwood E. Williams: "Can Youth Be Coerced?"
Friday, March 4—Everett Dean Martin: "What Is the Matter With Modern Ideas? The Influence of the Discovery and Settlement of America on Modern Ideas."

AT MANHATTAN TRADE SCHOOL
(Lexington Ave. and 22nd St., at 8 o'clock)
Single Admission, 25 cents
Reduction for Course Tickets

Monday, Feb. 28—Morris R. Cohen: "American Philosophy, American Political Theory."
Wednesday, March 2—Lawrence J. Henerson: "The Adjustments of the Human Body."
Thursday, March 3—E. G. Spaulding: "Questions People Expect a Philosopher to Answer. What Is Potentiality, or Can Something Come Out of Nothing? (Conklin)."
Saturday, March 5—Mortimer J. Adler: "Psychological Relativity: The Four Geometries of the Soul. The Morality of Health."

BONDS

Mexican Government & Railroad Bonds

These bonds at prevailing prices offer attractive investment and speculative possibilities.

Detailed information furnished on request. Correspondence invited.

J. SANTILHANO
Specialist in Mexican Issues
50 Broad Street Tel. Han. 4419

POSITIONS WANTED

EDITORIAL, library, research, translation, rare books, art. Knowledge classics, sciences. Ph.D., German, French, English Literature, Full, part time. Assist adults advanced study or travel. Main 8947. Box 638, care The Nation.

FORMER journalist, speaking several languages, convalescent, university graduate, elderly single man, is looking for not too heavy work with modest salary (and decent room or home as part-compensation for services). Address Box 633, care The Nation.

COUPLE desires refined, middle-aged woman to assist in light housekeeping, small house, Manhattan Beach. Good salary, permanent home. Sheepshead 2662.

TEACHER desires summer employment in country. Pleasant work in any form acceptable, with remuneration. Box 643, care of The Nation.

Do you want to make extra money?

Address Dept. 11

THE NATION

20 Vesey St. New York for the truth about China . . .

read this clear, comprehensive and authoritative book in which a keen-minded observer analyzes China's past, present and future.

Henry Morgenthau, former ambassador to Turkey:

Mr. Morley shows wonderful powers of penetration . . . clearly analyzes the status of the countries which will play so large a part in our future international problems.

Dr. W. W. Willoughby, formerly Constitutional adviser to the Chinese Government:

I know of no work dealing with the Far East which within an equal compass gives more information.

Grover Clark, Editor, the Peking Leader:

Much the best brief presentation of the Far Eastern situation of which I know.

Hon. Setsuzo Hawada, Counsellor of the Japanese Embassy:

I feel sure it will help the reading public gain a better understanding of Far Eastern affairs.

Dr. Ping Wen Kuo, Director of the Chinese Institute in America:

A valuable contribution to the literature on Far Eastern problems.

OUR FAR EASTERN ASSIGNMENT
By FELIX MORLEY
$2.00 Doubleday Page & Co.

The Stenographic Report of
The Seminar on Relations with Mexico

Mexico City, January, 1927, Hubert C. Herring, Director. Contains full record of interviews with Pres. Calles and Mexican leaders.

Send orders to
HUBERT C. HERRING,
14 Beacon St., Boston, Mass., with check for $1.50.

MISCELLANEOUS

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

REAL ESTATE

—If you have a house or property to sell or lease, try The Nation classified advertising section.
—If the experience of other advertisers of real estate is a guide, your advertisement in The Nation will pay.
—Write for rates to Dept. R., The Nation.

THE NATION'S Index to Vol. CXXIII
July-December, 1926

is now ready. One copy will be sent to each library on the subscription list of The Nation. Other subscribers who wish a copy should send their request to the Subscription Department.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York City

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9, 1927 No. 3218

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 249
EDITORIALS:
The Tariff—The Farmers' Enemy 252
A Hundred Years a Railroad 253
Mechanical Jurisprudence and Constitutional Law 253
Biographers, Beware! 254
"TAXI, MISTER?" By Sol Auerbach 255
THE MORTGAGE BOND INDUSTRY. By Henry S. Villard 258
HE WHO GETS SLAPPED AT GENEVA. By Roger N. Baldwin 259
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 260
CORRESPONDENCE 261
BOOKS, MUSIC, PLAYS:
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 263
Professor Quixote. By Stuart Chase 263
Study of a Sensitive Boy. By Herbert S. Gorman 264
A Pressed Flower. By John Waldhorn Gassner 265
Young China. By Lewis S. Gannett 265
John Bull and Brother Jonathan. By Allan Nevins 266
The Emerging Balkans. By Nicholas S. Kaltchas 266
Books in Brief 267
Music: "The King's Henchman." By Henrietta Straus 267
Drama: Pastiche. By Joseph Wood Krutch 269
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Two World Tribunals. By Charles Hodges 270

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

IS THERE A BRITISH-AMERICAN ALLIANCE? Did the British chargé at Managua ask that a British warship be sent to Nicaraguan waters in order to facilitate Mr. Coolidge's task in persuading the American people that it is our duty to keep in Nicaragua eight armed protectors for every civilian American in the country? And were the British, eager to have American moral and military support in the event of trouble at Shanghai, only too ready to perform this trifling service in Nicaragua? Can there be any relation between these events and the British note to Russia, threatening to sever relations with the soviets and to put Britain in the same position with respect to that country as the United States? These are questions inevitably evoked by the strange coordination of recent events.

AT SHANGHAI the British, supported by the Italians (another coincidence which makes any student of modern history wonder what is the other half of that bargain), are defending a line which reaches far beyond the boundaries of the International Settlement into purely Chinese territory. They have not bothered to give any excuse, not even to explain that their promises to observe China's national integrity are mere "scraps of paper"; like the Germans in Belgium thirteen years ago, they have simply taken the most convenient course. Meanwhile Sun Chuang-fong, recently lord of five provinces, is fading out of the picture. His defeat by the Cantonese near Hangchow was a tremendous blow to his prestige; and the reckless butchery of Cantonese sympathizers by his underling in Shanghai lost him the last vestige of sympathy among his own people. (It is instructive to reflect what might have been the comments of the British press had a Cantonese general rather than a friend of England's beheaded a hundred of his opponents.) Another Northern militarist, Chang Tsung-chang, the bandit chief of Shantung, is moving his troops into the Shanghai region; but the force of public opinion, which mysteriously wins battles in China, is against him, and sooner or later he will suffer the same eclipse as Sun Chuang-fong.

THE "SHARP" BRITISH NOTE to Russia proved to be an uncomfortable boomerang; Litvinov was able to parallel the vague British complaints of Russian anti-British propaganda by chapter-and-verse citations from wild speeches by Churchill and Birkenhead, with the result that the British Government has no recourse but sulkingly to state that it will not reply. Meanwhile the American Government is beginning to discover its own unpopularity. The faithful correspondent of the Republican New York Sun let the cat out of the bag in reporting the funeral of the American good-will fliers killed in Argentina. So hated is the United States, he said, that although the Argentines celebrated the coming of three fliers from other nations with all manner of festivities no one paid the slightest attention to the North Americans except to scowl at them and call them Wall Street spies, until death touched a chord of universal sympathy. This is the result of Coolidge-Kellogg diplomacy in Mexico and Nicaragua! Their one decent move—toward a further disarmament conference—was so ill prepared that Italy and France frankly repulsed it, while Britain and Japan made it plain that while ready to confer they have no intention of reducing their present navies.

HOW COMPLETELY A PUPPET of American Marines is the man whom our State Department calls President of Nicaragua was made superabundantly plain when Diaz publicly announced his readiness to negotiate a treaty turning his country into an American colony—a 100-year treaty giving the United States control of his finances and the right to intervene at any time. Fortunately, even the State Department was appalled at this cravenness, and announced that it did not want quite such abject terms. Before this issue of The Nation goes to press Congress will have decided the fate of Senator Borah's proposal to set up a Senatorial commission to watch the Central American pot boil while Congress is out of session. The Senate, and particularly Senator Borah, has proved itself in this crisis, as many times before, the guardian of American honor. Without his independent investigation the country might never have learned to what depths the Administration has sunk; and the attack upon his endeavor to get at the facts is evidence again that somebody fears the truth.

UNCLE SAM HAS WON BACK his oil lands; but the black mark of shame still stands where the Fall-Denby-Doheny crew put it. Senator Walsh and Senator La Follette stand splendidly vindicated from the abuse heaped upon them for their patriotic service in uncovering the crimes of government officials. But the Administration in Washington still stands silent, and by silence excuses. Men who sat in the Cabinet with the corrupters, men who still sit in the Cabinet, have never found a word of blame for these transactions; and Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Kellogg are at this moment pursuing an aggressive policy in Nicaragua which is part of an attempt to force Mexico to validate the titles of oil lands staked out by the same Mr. Doheny who bought the aid of Mr. Coolidge's former Cabinet colleague, Albert B. Fall.

> The facts and circumstances disclosed by the record show clearly that the interest and influence of Fall, as well as his official action, were corruptly secured by Doheny for the making of the ·· tracts and the leases; that after the executive order of May 31, 1921, Fall dominated the administration of the naval reserves, and that the consummation of the transaction was brought about by means of collusion and corrupt conspiracy between him and Doheny.

THUS THE SUPREME COURT of the United States set the final seal of shame upon the oil corruption of the Harding Cabinet. Every member of the Supreme Court —with the exception of Justice Stone, who was Attorney General when the cases were brought—concurred in a tremendous decision which will stand as a monument in American history. The Supreme Court accepted all the findings of the lower court except the statement that Secretary of the Navy Denby "signed the contracts and leases under misapprehension and without full knowledge of the contents of the documents." As to that the court says: "He is presumed to have had knowledge of what he signed; there are direct evidence and proven circumstances to show that he had." The Supreme Court has often shown itself lacking in understanding of social forces; but when faced with a simple question of honesty it could have no hesitation. Doheny, it said in substance, corrupted the Secretary of the Interior, who, with the Secretary of the Navy, sought to deprive the United States of its property. The Elk Hills oil lands now return to the United States, and Mr. Doheny's companies lose the $11,000,000 they have invested in pursuance of their corrupt bargain; presumably, Mr. Sinclair's Teapot Dome leases will suffer a similar fate.

A PROFESSIONAL TRAFFIC-DODGER in New York City may be alarmed by the sight of six cows on a country road; and Samuel Insull, who is accustomed to dictating to Chicago, looked like any fat man on an August Sunday when Senator Reed put him through cross-examination in Washington. Mr. Insull, it now appears, outranks the Pennsylvanians in miscellaneous campaign giving. He controls a half billion dollars' worth of public-utility corporations in Illinois; and when Chicago's grand opera counts up its deficit at the end of the year Mr. Insull signs the check as easily as other men would buy a ton of coal. Last autumn's investigations brought out that Mr. Insull had contributed more than $100,000 to help Frank Smith into the Senate, and minor sums to Colonel Smith's opponents. Armed with a court decision that he had a right to force witnesses to testify, Senator Reed has got a little deeper. Mr. Insull's assorted gifts to politicians, it appears, totaled $238,000 in a single primary election in a single State. Much of it was turned over to the political gentry in cash; $190,000 of it was borrowed for the occasion from one of his public-utility corporations. Mr. Insull felt that it was unfair to ask him to reveal the confidential ways in which the money had been used; but he looked like a very wilted millionaire when Senator Reed got through with him. The fact is, Mr. Insull was scared; a mere Missouri Senator, tracking out the truth, scared Chicago's wealthiest! We would wager that Mr. Insull was so scared that ex-Mayor William Hale Thompson had to go through his fight in the Chicago primaries in February without financial aid or opposition from the traction magnate—and that appears to be something new in Chicago.

WHEN THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT refused, in the Los Angeles and Salt Lake case, to give any opinion on the methods of valuing railroads, declaring that it would wait until rates were made upon those valuations, the solution of our pressing railroad problems suffered another setback. The decision furnishes a sad commentary on the difficulties of railroad regulation. La Follette thought in 1913, when he introduced his railroad-valuation act, that he was providing for clarification of the all-important problem of railroad rates. One stumbling-block after another has arisen; after the lapse of fourteen years the valuations have not yet been used, and the Supreme Court has not even begun to consider the difficult economic problems brought up by the act. With such inadequate legal mechanism, it is to be hoped that railroads, shippers, and the Interstate Commerce Commission can get together in an effort to set up mutually satisfactory rates.

ROGER BALDWIN of the American Civil Liberties Union, one of whose articles we print elsewhere in this issue, has been refused a visa to visit England, apparently on the theory that he is a soviet sympathizer. The theory is probably derived from his defense of free speech for Communists in the United States. But Communists have booed him in New York for defending the cause of political prisoners in Russia. Freedom seems to have lost its appeal everywhere; perhaps Russia will bar Mr. Baldwin next.

RADIO WILL BE CONTROLLED. The Dill bill has passed both houses of Congress and been signed by the President. Under it the licensing and general supervision of broadcasting stations will be in the hands of a board of five, appointed by the President. Secretary Hoover has shown, in some of his remarks, an appreciation of the dangers of censorship, recently underlined by the ridiculous censorship applied by Station WEAF to Representative Celler's remarks on George Washington. Mr. Celler was not permitted to state that Washington occasionally lied, despite the legend; that he "liked good wine"; that he paid for rum for his constituents. He was made to change the word "gamble" to "wager," and to soften a quotation from the first President so as to make him say "by heaven" instead of "by God"! We assume that Mr. Coolidge will consult Mr. Hoover about the personnel of the new board; and we hope that the Secretary of Commerce will see fit to suggest that at least one of the nominees be a man known for his concern with the principles of free speech.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S EULOGY of George Washington was tame enough, but it was eminently characteristic of its author. What did he find especially to admire in the Father of his Country? Primarily, his money-making achievements. He is lost in admiration at his having started in at sixteen years of age as a surveyor, and having died as one of the great propertied men of the nation. His absentee landlordism was one of the blessings of colonial days. His reputation for being a wise investor made him a wonderful guardian and administrator of the property of others. Before him as a successful farmer we are bidden to bow down. We are told to revere him as one who, besides being a general and first President, had plenty of time to make lots of money, hoard his riches, and become the best big-business man of his day and thus help the national wealth of his native land. The rest of the story fades into relative insignificance in Mr. Coolidge's view. This thoroughly consistent performance provides another cue to Mr. Coolidge's every action. It was only the other day that in deprecating the reports of European criticism of us he said in rebuttal: "We never had a larger foreign trade than at the present time."

THERE IS A LEAVEN in the university lump. Students are writing editorials in college weeklies on free speech in and out of universities; students are writing stories and articles in college monthlies which are frank in their treatment of love and unorthodox in their treatment of religion. Students right and left are championing unpopular causes. On some of these daring ones the sword of Damocles falls swiftly. Two students at Indiana University were recently expelled for an article in the Vagabond on juvenile sophistication. A sophomore at the University of Denver was twice kidnapped and flogged for arranging, as vice-president of the Thinkers Club, a debate between Judge Ben Lindsey and a Kansas City preacher. We have already commented on the persecution of student editors at Kansas City Junior College, and we are glad to note that the "militant minority" at the University of Kansas is busy at present in publishing four pages of refreshing impudence with not a few incidental ideas every week. Springfield College, at Springfield, Massachusetts, goes on the Honor Roll with a ruling by the Advisory Council, including both faculty and students, to permit speakers, no matter what their doctrine or creed, to present their views before the student body. At Cornell University Norman Thomas recently debated, defending socialism against a communist. There are students who dare to think and faculties who dare permit them to do so, as well as members of both groups who do neither.

SUICIDE WAVES, like crime waves, are largely products of newspaper psychology. Year after year twelve or thirteen thousand people in these United States take their own lives, and most of them die unnoticed. The adolescent years contribute their full share. But let the son of a prominent man kill himself, and dozens of suicides which would otherwise have gone unnoted become front-page news. The fact that nearly a score college students killed themselves in January and February does not constitute a "wave" to the student of statistics. Individuals follow individual impulses; in the mass the movement is much the same. It is safe to say, today, that in 1927 about 8,500 men and 4,500 women will commit suicide in the United States; that Los Angeles will have the highest suicide rate of any city in this country; that there will be a few suicides of children under ten and more of veterans over ninety; that the young will, in general, prefer poison, the middle-aged shooting, the old hanging as a means of self-destruction; that more men will hang or shoot and more women drown or poison themselves; that Saxony will have the highest suicide rate in Europe, and Ireland the lowest. Year after year these figures repeat themselves, paying no heed to the waves of interest reflected in newspaper headlines. The ratios here today will not be very different from those discovered in Europe forty-eight years ago when Thomas Masaryk, now president of the Czecho-Slovak Republic, published a famous study of suicide. Man does not change suddenly; although habits and customs do alter through the generations and across the surface of the earth. Napoleon attempted suicide, and Hannibal was honored for his self-destruction; for Dido self-immolation was an almost religious rite, as harakiri still is in Japan.

THE MEDAL OF HONOR in architecture awarded annually by the Architectural League has been given this year to "Ralph T. Walker and McKenzie, Voorhees, and Gmelin" for the design of the Telephone Building in New York. The decision is welcome not only on account of the beauty of the building on Vesey Street (mentioned in The Nation's roll of honor for 1926) but because of the circumstance that an individual has been named in an architectural award. Firms of architects are necessarily organized on a large scale, and latterly it has not been possible for the public to know whether one or many men did most of the creative work on a structure. There was reason, it is true, why the firm's name should be most often known, since the effort which goes into a great design is, now as in all creative periods of architecture, in part a guild or cooperative effort; there has been something quite admirable in the willingness of expert draftsmen and inspired designers to remain anonymous. At the same time we are entitled to be curious concerning the identity of the ruling spirit in each case—and surely one is always there.

HARMON, MAXWELL, HYNICKA—there died within a few days of one another these three of the best-known citizens of Cincinnati. Rudolph Hynicka rose from a newspaper reporter to being one of its most powerful and hated bosses in a day when the machine completely dominated the city. Where Hynicka achieved only notoriety, Judson Harmon, Attorney General in Grover Cleveland's second Cabinet, lent distinction to his city. Of handsome personality and great ability, he was twice Democratic Governor of Ohio. As Attorney General he again displayed learning and a sterling honesty; one has only to think of these to realize how far that great office has sunk under recent Administrations. It was natural, therefore, that he should have been much talked of as the successor of Grover Cleveland. Had he been nominated in 1896 instead of Mr. Bryan there is no doubt that the history of the country would have read differently. We should not have had the free-silver campaign and, if the Democratic Party had won, we might have waged no war with Spain and might not have entered so early the path of imperialism in Cuba and the Philippines. Mr. Harmon was always earnest in his opposition to every imperialistic move and never failed to lift his voice for independence for the Filipinos. But like Lawrence Maxwell, who was Solicitor General under Mr. Cleveland, he belonged to the conservatively liberal wing of their party, and its temper in 1896 was wholly against the men of the East in Mr. Cleveland's entourage. Mr. Maxwell will be remembered in Cincinnati for his devotion to the cause of music, especially the May festival, to which he gave endless time and intelligent musical interest.

The Tariff—The Farmers' Enemy

WE would not begrudge the President any meed of praise which he deserves for his veto of the McNary-Haugen bill. He had to choose between stultifying himself to get the farmer support by swallowing his previous condemnation of this measure or winning the redoubled praise of the big-business men, financiers, and manufacturers, whose loyal servant he is. Naturally he chose the latter alternative, and the great capitalistic newspapers have been falling over themselves to declare that he has earned and won his renomination and reelection to a third term. It was, as we have stated, an economically unsound measure, as to the workings of which there were serious doubts. Its sole justification was as a temporary expedient of relief in a grave emergency, which offered some degree of justice to the farmer in that it gave him aid from the Treasury and thereby put him on an equality with all the merchants and manufacturers who profit by the protective tariff. But there has never been the slightest justification for letting the manufacturers get their feet in the Treasury trough and at the same time barring the agriculturists from an equivalent privilege of government subsidy, direct or indirect.

The President's veto message is evidently the work of several hands. First of all, let us examine his indignation that the bill is a price-fixing measure. Quite right; that was its intention. It sought to provide machinery to buy up an agricultural surplus and hold it for a good export price, and that, in Mr. Coolidge's eyes, is a crime because it puts a government agency into the business of price-fixing. Yet at the very moment that this veto message was being prepared for him, the President was raising the tariff on pig-iron under the flexible tariff system from 75 cents on the dollar to the maximum possible of $1.12½! That is, he was fixing the price for domestic pig-iron, which therefore advanced to $21.76. But that worries the President not at all. That is protecting a home industry and one that has from time immemorial paid handsomely to the Republican campaign funds for its price-fixing partnership with the government. And pig-iron is the basic element which enters into the manufacture of most of the farmers' implements! What impudence it is for the President to dwell scornfully upon the fact that the McNary-Haugen bill favors the "men who grow cotton, corn, rice, swine [sic], tobacco, or wheat" and overlooks those who raise "beef, cattle, sheep, dairy products, poultry products, potatoes, hay, fruit, vegetables, oats, barley, rye, flax," etc.!

But the President does not stop there. He says:

> Nothing is more certain than that such price-fixing would upset the normal exchange relationship existing in the open market and that it would finally have to be extended to cover a multitude of other goods and services. Government price-fixing, once started, has alike no justice and no end. It is an economic folly from which this country has every right to be spared.

Precisely. These are the words to apply. But the price-fixing in partnership with manufacturers which has been the stock in trade of the Republican Party has also "no justice and no end"—no excuse except that upon it certain privileged Americans wax rich and fat at the expense of all the others. How have the great tariff-fed industries of the country been built up if not at the expense of the general taxpayer?

Mr. Coolidge holds up his holy hands, too, because this scheme calls for a species of taxation in the form of the equalization fee, which he calls "a remarkable delegation of the taxing power." "As a direct tax on certain of the vital necessaries of life," he says, "it represents the most vicious form of taxation." Has he never heard that whenever a tariff bill is framed, whether by Democrats or Republicans, it is the privileged producers who write the schedules, by reason of a deliberate delegation of the taxing power to them, and that the tax becomes a direct one upon every purchaser of a tariff-favored article, as, for example, the aluminum products of his beloved Mr. Mellon? How can he blame the farmers if they are infuriated at this fresh favoritism? There is scarcely an argument that he makes throughout his long message that does not apply equally to the whole tariff swindle. He could not sign this bill because it might increase farm production and so give an increased exportable surplus to be dumped on the world. What in the world have our manufacturers been doing these fifty years?

The farmers are reported in revolt and turning to ex-Governor Lowden, who favored the McNary-Haugen bill. What folly! The farmers' enemy is the tariff. Nothing, and nobody else. Let them seek new leaders, not enlist under one who also stands for the tariff. Can they not see that the tariff not only mulcts them whenever they buy a trust-protected article but, by shutting out manufacturers from all the world, makes it infinitely harder, often impossible, for foreigners to buy foodstuffs from us for which they must pay in goods? The desperate situation of our farmers calls less for a slightly altered McNary-Haugen price-fixing machinery than for tariff reform, plus the immediate development of the cooperatives to the fullest possible extent.

The moment is the more opportune because for the first time the farmers have powerful allies at hand—the financiers are against the tariff as never before because they now realize that there can be no payment of the European debts to us unless the tariff walls are lowered. The bankers may not be natural or permanent allies, but for the moment the line-up can be the farmers plus the bankers against the manufacturers. Two weeks ago the farm bloc in Congress struck hands with the bankers' bloc so that the McNary-Haugen bill and the McFadden branch-banking bill could go through. The bankers got theirs and got it signed; the farmers were bilked. All right; but if the alliance can be formed once it can be formed again. The recovery of American money loaned abroad and the increasing of foreign markets for American agricultural products both depend upon lowering our tariff. Unfortunately not even the Progressive bloc in Congress has seen the direct connection of the tariff with the corruption in our political life, the building up of favored classes, the establishment of special privilege. It is idle to seek relief from a Lowden or anyone else who does not see this truth. Not only the farmers' but the future of the entire country is at stake. What man, what group of men in public life will lead the way?

A Hundred Years a Railroad

ON February 28, 1827, the Legislature of Maryland granted a charter to a group of citizens of Baltimore for the purpose of constructing the first public railroad in the United States. They did not know just where it was to run, or what it would cost, or how they would operate it—whether by sail, or by horses on a treadmill inside of the car, or by horse-power in the manner of stages. But they were alarmed at the threat of the Erie Canal to Baltimore, and so they decided to start the railroad across country to the Ohio and find out afterward how to operate it. Thus the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad came into being, and, unlike many another early line, it has remained the Baltimore & Ohio to this day, independent, and operating under its original charter.

There were, it is true, three other railroads in existence before the Baltimore & Ohio, but these were short lines constructed for other purposes than a general freight and passenger purpose. The Mohawk & Hudson Railroad had been chartered in 1826; but it did not begin running cars from Albany toward Schenectady until 1831, after the Baltimore & Ohio had begun to run, and its identity has long since been merged in the New York Central. On July 4, 1828, the first stone of the railroad—still in existence—was formally placed by the local Masons and that remarkable man, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, then said to have been the only surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence. On May 24, 1830, the first Baltimore & Ohio "trains" began taking passengers to Ellicott's Mills, twelve miles away, passing a midway halt for changing horses called Relay, which leaped into national importance just thirty-one years later, for it was at Relay that the road to Washington was cut in 1861, and the capital isolated from the East. Inclined planes—still traceable—were constructed to get the cars up and down hills by means of horse-powered windlasses.

And so the road had its humble beginning, until the steam engine appeared in America—one of the first, the Stourbridge Lion, imported from England and tried out at Honesdale on the Delaware & Hudson. Next came two American-built engines, the Best Friend of Charleston on the South Carolina Railroad, and the Tom Thumb, designed by Peter Cooper of New York especially to convince the Baltimore & Ohio directors that they must turn to steam. They did, but, being bent on developing this infant industry at home, they refused to import English locomotives and themselves built all, or nearly all, theirs for many years. That was characteristic of the railroad. It has always kept a local color even when developing into a great national enterprise with 70,000 employees and 5,000 miles of track, and within the railroad itself there have been not only healthy traditions but a fine family spirit which has made greatly for efficiency and contentment. It is not without significance that its operating vice-president is the grandson of the man who drove the first horse-car to Ellicott's Mills and later became engineer of the first locomotive upon the Washington branch. It is not at all exceptional to find in the Baltimore & Ohio's service the fourth successive generation of a family.

If it was the first and almost the only railroad to build and own a steamship line across the Atlantic; if it was along its line that the first telegraphic message "What hath God wrought" was sent; if it first employed electricity on a standard railroad, these and other facts pale into insignificance compared to its admirable labor standards. Its relations with its employees are of the best; the railroad has a real pride in its democracy, a real respect for its workers, and a long-proved readiness to work with them through their unions. For this much credit must be given to the president, Daniel Willard. No railroad has at its head a wiser or more far-sighted executive or one who enjoys a more universal respect. No aroma of stock-jobbing, no public-be-damned policy about him. Instead one meets a steady recognition of the rights of the workers and the public, with the stockholders placed third.

So the railroad has flourished and has been part of the history of the country. At its Harper's Ferry station John Brown's men fired their first shots; from one of its conductors came the first authentic news of the John Brown raid; over its line from Washington went the company of marines, headed by Lieutenant Israel Green and Colonel Robert E. Lee, which broke down the doors of the engine house and captured the raider, the "madman" who died as a traitor, but whose soul soon went marching on wherever there were federal troops. Three years later it was the first railroad to be used extensively for military transportation. Then for four years its bridges were burned, rebuilt, burned again, and its lines were first under one flag and then another. It came out of the Civil War triumphant and it is today the same Baltimore & Ohio as it was a hundred years ago when railroads were more experimental than radio is today, under the same charter, with the same corporate organization, under its own flag in the business of selling transportation honestly and squarely.

Mechanical Jurisprudence and Constitutional Law

ONCE again a majority of the United States Supreme Court have shown an inability to think realistically in dealing with the constitutionality of important State legislation. As a result the machinery of social adjustment in a number of the States is thrown out of gear at an important point. Once again an enlightened minority (Justices Holmes, Brandeis, and Stone) have failed to convince their brethren of the error of their ways. Experience has shown that immigrants who are ignorant of our language and customs are frequently defrauded by irresponsible brokers from whom they have agreed to buy steamship tickets to send abroad to relatives whom they wish to bring over. To prevent this, a number of States have passed laws forbidding any one except steamship or railroad companies to sell steamship tickets without a license. Applicants have to satisfy some State official that they are of good character, and are required to give security for the performance of their contracts. Comes now the majority of the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Butler, and holds Pennsylvania's statute unconstitutional (Giovanni di Santo vs. Pennsylvania). This time it is not our familiar friend, the Fourteenth Amendment, which stands in the way; it is the "commerce clause" of the Constitution—specifically, the provision which vests in Congress the power to regulate foreign commerce.

The argument of the learned justice is simple and on its face unanswerable. It runs as follows: All State statutes which by their necessary operation directly interfere with or burden foreign commerce violate the Constitution; this statute does this; therefore it is unconstitutional. In the Constitution, however, no such rule appears. The word "direct" does not occur. Whence comes the rule? It has been read into the Constitution with the passing of the years. But given the rule and a new kind of statute the problem is how to determine whether the burden is "direct." No statute precisely like the Pennsylvania statute had ever been passed on. How did the learned justice know that the burden was "direct"? His opinion is silent on the matter; he merely asserts that it is. The answer is that he did not know this; he merely assumed it for reasons not stated. In his illuminating dissenting opinion Mr. Justice Stone tells us why. He says:

> In this case the traditional test of the limit of State action by inquiring whether the interference with commerce is direct or indirect seems to me too mechanical, too uncertain in its application, and too remote from actualities, to be of value. In thus making use of the expressions, "direct" and "indirect interference" with commerce, we are doing little more than using labels to describe a result rather than any trustworthy formula by which it is reached. It is difficult to say that such permitted interferences as those enumerated in Mr. Justice Brandeis's opinion are less direct than the interferences permitted here. But it seems clear that those interferences not deemed forbidden are to be sustained, not because the effect on commerce is nominally indirect but because a consideration of all the facts and circumstances, such as the nature of the regulation, its function, the character of the business involved and the actual effect on the flow of commerce, leads to the conclusion that the regulation concerns interests peculiarly local and does not infringe the national interest in maintaining the freedom of commerce across State lines.

In other words, the learned justice sees clearly what Mr. Justice Holmes told us so long ago, that general propositions do not of themselves decide concrete cases; that a decision in a particular case rests and must rest upon judgments of social value and expediency, judgments which are often inarticulate and unexpressed, but which it is desirable to drag out into the light of day and consider carefully before coming to a decision. Thus he is led to deal with his problem realistically, in the light of modern ideas of logic and of human reasoning, and abandons the formalistic jurisprudence with which the majority apparently deceive themselves.

Whatever one may think of the present-day reluctance to concentrate additional power in the federal government, it seems clear that the matter with which the State statutes deal can best be left for regulation by State officials rather than by remote government officials in Washington. Obvious also is it that in the present state of the public mind Congress will be unlikely to undertake federal regulation of the problem involved, and that the sole practical effect of the decision will probably be to allow the defrauding of ignorant immigrants to go on unchecked. It is to be regretted that, perhaps because of a failure of some of its members to appreciate that they are in the last analysis dealing not with questions of pure logic but of policy, the majority of our highest judicial tribunal have once more shown an inability to grapple with the social realities which lie behind all legal rules.

Biographers, Beware!

HEROES have often had good cause to fear biographers, but the tables are turning and it begins to look as though, from now on, biographers may have cause to fear heroes as well. Not infrequently a Caesar dead and turned to clay has living descendants for whose existence his fame is the chief excuse. They are not always anxious that any valet's view of their progenitor should prevail. We have known of families who demanded to know what conclusions an author intended to draw from a document before they would consent to surrender it, but never until now have we heard of a suit for damages based upon the appalling theory that libel descends upon the heads of even the third generation of the descendants from those who are considered maligned.

Not long ago, to be sure, the descendants of General Burnside obtained an injunction to restrain the manufacturers of a certain shaving soap from using a picture of him as a horrible example of the results of abstention from the razor, but the protest of the son of Gladstone against the biographer who asserted that the great apostle of Victorianism was not all that he ought to have been seems to have started a new movement. News comes from France that Mme Aurore Sand, granddaughter of the novelist, has asked ten thousand francs as damages for alleged defamation of her grandmother's memory. The article in question, written by the critic, Jacques Boulenger, represents George Sand as "a woman of singular morals and innumerable lovers" who sometimes did not hesitate to use the favor of one to advance the interests of the other, and this, says the complainant, is "clearly defamatory to the memory of a dear being" who is unable to defend herself.

If M. Boulenger is guilty, then so are most of those who have written about the author of the "Histoire de ma Vie." We were, indeed, under the impression that the lady herself took no trouble to counteract the impression that her amorous history was varied, and we see no reason to suppose that she regarded the charge as anything requiring a defense. But if biographers are exposed to this new danger we perceive the likelihood of a terrible consequence. Biographies will have to be written in that style popular with cautious newspapers and which will read something like this:

> George Sand is said to have been born in 1804. Rumor has it that her parents were not married until one month before her birth, and since she is said by her contemporaries to have left her own husband it has been assumed that their relations may not have been entirely harmonious. Upon the termination of what is thought by some to have been an intimate friendship with a man who gave his name as Jules Sandeau she is said to have written "My heart is a tomb," to which this same Jules is alleged to have remarked, possibly in reference to the reported plurality of her lovers, "A tomb? It's a necropolis."

We suggest, however, that the French find a way out by the extension of that admirable and logical law of theirs which requires that any journal which prints an unfavorable review of a work of art may be compelled by the artist to print gratis his own opinion of its merit in exactly the same number of words as was used by his critics. Let the biographer be compelled to submit to a biography of himself written by his subject.

"Taxi, Mister?"

By SOL AUERBACH, of the University of Pennsylvania

I

I BROKE loose from my last examination like a wild bird whose cage door had been opened. I bought an evening paper and looked through the ads. Auto-mechanics, bakers, barbers, bricklayers, riveters, tailors. No chance for me. Perhaps a chauffeur's job . . .

I had qualms about applying to the Yellow Cab Company of Philadelphia. When I had applied to them two years before they had asked me to sign a non-union agreement and I had refused. Now they were under "Mitten Management." There would be no non-union agreement to sign, but still there was no union.

When I came into the employment office on Monday morning there were about twenty others already there. They were sitting at a table along the wall, filling out application blanks. The agent gave us the blanks, examined our driver's licenses, accepted our applications, and sent us to "school."

School was a long-drawn-out three-day affair, with no pay for our time. Doctor's examinations; intelligence tests that a five-year-old could pass; road tests that anyone who knew how to start and stop a car could pass; lectures on salesmanship, courtesy, accidents; warnings, threats. The most unbearable part of our schooling was waiting in the hot employment office between examinations. The whole course could have been completed in one day.

They told us, and repeated it again and again, that we were salesmen, selling safe transportation. They urged us to use any means to obtain riders provided we collected the fares and did not damage the company's reputation or property. My impression was that I had become a petit bourgeois, with a store on wheels, out to "go get it" and let the other fellow worry about himself.

There were fifty in the class. We sat in a crowded room, hour after hour, waiting. All kinds of men are here: Professional cab-drivers who roam from city to city and work, a few months here and there; married men who are out of work and take such a job until they find a better one; seasonal hands whose trades are dull; a stray college student. There is no one here over thirty.

Work looked like freedom when, late the third afternoon, they sold us our uniforms, took our pictures, and appointed us to garages. We had received our university diplomas. They did not know whether we knew the city or not. They let us loose to learn at the expense of the riders.

II

I was put on a night shift, 6:30 p. m. to 4:30 a. m. If my day-man came in time I was to leave the garage promptly and remain on the street for at least ten hours. If I wanted I might remain out until eight o'clock the next morning. But no later.

They gave me what was officially known as an 03 cab. The drivers called them "boilers" or "cement-mixers," and a more descriptive or appropriate name could not have been devised. They are the oldest cabs in the city. For an accelerator there is a needle in the floor that carves holes in the sole of your shoe. The lights are so poor that if you were in a dark section, of which there are plenty in Philadelphia, you could only see about ten feet ahead of you. The cab is clumsy and difficult to steer. The gears are as hard to shift as those of a five-ton truck. The car can not go up the slightest grade on high. It has no self-starter, and since we were not allowed to leave the motor running, our hands from cranking became as calloused as a pine cone. The driver's seat has no protection from rain. A tradition prevails among the cab-drivers, one that is well advised: "Don't drink milk if you drive a 'boiler.'"

We were paid on a purely commission basis of 33 1-3 per cent. About forty supervisors checked us up for speeding, cheating, running motors, sitting in the back of the cab, and other offenses. During the day the "loop," center of town, would be most profitable. In the early evening, the residential sections for the theatergoing crowd. From ten o'clock on, the "loop"—again for the theaters. From twelve to two, the cafes. After two, "rolling the tracks" for a stray fare, who is waiting hopelessly for a trolley, or "laying" at street-car junctions for the unwilling rider who has missed his car.

The cab people had the Sesquicentennial hysteria. There were twice as many Yellow Cabs on the street as in a normal summer—1,200 cabs in all. Of these, 300 were "boilers," 300 new ones, and 600 "babies," of which 200 were comparatively comfortable, the others almost as bad as the "boilers." The Quaker City Cab Company, the Yellow's chief competitor, had 700 cabs. The smaller companies, together with the independents, must have totaled about 500 cabs. Twenty-four hundred cabs look meager among a populace of 2,500,000. But the people of Philadelphia are not regular riders, the city is too large and scattered, the fares higher than in New York. Moreover, many of the regular riders leave the city in the summer.

Between the hot weather, which scattered the residents, and the double number of cabs, the drivers were "left on the back fence." It is no good "playing the loop" when there are twice as many cabs there as the public needs. There is no object in "laying" at a corner if you have to wait an hour or so to be first out. The same is true for "boxes" (company telephones placed on walls and telegraph poles throughout the city). What is the use of "playing" the theaters or cafes when the people will not get into a "boiler" but will choose a new cab out of a line-up that is big enough to haul the whole audience home?

This essay was awarded first prize in The Nation's contest for American college students who spent the summer of 1926 in industry or agriculture. The second prize was awarded to Alfhild Johnson of Oberlin College for an account of her experience in a hardware factory. The third prize went to William C. Putnam of Stanford University for his essay, Serfs of the Sea. Alfred W. Page of New Zealand contributed an article on coal mining which, although ineligible for a prize, will on account of its high merit be printed in a later issue of The Nation.

Last summer the average pay was about $20 a week, to which can be added $10 in tips, making an average earning of about $30. (Tips generally amount to one-half of the commission, if there are no lucky breaks.) This is low enough for work which demands long hours, six days a week, and some skill. I found the drivers dissatisfied. Many of the old boys were "throwing up the sponge," resigning. It is hard for a married man to live on $30 a week.

Many of the drivers worked twelve, fourteen, or even sixteen hours at a stretch. There was a time when to stay out on the street more than ten hours was the meanest thing a fellow could do. It earned for him the most disreputable epithet of all—"hungry." It meant taking bread and butter from the men who were on regular shifts. The driver's code of morality would not allow it. But now we were all "hungry." Twelve hours on the street a day would guarantee us our $35. Some would even work on their days off, to earn another $4 or $5. Twelve hours on the street really meant thirteen hours of work, for it took time to gas up, wait for your cab, have it repaired. The clock was punched when the cab left the garage.

There were some married men, generally with large families, who worked on one-man cabs. They took their cabs out at two in the afternoon and were permitted to remain out as long as they chose. When I rang in at five or six in the morning I would see them coming in. They needed the money and would set a mark, say $15 or $20 in receipts, and they would remain out until they got it. They got back to work at two the same afternoon.

Most of the cabs ran two shifts a day. The day-man might be due to take his cab out at eight in the morning. He would return at six. The night-man would take it from six until four the next morning. That left four hours which they could put in as extras between them. This was nearly always used, either by one man or both.

About seven years ago there was a union, eight hundred strong. They had a strike and lost. The company rehired the men on condition that they would sign a non-union agreement. Now the company is in the hands of the Philadelphia Rapid Transit. I asked some of the men why they didn't form a union. Well, a union is all right. But you know about so-and-so of such-and-such a union who ran away with the funds. And Mitten's got it now. He'll do something for us. The car men are satisfied. You'll see if we don't get free passes on the trolleys. And he'll throw the "boilers" on the scrap-heap. This confidence in Mitten was prevalent among the men. When I left, the Yellow Cab Company had been under Mitten Management for four months and not a thing had been done for the men.

The cab-driver is an independent salesman selling transportation, so the company would have us believe. They even replaced the old "driver" on our hats with "salesman." It was curious how this attitude worked itself into the driver's psychology. Thinking himself, more or less, in a business of his own, the driver is alienated by competition from his fellow-workers. In reality he is a wage-earner and might be considered a piece-worker. Organization of transportation workers meets with a great difficulty in the fact that the nature of the job is such that the men work by themselves or in groups of two. In the case of the cab-drivers there is the additional factor of a twofold competition, on the one hand among the men of one company, on the other between men of competing companies. This very condition is aggravated by the labor policy and training methods of the companies.

In case of strike, where the sympathy of the public is of such importance, the regular riders are not such as would give much thought to the drivers. The workingman, from whom sympathy is to be expected, is not a cab-rider. Peaceful picketing is almost impossible, since drivers are easy to obtain, and scattered.

The cab-driver, the salesman of luxuries, giving his personal services to the client, belongs to the mass of tip-takers. When I received my first few tips I felt uncomfortable. It is an awkward moment when you are counting out the change, with the question in your mind, "What will he give me? Shall I give him a quarter, two dimes, and a nickel, or two quarters?" The passenger at the same moment asks himself, "What shall I give him? That clever fellow is counting the change with an idea." Sooner or later the awkward moment becomes a part of the "racket." Tips are figured in as a part of the earnings and the driver looks upon them as his rightful wages. A quarter is a satisfactory tip. More often we got ten or fifteen cents, and many times we were "left flat."

A one-sided partnership is thus cleverly thrust upon the public. The clients pay, in the form of tips, what ordinarily the company would have to add to its salary. Gangsters and gamblers are the most liberal tippers. A workingman with his family of six once a month follows a close second. Jews, no matter of what class, are very liberal. The usual run of people that we pick out of the Bellevue-Stratford and the Ritz ride short and give you a cheap cigar or ten cents. Once I got a $5 tip from a man out of one of the big hotels—and he wasn't drunk. That is called a lucky break. It is a cabman's dream and happens once in a lifetime.

III

The Philadelphia cab-drivers come from all walks of life. The majority are under thirty, although there are some gray-haired regulars who have been in the game from the time of the hansom. Many are married men and have families to support. They are independent fellows, made more so by the nature of their work. The freedom that their work allows is their strongest argument for the job. A more motley and yet more united group would be hard to find. A fight, and you are sure to find the Yellows there en masse; a flat tire, and they are on hand to help one another. Comradely, good fellows, rough, good-natured, dirt-slingers, jack-handle wielders, yarn-spinners.

You can always tell a new man by the way he wears his uniform, by the way in which he pulls up at a stand. There was something about me at first that the observant eye of a regular caught. I could never understand what they had against the student unless it were a dim feeling of class distinction. Those of us who worked among them were not highbrow. We took our jobs seriously—perhaps too seriously. At any rate, in a week I had assimilated the language and could bandy words and hold my own in slang and curses. In about two weeks I had succeeded in hiding the student. I could make a neat turn into a stand, hop unconcernedly out of my cab, approach the group, and say, "Hello, fellows! How are they rollin'?" and listen to their stories with a straight face. I became one of them.

Those stories. In times of idleness—there were plenty of them that summer—we would collect at the stands and street corners, outside of cafes, theaters, and railroad stations. Sitting on soap-boxes, curbs, steps, someone would pull out a pack of cigarettes.

"Pack out!"

"Hey, kid, gimme one of your sticks."

"I'll tell you a funny one . . ."

Anyone at all might begin. Stories of drawn-out rides for strangers, "rollin' up a bill," drunks, crooks, lucky breaks, women. Once begun, they flowed on like a river. There was one man, a Southerner, who in a racy Southern drawl could tell stories for hours. We would hear the crunch of his brakes and his once-upon-a-time drawl at the same moment. I heard enough stories, real and imaginary, to keep a proletarian de Maupassant at work for a lifetime.

The cabman is independent in other ways. If a customer does not suit him he will turn him down. He will collect the last penny of his fare at any cost. He will not stand for "high-hat stuff" from aristocrats. He is ever ready to use his jack-handle to get rid of pests, crooks, and other undesirables. He will step in where a cop would be afraid to poke his club. Living by the street, he knows its lingo, its manners and morals, its rough-and-ready ethics. He has met people—from gangster to actress. Whether it be before a Washington Avenue gat-toter or a college professor, he preserves his dignity and self-respect. He knows the city—its speak-easies, gambling joints, houses of ill-repute, street-walkers, milkmen, breadmen, dicks.

People who have used cabs tell me that a cab-driver looks so unapproachable and straight-faced that they are afraid to speak to him. To look that way is a part of his business. There are many things that a cab-driver must not see. Strange happenings in the back of his cabs. Mysterious night journeys. All kinds of people. But those very people should hear their straight-faced, eyes-front driver talk to his buddies in his moments of idle waiting. He has seen everything. And there is hardly anything new that happens. One runs the whole gamut of such affairs in a few weeks' time.

I was on night shift. I saw the night life of the city. I had worked at night before, as a newspaper-carrier; but then I saw the breadman, the milkman, the people going to work, lunch pail in hand, wiping the sleep out of their eyes, grim, hardened to work. This summer I saw the pleasure-seeker, hardened to rum, women, and gambling.

I "played" regularly, after 1 a. m., the busiest street intersection of West Philadelphia. On the second story of one corner building was a large gambling joint. A few doors along, a saloon. A door or two on the other side, a cafe where drink and women were for sale. Two girls also "played" that corner regularly. Every night they were there and every night they were "picked up," sometimes by cops, sometimes by smart men in automobiles. Many a girl was transferred from a private car on that corner to a cab to be taken home. Men have stepped into my cab to go home and have picked a companion out of the street. I have had to lift drunks out of my cab who were so powerless that they could not open the door. During the day this corner is the business and trading center for the respectable families of West Philadelphia. These things do not happen once a week, or even once a night, but all night long in all parts of the city.

IV

This evening I have arrived early at one of the outlying boxes to catch the theatergoing crowd. Two cabs are in ahead of me and soon three more line up. We lean against the wall idly smoking cigarettes, listening now to one, now to another of the drivers "putting their line across." We never miss a detail of what happens on that corner. A cab-man's eye is alert, sharpened by the continual lookout for possible riders and by a forced lazy observation that comes from much loafing on street corners.

Business is dull. It is already 7:30 and only one cab has moved. Someone remarks that it looks like rain. We all cheer up. Rain means business.

"Yes. And now we'll get them damn rainy riders that always leaves you flat."

Thoughts of rain lead to yarns of emergency calls at breakneck speed over wet streets; or queer birds one gets when it rains. The inevitable symposium has begun.

"That's nothin'. Listen to this one."

The box is becoming "hot." I am now first out. I lean against the box beside a middle-aged driver who has listened to all that has been said. He looks at me sidewise:

"Yes, you meets all kinds of people in this business. Gee, the kinds of people I've seen—there's no telling what you're hauling. I've seen so many things and different kinds of people—dammit, I wish I could write and put it all down."

"Have you tried?" I ask him.

He blushes, looks at his feet, and says, "Aw, no!" Pause. "But, you know, I like to read. I can sit down and read all day long. Some of those stories in Adventure and Saturday Evening Post are damn good stories. And I got a set, I forget the name of it, Collier's gave it one year, Harvard something, that's got damn good stuff in it."

"You know," I said, "there is a guy who used to wish that he could write—he saw so many interesting things in life. So at night, when he came home from work, he used to sit down in a corner of his home and write down his thoughts and what he had seen. He would write every night. Now he's one of the best writers we've got. It's not so hard as you think."

"Yes, I guess it's not hard to write, but it's damn hard to make it good reading. Well, here goes your ring, buddy; go get it!"

I find it hard to reflect the psychology of the cab-driver. Perhaps a few months of acquaintance are not enough to get at the spirit that makes a group of workers out of an otherwise pied collection of men.

What difference does Plato or Aristotle make to a man who, occupied with his work for at least twelve hours, sleeping eight hours, has four hours left to dress, talk to his wife and children, and enjoy himself? As I go back to school that man is on my mind. During my few months of work among the men of the street I have learned as much as in my three years of college. I am tickled to death when a page of "The History of Aesthetics" catches on a callous. I love to squeeze the feminine hand of a student or professor in my crank-hardened grip. But to feel another palm, as hard, as calloused, in mine is one of the most beautiful sensations I have had.

What Made These Women "Modern"?

The tenth article in the series of personal revelations by well-known women will appear next week. John B. Watson, behaviorist, and Beatrice M. Hinkle, psychoanalyst, will analyze these articles for The Nation, in an attempt to discover the underlying causes of the modern woman's attitude toward men, marriage, children, and jobs.

The Mortgage Bond Industry

By HENRY S. VILLARD

SKYSCRAPER offices, apartments, and hotels, going up overnight, have brought us face to face in the big cities with problems that have suddenly become of acute importance. The first deals with the frenzied financing of these new structures; the second frames the question, Is there an economic need, or even an economic place, for them?

Close on the announcement by Franklin D. Roosevelt, chairman of the American Construction Council, that six mortgage-bond houses had agreed to adopt definite rules of procedure in their business, has come the ultimatum of Attorney General Albert Ottinger that yet more drastic regulations must henceforth be observed. Mr. Ottinger's proposals, based on a report by Keyes Winter of the Anti-Stock Fraud Bureau, are designed to check up the legality of methods in many bond houses of mushroom growth. And a glance at the tremendous building activity which at present grips the United States—New York in particular—gives confirmation to a warning recently uttered by S. W. Straus, president of the bond house of that name, that we are near the saturation-point in certain lines of construction.

It is estimated that seven billion dollars were spent last year for new building in this country, of which nearly one billion were taken up in real-estate bonds. This represents a phenomenal increase in speculative enterprises, such as office buildings and the latest luxury of the twentieth century—the apartment hotel. In 1926 the amount put into bonds alone, according to Mr. Straus, was double what it was three years ago.

The magic spring from which the money flows to finance these properties is the mortgage-bond house—a nouveau-riche cousin of our building trades, begot by the marked acceleration in late years of American "progress." Formerly the savings banks, the trust companies, the insurance firms furnished the funds for building ventures, finding such mortgages comparatively favorable in interest return and with inconsiderable principal loss. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, for example, is said to have $500,000,000 outstanding in city loans. But today the bond house is so arrogant a factor in real-estate financing that it is rapidly becoming the first resort in this field and threatening materially to narrow the mortgage channel as an outlet for the deposits of banks and the assets of insurance concerns.

The first-mortgage real-estate bond was brought forth for the purpose of tapping a new vein of capital to erect the bigger, better, and more expensive buildings we see going up on every side. Instead of obtaining funds by the old-fashioned single mortgage method, in which conservatism and safety played restraining hands, it was found far easier to divide up a large mortgage into bonds of $100, $500, or $1,000 denomination and sell them to the eager small investors in the cities and the hinterland alike. The company which underwrites the bonds advances the loan to the builder, and appropriates for itself as fat a commission as possible. And thus the trouble begins.

Mr. Ottinger's investigations, following the receivership of G. L. Miller and Company last year—who were said to have underwritten $65,000,000 in bond issues since 1920—has brought into the spotlight a number of practices which should be perturbing to the innocent buyer of the "baby bond."

First, there is the danger of over-appraisal. The New York law states that all property shall be worth at least 50 per cent more than the total amount of the mortgage. The old type of loan adheres more or less strictly to this standard. But the joker rampant in the bond industry lies in the basis of appraisal. To facilitate the birth of a bond issue at a good figure, it is not difficult to secure a higher valuation of one's property by paying a slightly higher fee to a more obliging concern.

Again, the anticipated earnings of a building are often overestimated. Because the tenants can move quickly, the worth of an office building is likely to fluctuate; yet bond buyers show such a preference for this particular form of investment, that to keep up with the demand there is an endless succession of these projects. The usual conservative mortgage of former days dealt instead with a residence—obviously sound, substantial, and finished.

A greater menace, however, lies in the prodigious extent to which this bond-selling business has grown. So profitable has the floating of mortgage bond issues proved that a host of organizations has sprung up to lure the investor who believes instinctively in the safety of a "good building loan." An army of high-pressure, highly paid salesmen is employed; and to keep these men busy earning their commissions of 2, 3, or 4 per cent, there must be an unfailing supply of new issues. An institution organized for this competitive selling game has a large overhead expense—at least three times the sum of the salesmen's commissions, according to an official of the Straus company—in the form of advertising and maintenance of the branch offices which sometimes dot the country from coast to coast; so that the salability of a given issue may become the first consideration instead of its security. Thus an enormous artificial stimulus is given to the building trade.

The anxiety of bond houses to manufacture enough bonds, lest the overhead eat up the gain, has created another peril. Contractors as well as architects are tempted to produce hasty buildings which are not sound in structure, location, or arrangement. Often the promoter or contractor steps out after collecting his profit, leaving the bondholders to shoulder any further burden. A recent article in the Annalist pointed out that bond houses have only a moral obligation for the repayment of principal and interest on the mortgages which they compete to sell. If the building proves faulty or non-profitable, the investor is "stuck."

This scramble to create and sell bond issues is of recent origin. Since the close of the war and with the start of our era of "prosperity," the American public has displayed an amazing tendency to buy "on expectancy." The old conservative mortgage invariably covered completed property. But the speculative element of high interest return on these bonds which are "built to sell" has attracted a huge class of investors who do not stop to weigh the future of buildings which are yet to be constructed. Some firms proclaim that they have had years of experience without loss to investors; but if one stops to think, that is no gilt-edged guaranty. Some companies which over a long period conducted their business in a conservative manner have in the last few years been operating at top speed under methods which may well be questioned. Attorney General Ottinger has stated that this bond type of financing did not exist prior to 1916.

"No one can pass judgment upon a loan secured by a large apartment or office building if he has only the meager information that it is possible to place before the buyer of the $100 bond," a well-known surety official writes in the National Real Estate Journal. Furthermore he warns that "the amount of poor mortgages now in existence . . . has reached such large proportions that great caution is necessary."

Not all real-estate bonds are dangerous. There are many investment bonds on the market conforming to strict loaning principles; there are many surety companies whose function it is to undertake the responsibility of a given issue; there are many houses that offer such protective devices as a separate guaranty at one-half of one per cent premium. It is the common or garden variety of bond, financing highly speculative enterprises like apartment hotels, theaters, and office buildings—construction and success of which rest in the future—which offers the commonest pitfall.

There the bait of interest at 6½ per cent, 7 per cent, or 7½ per cent entices the bond-buying public. Not infrequently a company will use the proceeds of its sale of bonds to pay the interest and sinking-fund charges, long before the structure is earning enough to carry its own mortgage. The more bonds issued, the more buildings can be started before earlier ones are completed; and the more buildings started, the more bonds can be issued. Thus the vicious circle produces a frantic and insecure building program.

Up to a certain point, an increase in building is indicative of healthy growth and prosperity. But when we approach the margin that separates a highly developed community from one that is overbuilt, and in some cases faultily built, it is time to check the pace. Many new skyscrapers in New York City, like the French and Delmonico buildings on Fifth Avenue, are finding it difficult to rent their vast space. This phase of the business is beginning to worry the bond houses themselves. An oversupply of space will tend to slow up the bond market, so that the goose that lays the golden egg is in danger of being strangled. For this reason there are many who join in Mr. Straus's view that we need a temporary lull—a six or eight months' breathing spell to catch up with the construction already available.

And Manhattan, with its overcrowded streets, should be the first of all localities to wonder whether there is an economic place for more skyscrapers—unless our mode of life is to be radically altered in the near future.

He Who Gets Slapped at Geneva

By ROGER N. BALDWIN

IF a journalist can walk right up to the head of a government in the hall of the League of Nations and give him a resounding slap in the face, no country's dignity is safe. Since Count Bethlen, Premier of Hungary, got patriotically slapped last June by an ardent young Republican, the hospitable doors of the League "palace" have been strictly guarded. The back gates of the old hotel in the park on Lake Geneva are closed, and at the front door you state your business. When the great ones come to Geneva, the screws are put on tight and every card of admission is severely scrutinized. For who knows who may be the next to get slapped?

In the face—literally—of grave international complications the highest Swiss trial court which has just sat with ponderous weight at Geneva vindicated the honor of Switzerland as a safe place of resort for dictators. A jury of twelve men found Ivan de Justh, 28-year-old Hungarian Republican exile, guilty of an outrage and bad treatment ("l'outrage et les mauvais traitements") against the head of a foreign government on Swiss soil. The court of three old judges by a vote of two to one agreed that a law of 1853 could be stretched to apply to representatives of governments at the League of Nations, although intended solely to protect diplomats accredited to Switzerland. The ardent young Mr. de Justh, suave and well-groomed—"très élégant" the press described him—was generously sentenced to only the twenty-four days he had served in jail before being released on bail, to banishment from Switzerland for ten years, and to a fine and "emolument of justice" amounting to $160 with costs of about $400. He has paid the fine and costs from his small patrimony rather than appeal, for he regards the slap as worth its cost. And there was no technical error to appeal, anyhow. He has returned to Paris to continue editing the Free Press for the thousands of Hungarian Republican exiles, and to his job as secretary of the Hungarian Republican Party. It's a moral victory, of course, like all such defeats.

Considering that the prosecution was formally requested by the Hungarian Government, that it was the first political case ever tried in Switzerland at the request of a foreign government, that it was the first time in thirty-five years that this high federal court had sat in Geneva, that it involved brand-new questions of international law in the relation of Switzerland to the League of Nations—de Justh got off lightly. I asked him what he had expected as a result when he came to Geneva from Paris last June for the express purpose of slapping Count Bethlen. He replied: "I didn't think of that at all. I was willing to take whatever came. I was interested only in making a protest against the dictatorship and terror in Hungary. Afterwards I thought that six months in prison would be about what they would give me." He explained that his act was purely personal. He planned and executed it alone without speaking of it to anyone. He came to Switzerland as a reporter for L'Ere Nouvelle of Paris and was, of course, admitted to the League meetings. He stepped up to Count Bethlen as he was coming out into the crowded hall from one of the meetings and slapped his face once, saying: "I do this for the honor of the Hungarian nation and in the name of the Hungarian people." Count Bethlen ducked into a corner, his hands over his face, evidently expecting more. De Justh made a speech to the astonished crowd and distributed copies of a statement explaining his act. When the astounded onlookers recovered their wits, two of them grabbed de Justh and held him for the police.

This was the undisputed story. The trial, therefore, was brief, covering only two days. Only two witnesses were heard, one testifying to the arrest, and the other, the secretary of the Hungarian legation, as to his official representations. The defense called none because of the certainty of revenge by the Bethlen Government on any who came from Hungary to testify as to the truth of de Justh's charges. The bare, gray courtroom was crowded chiefly with journalists and League attachés. The section reserved for the public in the rear behind a low partition was only partly filled, mostly with working-class radicals, mildly interested in this bourgeois Republican.

One of the gendarmes in the courtroom—all of whom looked like Napoleon in field uniform—unbent to observe to me: "This affair is absurd. Count Bethlen deserved what he got. If it weren't for the Hungarian Government the case would have been settled in the police court with a ten-franc fine. It's a fine spectacle to see dictators so well protected in a republican country." That was the view of the man in the street, but the "responsible" citizenry, whatever their views of the Horthy regime, felt that Switzerland must do her duty to the League.

The case was frankly political. The "common assault" was lost in high international questions. The speeches in court reeked with politics. M. Marius Moutet, of Paris, French Socialist deputy brought in as counsel for de Justh —a most unusual proceeding—made the most of the Hungarian franc forgeries. The whole Horthy-Bethlen regime, with its terror, suppressions, chicanery, and cruelties, was eloquently laid bare. Nor did Moutet fail to point out that when the Russian Soviet representative Vorovsky was assassinated at Lausanne in 1923 by Conradi, a Swiss long resident in Russia, the trial took place before an ordinary local criminal court and the jury acquitted him of "liability," though the murder was admitted. "For a simple slap," cried Moutet, "de Justh is brought before the highest federal court, while for a murder Conradi went before a cantonal criminal court."

The defense endeavored to divide Count Bethlen into two persons—one, the head of the Hungarian dictatorship, the other, the delegate to the League of Nations. De Justh explained: "I admit striking Premier Bethlen, but I had no intention of hitting a delegate to the League of Nations. I wished to strike only the head of the usurpers' government of Hungary." The prosecution observed at this point that de Justh had picked out an occasion at Geneva when Count Bethlen's several positions could hardly be separated. And anyhow it was the same face.

The jury was evidently far more moved by the prosecutor's plea to vindicate the honor of Switzerland among the nations. Said he:

> The League of Nations should be able to count on the protection of the Swiss authorities to accomplish its work of peace in a calm atmosphere of absolute respect. The whole country is interested in a verdict which will make new law, and is of the highest importance from the viewpoint of our international relations.

The jury had only to decide the facts and in half an hour brought in a unanimous verdict of guilt. The judges, with one dissenting, agreed (1) that representatives to the League of Nations are guaranteed the same protection as diplomats accredited to Switzerland by virtue of an article of the compact which provides that "representatives of the members of the League and its agents shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities in the exercise of their functions"; (2) that the old laws of 1853 applied because the Hungarian Government had officially requested the prosecution and had shown that it granted reciprocal protection to Swiss representatives in Hungary; and (3) that there were extenuating circumstances for de Justh in the fact that "his act was disinterested and that he had obeyed patriotic motives."

So it is now clearly Swiss law that any official personage who is slapped, however patriotically, at the League of Nations will have the satisfaction of invoking the power of the highest court; that the buildings of the League are not "extraterritorial" but subject to Swiss law; and that the country is safe for all dictators—except Russian.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter's recent comment that "nobody loves an automobile" has brought to him, as he knew it would, several letters of dissent and, much to his surprise, one note in agreement. M. H. W. writes in this wise:

> Our first car was an old Pierce-Arrow. It had a right-hand drive, no door for the front seat, and tires that felt their duty so keenly that it took an hour to change one of them, with all the small boys of a town about to offer encouragement. We used to put Methuselah's top back and pile in ten strong, some perched high on top of the back seat, while those below hung on to their legs to keep them from blowing away. We sang lustily as we sped under friendly trees in the evenings. We ate innumerable hot dogs in new picnic places. Do you wonder that tears were shed when Methuselah departed?
>
> There's no accounting for tastes. Take my brother-in-law's dilapidated Ford, for example. All the children loved it. It was amazing to see how, at a gathering of the clans, they preferred it to all its powerful, bran'-new, shining relatives standing near. They raced in and out of it in a steady stream. They poked their heads up through a hole in the top. They pressed every pedal and moved every available piece of apparatus. They rocked it from side to side. The clean cars stood near, disdainful, but envious.
>
> And now I come to Ebenezer, who at this moment is gazing at the back wall of a barn with a sense of melancholy neglect that sends a pang through me now and then. He—notice the pronoun, Mr. Drifter—is my first and only car. I think even you would have developed some sort of affection for him if you had seen the way he climbed mountains, sped through dust storms, dashed through mud holes. And if you had gone camping with him you couldn't have withheld your admiration. We were dependent on no hotels or tourist cabins. Ebenezer provided us with a bed. And after a car has enabled one to see Mount Shasta from the Siskiyous, and to gaze upward into the forbidding beauty of the redwoods, how can one help but love it?

* * * * *

FROM the heart of New York City comes this word:

> The fault lies not in the machine but in the owner. Automobiles are loved, but only by those who know and understand them. First, as to the average car-owner. What does he know? Pressed, he can tell you that his car has six cylinders, an oil filter, certain refinements of carburetion and ignition. But that space under the hood is still the home of mysteries to him, on the rare occasions when he peers into it. Of the beautifully interdependent functioning that goes on under his feet he is worse than ignorant; he is complacently acceptant.

The modern car has clean lines: the radiator goes up high and thin, with something of the look of a deep-chested thoroughbred horse and something of that suggestion of strength and speed and endurance. It has taken only a quarter of a century for the automobile to evolve from the high-wheeled horseless buggy to the form that exactly suits its function. What America has almost done in architecture and native music has been successfully created in the automobile—a new form and a new beauty.

And yet, admitting this, one does not truly love mere beauty. It is personality, individuality, that hold the affections. Like a new-born baby, a new car is seemingly vacuous and uninteresting.

If you would love your car, then buy it second-hand. It will be a fully developed entity, and someone else will have paid the high price and reaped the meaningless rewards of auto-snobbery and trouble-free driving on smooth pavements.

I have owned cars, and I have sold old ones to buy new. But each time an old car trundled down the street toward the resale shop and the ultimate junkman I have experienced the shame and self-reproach of a father who sells his child to slavery. Always the new car was an interloper for a time, until I could forget the old and become engrossed in the study of a new personality.

* * * * *

FINALLY, the Drifter appends a word of sympathy from a correspondent signing himself either "The Connecticut Hired Man" or "The Connecticut Fired Man," it's impossible to make out which:

> Your answer's in a summer evening down by the dock; by the roundhouse on a crisp blue winter morning. The little yawl dipping and nodding to the lazy swell, anchored at rest yet full of life, anticipation of adventure just around the headland; the engine standing shiny and glossy like a well-bred horse, steaming like a dragon, rumbling and thumping. In a cold cement tomb sits your automobile—no gentle rocking there, no clanking action, just tin and iron, dust and greasy oil. Dust and mud, effort and aching spine. Stops for this and for that. More oil—more grease. Oblivion!

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Church and School

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Hays says in The Nation: "Through this method the child, as recompense for going to church, avoids one half hour of school." Is church so much pleasanter than school that the substitution operates as a bribe? If so, ought not the school-teachers to spend the religion half-hour in attending the children's church to learn how to make teaching attractive?

Ballard Vale, Mass., February 9 STEVEN T. BYINGTON

The Bishops and the Knights

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Pastoral Letter of the American Bishops on the Mexican situation must have been sent to your office; it is not a secret document. After all, it is the bishops who speak for the church, not the Knights of Columbus. I hope you will find time to examine the pastoral. It may be good for what ails The Nation, the apparent conviction that there is no truth among us. The Catholic church in America does not want war with Mexico, any more than the two groups you so happily choose to mention together, "the Methodists and Masons." The church in Mexico does not want war with the United States. Even the Knights of Columbus do not want war—with anybody, that finely cultivated and tolerant Senator from Alabama to the contrary notwithstanding. This has been the church's attitude from the beginning, in spite of the inevitable few hot and empty heads here and there. And, by the way, that yarn about an archbishop at the head of a rebel army in Mexico is good copy—but it's not true.

St. Paul, Minnesota, February 1 BERNARD VAUGHAN,
Editor the Catholic Bulletin

The Catholic Church in Mexico

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is true that the Pastoral Letter of the Catholic Episcopate of the United States on the Religious Situation in Mexico said that "Christian principles forbid the church founded by the Prince of Peace to take up the sword or rely upon such carnal weapons as the inflamed passions of men would select." But what men say and what they do is often, sad to tell, very different.

I am afraid that Mr. Drees who quoted the pastoral letter to you has not read either the history of Mexico or of other countries in which he will find incontrovertible evidence that the "church founded by the Prince of Peace" has either used the sword direct or blessed it in the hands of its champions. He will also find that it has frequently "relied upon such carnal weapons as the inflamed passions of men would select." It is true that some noble men within the church have rebuked its hierarchy for such abuse of the teachings of the Prince of Peace, but it is also true that they have suffered at its hands for their loyalty to the teachings of the Nazarene.

In Mexico the hierarchy in the past have blessed the sword of its defenders and excommunicated faithful priests who dared to champion the poor and the oppressed. Fathers Hidalgo and Morelos were not only excommunicated but put to death for this, a crime in the eyes of the hierarchy. There is no record that the hierarchy was ever rebuked for this.

Does your correspondent know nothing of the praising by the hierarchy of the sword "of the ever-victorious Santa Anna" in the middle of the last century; of the backing by the hierarchy of the unspeakable Huerta, whom the late President Wilson refused to recognize because of his murderous record; of the actions of the Archbishop of Guadalajara in support of General Estrada in the de la Huerta revolt in 1923-1924?

Has your correspondent never read the statement of Judge Talley, the president of the most influential lay society of the Catholic church in the United States, rebuking the Government for its failure to lift the arms embargo? Has he failed to read the utterances of the Archbishop of Baltimore in the beginning of what has been misnamed "the religious controversy in Mexico"? In reality religion has little to do with the present controversy, which is between the Government of Mexico and a hierarchy which the records of history show has opposed every step toward democracy, whether in the days of Juarez or today, when the producing masses of Mexico are struggling through peaceful political action to raise their standard of living.

In conclusion I would draw your attention to the fact that the pastoral letter came only when an aroused public opinion in the United States gave warning that the powers of the Government must not be placed at the service of any church hierarchy. I would also recall the saying of the Carpenter of Nazareth: "By their fruits ye shall know them."

Mexico City, February 12 CHARLES W. ERVIN

A Victory for Force

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Since I acted by request of the Citizens Committee as chairman in two public attempts by that committee to bring about negotiations between employers and their striking employees in the paper-box makers' industry I feel a duty laid upon me to make a public statement on the termination of the struggle by the temporary defeat of the strikers.

In no spirit of partisanship and simply on the basis of the facts it must be recorded that the employers throughout the strike showed a contemptuous disregard for public opinion. Throughout the larger part of the eighteen weeks' struggle the workers were willing to negotiate. It was the employers who were determined to fight the thing through to the end. Their utmost concession was a reluctant consent to the appointment by the Mayor of a fact-finding committee whose existence, they stipulated, did not involve recognition of the union and whose conclusions they were not bound to accept. And even these concessions came too late to be of service. The workers lost their strike because the employers had the advantage of position and financial power.

Such a victory by the employers settles nothing. It increases bitterness. It remedies no basic cause of trouble in the industry. Wages and working conditions are still subnormal according to official documents of the State Labor Department. It is not a matter of indifference to the public that this should be so. Nor should those men and women in the community who sought to substitute negotiation for force see the failure of their efforts without recording their solemn protests. The hope of peaceful social progress depends upon an increase of industrial self-government and a steady improvement of conditions in those subnormal industries where conditions are worst. Both these desirable ends have been temporarily thwarted by the course of events in the paper-box makers' strike. A public which is powerless to take other action may at least be informed of the facts in order that it may render its moral judgment against a repetition of this sort of thing in the industrial life of the community.

New York, February 28 Jacob Billikopf,
Impartial Chairman, Men's Clothing Industry

Capital Punishment

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: We are informed, by the press, that Mr. Henry Ford is strongly opposed to capital punishment. We are also informed that the same gentleman has amassed a fortune, estimated at two billion dollars, by the manufacture of automobiles. Yet Mr. Ford is aware that automobiles, owing to their excessive, unnecessary, and homicidal speed (which is, in fact, illegal) are inflicting capital punishment in this country every year upon more than twenty thousand guiltless persons, one-third of whom are innocent and helpless little children.

If Mr. Henry Ford really objects to capital punishment he should reduce the speed of his automobiles to a safe and reasonable limit, and induce other manufacturers to do the same.

Denver, Colorado, February 14 Bertrand Shadwell

Civilized Arkansas

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Arkansas House, after a hot debate, barely passed the anti-evolution bill pending in the legislature; but early the next day the Senate promptly killed it without debate and without a roll call.

The Arkansas Gazette, the leading newspaper of the State, rendered conspicuous and invaluable service in this fight for intellectual freedom.

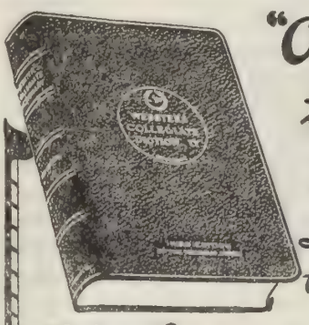
McRae, Arkansas, February 14 Clay Fulks

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

The course is open to graduates of colleges and universities of recognized standing.

Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.

Special courses will be arranged for social workers in accordance with their needs.



For information, address the

Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL
For
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)

210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

"Oh, here's that treasure of a Dictionary! I wouldn't know how to get along without my Webster's Collegiate"

Is a common expression from owners of this book

Based on WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY
Surpasses all other abridged dictionaries

Contains a wonderful Vocabulary, including hundreds of New Words, such as vitamin, novocaine, rada, balalaika, dud.
Derivations treated with Merriam-Webster accuracy.
Definitions are clear with abundant use of Illustrative Examples.
Synonyms an outstanding feature of excellence.
Illustrations selected to aid the definitions of complex objects.
Glossary of Scottish Words and Phrases. Pronouncing Gazetteer.
Vocabulary of Rimes. English Christian Names.
Pronouncing Biographical Dictionary. Foreign Words and Phrases.
Abbreviations and Arbitrary Signs used in Writing and Printing.
1700 Illustrations, 1256 Pages

LOOK for the MERRIAM Trade Mark
Sign of highest scholarship and accuracy

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY

The thin-paper edition is especially handsome and convenient to handle. Art Canvas binding, $5.00; Fabrikoid, $6.00; Leather, $7.50

Purchase of your bookseller; or send order and remittance direct to us. Write for information. Free Specimen pages if you mention The Nation.

G. & C. MERRIAM COMPANY, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Books, Music, Plays

First Glance

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY'S "The King's Henchman" (Harper: $2) has neither the form nor the force of her three earlier plays, though two of those were slight and the third was college-Elizabethan. The fault may lie with the fact that Miss Millay in the present case had to write with both eyes on the operatic stage, had in other words to perpetrate a libretto for Deems Taylor to compose by; or it may lie elsewhere. At any rate "The King's Henchman" is not much of a play, except in certain spots which I shall speak of.

The story cannot be believed. That is the first drawback, and I suspect that the weakness is not in the material as such. In some other form or through some other telling it could have become credible; a ballad, written by Miss Millay herself, or a full-length tragedy by Shakespeare might have been decidedly effective. Either a very spare handling, with bright emphasis on a few picturesque details, or a very rich handling, with plenty of space in which to motivate the fatal action, was necessary. Miss Millay, forced by opera to set a full stage and start great things going, is prevented by opera from showing that she knows anything important about human nature. The first half of the piece is the better half because there we are simply being introduced to the people and hearing them talk; and they talk fetchingly—quite indeed as if the last thing their creator knew was that tragedy lurked a few hundred lines ahead. King Eadgar's farewell to Aethelwold at Winchester, with the all-night feast that preceded and glorified it, is surely fine, and so is the first misty meeting of Aethelwold and Aelfrida in Devon, with Maccus, the "bearded nightingale," standing among the trees. But then come marriage and eventually the necessity of action; then comes Eadgar down from Winchester to see this foster-brother of his who, sent to woo Aelfrida for Queen, has stayed with her there "in the eaves of the earth." In all this latter part the plot speeds up beyond believing; decisions are made, minds are changed, death arrives without proof or warning; the opera has not given Miss Millay room to turn her genius around in, and so she gives up. The problem is introduced but never faced. To have faced it and solved it would have been perhaps to write a great play.

In the first act, and occasionally elsewhere, I thought of Shakespeare. There are a dozen lines or groups of lines in which Miss Millay is witty—in the poetical sense—as no other living poet can be. When she is free from the responsibility of conducting persons through the maze of tragedy, when she can be the lyric poet she is, she can, for instance, make Eadgar call the middle-aged bard Maccus a bearded nightingale. Archbishop Dunstan says quietly to his scoffers:

> The Church of God is not a candle.
> Blow on.

Maccus says:

> My heart hath a stone in its shoe.

And Aethelwold:

> I could do mousily by a crumb of cheese.

"And forth he went," says Ase of one Thored, "buzzing like a fly in a crack." Aelfrida after a winter of marriage chides Aethelwold:

> I see thee go forth into the wood to hunt,
> And come home like a baby with a wilted blossom in thy fist.
> Thy helmet is a house for spiders,
> And thy saddle is cold.
> Where is that Aethelwold
> That was the King's darling,
> And the dread of the Dane,
> And my true love?

And so on, in longer passages still more deeply dyed with felicity. The play abounds in uniquely lovely lines. But a play is not composed of lines any more than a poem is composed of words. There is abundant evidence here that Miss Millay is a surpassing poet; she has not in this case written a surpassing poem.

MARK VAN DOREN

Professor Quixote

Main Street and Wall Street. By William Z. Ripley. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

PROFESSOR RIPLEY—who once taught me the art and economics of railroading—has mounted a white horse, clapped a visored helmet over the merry twinkle of his eyes, encased himself in chain mail, taken a lance new sharpened from the hands of Mr. A. A. Berle, Jr., a mace from Mr. Alexander Dow of the Detroit Edison Company, a sword from the collection of Woodrow Wilson, and with spurs—perhaps provided by Mr. Ellery Sedgwick—has ridden horse and accouterments down Brattle Street, along Massachusetts Avenue, and so into State Street, and, gathering clangor, clean through the offices of the American Woolen Company, Willett-Sears, the Waltham Watch Company, the New England Power Company, and the Boston Edison Company—and so, amid an ever-growing shower of inkpots, ledgers, blackboards, adding machines, and ticker tape, along the Boston Post Road with excursions, in full regalia, into the Connecticut River Power Company, the North Adams Gas Light Company, the Associated Merchants of Connecticut, and so down Broadway to Wall Street with a frightful carnage among office breakables in the local headquarters of the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, the United States Rubber Company, the National Biscuit Company, the Studebaker Corporation, the Botany Worsted Mills, the North American Light and Power Company, Cities Service, Dodge Brothers, Incorporated, and come at last to rest, the twinkle still in his eye but with a resolute lance (resharpened by Mr. Berle en route) bedecked with the bisected annual reports of great corporations leveled (not for nothing have I read Henry James), leveled, I repeat, full at the main entrance of what might be termed, for want of a better simile, the Religious Center of the Republic, the New York Stock Exchange. . . . [Five minutes for refreshments.]

From within this awful shrine, in the face of that undrooping point, come sounds denoting terror, remorse, renunciation, and the whirring squeak of a vigorous vacuum cleaner—which all goes to prove what we Harvard men can do when we get our dander up.

All the world knows how a couple of articles in the Atlantic Monthly swept the financial centers of the country, put their author and his opinions into the headlines and the editorials of every newspaper, and finally forced the governors of the New York Stock Exchange to contemplate, if not to make, drastic revisions in the rules covering the issue of no-par-value and non-voting common stocks. These articles, greatly expanded, documented to the hilt with specific cases, have been made into a book. Perusing its sprightly pages, and skipping but few of its learned citations, I attempt to get into focus just what it was that broke so much plate glass, and splintered so many swivel chairs, along State and Wall streets.

Corporation financing, particularly since the war, is charged with the following high crimes and misdemeanors:

> A growing limitation upon the time-honored right of stockholders to participate in future issues of securities. The gravy, if any, is swallowed by the insiders.
>
> Insiders are arrogating to themselves sole right to issue new securities, often with priority over existing issues.
>
> The unrestrained right of management to dispose of new shares upon any terms it likes.
>
> Power to sell the assets or to enter into new corporate relationships without let or hindrance.
>
> The attempted exemption of directors and officers from liability for their corporate acts.
>
> Absurdly inadequate financial reports, and the muzziest sort of treatment accorded to the central problems of adequate reserves for depreciation and obsolescence.
>
> A pyramiding of intercompany securities through tier upon tier of holding companies—particularly in public utilities—that makes accurate accounting a farce, the wayfaring stockholder a powerless dummy, State corporation laws a joke when not a positive source of corruption—witness Illinois: rate regulation an incipient scandal, and any attempt to secure a true financial picture of the whirling tower of Babylon, a dream and a delusion.

In brief, the fat boys, no longer content with their ancient perquisite of milking the public, are now engaged in the dizzy and lofty job of squeezing their own stockholders dry! Whatever else it may be, it is evidence of an utterly sublime nerve. By means of the no-par-value device, non-voting common stocks, the series A, B, and double B, cumulative, participating, first, second, and third preferred—by means of a mouthful of succulent and appetizing words, Main Street buys the lot, bewildered by a show of learned terminology and beautiful engraving, while Wall Street, not out a penny, hangs on to the Series Q Management shares which control the whole works.

Owning no stock, I cannot weep with Professor Ripley at the fate—still largely prospective; it will take a business depression for the dirty work to find its stride—of the lay or garden stockholder. But I can admire the consummate skill with which he gathers his facts and states his case.

To develop that case in any detail is beyond the limits of a book review. The reader is urged to seek the original source. He will find it richly rewarding, whatever his political views. But if a summary is permissible—and I am not at all sure that it is—I would summarize the situation which Professor Ripley attacks in the following terms. Be it remembered, this is my summary and not his.

One can buy a business to operate it, and so achieve something in the nature of a public service; or one can buy it to sell again, hopefully at a profit, thus achieving nothing but confusion and rising costs. City real estate is now largely dominated by the latter motive—the gambler's motive. More and more great corporations, such as combinations of public utilities, are coming under the speculative technique. This in the face of the fact that there is very little risk, relatively speaking, in public utilities. In the place of the hard work which is so often necessary to make a concern pay handsomely by virtue of operating it well, how much easier to get control of it, make the public pay the purchase price through non-voting securities, and then retain all the profits of a resale by means of the Class Q Management shares which have cost you precisely nothing? Or hang on to the management shares and experiment with the fine art of milking subsidiaries? Of $1,500,000,000 of public utility securities now outstanding in the hands of the public, the control of the whole investment lies in the hands of a few Class Q gentlemen "who have paid not one cent for their holdings." A prettier way to eat one's cake and have it, too, it would be difficult to imagine.

Professor Ripley draws a telling parallel between the railroads a generation and more ago and the light and power industry today. The railroads went through a series of financial nightmares engineered by those great captains of industry who knew how to turn ten honest pennies by wrecking a road for every penny to be gained by soberly operating one. The terminology is incomparably more elegant today, but precisely the same up-and-coming forces are at work. Before the people of the United States—aye, even before the stockholders of the several companies—shall benefit from the magnificent new technique of giant power and its by-products, the insiders are determined to put such a load of securities on the whole fabric that all the benefits will be drained into their particular pockets. They will collect from their strategic position all that the traffic will bear in cold cash, and then, happily, get out from under before the inevitable day of reckoning and reorganization and squeezing out comes. In later years they can write success stories for the American Magazine setting forth how pluck and perseverance wrecked a magnificent engineering achievement, ruined a million minor stockholders, and loaded the electric light and power bill of every consumer with waste and loss for a generation.

The author's lance is leveled at no windmill but at a real, live, fire-breathing dragon. If he can slay it, he will save the American people a very considerable number of billions of dollars in the next decade or two.

A bespectacled professor on a horse in the middle of Wall Street. Shall he stand alone?

STUART CHASE

Study of a Sensitive Boy

Little Pitchers. By Isa Glenn. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

"LITTLE PITCHERS," Miss Isa Glenn's most worthy successor to her novel of a year ago, called "Heat," is a tragedy seen through a veil, a veil that has been arbitrarily rent in several places by the astute and sophisticated maturity of the author. To be precise, the veil is the mind and somewhat limited comprehension of young Michael Clendenning and the tragedy is the acrid and unequal struggle of his father and mother to maintain their married relationship in spite of an obvious spiritual incompatibility. The book, therefore, resolves itself into a long series of bickerings, fragmentary recriminations, broken accusations, and dimly comprehended gestures that impinge on the sensitive and somewhat foggily mystic-minded boy. The device is dangerous, for it is apt to lead into extravagant presentation, the implantation of a maturity of comprehension in the child, for instance, that should not be there, or, on the other hand, an incompleteness of texture due to an over-insistence on the juvenility of the mind through which the subject is perceived. It is a distinct vindication of Miss Glenn's technique to point out, then, that she does not fall into either morass but pursues a careful intermediate path. The reader is impressed with the fact that he is seeing or hearing nothing that has not been seen or heard by Michael, and he is also amply enlightened regarding the most subtle shifts of the relationships between Lucy and Peter Clendenning.

It is possible that Michael is an ultra-sensitive boy, but, even so, there are ample reasons for this sensitiveness. He has been dragged over half the world, for his father's labors lead him into the tropics, and he has necessarily l d a somewhat lonely life that forced his mind in upon itself. Amid the sophisticated scenes of Rio, where even the children, apparently, discuss illegitimacy with the sangfroid of the most blasé adepts, he achieves what might be called a juvenile maturity that is, however, never vicious but always somewhat innocent and wide eyed. This portion of the book is splashed with excellent color and proves again what readers of Miss Glenn's "Heat" already knew —that she is extraordinarily able in the depiction of tropic atmospheres, managing always to inject into her chapters the very feel and texture of the free, sprawling, semi-vicious, sun-heated, dirty cities of the tropic belt. It is here, too, that her characterization is at its best, such entirely delectable creations as the Mimi-Lala-Elizabeté group, for instance, standing out in pure comedy relief and yet impressing its reality on the reader.

The major (and, indeed, the only) problem in "Little Pitchers," that of the complicated relationship between Michael's parents, remains unresolved to the end, for, after all, death resolves nothing but is a mere begging of the question, an arbitrary gesture to force a conclusion. Yet the justification for such an ending should be obvious enough. There is, in reality, no meeting-place for Peter and Lucy, since their minds move in different orbits. Lucy's looseness of behavior is as natural to her as self-preening is natural to a cat, and Peter's perplexed and somewhat trite protest is a sure index to his character. Although a superficial examination may place Peter higher in the moral scale it is obvious that he is not so likable a personality as Lucy. He is a little heavy, a "woman's-place-is-in-the-home" type of man. Michael, it is to be feared, is somewhat of a childish replica of him. Lucy, on the contrary, is a woman of instincts and vanities commingled of sensuous and sensitive substances. She loves life more than duties and it is this more than anything else that drives her into the various illicit affairs with rather unworthy men. Miss Glenn has drawn this type with an unclouded reality, and, because it is so well drawn, "Little Pitchers" takes its place among the season's distinguished fiction.

HERBERT S. GORMAN

A Pressed Flower

All Summer in a Day. An Autobiographical Fantasia. By Sacheverell Sitwell. George H. Doran Company. $3.50.

"All Summer in a Day" is in the tradition of English introspective literature. It treats much that is trivial or intimate without the salacity of confession we are accustomed to call French, without the frantic anxiety for sympathy we term Slavic, and without the matter-of-factness of the American. Nevertheless, in the fruitful field of the "Religio Medici," "Confessions of an Opium Eater," "Essays of Elia," and "Winterslow" Mr. Sitwell's fantasia ranks at best as a very low shrub. Nourished on a more positive character—for good or for ill—it might have risen somewhat, but only when steadied by some sense of the architecture of writing could it have really achieved altitude. Construction above all other qualities it lacks; its author appears to depend more upon a vague lyrical response from his readers rather than upon their understanding.

A mood he does achieve, and in passages we are apt to forget the disjointed English of the whole—passages that somehow flower exotically in a room whose blinds are drawn. There are moments when one feels at home, entertained by a sense of recognition and a familiar sadness, as of rain sounding on the sky-light. Both the lush somnolence of the sentences and the quick entry and exit of pasteboard people in one attitude or another create this sadness. It is not without its pale beauty when undiluted by the author's comment, and one may even be led to feel that the book has lasting images, substantial experiences rendered with art by one who is intrinsically a poet; and here and there is a sentence valuable for its sound.

The insignificance of the content and the relaxation of the style, however, are too great a strain. We have come to expect little else from the younger and polished literati of England, and if sociology points to an aristocracy that lacks a raison d'être, criticism should take the clue and call men with more vital backgrounds to the task, plus the privilege, of expressing the period. Only in the face of a book like "All Summer in a Day" is the passive and craven character of contemporary criticism apparent. In Crocean fashion we refrain from criticizing books for what they are not; but when books throw us insidiously, as an excuse for continued existence, only the sensationalism of an acute animal, it is high time to criticize those books adversely for what is not in them. Yet when criticism does take the offensive, "All Summer in a Day" with its "degree of immortality that a flower possesses pressed between the pages of a book" will be found comparatively only a minor offender.

JOHN WALDHORN GASSNER

Young China

The Youth Movement in China. By Tsi C. Wang. New Republic. $1.

WHERE else are youth so young, so full of the springtime of the world, and yet so old, so burdened with a sense of their responsibility to the world, as in China today? Where else, indeed, are youth so important?

There, in a sense, a generation is being sacrificed on the altar of progress. There are no middle-aged men in modern China. There are grand old men, survivals of the old regime; and young men, fresh from Western education. The old men cannot adapt themselves to the swirling changes; the young men are forced to act beyond their capacities. "It is unfortunate for men of talent to be born in China today," Hu Shih said to me once, "they get too far too easily; they are pushed rapidly to responsibilities beyond their powers—and they are done. Wellington Koo would have made a splendid permanent under secretary of the Foreign Office—he is made Prime Minister; Wu Pei-fu an excellent division commander—he has to try to be a generalissimo; two years after I returned from America a newspaper straw ballot declared me one of the twelve greatest living Chinese! When you have made a reputation you have to do one of two things: live up to it or live on it. In the first case, you are ruined physically; in the second you are ruined morally and intellectually. You try to be a great man; you try to do too many things—and you break."

Boys out of college perforce assume jobs fit for men of mature years; college students do the work done in the West by men in their thirties; and mere high-school lads do a task of political agitation for which we would consider college men unripe. They do it badly enough; but there is no remedy; the twentieth century will not wait, and the work has to be done. The foreigners, safe in their compounds, complain that the boys are losing their schooling; but the students know that they are making young China.

An old Chinese maxim said "Be old while you are young." In the West, Chen Tu-shu told his Peking students, we say "Stay young while you are growing old." Chen, like many Chinese, exaggerated our virtue, but it was a lesson old China needed. Without the iconoclastic students Sun Yat-sen's long years of revolutionary activity would have been vain; the students poured their souls and blood into the Second Revolution that seemed to fail in 1913; and it was the students of Peking who, in 1919, overturned a rotten and corrupt government, aroused a sodden nation, and forced a surprised delegation at Paris to refuse to sign the Treaty of Versailles which confirmed Japan—for three short years—in possession of the sacred province of Shantung. It was a group of just returned students who, in the preceding two years, had laid the foundations of a greater revolution by exalting the spoken language of the people, decrying the artificiality of the old written language of the scholars, thus opening the way for a great germination of mass education. It was a student demonstration in Shanghai which, silenced for a minute by police guns, touched the spark that set the Chinese nation aflame in 1925 with a fire which is still scorching the proud British Empire. It is in the mere children who leave their classes for what seem futile patriotic parades that China's hope lies. Where in our discouraged West would a student deliberately break his finger to write in blood "Save our Tsingtao"; and where else would that gesture seem a holy act and arouse millions to determination?

The Iliad of the Chinese student movement has yet to be written. Dr. Wang's little book is a stirring, turgid outline of its genesis. It follows the record of the first foreign students, the era of translations, the Literary Renaissance, the anti-religious movements, the triumphant Peking movement of 1919. Apparently Dr. Wang left China in 1922, and his story is not brought to date. The Shanghai movement is hardly touched upon; the interrelation of the student and labor movements is barely hinted. His book lacks evidence of the most elementary editing—Hu Shih's name, for instance, is spelled in four different ways; other names are almost as erratic, and the proofreading is wretched. Yet somehow the springtide of China's youth movement surges across its pages; I began reading late, and could not sleep until I had finished. Translations of student diaries and of pages from Hu's, Chen's, and others' elsewhere untranslated writings convey the passion and poetry and color of the young generation in China. Too many foreign-trained Chinese students lose their roots; they write the history of their own country from foreign sources; in these pages of translation Dr. Wang gives us a kind of telescope through which we can watch the comet-course of this young and inexplicably living China.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

John Bull and Brother Jonathan

The American in England During the First Half Century of Independence. By Robert E. Spiller. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

MR. SPILLER gives us an entertaining summary of the impressions of rather more than a hundred American travelers in Great Britain between 1780 and 1835. The list of names is impressive. It includes writers like Irving, Cooper, Longfellow, and N. P. Willis; scholars like Ticknor, Benjamin Silliman, and Jared Sparks; artists like Benjamin West, Washington Allston, and S. F. B. Morse; and, of course, the envoys—John Adams, Richard Rush, Albert Gallatin, and Martin Van Buren. Only about twenty-five of them actually wrote books of travel, but Mr. Spiller has extracted the opinions of others from diary jottings, letters, and fugitive publications. The record as a whole is vivacious, interesting, and, though too superficial to have much value for the specialist in English social history, informing for the general reader.

It has the merit of throwing nearly as much light upon the American character and point of view as upon the British. This was a period when England was still the mother country, when men of cultivation were naturally Anglophiles, and when Washington Irving could be one month on the hostile Canadian border with his militia regiment and the next month fraternizing on board an Atlantic packet with British officers. Most Americans were deferential. Young James Gallatin, to be sure, remarked that "I frankly don't like England or English customs and manners," and Fenimore Cooper attacked the vices and artificiality of English aristocracy as warmly as he attacked the crudity of American democracy. Numerous travelers complained of the English reserve of manner. But the dominant note was that struck by Irving in his idealizations of English country life, literary scenes, and hospitality. Rush and N. P. Willis took a keen delight in London society. Silliman, spending a year abroad in search of scientific enlightenment, was as much impressed as Ticknor by England's cultural superiority. American business men, like the manufacturer Zechariah Allen, envied the enterprise and energy of the British industrial centers. American artists delighted in the picturesque beauty of the country and the high station accorded to the arts. As America grew toward maturity, however, this deferential attitude was strongly modified.

The amusing incidents which can be caught up in a book like this, the picturesque descriptive bits, constitute its principal charm for the general reader. Royalty received generous attention. Elkanah Watson saw George III go before Parliament to make his memorable acknowledgment of American freedom, and dwelt upon the anguish and despair on the long visages of the American Tories in the gallery; young Gallatin saw George IV come home drunk from a cockfight, fat, redfaced, and staggering. William Austen described Fox—slovenly, unwieldy, ungracious, and shrill, yet irresistibly fascinating—and Rush the "intuitive and brilliant" Canning, while Nathaniel Wheaton listened to Macaulay's first public speech in London, long and loudly applauded. Few Americans failed to invent an opportunity to call upon at least one or two literary lights. It is noteworthy that they sought out the well-established authors of the day, such as Wordsworth, Coleridge, Scott, Rogers, and Moore, and paid no attention to figures like Keats. Hannah More and Barry Cornwall were more important in American eyes than Lamb and Hazlitt. Coleridge talked right through every Yankee who knocked at his door, and Wordsworth, with leggings and green goggles, edified them with—as one put it—"sound remark and didactic wisdom."

The volume is in some respects disappointing. These supposedly inquisitive Yankees paid little attention to the lower classes and the industrial revolution; they were not much interested in education or government; they saw little but the upper strata of English society and the outside of British institutions. They were acquiescent and uncritical. But Mr. Spiller has made the most of his material and given us clues to a great deal of buried information.

ALLAN NEVINS

The Emerging Balkans

The New Balkans. By Hamilton Fish Armstrong. With an Introduction by Archibald Cary Coolidge. Harper and Brothers. $3.

THIS book is not, as its title might suggest, a survey of post-war Balkan conditions but a collection of more or less unrelated articles of unequal merit on "a few of the special problems that are troubling, or may at any time trouble, the Balkan peninsula." It lacks organic unity. But this defect, aggravated by the absence of an index and even a short bibliography, is partly made up for by Professor Coolidge's brief, adequate introduction, which provides an indispensable historical background. The author's temper is all that could be desired. He is free alike from strident partisanship for one or another of the Balkan nations and from an attitude of condescension toward all of them characteristic of much of the work of outsiders on the subject.

No part of the globe has undergone greater changes during the last fifteen years than the southeastern corner of Europe. These changes in the southeast, combined with the general transformation of the European map, have resulted, startlingly enough, in a palpable decline of the international importance of the Balkan peninsula. The disappearance of Austria-Hungary, the return of Germany to the Bismarckian tradition of aloofness from Balkan affairs, the withdrawal—however temporary and partial—of Russia from the Balkan scene, the break-up of the system of European alliances, and the creation of the League of Nations, whose dominant members, Great Britain and France, are primarily interested in the maintenance of the Balkan status quo and the preservation of peace, have greatly simplified the Balkan situation and robbed the game of haute politique, in which the Balkan states were mere pawns, of much of its pre-war complexity and zest. M. Seignobos's remark, indorsed by the author, that "the whole political history of Europe since 1871 has concentrated in the Balkan peninsula," while made in 1896, still held good in 1914, as Serajevo and its aftermath showed; but it would be a gross exaggeration today. Professor Coolidge warns that "the eternal Eastern Question is still with us"; but in a greatly modified and attenuated form.

As regards the outlook for Balkan peace, Mr. Armstrong, though reasonably optimistic, wisely refrains from definite prophecy. But he does record his conviction, which the reviewer shares, that Balkan peace should and will be promoted by the Balkan states themselves rather than by either the Great Powers or that much-advertised combination, the Little Entente. With its population of forty millions and its area of 320,000 square miles, distributed among six sovereign states, the Balkan peninsula offers sufficient scope for an exclusively Balkan pact of non-aggression. That the settlement of the outstanding differences among the Balkan states must precede this consummation goes without saying. And though there are many obstacles to be overcome, there are distinct signs of a new Balkan spirit abroad—a consequence of the disillusionment of war or of the attainment of national aspirations—which makes the prospects of peace considerably brighter than they have been at any time since the Congress of Berlin. We are witnessing the moral de-balkanization of the Balkan peninsula heralded by such un-Balkan portents as preoccupation with economic interests, a growing realization of the economic interdependence of the Balkan nations, a distinct decline of intransigent nationalism and irredentism, and an unmistakable attitude of sophistication and mistrust toward the European Powers. The Balkan peninsula has lived through—and survived—its age of innocence.

NICHOLAS S. KALTCHAS

Books in Brief

Frederic Harrison: Thoughts and Memories. By Austin Harrison. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

Mr. Austin Harrison has set down a stimulating and at times a vivacious account of liberal tendencies in Victorian England, with particular emphasis upon English positivism, in which his father, Frederic Harrison, was the dominant personality. The family note is entirely absent. The volume moves forward with a singular justness of tone. Clearly Mr. Austin Harrison is not a positivist himself; he has too much humor. And he has too much historical imagination to decry the intellectual milieu of the Oxford men. The age produced a fighting sociology and a fighting science whose implications we are still struggling with. But in the meantime it left many gifted men in an impasse, spiritually with the theologians, intellectually with Huxley, Clifford, and Tyndall. Frederic Harrison was such a man, and his chief reward for his sixty years of effort to acclimatize the philosophy of Auguste Comte in England was the suspicion that he sympathized with Catholicism for the plain reason that he did not sympathize with Protestantism. Thus, even in his heresy, choosing French humanism when the cry was all for evolution, Frederic Harrison was on the unpopular side, and his son leaves him there, with tact and sympathy and a wry smile at the irony of it.

The Culture of Ancient Greece and Rome. By F. Poland, E. Reisinger, and R. Wagner. Little, Brown and Company. $6.

This volume has definitely solved an "outline" problem of long standing; how to present to the semi-lettered multitude the splendors of classical antiquity in one moderately sized volume. We are presented here with a concise and penetrating study of the life, thought, and culture which have come down to us from Greece and Rome—a study intended for plain people who have neither time nor opportunity for specializing study. Outstanding features of the book are the many and excellent illustrations and the references to the latest literary and archaeological discoveries.

Homes of the Freed. By Rossa B. Cooley. The New Republic. $1.

Negro Illegitimacy in New York City. By Ruth Reed. Columbia University Press.

Here are two books about the Negro woman, as amazingly different as two books on the same subject can well be. The first is a vivid and moving account of the struggle upward toward homes and common decency as exemplified in the Carolina islands; the second is a description of a group of Negro mothers living in a furnished room in the city, with a man who may or may not be the husband, who may or may not be the father of the children. In both books we see Negro women caught in problems which are theirs both as women and as Negroes, working out these problems through the assistance of white agencies. "Homes of the Freed" has some significance as a sociological document but most of all it is an idyl; it has about it the naive charm of simpler and earlier days. Persons who like mental shocks might read it along with "Nigger Heaven." There is nothing idyllic about Miss Reed's study of five hundred Negro mothers. On the whole they show attitudes and attempts at adjustment to a difficult situation which are in no way distinctively racial. The economic independence of the Negro woman appears to be a phase which passes as the husband's earnings increase, while among the well-to-do cultured class Miss Reed finds standards of family life characteristic of the Puritan era.

The Wives of Henry the Eighth. By Martin Hume. Brentano's. $4.

Mr. Hume will have it, in flat contradiction of Froude, that Henry's two beheaded spouses—Ann Boleyn and Katharine Howard—were both guiltless victims of royal tyranny. Not the least amusing and instructive parts of the volume are the portraits of Henry's six wives, done in the staring, pop-eyed, Holbein and Frans Hals manner. If the portraits (both contemporary) of Ann Boleyn and Katharine Howard are faithful presentations, Mr. Hume has won his argument against Froude, and the ultimate verdict of history, confronted with such startling homeliness, must be: not guilty.

Desert: A Legend. By Martin Armstrong. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

In the year 420 A.D. Palladius, bishop of Helenopolis, finished his "Book of Paradise," perhaps the oldest and surely the most suggestive account of the early Christian ascetics. This book is a mine not only of information but of romance, and Mr. Armstrong has done well to sink shafts in it and stope out the contents of its rich veins. Moreover he has worked upon Palladius's precious ores with an artist's imagination, carving them in lovely patterns and adding here and there some rich jewel from his own storehouse. The result is an understanding reconstruction of those curious days when a wealthy young Alexandrian might well abandon the fleshly sophistication of the city to seek spiritual comfort and the salvation of his soul as a lonely hermit in the desert. Malchus's monkly torments and temptations and his various adventures, spiritual and physical, in his difficult pursuit of holiness are both psychologically and archaeologically convincing. Less vivid perhaps are the few scenes laid in Alexandria.

Music

"The King's Henchman"

THE success of "The King's Henchman" has spanned so much of the future for American music that it looms up more important than the work itself. The preliminary interest one can discount by clever publicity and the personal popularity of Deems Taylor, the composer, and Edna St. Vincent Millay, who wrote the libretto. The professional character of the dress rehearsal, the social brilliance of the first-night audience, and the unprecedented box-office receipts for the premiere of an American opera attest merely to this. But a sold-out house greeted the second performance, which means that the public as well as the critics gave their approval. It means, too, that confidence has been established in the American composer where there has never been confidence before—a fact already emphasized by the equally unprecedented act of the Metropolitan in commissioning another opera from Mr. Taylor. Because of this effect upon the public it is less necessary at this period in our musical history that "The King's Henchman" be of great originality and far-reaching musical consequence than that it be a good opera. And this is what Mr. Taylor has achieved.

That a composer should seek his libretto from a poet, as

Mr. Taylor did, is a cause for congratulation in any country—especially such a libretto as Miss Millay furnished. The tale itself has been told too often now to be more than touched upon: Eadgar, King of England, and a widower, "burns" to marry again. Hearing of the beauty of Aelfrida, daughter of the Thane of Devon, he sends his foster brother and dearest friend, Aethelwold, to verify the report. Aethelwold sets off unwillingly, for he knows and cares nothing about women. That night he loses his way in a woods near Aelfrida's house and there meets Aelfrida herself. It is Hallowe'en, and Aelfrida has come to seek "in rune and spell" a lover more to her liking than the country bumpkin her father has selected. The two fall in love, neither knowing who the other is. And when Aethelwold finally does learn the truth, he is so helpless in the power of this magic that he lies to the king about Aelfrida's beauty, and marries her himself. Marriage does not bring happiness, however. Aethelwold is tormented by his treachery to the king; and Aelfrida is discontented with her humdrum existence. Both indeed have agreed to flee to Flanders when Eadgar suddenly arrives on a friendly visit. Seing Aelfrida, he understands all. And Aethelwold, unable to bear Eadgar's noble reproach, falls upon his sword.

This tale undoubtedly bears analogies to Wagner's "Tristan," and Mr. Taylor has treated it in similar mood. The question is, however, whether it can stand such treatment. Miss Millay's characters are far more human than they are heroic. Aelfrida is a vain, shallow creature who might well have saved her husband had she but heeded his plea to make herself ugly rather than to make herself more beautiful, as she did, to greet the king. Aethelwold was quite willing to continue to deceive the king to the very end. Even their love scene lacked the epic passion of "Tristan." "I am lost!—I am swept out to sea!" cries Aelfrida, dazed by this new emotion. And Aethelwold, "Thou—knowest thou aught of love and how it taketh a man? Thinkest thou I am in love with thee?" Eadgar, too, young and personable, is quite human in his desires and affections.

And yet Mr. Taylor has chosen to treat this text heroically. His orchestra surges symphonically with an ebb and flow of passion truly Wagnerian. Strings and brasses, rather than the voices, carry the burden of the drama with little variety. In fact, the voices are too often submerged by the instruments, which was all the more unfortunate, as Lawrence Tibbett, Edward Johnston, and Florence Easton—cast respectively as Eadgar, Aethelwold, and Aelfrida—sang superbly. This may have been partly due to Tullio Serafin, who conducted finely but ruthlessly, as far as the singers were concerned. On the other hand, Mr. Taylor used his chorus with beautiful effect in the first act, where it was punctuated by the solo voices, and in the second act, where it played echo to the lovers. The sighing of the wind through the birch saplings, though too long, was also well presented by the orchestra. And the harp accompaniment to Maccus's song in the first act gave an appropriate atmosphere to the early Saxon setting that might have been utilized again with great relief. A few more pauses would also have been welcome.

It has been pointed out that Miss Millay's libretto was literary rather than dramatic. Literary it was—one of the finest librettos from that standpoint since "Pelléas." But it would be equally true, perhaps, to say that it was lyrical rather than dramatic, whereas Mr. Taylor's score was just the opposite. Even the interpolated "Beggar on Horseback" suffered from this treatment. For the rest, the music was conventional, and distinguished only by a genuine emotional content. Nevertheless, it was this very conventionality that made it acceptable to the Metropolitan and the public, and so paved the way for the "great" American composer. The latter is not yet safe, for only a few nights later one die-hard remarked, "I wouldn't even go to hear an American opera. English and grand opera don't go together." And that was from an American!

HENRIETTA STRAUS

ONE CRYSTAL AND A MOTHER
By ELLEN DU POIS TAYLOR

"Astonishing! I never came across a first or an early novel that had half its brilliancy." — Ford Madox Ford.
"So sophisticated, so amusing, so sharp, so brilliant and so intelligent, and it keeps on being, page after page."—Fanny Butcher in Chicago Tribune. $2.00

THE KING'S HENCHMAN
By EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY

"As simple, as stately and as heart-breaking as anything Miss Millay has ever written." — Elinor Wylie in the N. Y. Herald Tribune. $2.00

HARPER & BROTHERS :: Publishers

137
Leading critics of the country call Lewis Browne's book the most picturesque and absorbing story of religions ever written.

This Believing World

By the author of "Stranger than Fiction"
Eighth large printing
Macmillan • $3.50

Drama

Pastiche

DORRANCE DAVIS, author of "A Lady in Love" (Lyceum Theater), has concocted a fairly amusing play, but he has at the same time unwillingly demonstrated how nearly impossible it is to capture a style which no longer has any vital relation to life.

The scene of the piece is London in 1680, and its aim is to recapture the spirit of the comedy of that time. The characters beloved of the Restoration dramatists—the pert miss, the suspicious old husband, and the roistering young blade—are put through their familiar paces and they are made to express themselves in witty phrases of wicked import. The plot consists wholly of a series of elaborate intrigues which reach their climax when the husband is made unwittingly to send the young lover into his own wife's bed, and thus far the imitation is fairly successful. Yet though both the characters and the situations are modeled closely upon their prototypes, the author cannot avoid betraying the modernity of his sensibilities by introducing motives and sentiments wholly alien to the pattern of the Restoration mind. There are times when he plays both wittingly and effectively with the humorous possibilities of anachronism, as when, for example, he makes one of his three ladies of the town exclaim "Gadzooks, girls, the house is pinched"; but it is not of such intentional lapses that I am thinking, for time and time again the illusion is shattered by an incident or an emotional coloring which, to anyone at all sensitive to such things, is as obviously false as the touch of Renoir would be in a copy of a Flemish primitive.

Thus when he makes the young wife in her lover's arms speak pathetically of the torture which for seven years she has endured through the necessity of living with the husband whom her father had forced upon her, he is appealing to a particular strain of sentimental pity which, if not exactly modern, was not discovered until the eighteenth century, and he is using it as an excuse for an adultery which no Restoration comic writer would have thought of as needing any excuse at all. The villainous husband, hoist on his own petard, is made to exclaim at last "Very well then, I will give you a divorce," and it is not mere pedantry to point out that since no divorce was obtainable in England except from an ecclesiastical court until well into the nineteenth century, no Restoration writer would have been able to understand what such a conclusion was supposed to mean. Not only would it have been contrary to any known law but equally contrary to the requirements of the emotional pattern of the audiences as well. "A Lady in Love," amusing though it is, suffers from the defect of all pastiche—whenever it begins to take on life it tends to miss the style which it is attempting. A play written as some other age would have written it is inevitably either a wax-work or full of mental and emotional anachronisms. A first-rate modern play about seventeenth-century London would have to be as far different from Congreve as Shakespeare is from Plutarch.

"Set a Thief" (Empire Theater) is one of those regulation mystery melodramas in which every male member of the cast is suspected of having done the crime in which, as it turns out, most did have a hand. Those who have studied criminology by means of the theater will suspect from the start that the man to whom all the evidence points is not really guilty, and they will suspect it not only because all the evidence does so point but even more because the nice young girl is in love with him. Mystery plays generally reveal a cynical attitude toward most things. The police are crooked and the most respectable looking gentlemen usually unconscionable rogues. But young love is sacred. Ministers of the gospel turn out to be yeggmen, detectives rob safes, and even bankers are cast down; but romance is never destroyed; and the man who is loved by a beautiful girl is never guilty.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Just Published at

95 Cents a Copy

Seven Important Additions to

THE MODERN LIBRARY

OF THE WORLD'S BEST BOOKS

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI

Volume No. 3 — 95c

John Addington Symonds' famous translation. A complete and unabridged edition of one of the most singular and fascinating books in existence, identical in content with editions priced up to ten dollars a copy.

THE PURPLE LAND

Volume No. 24 — 95c

By W. H. HUDSON. One of Hudson's best loved books, with a new introduction by William McFee. W. H. Hudson's "Green Mansions," with John Galsworthy's introduction, is volume number 89 in the Modern Library.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPINOZA

Volume No. 60 — 95c

Selected from his chief works with a life of Spinoza and an introduction by JOSEPH RATNER. "This book will immensely assist to get Spinoza read and understood as well as honored. If Mr. Ratner had not actually accomplished the task, I should not have thought it possible."—John Dewey.

ECCE HOMO and THE BIRTH OF TRAGEDY

Volume No. 68 — 95c

By NIETZSCHE. Translated by Clifton P. Fadiman. Other Nietzsche volumes in the Modern Library: THUS SPAKE ZARATHUSTRA (No. 9). BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL (No. 20). GENEALOGY OF MORALS (No. 62).

THE SCARLET LETTER

Volume No. 93 — 95c

By NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE. With a new introduction by William Lyon Phelps. The inclusion of this volume adds the name of Hawthorne to a roster of American authors that already contains Poe, Whitman, James, Melville, Dreiser, Anderson, Hearn, Crane, Bierce, O'Neill, Hecht, and Beebe.

MODERN AMERICAN POETRY

Volume No. 127 — 95c

An ANTHOLOGY. Compiled by Conrad Aiken. Includes contributions by Emily Dickinson, Edwin Robinson, Robert Frost, Vachel Lindsay, Amy Lowell, Edna Millay, and many others.

THE CREAM OF THE JEST

Volume No. 126 — 95c

By JAMES BRANCH CABELL. With an introduction by Harold Ward. The most charming of all Mr. Cabell's romances of that fascinating land which he calls Poictesme.

"TEN BEST SELLERS" in the MODERN LIBRARY

BUTLER'S WAY OF ALL FLESH.....(No. 13)
WILDE'S DORIAN GRAY...(No. 1)
FRANCE'S THE RED LILY .(No. 7)
HARDY'S RETURN OF THE NATIVE.....(No. 121)
LEWISOHN'S UPSTREAM.(No. 123)
BEERBOHM'S ZULEIKA DOBSON.....(No. 116)
DOUGLAS' SOUTH WIND...(No. 5)
GAUTIER'S MLLE. DE MAUPIN.....(No. 53)
ANDERSON'S WINESBURG, OHIO.....(No. 104)
MELVILLE'S MOBY DICK (No. 119)

UNABRIDGED, AUTHORIZED EDITIONS
LARGE TYPE : GOOD PAPER · LIMP BINDING : POCKET SIZE : 130 TITLES

95 cents a copy at every bookstore in America. (One Dollar in Canada). Send for free illustrated catalogue describing all 130 titles.
MODERN LIBRARY, INC. · 71 West 45th Street, New York

MODERN LIBRARY

Use this Coupon Today →

N 4

To YOUR BOOKSELLER, or
THE MODERN LIBRARY, INCORPORATED,
71 West 45th Street, New York City.

Please mail me MODERN LIBRARY book Nos.....

☐ I enclose $1.00 for each volume (95c for the book, 5c for postage).
☐ Send books C. O. D.
☐ Please send me, free of charge, your new illustrated catalogue, describing all of the books in the Modern Library.

Name.....
Address.....
City..... State.....

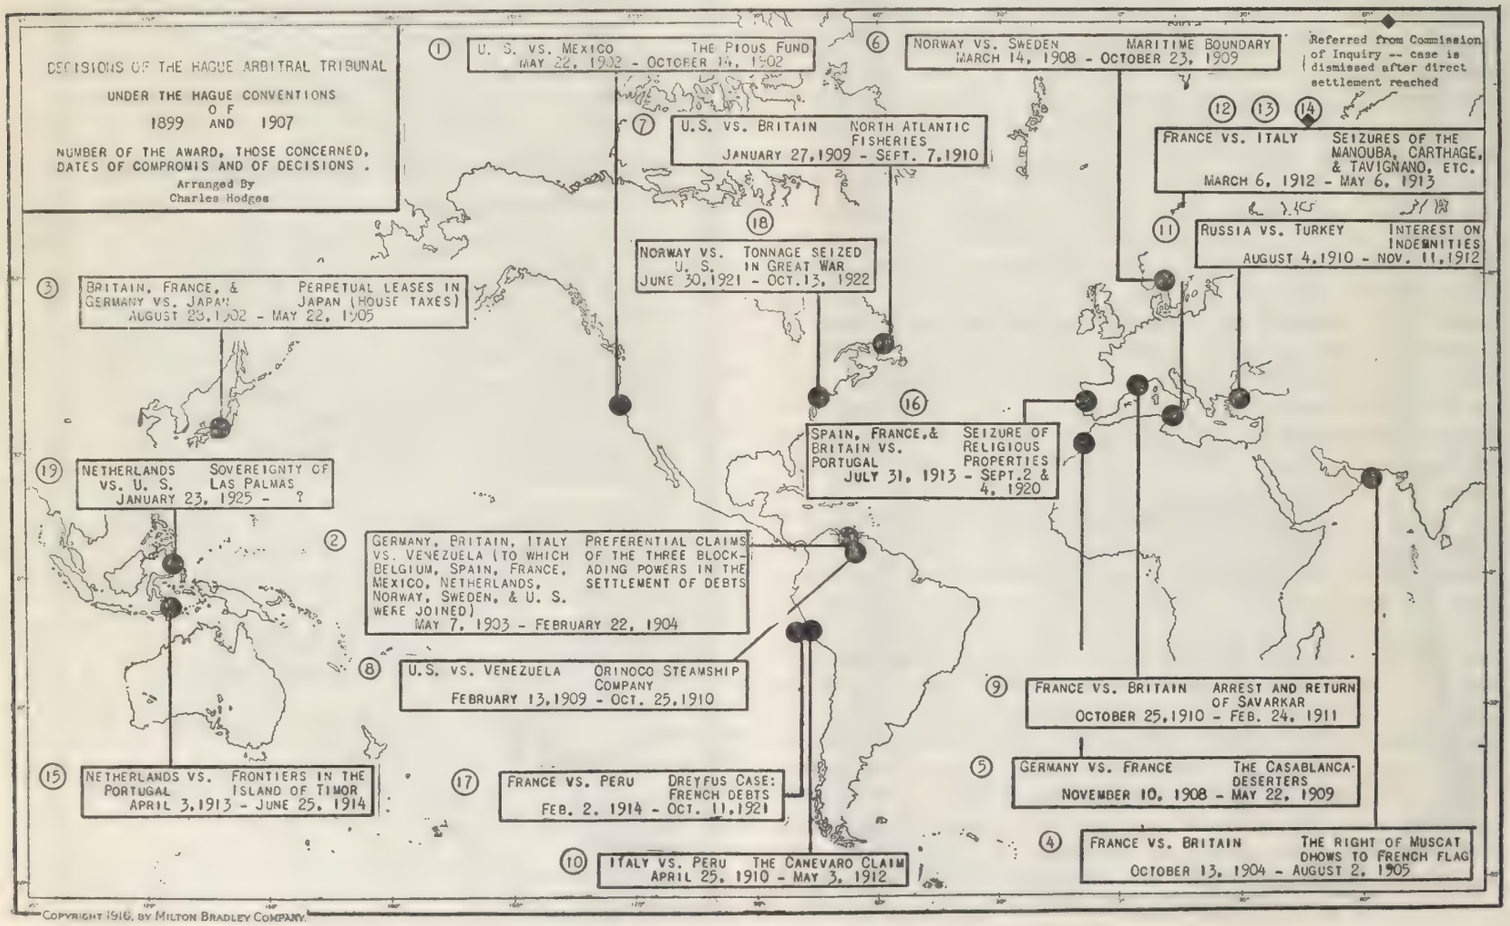
International Relations Section

Two World Tribunals



By CHARLES HODGES

WORLD justice today rests upon two tribunals—one the court of arbitral procedure agreed upon at the First Hague Conference of 1899; the other that of judicial settlement established as a result of the Paris Peace Conference of 1919.

For the purpose of setting the picture, it suffices to say that the quarter of a century standing between these two world tribunals is all-important to an understanding of their respective roles. The Hague Arbitral Tribunal represents the culmination of centuries of development in the arbitration of differences between nations. From the days of ancient Greece, where about 75 arbitrations are recorded with the awards of the Amphictyonic Council executed in a ratio of 17 to 3,[1] to the present there has been a steady growth of arbitral settlements by special agreement, general treaty, and tribunal. Indeed arbitration was the battle-cry of nineteenth-century internationalists, who pointed with satisfaction to the negotiation of between 281 and 314 treaties providing for arbitral settlements[2] and some 200 actual arbitrations of differences during this hundred years,[3] every award having been accepted. Moreover, from the launching of the Hague Tribunal in 1899 to the European crises immediately preceding the Great War the number of agreements providing for "compulsory" arbitration in pursuance of Article 19 of the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes increased from 2 in 1903 to 80 in 1908.[4] In other words, arbitration had won an established place in the world at the time the tribunal was projected at the Hague while its activities were carried on against a background of treaty obligations binding the nations more and more to resort to its procedure.

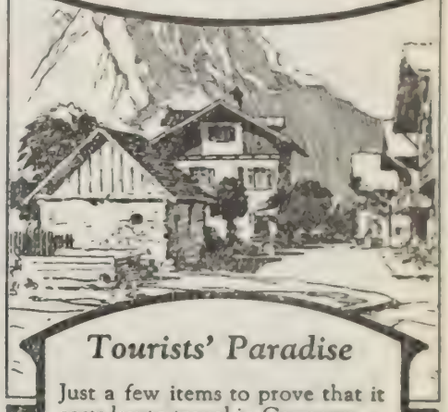
By way of contrast, the World Court—the Permanent Court of International Justice—which came to be housed under the same roof in the Peace Palace at the Hague stands out as the realization of a judicial project inevitable but new to the life of nations. Instead of marking the end of a century of unprecedented world progress and international cooperation, it appeared at the close of the greatest war of our times. Instead of resting on a long history of cases in which the underlying concepts of its work had been tested, this world tribunal had no more precedent than had the Supreme Court of the United States in 1789 and assuredly not as many favoring circumstances. Instead of facing in a decade a leisurely accumulation of cases which, important as they were, had but little diplomatic dynamite in them, the newer tribunal in the five years of its busy life has had to meet in its advisory opinions and judgments the exigencies of post-war politics, constitutional trail-blazing of world importance, and the administration of a law of nations itself under the shadow of past events.

In a summary way, the post-war work of the two tribunals emphasizes this contrast. The Hague Arbitral Tribunal has 19 cases to its credit.[5] In this figure is included the arbitration of the sovereignty of Las Palmas Islands, lying between the Philippines and Dutch Borneo, to which the United States and the Netherlands are parties; while the work of the Commissions of Inquiry, instituted under the old Hague scheme, is excluded. The Permanent Court

SWIFTLY PLY DESTINY'S SHEARS

Human experience is reflected graphically by the records of a life insurance organization.

In 1926 The Prudential paid 275,181 death claims for a total of $72,271,517.



Of these, 24,831, amounting to $7,573,871, were on the lives of policyholders who had been insured less than one year.

And of the 24,831 it is conceivable that not one anticipated so sudden a parting of the golden threads of life.

What more convincing argument for adequate preparedness could man ask?

THE PRUDENTIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY OF AMERICA
EDWARD D. DUFFIELD, President
Home Office, NEWARK, N. J.

Why it Costs Less to Travel in Germany

Tourists' Paradise

Just a few items to prove that it costs less to travel in Germany ...

Passport Vise—Free . . . 1,000 Miles by Railroad—$22.50. Room and board in vacation and health resorts, from $2.00 day, up. Table d'hote dinner on Rhine steamers, 95¢.

And everywhere in the land of romance and wanderlust, German "Gemuetlichkeit". Truly a paradise for tourists—and for less money!

To help you enjoy a visit to picturesque Germany, we will gladly furnish, gratis, illustrated booklets and information on interest points, transportation, fares, spas, hotels, etc.

German Railroads
INFORMATION OFFICE
630 Fifth Avenue, New York
USE THIS COUPON

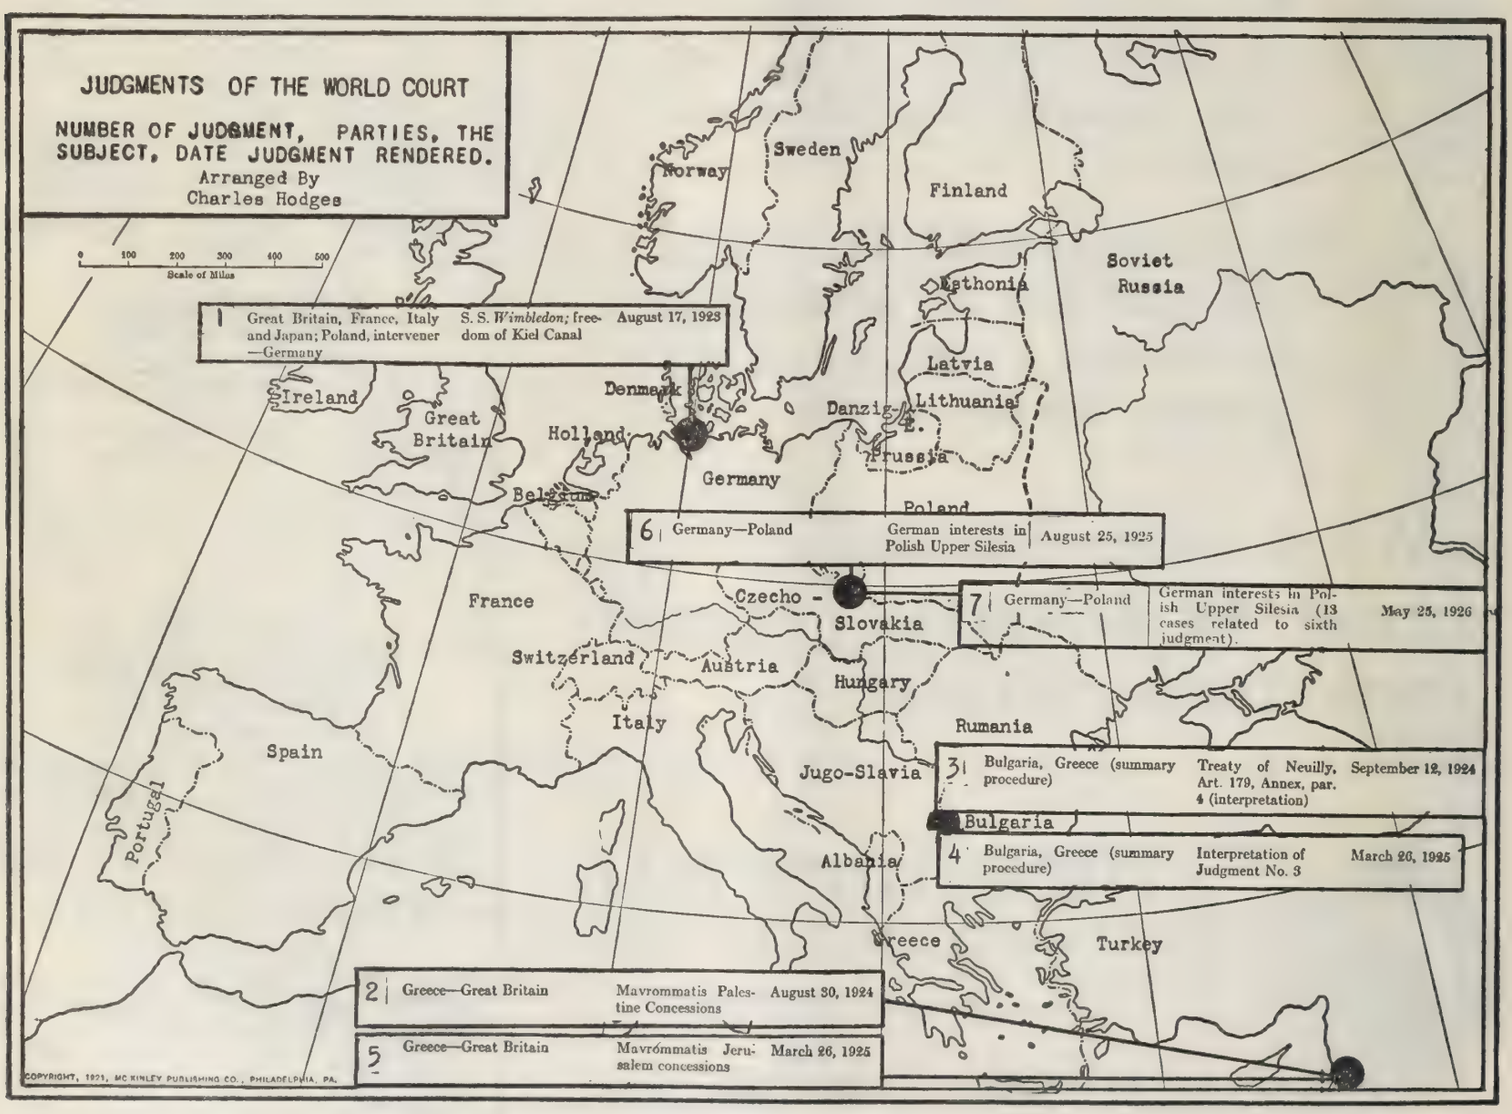
Please send me Illustrated Travel Brochures on Beautiful Germany.
Name _____
Address _____
21

EDUCATIONAL

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE
Program March 6-12
AT COOPER UNION
(8th Street and Astor Place, at 8 o'clock)
Admission Free

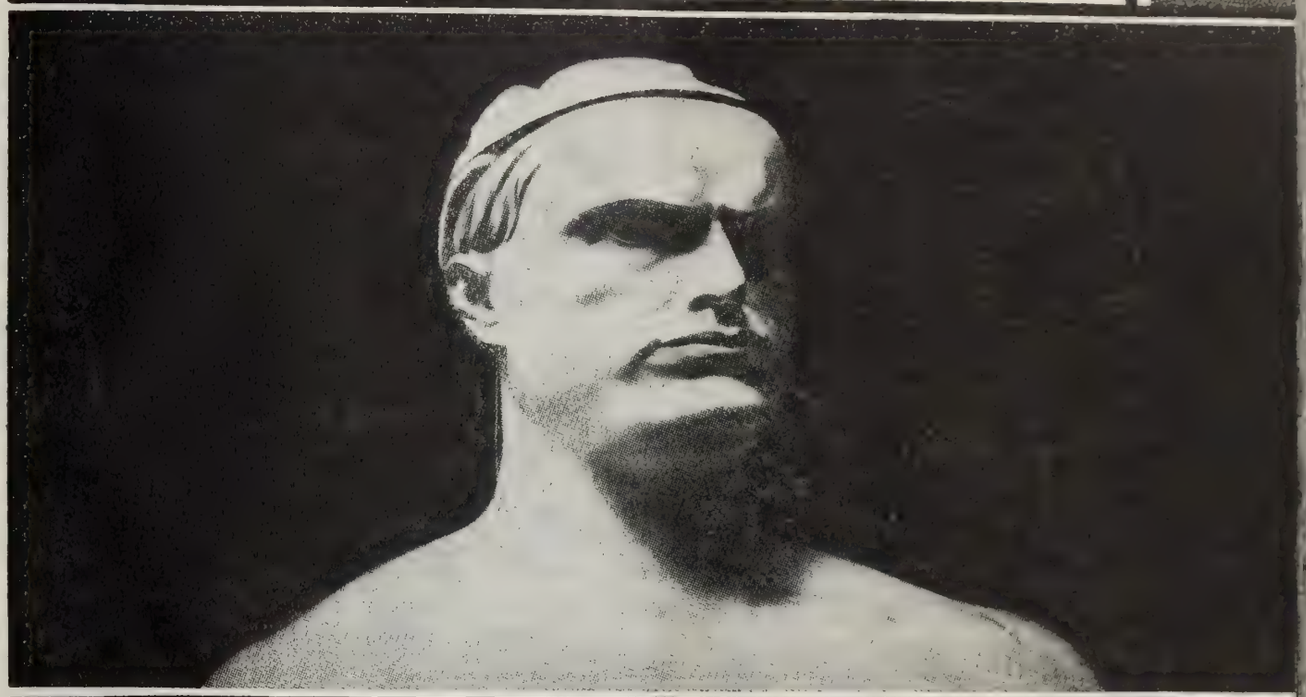
Sunday, March 6—Concert by the American Orchestral Society, Chalmers Clifton, Conductor.
Tuesday, March 8—Frankwood E. Williams: "Results of Attempts to Coerce Youth."
Friday, March 11—Everett Dean Martin: What Is the Matter With Modern Ideas? "Why Is There Not More Internationalism in the Modern World?"

AT MANHATTAN TRADE SCHOOL
Lexington Ave. and 22nd St., at 8 o'clock)
Single Admission, 25 cents
Reduction for Course Tickets



Monday, March 7—Morris R. Cohen: "American Philosophy, American Aesthetic Theory."
Wednesday, March 9—Carl P. Sherwin: "The Chemistry of the Human Body."
Thursday, March 10—E. G. Spaulding: "Questions People Expect a Philosopher to Answer. What Is a Sensation, or Does Watson Answer Berkeley?"
Saturday, March 12—Mortimer J. Adler: Psychological Relativity: The Four Geometries of the Soul. "The Soul as Perception."

of International Justice has passed upon 20 cases, including 13 advisory opinions and 7 judgments.[6] All but two of the arbitral awards have dealt with pre-war controversies. Each of them has been concerned of course with disputes of a localized character involving directly but few Powers as parties to the proceedings—more than a single plaintiff has figured in only three instances.



Looking at the geographic distribution of these cases, a notable fact is the absence of any recourse to the World Court from the Americas. Whereas the old Hague Tribunal acted as an arbitral buffer between the Old and the New World, no such prospect presents itself in the case of the Permanent Court of International Justice as long as the United States is outside its judicature. Indeed two of the post-war cases before the Hague Arbitral Tribunal have come through the willingness of the United States to continue its traditional friendliness toward arbitration; this brings the number of cases to which the American Government has been a party to a quarter of the total arbitral settlements. There is every reason to believe that Latin-American recourse to the World Court, not to mention the interposition of the League of Nations, runs counter to the Pan-American purposes of Washington.[7]

So far as the status of the parties is concerned, another sharp contrast presents itself. The older Arbitral Tribunal, by the very nature of its processes, appealed to the Great Powers as a convenient means of settling justiciable questions which in most cases involved nothing more than property interests of a substantial character. The bulk of the awards have been of two categories: the disputes between the Great Powers themselves number 9 while there have been 8 between Great Powers and lesser Powers. Only two cases are on record between the smaller nations during the existence of the tribunal. The reverse may be said to obtain in the World Court. But a single judgment and one advisory opinion have been rendered involving Great Powers alone. One-third of the opinions and over half the judgments have concerned Great and lesser Powers; while in both types of cases, the small nations have found the Permanent Court of International Justice filling a long-felt want since it is permanently constituted under conditions that obviate the heavy direct charges incurred in a resort to the Hague Tribunal. Emphasis, too, may be laid on the fact that one-third of the advisory opinions virtually involve the world as in this number of cases the International Labor Organization with its membership has been a party.

The major part of the work of the Hague Tribunal has concerned itself either with the adjudication of claims regarding property or jurisdiction between states. Four boundary disputes complete the picture. In the cases handled by the World Court property interests were reviewed only in the 2 judgments concerning the Mavromatis Jerusalem Concessions to which Britain and Greece were par-

MARCH SURVEY
GRAPHIC

FASCISM
A New Challenge to the Spirit of 1776

FRANCIS HACKETT - - THOMAS W. LAMONT
EDUARD C. LINDEMAN - - HENRY W. TAFT
WILLIAM BOLITHO - - - - W. Y. ELLIOTT
LINCOLN STEFFENS - ARTHUR LIVINGSTONE

ARNALDO MUSSOLINI : For
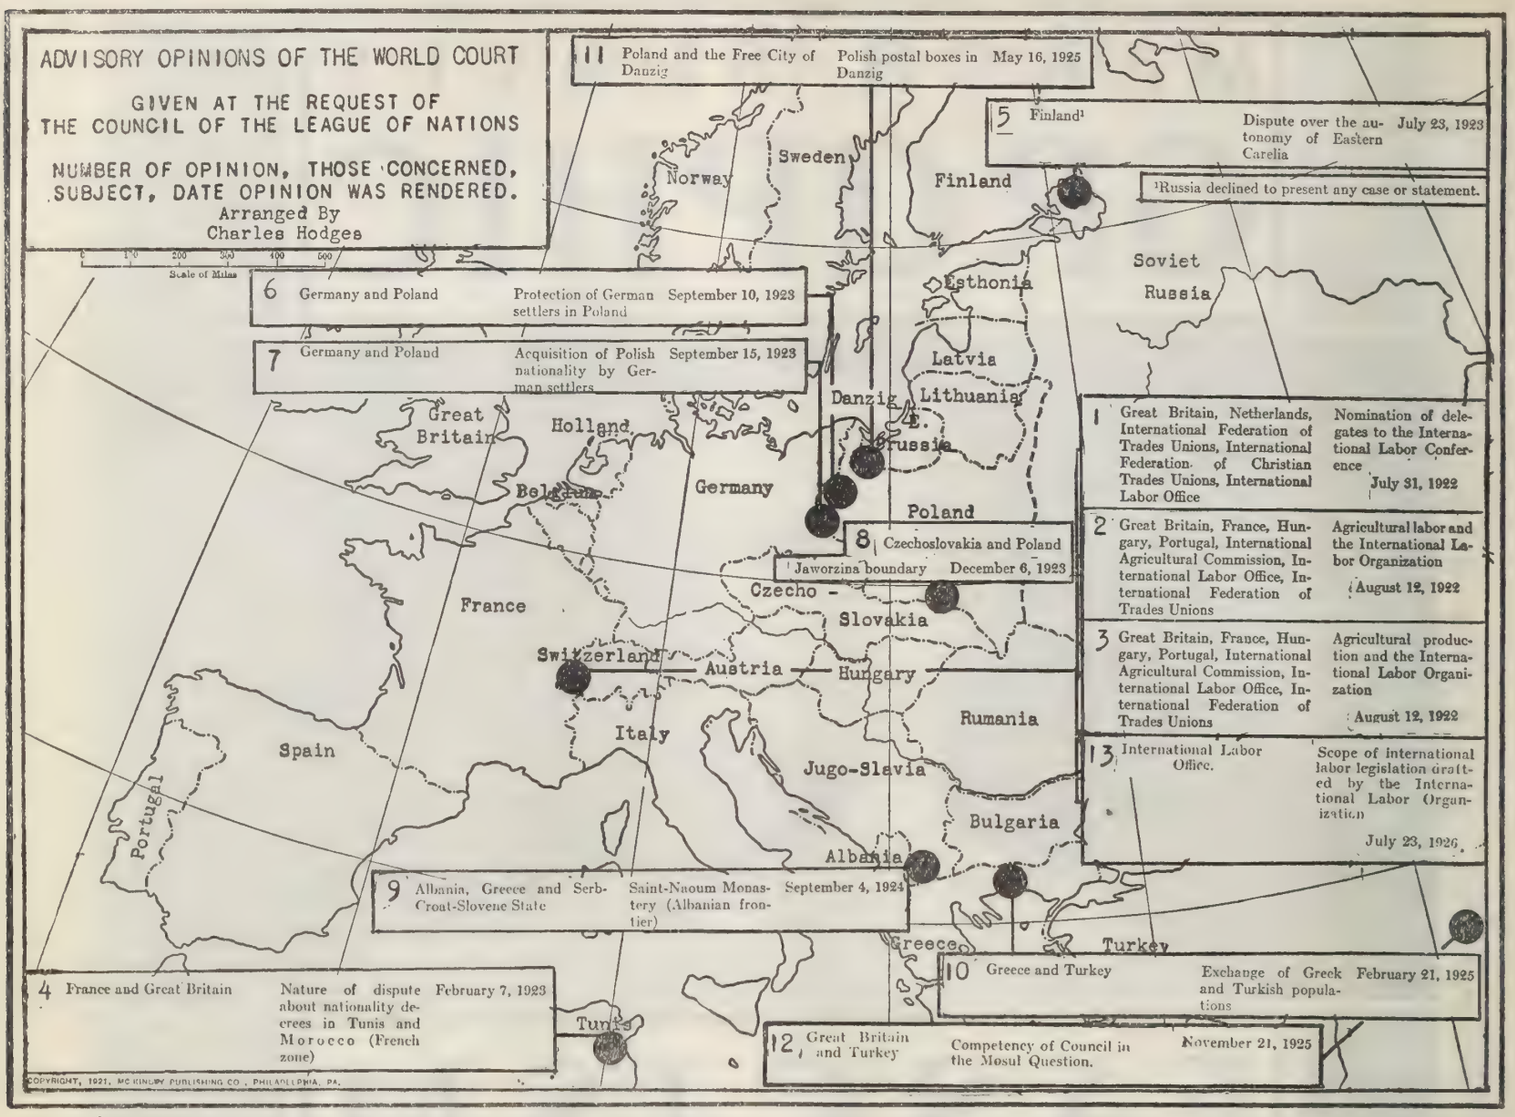
Against: GAETANO SALVEMINI

50 cents a copy MARCH, 1927 $3.00 a year



TEAR OFF AND MAIL

$1 FOR SIX MONTHS
This Fascist number (50c. alone) plus the five succeeding issues. Tear off this strip and mail with a dollar.

SURVEY GRAPHIC, 112 East 19th St., New York
For the enclosed $1 send me the Fascist number and the five succeeding numbers.

Name .....

Address .....

ties. Four advisory opinions, however, have dealt with boundary questions; while 5 others, to which may be added 5 judgments, have dealt with conflicts of jurisdiction. Once again, the World Court is unique for the group of advisory opinions in which a collective interest prevails—4 such cases have had a general rather than an individual bearing upon the jurisdiction of states and may be said to affect all nations participating in the work of the League.

The accompanying charts graphically illustrate the contrasts in function and status of the two international tribunals described in these paragraphs.

Both have their place in the world of states. They are different instrumentalities, the differentiation of function and machinery being a part of the general growth of a society of states in the direction of the higher nationalism wherein cooperation is achieved through a more and more complete and unified structure.

---

[1] Cf. Phillipson, "International Law and Custom of Ancient Greece and Rome."

[2] Estimates differ, due both to methods of classification and completeness of records used by authorities; i.e., La Fontaine, 281 (1821-1900); Moch, 314 (1822-1909).

[3] Moch, "Histoire sommaire de l'arbitrage permanent," 212; Darby, "International Arbitration," 222.

[4] "Annuaire de la Vie Internationale," 1908.

[5] The Hague Court "Reports" are made public through the International Bureau of the Permanent Court of Arbitration.

[6] Publications of the Permanent Court of International Justice—Series A, "Collection of Judgments"; Series B, "Collection of Advisory Opinions."

[7] The Tacna-Arica dispute and the controversy between Panama and Costa Rica indicate reasons for this view. (1920 and 1921.)

Contributors to This Issue

SOL AUERBACH is a student at the University of Pennsylvania.

HENRY S. VILLARD is a young journalist of the third generation of his name.

ROGER N. BALDWIN, director of the American Civil Liberties Union, is now in Europe on various missions.

STUART CHASE is soon to appear as co-author of a book, "Getting Your Money's Worth."

HERBERT S. GORMAN is a poet, novelist, critic, and biographer. His latest book is a life of Longfellow.

LEWIS S. GANNETT, associate editor of The Nation, has written a series of articles on China which are being reprinted in a pamphlet, "Young China."

ALLAN NEVINS is on the editorial staff of the New York World.

NICHOLAS S. KALTCHAS has pursued special studies in Balkan history at an American university.

CHARLES HODGES is the author of "The Background of International Relations."

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIV NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1927 No. 3219

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 275
EDITORIALS:
- China News 277
- The Dead Congress 278
- The Cash Value of a Genius 279
- British Trade Unions and the Law 279
- Homage to Isaac Watts 280

THE HAZE IN HAITI. By Rayford W. Logan 281
MOTHER-WORSHIP. Anonymous 283
TOWARD LOWER ELECTRIC RATES. By Morris Llewellyn Cooke 285
DAWES OR COOLIDGE? By Frank R. Kent 286
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 288
CORRESPONDENCE 288
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
- The Eternal Mercy. By S. Bert Cooksley 291
- First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 291
- Mr. Babbitt's Spiritual Guide. By Joseph Wood Krutch 291
- A Note on the Labor Talmud. By Benjamin Stolberg 292
- The Father of the Little Theater. By Henry S. Villard 293
- A Source of Innocent Merriment. By Donald Douglas 293
- Cosmic Evolution. By Radoslav A. Tsanoff 294
- Books in Brief 294
- Drama: A Jesting Pilate. By Joseph Wood Krutch 295

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Unemployment in France 297

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES worthily celebrated his eighty-sixth birthday by reading the unanimous opinion of the United States Supreme Court that the Texas law barring Negroes from the Democratic Party primaries was unconstitutional. It was a decision in the spirit of Massachusetts in the Abolitionist days of Justice Holmes's youth, when liberty was still a living part of the American tradition. Texas cast 735,186 votes in the Democratic primary of July, 1926, but only 100,617 at the regular election; to claim that disfranchisement at the primary of the dominant party was not disfranchisement was, of course, a mere trick of rhetoric. Justice Holmes said so. The Fourteenth Amendment, his opinion recalled, > not only gave citizenship and the privileges of citizenship to persons of color but it denied to any State the power to withhold from them the equal protection of the laws.

>
> What is this but declaring that the law in the States shall be the same for the black as for the white; that all persons, whether colored or white, shall stand equal before the laws of the States, and in regard to the colored race, for whose protection the amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color?
>
> The statute of Texas in the teeth of the prohibitions referred to assumes to forbid Negroes to take part in an election, the importance of which we have indicated, discriminating against them by the distinction of color alone. . . . It is too clear for extended argument that color cannot be made the basis of a statutory classification affecting the right set up in this case.

That is a splendid vindication of the constitutional principles of equal rights for the two races, but it will take a still longer step to establish a practice of anything like equality in the South.

LIKE THE MAKERS OF IVORY SOAP, Alexander Kerensky calculates his percentages minutely if not quite exactly. Ninety-nine per cent of the Russian people, he said upon arriving in New York the other day, are opposed to Bolshevism. From the distance of Paris, where he makes his calculations, it is possible, of course, that the ex-Premier counted some heads twice. His prophecies are as optimistic as his figures; the Bolshevist Government, he says, is bound to collapse because the industrial machine is breaking down. Should prosperity increase, on the other hand, the Soviet regime is still more surely doomed, since "everything that restores the economic force . . . of the country destroys the power of the Bolshevist Government." Heads, they lose; tails, he wins. Such high hope, even at the expense of likelihood and logic, is doubtless necessary for a man whose life is spent in exile planning a return to power and the good old days. His reason for existence would be lost if he were forced to look into the cold face of reality. Fortunately for him he can continue to hide behind his illusions as long as he remains in America, where the Red Menace is a popular myth, where his phantom government is still solemnly believed in, and where he is welcomed by an Assistant United States District Attorney while other political refugees—the Karolyis, for example—are turned away from these shores.

DOUBTLESS THE AMERICAN MARINES who had been cooped up on shipboard in the river off Shanghai were enormously relieved when the order came to disembark and march, drums beating and flags flying, through Nanking Road and out to Jessfield Park. And doubtless the Americans who live in Shanghai under the protection of the British flag were glad to see this visible evidence that the United States stood shoulder to shoulder with Britain in defense of the foreign lives and property centering in Shanghai. Unfortunately, it meant more than that. The Americans stacked arms at the end of the march in Jessfield Park, outside the foreign Settlement boundaries; and while the foreigners who lined the streets cheered, the Chinese stood impassive and silent. To them it meant that America indorsed Britain's action in invading Chinese territory because it happened to be more convenient to do so. Washington may be ever so careful in insisting upon its diplomatic independence, but all that the Shanghai coolie knows is that American troops followed the British along the line of march. Meanwhile—and to a certain degree consequently—the Nationalist movement continues to gain.

HARRY DAUGHERTY found one juryman who felt reasonable doubt of his guilt, but the public long ago made up its mind about Mr. Harding's Attorney General. The story of his interest in splitting the Merton fee of $441,000 in bonds and cash which obtained release of $7,000,000 of German property from the Alien Property Custodian is only one of scores which have never been satisfactorily answered. Mr. Daugherty's action in destroying the records on a lonely Sunday in his brother's bank told the public all it needed to know. Emory Buckner, the prosecuting attorney, had a harder task to prove conspiracy. Most prosecutors would have given up after the first attempt—especially after the plain evidence that his departmental superiors were hostile to his vigorous pursuit of his sworn duty. But Mr. Buckner stuck. He fought the case through once, against enormous obstacles, and returned to fight again. There have been stories that Thomas W. Miller, the former Alien Property Custodian, who was convicted by the same jury which disagreed about Mr. Daugherty, would now "spill the beans," that he has been "double-crossed" by the Daugherty gang. We shall await his action with interest. Twice he has assured the public that he would take the stand in his own defense; twice he has cowered behind his legal right to evade examination; if he is innocent he should have seized the opportunity to make his statement in the full publicity of the courtroom and have courted Mr. Buckner's attack.

ONE ACCUSED SENATOR, Gould of Maine, was "cleared" by the subcommittee of the Senate Elections Committee just before Congress adjourned. At least, that subcommittee voted that the charges against him, which related to the bribing of a former New Brunswick Premier, be dropped. There is no doubt that $100,000 was paid to Premier Fleming in connection with a railway undertaking of which Senator Gould was the head. Mr. Gould said it was done contrary to his wishes by his associates. The subcommittee observed that the transaction was fourteen years old and had no relation to his election to the Senate of the United States in the year 1926, adding: "It affirmatively appears that the Hon. Arthur R. Gould is a man of good character." The United States Senate has thus laid down the rule that if a "good man" helps to bribe a neighboring government with the sum of $100,000 it does not affect his eligibility for office. Meanwhile we may get new sensations out of Colorado. According to the press reports startling evidence is at hand as to the corruption which led to the election of Senator-elect Waterman of Colorado. That, it is explained, is why Senator Phipps of Colorado fought so bitterly on the side of Reed of Pennsylvania and Moses of New Hampshire to block any further probing into electoral corruption by Senator James A. Reed of Missouri.

SENATOR REED OF MISSOURI and Senator Robinson of Indiana, calling each other liars and talking about garbage, were headline material in America, and a threat of Congressional fisticuffs is always good for the first page. But as sensational dramatists our Solons have to take back step when compared with the Jugoslavs. The opposition in the Belgrade Parliament recently charged the Government with maintaining a White Terror. The Government denied it; the opposition said they would prove it, and prove it they did! Into the Chamber they brought a stark naked victim of third-degree police torture, his body black and blue and bleeding from police beating. Women shrieked in the galleries; deputies yelled; the presiding officer put on his hat and departed. But the Government, it is reported, will have to resign. The method seems drastic; but it might have awakened some of our Senatorial sleepers if Senator Borah had presented to the Senate the corpses of a few of the Nicaraguans who might still be alive but for the Coolidge-Kellogg policy in their country.

"WOMEN ARE THE AGREEABLE or pleasant parentheses of life." Thus Mussolini in an interview printed in the New York Times, given to one of the parenthetical sex. That was the beginning of the interview; as it proceeded it gathered momentum, so to speak:

> What should women do? In what field can they shine as man's equal? In anything that is not creative. Women cannot create. In all of the arts, from the beginning of time women have done delicious small things. . . . The power behind the throne? No. Woman is not that. No great man has ever been inspired to greatness by a woman's unseen power. . . . The more virile and intelligent a man is the less need he has of a woman as an integral part of himself. Women are a charming pastime, a means of changing one's trend of thought; but they should never be taken seriously, for they themselves are rarely if ever serious. . . . What more charming, thrilling than the first kiss? What brings a more profound sigh of relief than the last? . . . Left in their proper relation to man they are all that is delicious, adorable, sensuous. . . .

This is one of the most complete statements on an interesting topic that this paper has ever had the privilege to print. It is sweeping, it is all-inclusive, it is incontrovertible—or is it? We confess that we have been rendered slightly dizzy by the Duce's confidence. Is woman a parenthesis? Or is Italy's First Man, on the other hand, a rather rash and tottering exclamation-point?

THE PERSECUTION of George R. Dale has developed into a State-wide fight in Indiana. Because of slashing attacks upon the Ku Klux Klan and corruption in local politics in his weekly newspaper in Muncie, Dale has been the victim of a bitter vendetta, in which the courts have participated by use of their despotic and unregulated powers to punish for contempt. The highest court of Indiana, as previously noted in The Nation, laid down the extraordinary doctrine that proof of the truth of statements made in Dale's newspaper could not be submitted as a defense against his conviction for contempt. Dale is trying to get this doctrine reviewed by the United States Supreme Court. In the meanwhile Judge Clarence W. Dearth of the Delaware County Circuit Court has attempted, apparently without a shadow of legal authority, to prevent the distribution of Dale's newspaper, while new charges have been made against the editor. Fortunately Dale's persecution has brought champions to his side. On March 2 the Indiana House of Representatives voted 93 to 1 to impeach Judge Dearth for his attempted suppression of Dale's newspaper.

HORACE LIVERIGHT'S action in acquiring the rights to "The Captive" (which its original producers agreed to withdraw from the stage in order to escape criminal prosecution) has been variously judged. To the militant advocates of "clean stage" he is of course anathema, and to many of the other managers who would like to see the play sacrificed as a sop to the reformers he appears at least impolitic. Yet to us his determination to fight the case through the courts seems precisely in line with the general tactics which have been found most effective in the fight for free speech. We have never advocated the withdrawal of a speaker for any of the unpopular causes because he happened to be the object of attack on the part of the American Legion or the American Defense Society. We have believed that the only way to affirm rights is to fight for them and we see no reason why this principle should not apply in the case of the theater also. From the commercial standpoint it is no doubt best for a manager to withdraw any play which comes under heavy fire, but from any other standpoint it is best for him to stand by his guns, and Mr. Liveright's fight, which is sure to cost him both money and friends, is evidence of sincere concern for a principle.

VIRTUALLY ALL the leading European authors have signed a remarkable letter of protest against the action of Samuel Roth, editor of the Two Worlds Monthly, in reprinting James Joyce's "Ulysses" "without authorization by Mr. Joyce, without payment to Mr. Joyce, and with alterations which seriously corrupt the text." Fuller descriptions of the letter, appearing recently in American newspapers, have contained a complete list of the signatures—we can merely note that among the 160 these are to be found: Arnold Bennett, Havelock Ellis, Bertrand Russell, May Sinclair, H. G. Wells, André Gide, Paul Valéry, Romain Rolland, Maurice Maeterlinck, Knut Hamsun, W. B. Yeats, "A. E.," Ivan Bunin, Miguel de Unamuno, Thomas Mann, Jacob Wassermann, Benedetto Croce, Luigi Pirandello, and Giovanni Gentile. The protest is surely the most significant one of its kind since the copyright war of the last century, the issue of which seemed to guarantee to European authors a fair share of their American rights. In the present situation there is said to be no legal redress; the American literary public is simply asked "to oppose to Mr. Roth's enterprise the full power of honorable and fair opinion." We hope that this can be made to mean something.

THE LATE IRA REMSEN was president of Johns Hopkins University from 1901 to 1913. Like Harry Pratt Judson, formerly president of the University of Chicago, whose death is also recorded, Dr. Remsen succeeded to the presidency in succession to the real organizer and developer of the university he came to head. Both Daniel Coit Gilman and William Rainey Harper had extraordinary organizing ability; they canvassed the country for scholars with whom to man their great institutions of learning, and their successors had in large degree merely to carry on what had been started—not, however, easy tasks. Dr. Remsen and Dr. Judson were both scholars of the old type who continued to teach throughout their presidencies. Dr. Remsen was a great chemist with an international reputation; it is hardly too much to say that he revolutionized the teaching of chemistry in America, and his textbooks have made his name familiar to untold thousands of students. Dr. Judson's quiet and gentle personality did not suggest the go-getter college president of which we hear so much today, but his university gained by his profound scholarship.

China News

WE have commented before, and may have to comment again, on the extraordinarily bad news service connecting China with the United States. Part of the fault lies in the high cable tolls—due to the Pacific cable monopoly—which makes the cost of long messages all but prohibitive. But more of the trouble lies in the blindness of the correspondents, who often regard themselves rather as partisans of the foreign community in China than as neutral observers and interpreters. The result is that our news from China today is like the news from Russia in the early days of the Soviet Revolution—distorted by a race and class partisanship which blinds otherwise intelligent newspapermen to obvious facts. Until recently we have had the benefit of one correspondent who understood and expressed the Chinese point of view—Thomas F. Millard of the New York Times. Now he has been replaced, for reasons unknown to us, by Frederick Moore, late foreign councilor to the Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, whose dispatches have been poisonously hostile to the Chinese Nationalists.

In our issue of January 19 we referred to the fact that in treating the Hankow incident of January 3 > the press dispatches, almost all of British origin (the Associated Press unfortunately depends upon Reuter, a British news agency, for its Chinese news, and the United Press service is inadequate), report that the British soldiers were singularly restrained. The dispatches, however, mention a Chinese demand for apology for the brutality of the marines, while omitting to tell in what the brutality consisted.

We have just received a cablegram from the Nationalist News Agency in Hankow, throwing an extraordinary light on this comment of ours:

> On March 1, in the course of an editorial, the [American-edited] Hankow Herald quoted an editorial in the New York Nation for January 19. Referring to The Nation's remarks about the Associated Press report denying brutalities toward the Chinese in the Hankow incident of January 3, the Hankow Herald stated: "The reports which were sent to the Associated Press by its American representative were true to fact. When the Associated Press stated to its member newspapers that the British marines at Hankow did not use violence, that statement was a truthful statement and stands as it was written. There was no violence used. There were no two Chinese stabbed by bayonets."
>
> That several Chinese were stabbed, two seriously, was well known in Hankow and was printed in English-language newspapers throughout China. It was referred to several times by Eugene Chen in public announcements published all over the world.
>
> When the editor of the Hankow Herald, who is also the Hankow correspondent of the Associated Press, was taxed with these facts on March 1, and confronted with photographs of the wounded men and reports gathered by the local Commissioner of Foreign Affairs based on records of the Catholic Mission Hospital, he printed a retraction. In the course of his retraction he says: "It is now established beyond doubt that two Chinese were bayonetted on January 3."
>
> This retraction was printed on March 4. Two months after the Hankow affair of January 3 the Hankow correspondent of the Associated Press ascertains the facts!
>
> The Herald editorial is also insistent upon the independence of the Associated Press from the [British] Reuter agency in China. While it is true that the Associated Press has correspondents in China it is also true that it works in close cooperation with Reuter throughout the country. Today the chief Associated Press correspondent in China has his headquarters in the Reuter office in Shanghai, while the editor of the Hankow Herald is correspondent of both the Associated Press and Reuter.

When judging current events in China—the parade of American marines, the seizure of a Standard Oil launch—it is well to remember that, unfortunately, many of the correspondents are first foreigners and only secondarily newspapermen.

The Dead Congress

THE manner of the ending of the Sixty-ninth Congress has led to much moralizing upon the historic competition between the American Legislature and the Executive, and to much abuse of the Senate because of its failure to pass three supply bills and of the filibuster which marred its last hours. Vice-President Dawes made skilful use of the latter to point a moral in favor of his proposed revision of the Senate rules, and one of the pundits of the daily press says that by his veto of the McNary-Haugen bill Mr. Coolidge "has made of himself a national and towering figure that, at least for the moment, dwarfs Congress."

Every one to his taste! To us the David Reed filibuster about which so much has been said, obnoxious as it was, is but a small price to pay for an unfettered Senate. It was that small license which is concomitant with true legislative liberty. The very fact that so little in the outburst of press criticism has had to do with the House of Representatives is significant. That body, dominated by rigid rules, continues to be subordinate to a controlling clique of the controlling party; the discussion is not whether Congress bulks larger than the President, but whether the Senate does. The day that the Dawes rules are adopted—if ever—will mark the decay of the Senate. There are changes which may well be made by the Senate—or by Congress—without fettering their freedom. Of these the most important is Senator Norris's admirable proposal for changing the sessions of Congress in order to eliminate the "lame-duck" sessions and the wait of a year before a newly elected House meets. This excellent reform, against which no criticism of any kind can lie, has three times passed the Senate and needs only to be passed by the House to go to the States for ratification. It would end a situation which places a premium upon log-rolling and time-serving, and gives the President the opportunity to influence Congress improperly by promises of office to those who have lost their seats. But when all is said and done the retention of the freedom of debate of the Senate is something for which every liberal must fight.

But the dead Congress? Well, its record is about the average, save for one thing. Thanks to Senator Reed of Missouri, it has uncovered intolerable conditions in connection with the purchase of primary elections to the Senate and, despite the efforts of Senator David A. Reed of Pennsylvania, it may exclude others from the Senate besides Colonel Frank L. Smith of Illinois. Probably Senator-elect Vare of Pennsylvania will lose his seat—and perhaps one more beneficiary of corruption. The sweeping decision of the Supreme Court in the Doheny case, the conviction of the former Alien Property Custodian, Thomas W. Miller—these are due directly to the inquiries into crime committed by high officials which were instituted by the Senate, whose function as a watch-dog over the executive departments grows increasingly important with the lapse of years. As for the rest, Congress passed the McFadden bill indefinitely extending the life of the Federal Reserve System and permitting National Bank branches in cities of more than 25,000 where no State laws conflict; the Radio Commission bill; the Prohibition Reorganization bill; the McNary-Haugen bill; the bill prohibiting the mailing of fire-arms except to authorized manufacturers and dealers; and an appropriation of $10,000,000 to exterminate that unwelcome immigrant, the European corn-borer. In addition, Congress accepted the Cape Cod Canal steal—fortunately nullified for the present by the failure of the Second Deficiency bill; authorized three more cruisers and increased the gun-range of certain battleships; wisely increased the salaries of federal judges and extended the Maternity Act for two years; and blundered by passing the Milk Importation bill intended to exclude imports of Canadian milk and cream. The Postal Rates Readjustment bill, the Borah resolution for an investigation of the Nicaraguan-Mexico situation, the French debt agreement, the Boulder Dam bill, the Muscle Shoals bill, the Alien Property bill—these and many others failed of passage.

Throughout its life the Sixty-ninth Congress deliberately defeated the President's wishes at innumerable points. Not in many years has a Congress controlled by a President's party been so contemptuous of the Executive's recommendations. It overruled him in the matter of the cruisers; it denied him the railroad-consolidation legislation for which Wall Street pines, and the transfer of the Philippines from military to civilian control. It again rejected several of his nominations; it utterly ignored his official request for an income-tax refund or rebate and his appeal for reorganization of the farm-credit agencies of the government; it did nothing for the extension of our water resources; it did not give him the single head of our merchant fleet for which he asked; it refused his request to put the Radio Commission under Secretary Hoover; and it ignored his demands for power to deal with the threatened bituminous coal industry.

Of all the recommendations in his message of December 7, last, it acted favorably upon only one and part of another. Most of these recommendations were repeated from the Presidential Message of December 8, 1925; in that session Congress paid no attention whatever to the occupant of the White House. Yet this is the man heralded as a "national and towering figure," as a great and constructive leader, as worthy to rank with Roosevelt and Lincoln and Washington! Other Presidents have quarreled with Congress—to their and the country's advantage. This President is simply ignored.

So now he has Congress "off his hands," as the phrase runs, and all those about him rejoice because he is now free to devote himself to that "vigorous foreign policy" so long scheduled. If he does, those Americans who believe that this government should do unto others as it would be done by will, we fear, have reason to regret that Congress is not in session. Fortunately, the United States Supreme Court having ruled that the Senate is a continuing body, its committees can function during the recess. Especially is it a happy circumstance that William E. Borah remains the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, whether the Senate sits or adjourns. Equally encouraging is the fact that in the next Congress the President will not control the Senate; it may even be organized by the Democrats. It is extremely questionable whether he will "tower" quite as high next winter, but it is certain that Mr. Coolidge will hardly get less from a hostile Congress than he has obtained from one in which his party had large working majorities.

The Cash Value of a Genius

AT bottom the question simmered down to the cash value of Henry Ford in 1913. Behind all the muddling mixture of politics and statistics that was the question at issue in Washington. And it was a question for which no slide rule or logarithmic tables existed. Henry Ford stands outside the calculations of the business-school experts; he is a genius, and geniuses defy rules.

Of course the court was not asked to settle the question in those terms, nor was it a yearning for information as to Henry Ford's 1913 value which led Mr. Mellon's young men to open the recent proceedings. The case had its origin in politics—Senator Couzens of Michigan was attacking Mr. Mellon's policies and demanding an investigation of his department, and Mr. Mellon saw an opportunity to get back at Senator Couzens's pocketbook by questioning the income-tax payments on the profits made by selling, in 1919, the minority stock in the Ford company.

When property is sold for more than was paid for it the profit is of course taxable income. Now, the income-tax law took effect in 1913, and only income received since that date is subject to the income tax. When property bought previous to that date is sold it is necessary to calculate its probable value as of 1913, in order to compute the tax on the subsequent profit. This was the case with the Ford minority stock, which Senator Couzens and others sold in 1919. If any Ford stock had been sold in 1913, the Government would simply have accepted the market rate as the 1913 value. But Ford stock was closely held; none was sold in or about 1913; the value had to be calculated by taking into consideration the general state and prospects of the business. The earnings of the Ford Motor Car Company at that time had been doubling each year for several years, and the annual return on the invested capital was very high. No other automobile company in the country was like it. There were no competitors whose values could significantly be compared with its. Today, looking back upon the fabulous development of the Ford company, we may compute a certain valuation. But our present computation, based upon the subsequent record, might not have been fair in 1913. Henry Ford was the firm's greatest asset; but suppose he had died in 1914, what then? It is not easy to reckon the cash value of an industrial genius.

If the 1913 value previously ascribed to the Ford stock was too high, as the Treasury has been contending, Senator Couzens owes the Government taxes on the extra post-1913 profits which would result from such a reckoning, for the lower the 1913 value the greater the subsequent—and taxable—profit. In this case Senator Couzens suffers a double injustice. Secretary Mellon has reopened the case after a lapse of six years, which is bad enough; furthermore, the 1913 value which was computed in 1919 was set not by Senator Couzens but by Treasury officials! The income taxes on large incomes were then at their highest, and Senator Couzens, knowing that he would have to return more than half his profits to the Treasury, naturally wanted to know on what he would be taxed before he consummated the sale. Indeed, he and his fellow minority stockholders might not have sold the stock at all (thus depriving the Government of any tax whatever) had the Treasury Department not fixed a valuation—the very valuation which the Treasury Department is now attacking! These are considerations of honor and decency with which the court is not at present concerned. It has before it a technical problem—to determine the cash value of Henry Ford, in 1913 regarded as a rather flighty though successful industrial genius, to his firm. To the lay public, however, the case has another significance. Mr. Mellon, by using his control of the Treasury Department to persecute a personal enemy, has degraded the Government and weakened public confidence in the administration of the income-tax system—a serious matter, which may in time react upon his own friends and business associates.

British Trade Unions and the Law

THE general strike of 1926 focused British attention on the legal immunity of trade unions, and the Tory Government has in hand a project to harness them. The sudden strike, the Conservatives say, resulted in very considerable financial loss to many employers who had no direct connection with the dispute in the coal-mining industry. Fifty years ago such action would have been a malicious conspiracy for the restraint of trade on the part of the trade unions concerned, and as such the unions would have been liable for damages to the extent of the injury caused. But various acts toward the end of the last century limited that liability, and after the Taff-Vale judgment in 1902 came legislation which gave the unions their present privileged position.

The Taff-Vale Railway was a small concern in South Wales of whose existence the majority of Englishmen were totally unaware. It was, however, rescued from obscurity by a strike of its employees; the company instituted proceedings against the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, and after much litigation obtained damages against the union for losses in traffic receipts caused by the strike. The decision caused consternation in the trade-union world; it had been believed that unions were by statute exempt from such liability, which imperiled the funds of any striking union.

It was this threat to the trade unions which made obvious the necessity of working-class representation in Parliament to press the claims of the unions and to initiate legislation to guarantee their security. The trade unions then decided to rely no longer on either the Liberal or the Conservative Party, neither of which could fully appreciate the gravity of the threat; instead they organized the separate Labor Party, which has now supplanted the Liberals as the second British party.

The unions succeeded almost beyond their hopes when the Trades Disputes Act was passed in 1906. Therein it was declared: "An action against a trade union . . . in respect of any tortions act . . . shall not be entertained in any court"; for the future the unions were not to be held liable for loss of revenue caused by a strike. Another section of the act exempted officials of the unions from prosecution for persuading their members to strike, an act which under the common law was a conspiracy directed toward a restraint of trade, and therefore illegal. Moreover, peaceful picketing was legalized, provided it did not extend to physical force. A clause was inserted, however, that these acts were permissible only if they were "in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute." It was in reliance on these words that the Government asserted last year that the protection of the Trades Disputes Act did not apply to the unions, other than the Miners' Federation, which participated in the general strike; the Tories held that only the miners were engaged in a trade dispute, and the other unions had a different object. Legal opinion, however, did not generally support this theory, holding instead that the general strike was "in furtherance of the trade dispute" which affected the miners. At any rate, no prosecutions under the act were brought before the courts, and no final opinion has been handed down.

The Osborne Judgment of 1911 was another surprise to the trade unions: it held it illegal for a union to apply its funds to a political object. The effect would have been to prohibit them from taking part in political campaigns by financing candidates for municipal and parliamentary elections; but the Trade Union Act of 1913 remedied this situation, allowing the creation in each union of a special political fund, raised by a levy on all members who did not specifically contract out by arrangement with the secretary of the union. The result of this legislation was to exempt the trade unions from the ordinary application of the common law by legalizing what in another organization would be considered an illegal and malicious conspiracy. The trade unions in England thus occupy a privileged position, and probably this is necessary for their continued existence, but it naturally aroused misgivings among those who regard trade unionism as a dangerous growth.

The first attempt to withdraw the privileges came two years ago, when a Conservative Member of Parliament introduced a private bill to amend the Trade Union Act of 1913, in such a way that instead of containing provisions for "contracting out," the political levy should only be raised from those who "contracted in." The intent was to rely on the inertia of the masses and so to hamper the Labor Party which derives its funds from the individual unions. Mr. Baldwin, who had just become Prime Minister for the second time, while not opposing the bill, said the time was not ripe for its consideration.

A more determined move, however, is now about to be made. A Conservative party congress has asked that the Government revise the laws relating to trade unions, and the Attorney General has announced that legislation to that end will be introduced. It is as yet uncertain what the form of that legislation will be; but many Conservatives look for provisions for a secret ballot of all members of a union proposing to call a strike; for the prohibition of strikes in public services (transport, water, electricity, etc.) and of "sympathetic" strikes—in other words, of a general strike; for the reduction of the right of peaceful picketing; and for some means of recovering damages from a trade union for loss of trade caused by a strike.

The mere prospect of this legislation has aroused a storm of protest from the labor movement. The Taff-Vale and Osborne judgments put new life into the trade unions and into the political labor movement, and the present threat to limit their power may call forth even greater strength. The existing law may be anomalous, but it seems to fit into the current of public opinion—which shifts as conditions change. The unions have not signally abused their privileges, and the Government has produced no substitute for the strike as a remedy for bad labor conditions. The attempt to weaken the unions is likely to help the Labor Party to win the next election, and end in strengthening the unions it seeks to undermine.

Homage to Isaac Watts

IT is no longer possible, or even desirable, to say of Isaac Watts what a pious commentator said in the nineteenth century: "His logical and other treatises have served to brace the intellects, methodize the studies, and concentrate the activities of thousands—we had nearly said millions—of minds." Who now reads "Discourses on the Love of God and Its Influence on All the Passions," or "Essays Toward a Proof of a Separate State for Souls," or "Useful and Important Questions Concerning Jesus, the Son of God"? Probably nobody. But "Mother Watts," as one of his eighteenth-century detractors called him, is nevertheless immortal, and the same pious commentator whom we have quoted knew the reason—though his is not the language we should use today. "To create a little heaven in the nursery by hymns, and those not mawkish or twaddling, but beautifully natural and exquisitely simple breathings of piety and praise, was the high task to which Watts consecrated, and by which he has immortalized, his genius." Watts may be mawkish and twaddling; but his poetry will not die; it is too well written. It has an uncanny felicity, for it is the product of an ingenious and poetically sophisticated mind.

In the new "Oxford Book of Eighteenth Century Verse" David Nichol Smith resuscitates the author of "Hymns and Spiritual Songs," "The Psalms of David Imitated," and "Divine and Moral Songs for Children." Now Watts, in spite of the fact that he has appeared in anthologies before, and gloriously resounds every Sunday in one church or another, has generally been held in contempt for his poetry judged as such. But Professor Smith, having plenty of space in which to display him, has displayed a genuine poet—one who has given deathless lines to the English tongue. It matters not that one repeats these lines without seriousness. They are there, they are inescapable, they are part of the language we live. Bernard Shaw, refereeing a debate the other day between Lady Rhondda and G. K. Chesterton on the subject of the leisured woman, simply could not avoid reminding his radio audience that

> Satan finds some mischief still
> For idle hands to do.

Lewis Carroll was, of course, a genuine poet, yet we might not have known it if he had not known Watts. The two are very near allied, and it matters little that the later man knew he was writing divine nonsense while the earlier man did not.

> How doth the little crocodile
> Improve his shining tail is no better than

> How doth the little busy Bee
> Improve each shining Hour for being a burlesque of it.

> 'Tis the voice of the Lobster: I heard him declare
> "You have baked me too brown, I must sugar my hair."
> As a duck with his eyelids, so he with his nose
> Trims his belt and his buttons, and turns out his toes is not a bit more beautiful than

> 'Tis the Voice of the Sluggard; I heard him complain,
> "You have wak'd me too soon, I must slumber again."
> As the Door on its Hinges, so he on his Bed
> Turns his Sides and his Shoulders and his heavy Head.

We seriously propose a toast to Watts as a poet. But not as a serious poet.

The Haze in Haiti

By RAYFORD W. LOGAN

[This article was submitted before publication to Major General John A. Lejeune, Commandant of the United States Marine Corps, and to Major General John A. Russell, United States High Commissioner to Haiti. General Lejeune said that "the allegations of the author of this article appear in general to be captious, ambiguous, and unfounded in large part, although I am not in a position to comment in detail." General Russell remarked that "The purpose of this article is obviously to discredit the United States Government and the article is, on its face, so childishly foolish that an intelligent reader could hardly fail to be amused and would wonder at the underlying motive for its publication." Neither General Russell nor General Lejeune made any effort to refute any statement in this article.—Editor The Nation.]

DURING the seven years that followed Admiral Caperton's seizure of Port au Prince the United States had no clearly defined policy in Haiti. In 1922, however, Dr. Carl Kelsey of the University of Pennsylvania, after a nine months' tour of the former "Black Republic," suggested that the best interests of the island and the prestige of the United States required the renewed declaration that we "try to put the country in a position which would make possible an orderly future development." Since then the Occupation has been digging in deeper every day by the simple process of absorbing the Haitian administrative departments.

Nothing illustrates better this assumption of the operation of the most vital Haitian institutions than the American Service Technique du Département de l'Agriculture et de l'Enseignement Professionnel. For seven years the American Occupation had been telling the world how backward Haiti was in agricultural production. For seven years the Occupation had left Haiti as backward as ever. And for seven years the Financial Adviser had not been able to find money to enable the Haitian administration to increase production or educate farmers. He had even refused the paltry sum of $80 a month to conduct a training section annexed to the primary schools in accordance with the law of July 30, 1919. As soon, however, as the organization and administration of agricultural schools passed under American control the necessary funds miraculously found their way into the Haitian budget. The Financial Adviser allowed the Haitian Service de l'Agriculture $13,114.39 in 1922-1923. He cautiously granted the newly organized Service Technique $17,500 in 1923-1924. The following year he lavished $216,000 and last year $365,600 of Haitian money on this department.

Dr. George F. Freeman of Alabama assumed the responsibility of spending the money, and Mr. Carl Colvin that of supervising the schools. Experts descended upon the island to improve the land and the stock and the people. The plan was admirable; its operation ridiculous. Courses given in English and translated into French are too wasteful even for a people that has no idea of the value of time. The imported pigs and cows refused to mingle with the native stock. But more serious than any general manifestation of inefficiency has been the gross unfairness in the matter of salaries. The recent complacent report of the Financial Adviser boasts of paying only 13 per cent of total salaries to Haitians. It fails to reveal, of course, the injustice of paying a Haitian girl only $35 a month and an American girl doing the same work in the same office $150 a month. Nor does it disclose the unfortunate effect of paying Haitians working for the Occupation more than those working for the Haitian Government.

Neither does the last Bulletin of the Service Technique, in spite of its 145 pages reading like a Florida boosters' prospectus, justify the vast slice made in the budget. There were only 1,316 students in the ten farm schools, three converted technical schools, and the new Central School of Agriculture. The students are, moreover, dissatisfied with the results. Many are attracted principally by the scholarships offered; there is little hope of increased enrolment; the attendance is poor. The veterinarians have not been able to win sufficient confidence from the natives to induce them to bring their animals to the clinics in large numbers. The pedigreed American stock is degenerating more rapidly than it is improving the native stock. Some say that the experts are learning tropical culture from their students.

But it is a comparison between the Service Technique and Public School Department which shows how extravagant the Americans are in spending Haitian money and how economical they are in allowing the Haitians to spend their own money. Haitian teachers working under Americans are generally paid at least $30 a month. The American "expert" teachers accept $300, $400, and $500 a month. Teachers in the primary schools, which are still under Haitian control, receive an average of $7 a month—one-third of the scholarship offered to entice Haitians into the American-controlled technical schools. When they asked for an increase Dr. Cumberland, the Financial Adviser, answered, "I am opposed." Then without consulting the Haitians he endowed them with the Central School of Agriculture. When money was asked to reopen the secondary school in St. Marc he replied, "I am astonished. . . . " When a Minister of Public Education asked for $3,075 a month to establish a men's normal school—even today there is no such building in Haiti—he retorted, "I am surprised. . . . " More recently, when another Minister of Public Education requested a small sum for a boarding department to permit girls living outside the capital to attend the one girls' normal school in Haiti, the answer was, "I am grieved. . . . " But the Financial Adviser was delighted to donate $40,000 of Haitian money to erect an American radio station in Port au Prince.

The most conservative American estimate declares that there are two million illiterate Haitians. In order to wipe out this condition Dr. Cumberland permits the one girls' normal school to continue with its thirty-nine students, and last year finally allowed a normal course for boys to be opened in one of the subsidized Catholic schools. In all he squanders $19,750 a month for primary education and $4,934 for secondary education in academic schools with an enrolment of more than 60,000 students. Even Georgia would be ashamed of such a farce.

Conclusive evidence of this policy of encroachment and blundering appears in the history of the Medical School. Under Haitian supervision professors got $30 a month. The building became so dilapidated that professors and students had to use umbrellas while in class. Unable to resist the temptation of a much higher budget, the Haitians finally permitted this school to be supervised by an American sanitary engineer. Immediately $60,000 appeared for a new building, an increase from $80 to $250 for the Haitian director and a corresponding increase for the professors. All of this in order to graduate doctors who will not be permitted to hold clinics in the Americanized Haitian General Hospital. In the meanwhile the Law School, which is still under Haitian administration, remains in its old building, the professors continue to struggle along on their $30 a month and enjoy their moot court without American interference.

The present policy is using starvation as a threat and money as a bait in order to force all Haitian departments under American control. When the Haitian law professors are sufficiently hungry, they too will put their school under an "expert." When the public-school teachers are tired of appearing in rags before their scholars, they may permit public-school education to be supervised by a Mississippi county superintendent. In like manner, the Departments of Commerce, Interior, Justice, and Religion are doomed to absorption by the American Occupation.

Any "orderly future development" of the country undeniably depends in great measure upon the means of communication. No past development has received such laudatory press comments as the American-built roads. No present aspect of the situation causes more deception to the visitor, or holds out less hope for future improvement. Instead of the magnificent macadamized roads which one must inevitably expect after reading any report, one finds dirt roads covered with broken, unrolled stones which the first rain washes away. Streams have to be forded in hundreds of places. The roads are constantly being repaired. Mail is often delayed by impassable roads. The rapid depreciation of automobiles makes traveling unusually expensive. Means of communication with the interior are practically non-existent. The railroad from Port au Prince to St. Marc is a joke, the street car used within the capital a curiosity.

In the midst of such blundering it is refreshing to observe the splendid work of the Marine Medical Corps. Many doctors in remote country districts are unselfishly devoting themselves to improving sanitary conditions and to eradicating yaws, a disease closely akin to syphilis, if it is not really syphilis. Nothing but praise is due these men who are showing what can be accomplished by really efficient officials, imbued with a sympathetic spirit.

If the operation of the administrative departments is resulting in confusion, the social and economic life is degenerating into chaos. Misery stalks throughout Haiti; starvation is threatening the masses; the "elite" is in many instances living beyond its means. The most tangible evidence of this misery is the continued and increased emigration to Cuba. Over two hundred thousand Haitians have definitely deserted the coffee fields for the sugar plantations across the water. Agents still round up laborers as in the halcyon days of European emigration, pay the emigrant tax of $9.85, and ship them to Santiago. In the region of Les Cayes women are doing road work for the American Travaux Publics. A plantation that formerly produced seventy-eight sacks of coffee now produces only eight. Since the vast majority of emigrants are men, the question of marriage is rapidly becoming an almost impossible problem. One distinguished diplomat, a man of moderate expression, declared that "It is really a slave trade that the American Occupation winks at and even encourages." For 5 per cent of this emigrant tax, just as of any other tax, fattens the expense account of the office of the Financial Adviser. No phase of the Haitian situation demands investigation more than this emigration scandal. One wonders how this "orderly future development" will be possible when almost 10 per cent of the total population has already been forced to seek a doleful existence in a foreign country.

A stupendous increase in the cost of living menaces those who remain. On the surface there is apparent wealth. But automobiles, traffic cops, one-way streets, and parking signs will not pay the mortgages which have permitted many Haitians to buy their cars. An augmentation of 19 per cent in the salaries of government employees is not sufficient to meet a doubling in the cost of living. Then what about the ordinary laborer who has not had this petty increase?

His situation is described by M. Dantes Bellegarde, an authority on social questions, in the July-August Bulletin of the Haitian Chamber of Commerce.

The best paid laborer earns thirty cents a day, or in a year with 294 working days, allowing three weeks without employment		$88.20
Food, alcohol, and tobacco, at $0.20 a day	$72.00
Rent, $1 a month	12.00
Clothing for the year	2.00	86.00
Bank account at the end of the year		$2.20

His food is at best a little codfish or rice and red beans. Meat at twenty-five cents a pound is obviously as rare as in a vegetarian's diet. It is a not uncommon sight to see a worker satisfy himself for his noonday meal by sucking some sugar cane or drinking a little rum.

In the sordid shack which he rents on the water's edge "there is no ventilation, no sunlight; the most revolting promiscuity assembles every night in one room men, women, and children, the sick and the well. When a contagious disease breaks out in these miserable agglomerations, it develops rapidly and soon spreads to the rich sections." His clothing is frequently a flour sack. It is easy to imagine the condition of the food and raiment of the $7-a-month teacher. It is not surprising that tuberculosis increases.

Disregarding this situation, the Financial Adviser forced through a new tariff law which has resulted in still higher prices. Foodstuffs particularly are more expensive. Codfish, one of the principal elements of the poor people's diet, is now taxed six cents a kilogram. The most unfortunate augmentation, however, falls upon flour. Haiti produces no wheat, but consumes an amazing quantity of bread. In 1923-1924 Haiti imported 41,329,095 kilograms of wheat. Yet the Financial Adviser raised the duty from $.028 to $.040 a kilogram. The tariff on butter, of which 290,361 kilograms were imported in 1924, has gone up 57 per cent, pure lard and cottoline 83 per cent. As a result, the factory of Saint André, profiting by the driving out of its competitors, has already increased the price of this product. Salt fish suffered an increase of about 25 per cent, ham 54 per cent, smoked fish almost 100 per cent, and salt meat 341 per cent.

But the most incredible innovation is this Haitian tariff strikes from the free list agricultural implements and schoolbooks. Neither are produced in Haiti. No comments could possibly make more evident the present muddle and mess. The new tariff protects industries that do not exist and cannot be developed. It increases the revenue, although one of the proudest boasts of the Financial Adviser is the fact that the interest on the American loan lies snugly—and idly—in the National City Bank six months before it is due. His whole aim is to be able to report, as he recently did, that the revenue for the last three months was so many million gourdes higher than for the corresponding period last year. The next report should show an even greater increase. But it will not show how many more Haitians are enjoying meatless and fishless days, how many children are not in school, or how many more farms have been abandoned.

Judged from the present situation then, the "orderly future development" of the island means absorbing Haitian administrative departments, lavishly spending money on American experts of dubious value, dividing Haitians into those working for the Occupation and those working for the Haitian Government, driving out the population, impeding academic education and agricultural development, raising the cost of living, lessening American prestige, and increasing Haitian hostility. The British mess in Mesopotamia is paralleled by the American haze in Haiti.

These Modern Women

Mother-Worship

ANONYMOUS

[We print herewith the tenth of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of a group of distinguished women with a modern point of view. The next article will appear in The Nation for March 30.]

THE story of my background is the story of my mother. She was a Middle-Western girl, youngest, cleverest, and prettiest of six daughters—children of an Irish gunsmith and a "Pennsylvania Dutch" woman of good family and splendid character. The gunsmith was a master of his trade but a heavy drinker, always ugly and often dangerous. My mother got away from home as soon as she could. After a year in a nearby coeducational college she taught school for a while and then married. The man she chose (for she was the sort of girl who has many chances) was a penniless but handsome and idealistic Yankee divinity student whom she met during that one college year. When he had secured his first parish, they were married.

For about eight years, during which there were four different parishes and four children were born, my mother was a popular, active, and helpful minister's wife. Then my father, who had always struggled against ill-health, suffered a complete nervous breakdown. He was forced to give up his church and his chosen profession. My mother had to support the family.

She began by teaching English literature in a girls' school. Before long she was giving Sunday-evening talks at the school. Then she began to fill outside engagements and finally she became a sort of supply-preacher to nearby country churches. About the year 1890, though she had had no theological education, she was ordained as a Congregational minister and called to be the pastor of a fairly large church in a well-to-do farming community. After three or four successful years, she and my father (who by this time had lost a good bit of money trying to be a farmer and a grocer but had begun to regain his health) were called as associate pastors to a big liberal church in a city of 40,000. It was my mother's reputation as a preacher that brought them this opportunity and she proved equal to the larger field. In time my father's health improved so that he could carry his share of the work, but my mother was always the celebrated member of the family.

I have a vivid memory of my mother when I was six years old. We are standing, my brother and I, in front of a run-down farmhouse on the edge of the town which had become our home. We have just said goodby to our mother and now we are watching her trip off down the hill to the school where she goes every day to teach. She turns to smile at us—such a beaming smile, such a bright face, such a pretty young mother. When the charming, much-loved figure begins to grow small in the distance, my brother, who is younger and more temperamental than I, begins to cry. He screams as loud as he can, until he is red in the face. But he cannot make her come back. And I, knowing she will be worried if she hears him, try to drag him away. By the time I was ten my mother had become a preacher.

Life was never ordinary where my mother was. She was always trying something new. She had an eager, active mind, and tremendous energy. She was preeminently an initiator. From the time I was thirteen we spent our summers like most middle-class, small-town American families, in a cottage beside a lake. And our life there, I suppose, would have been much like the life in thousands of other such summer communities, except for the presence of my mother. For one thing, she organized a system of cooperative housekeeping with three other families on the hillside, and it lasted for years. A cook was hired jointly, but the burden of keeping house, planning meals, buying meat and groceries from the carts that came along three times a week, getting vegetables and fruit from the garden, collecting the money, keeping track of guests, and paying the bills, shifted every week. At first it was only the mothers who took their turn at housekeeping. But as the children grew older they were included in the scheme, boys as well as girls. Toward the end we had all the fun of eating in a big jolly group and only one or two weeks of housekeeping responsibility during the whole summer.

We used to have Sunday night music and singing for the whole hillside at our cottage, with the grown-ups in the big room, and the children lying outside on the porch couches or off on the grass. We had "church" Sunday mornings, too, in our big room; after all we were the minister's family. But it was a very short informal "church" followed by a long swim, and any one who wanted to could preach. We took turns at preaching as well as at keeping house, and we could choose the subjects of our own sermons.

Then one summer my mother started "symposiums." Once a week the mothers and older children and any fathers who happened to be around would gather on somebody's porch, listen to a paper, and then discuss it. I read a paper on "Woman" when I was fifteen, and I believe I was as wise in feminism then as I am now, if a little more solemn.

"The trouble with women," I said, "is that they have no impersonal interests. They must have work of their own, first because no one who has to depend on another person for his living is really grown up; and, second, because the only way to be happy is to have an absorbing interest in life which is not bound up with any particular person. Children can die or grow up, husbands can leave you. No woman who allows husband and children to absorb her whole time and interest is safe against disaster."

The proudest and happiest moment of my college days was when I met my mother in New York, as I did once a year, and went with her to a big banquet in connection with some ministers' convention she had come down to attend. She always spoke at the banquet, and she was always the best speaker. She was gay, sparkling, humorous, intimate, adorable. I would sit and love her with all my heart, and I could feel all the ministers loving her and rejoicing in her.

Almost always it is painful to sit in the audience while a near relative preaches, prays, or makes a speech. Husbands, wives, brothers, sisters, and children of the performers ought to be exempt from attending such public functions. My brothers and I always suffered when father preached, although, as preachers go, he was pretty good. At any rate he was beautiful to look at and had a large following of enthusiastic admirers. But when my mother preached we hated to miss it. There was never a moment of anxiety or concern; she had that secret of perfect platform ease which takes all strain out of the audience. Her voice was music; she spoke simply, without effort, almost without gestures, standing very still. And what she said seemed to come straight from her heart to yours. Her sermons grew out of her own moral and spiritual struggles. For she had a stormy, troubled soul, capable of black cruelty and then again of the deepest generosities. She was humble, honest, striving, always beginning again to try to be good.

With all her other interests she was thoroughly domestic. We children loved her cooking as much as we loved her preaching. And she was all kinds of devoted mother, the kind that tucks you in at night and reads you a story, and the kind that drags you to the dentist to have your teeth straightened. But I must leave her now and try to fill out the picture. My father, too, played a large part in my life. He was a generous man, the kind of man that was a suffragist from the day he first heard of a woman who wanted to vote. One evening, after mother had been teaching for some time and had begun to know her power as a public speaker, she came to him as he lay on his invalid's couch.

"John," she said, "I believe I could preach!"

"Mary!" he cried, jumping up in his excitement, "I know you could!"

This was in those early days when he had given up his own career as a minister, when he had cheerfully turned small farmer and had begun, on days when he was well enough, to peddle eggs and butter at the back doors of his former parishioners. From the moment he knew that my mother wanted to preach, he helped and encouraged her. Without his coaching and without his local prestige, it is doubtful if she could have been ordained. And my father stood by me in the same way, from the time when I wanted to cut off my hair and go barefoot to the time when I began to study law. When I insisted that the boys must make their beds if I had to make mine, he stood by me. When I said that if there was dishwashing to be done they should take their turn, he stood by me. And when I declared that there was no such thing in our family as boys' work and girls' work, and that I must be allowed to do my share of wood-chopping and outdoor chores, he took me seriously and let me try.

Once when I was twelve and very tall, a deputation of ladies from her church called on my mother and gently suggested that my skirts ought to be longer. My mother, who was not without consciousness of the neighbors' opinions, thought she must do something. But my father said, "No, let her wear them short. She likes to run, and she can't run so well in long skirts."

A few years later it was a question of bathing suits. In our summer community I was a ringleader in the rebellion against skirts and stockings for swimming. On one hot Sunday morning the other fathers waited on my father and asked him to use his influence with me. I don't know what he said to them but he never said a word to me. He was, I know, startled and embarrassed to see his only daughter in a man's bathing suit with bare brown legs for all the world to see. I think it shocked him to his dying day. But he himself had been a swimmer; he knew he would not want to swim in a skirt and stockings. Why then should I?

Beyond the immediate circle of my family there were other influences at work. My mother, among her other charms, had a genius for friendship. There were always clever, interesting, amusing women coming in and out of our house. I never thought of women as dull folk who sat and listened while the men talked. The little city where we lived was perhaps unusual. It was the home of six or seven distinguished persons, and not all of them were men.

In this environment I grew up confidently expecting to have a profession and earn my own living, and also confidently expecting to be married and have children. It was fifty-fifty with me. I was just as passionately determined to have children as I was to have a career. And my mother was the triumphant answer to all doubts as to the success of this double role. From my earliest memory she had more than half supported the family and yet she was supremely a mother.

I have lived my life according to the plan. I have had the "career" and the children and, except for an occasional hiatus due to illness or some other circumstance over which I had no control, I have earned my own living. I have even made a certain name for myself. If I have not fulfilled the promise of my youth, either as a homemaker or as a professional woman, I have never wavered in my feminist faith. My mother has always been a beacon to me, and if today I sometimes feel a sense of failure it may be partly because I have always lived in the glow of her example. In their early struggle for survival against narrow-minded and prejudiced parents some of my contemporaries seem to have won more of the iron needed in the struggle of life than I got from my almost perfect parents.

Toward Lower Electric Rates

By MORRIS LLEWELLYN COOKE

THE question of getting light and power cheaply, of securing for the public the greatest possible advantage from the technological improvements in power engineering, has certain immediate possibilities. Many of the power and light companies are making profits large enough to warrant a considerable reduction in rates. Some are reducing voluntarily: the recent half-cent cut of the Brooklyn Edison is said to mean a $1,500,000 yearly saving to Brooklyn consumers. Sometimes these voluntary reductions are made to forestall a rate case and are far less than the limit of possible reduction. In Baltimore, for example, the local company, the Consolidated Gas and Electric, reduced rates $875,000 in 1925. The gracious gesture of the company did not mislead either the citizens or the industrial consumers into believing that they were obtaining all that was their due, and the Public Service Commission instead of gratefully approving this reduction initiated a thorough investigation resulting in a recent order for a further reduction of $1,000,000 a year in rates.

This growing and increasingly concentrated industry with its greatly improved technical efficiency is forcing two questions upon the people of this country. The first is, How can we protect our future from the complete dominance of a power alliance?

Senator Norris considers the Muscle Shoals project from this angle. He wants to keep it as a yardstick by which the rates of the privately owned power companies can be measured. Governor Smith in New York State, backed by the Public Committee on Power, is determined not to let the St. Lawrence power be alienated from the State for fifty years or longer. In Pennsylvania Governor Pinchot's Giant Power Survey mapped out plans for the protection of the interests of the small consumers in the future development of the industry. Other States are still trusting to regulation and to the efficacy of municipally owned plants in exerting a wholesome influence toward lower rates in the surrounding communities.

The second question which the power industry is forcing upon the public is more immediate: How can we secure today and tomorrow the low rates to which we may have a just claim? The figures collected by the Electrical World in its January 1, 1927, issue offer a basis for a few deductions about the rate-reduction policy of the power industry. We see that in 1926 it was selling its energy at a price per kwh about 6/10 of 1 per cent lower than four years ago, whereas in that time the operating expense per kwh has decreased 4.25 per cent and the average interest paid on new loans is more than 10 per cent less than in 1924.

The power, as distinct from the lighting, consumers received their energy at an average price of 1.47 cents in 1923 and of 1.29 cents in 1926, a reduction of over 12 per cent. The lighting consumers, on the other hand, paid an average of 7.1 cents per kwh in 1923 and in 1926 paid 7.36 cents, an increase of 3.7 per cent in those four years. Not only has the large difference between lighting and power rates been retained, it has been increased. If the average revenues from lighting customers had been kept the same per kwh as they were in 1923 it would have meant a saving of approximately $38,000,000 to the lighting consumers of the country in 1926. If the lighting rates had been reduced from 1923 to 1926 as much proportionately as the power rates were reduced in that time, a matter of over 12 per cent, it would have meant a saving to the lighting consumers of over $120,000,000 in 1926.

A few years of such a policy of giving all the benefits of the technical advance of the industry to the large consumers of power instead of to the small lighting consumers will cost the latter a pretty sum. Most of the State regulatory bodies concern themselves only with seeing that the power companies do not exceed a fair return on their "capital" and leave untouched the question of the amount of return gathered respectively from the small consumers and the large. The large power consumers can always threaten to build their own plants and furnish their own power, and so obtain comparatively low rates. The small consumers of electric lighting current are in no position to make such a threat. The electrical industry has been curiously inept in its attack on the domestic problem. While the number of domestic consumers has been vastly increased, the average quantity of electricity used per consumer has almost stood still. The Pennsylvania average is still only thirty kwh a month. The lowering of rates invariably brings increased use; in fact, low rates are the only route to any comprehensive scheme of domestic electrification.

Instead of leaving the matter of domestic rates to the public service commissions, which act on their own initiative much more rarely than was anticipated by the public when commission regulation was first brought about, interested groups might well consider the possibility of challenging directly the present city domestic lighting rates of the companies. The Baltimore case, mentioned above, where a reduction of $1,000,000 was forced after the company had made a voluntary reduction of $875,000, is interesting in this connection. The Consolidated Gas and Electric had an annual surplus of $3,000,000 in 1923, $2,000,000 in 1924, and $3,000,000 in 1925. The State of Maryland has a "People's Counsel" whose function it is to take care of the public in cases of this kind, and Mr. Clarence W. Miles, then counsel, started the investigation. The small consumers were supported by the powerful Industrial Consumers Association, which was trying to bring new industries to Baltimore and wanted cheap power as an inducement. Members of this group were particularly annoyed by the fact that the "coal clause" in their contracts (giving the power company the right to raise rates when the cost of coal exceeded a certain figure) had resulted in the company's collecting $4,935,668, while the whole cost of all the coal used to generate power had amounted to only $4,869,243. Another factor to which they objected was what is known as a "ratchet" clause in the contracts under which, in case the demand went up for even a short time, the consumer had to pay for that demand to the end of his contract.

The principal electrical expert was Major Clayton W. Pike, a prominent consulting engineer of Philadelphia, president of the Engineers' Club, and at one time chief of the Electrical Bureau of Philadelphia. He effectually disproved the company's claims that its new residence rates were lower than in other cities, that its power rates were also lower, and that it could not give still lower rates without jeopardy to its property interests. Its surplus in 1925 was 26 per cent of the fixed capital. It was able to secure its capital at a low cost ($15,000,000 was obtained in 1925 at 5.86 per cent). Forty-five per cent of its power was bought from a hydroelectric company at low rates. Baltimore wages and taxes were low, and the company obtained high-grade coal at a very low cost. He was also able to show that the demand charges were higher than in other cities such as Chicago, Cleveland, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Washington. On the basis of these facts the commission ordered the further reduction of rates mentioned above, of which the residence and commercial consumers got the major benefit—$650,000; the small industrialists, $165,000; and the large power consumers, $140,000. An annual revision of the minimum demand guaranteed by the consumer was also established by the commission.

The company accepted the decision and is endeavoring by even better management and expected increase in business to make up for the lowering of the rate schedules. Its credit has not been impaired. It has just floated an additional $7,000,000 loan at 4.90 per cent.

Until regulation is an automatic procedure, that is until the past investment is fixed by contract as a definite figure and new investment held down to actual net cost as is done in the Federal Water-Power Act, the consumers stand little chance of getting their due benefits from the industry. Rate suits brought by interested groups of citizens may help, especially when the suits are adequately financed so that legal and technical experts of ability and sufficient experience in these cases can be obtained. But even in them we shall see such absurdities as the New York Edison claiming, as it does at present, that $7,250,000 shall be capitalized and rates shall be paid on it because that sum would be the "reproduction cost" of training its several thousand employees in case the present staff were to die off and a new one had to be trained. It claims this in spite of the fact that these training expenses have already been paid for by the consumers of light and power. The power industry is much more awake to its opportunities than are the consumers. But the multiplying evidences of interest in such water-power developments as at Boulder Dam, Muscle Shoals, and on the St. Lawrence presage a new day.

Dawes or Coolidge?

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, March 2

THOSE who three months ago recognized the paretic condition of present party leadership and predicted so far as legislative achievement is concerned complete futility for this short session of the Sixty-ninth Congress, now find themselves fully sustained. At the start the Presidential politics of the session appeared the only phase upon which to base speculation. At the end that is clearly the only aspect worth reviewing. Looking back, three things stick out as developments on the Republican side of the fence which seems the only side on which the discussion can be practical rather than academic. One of these can be quickly dismissed—the sad sagging of the Longworth boom. Flat and shriveled, it is now revealed as a joke, a windy nothing that floated around Washington, got a certain publicity through friendly or flattered correspondents, but was never taken seriously save by the small group of back-slapping, cloudy-minded, convivial Congressmen of the "Sweet Adeline" type, who proudly pound their hairy chests and proclaim that "Nick is a regular guy and we're going to make him President." Nothing much happened to the Longworth boom during the session except that it was thoroughly sized up.

The second development was the extraordinary way in which Mr. Dawes, breaking all Vice-Presidential precedents for a hundred years, has succeeded not only in making himself a real force in the Senate, exercising in that body vastly more influence than the President, but has achieved a political position so strategically pivotal as to cause a considerable number of detached persons to regard him as being the best chance of any for the Republican Presidential nomination—provided the good Calvin concludes, as is now held probable, that in the matter of a third term the American people are concerned with "the substance, not the form." Exactly what Mr. Dawes has done at this session is not generally grasped. For one thing his really agreeable personality plus unquestioned efficiency and impartiality as a presiding officer has endeared him to the Senate as a whole, largely wiping out the memory of the ridiculous clowning and bad taste of his inaugural address two years ago. Even if that were not true the extraordinary way in which the Senate filibuster and its terrific sacrifice of public business justified his fight on the rules would have been enough. For another, he is the first Vice-President of this generation to take an active part in legislation pending in the body over which he presides and the first since Calhoun to take that part on the side opposite the President of his own party. That is exactly what, with amazing effectiveness, he did on the McNary-Haugen bill, to which Mr. Coolidge and his Cabinet were strongly opposed. It was Dawes who engineered the combination between the farm-relief forces and those behind the McFadden-Pepper branch banking bill, which enabled both to go through and without which it is conceded neither could have been passed. A slicker political deal—or one more entirely incongruous—has not been made in or out of Congress in a long time. Dawes did it. As a result the great farming organizations and the Corn Belt element generally look on him as a friend and champion, second only in their hearts to Lowden and the legitimate political heir of that genial gentleman should one of the various reasons cited against his candidacy prevail. On the other hand, the banking interests to whom the McFadden bill was vital not only feel deeply grateful to the Vice-President for putting through in a single session a measure one-half of which they would have been delighted to get in two but consider him one of themselves, which of course he is no matter how progressive he may seem in the farm-relief line. At heart he is as conservative as Andrew Mellon, as reactionary as Reed Smoot, though not as dull. The fact is that he comes out of this short session as Reed of Missouri did out of the long one last year, the only figure in Washington with an enhanced political reputation and an improved political position. He also comes out of it with the cold dislike entertained for him by Mr. Coolidge since the day he was inaugurated enormously intensified and increased. It is not too much to say that the good Calvin has for his Vice-President the same sort of affection that he has for a mad dog or the measles.

The third development of the session has been a strengthening of the belief that Mr. Coolidge will not be a candidate to succeed himself. There is nothing definite to hang that on; but it is clear that the risk involved in the third-term attempt is increasing not decreasing. It is, however, true that at the close of the session the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill rather helped Mr. Coolidge than hurt him. The idea that it put him in a hole is a joke. It pulled him out. It obscured completely the abject failure he had again made as a leader of his party and glossed over the glaring fact that scarcely a single one of the many recommendations made in his message last December had been acted upon. It gave the Administration publicity agencies a chance to beat the drums and proclaim that in vetoing the McNary bill Mr. Coolidge had single-handedly performed an act of unparalleled bravery, courageously ignoring the possible political consequences to himself and saving his country in a critical hour.

Perhaps he did and perhaps he is the unflinching and heroic soul pictured by the propagandists. It may not, however, be out of place at this moment when the congratulatory telegrams from applicants for positions on the new radio board are still pouring in, and when the national bank presidents, whose bill he signed, "thank God for Calvin Coolidge"—as they should—it may not be amiss while all this is going on to point out, merely in the interests of accuracy, certain salient facts.

While not detracting from the credit due Mr. Coolidge for his action, it ought to be possible, without being regarded as depraved, to say that he did not stand alone and unsupported in this matter of the veto. It is hardly in accord with the facts to picture him a solitary figure with calm, steadfast eyes facing great odds, taking vast risks, caring little for himself so long as he saved his country. There were, for instance, pushing him kindly but with great firmness toward a veto certain public officials close to the throne and not without influence, certain institutions not generally considered impotent, certain reasons not wholly divorced from politics.

For example, it was too plain to escape any Washington observer capable of a detached judgment that if he should do other than veto the bill Mr. Coolidge would render it ridiculously impossible for at least three members of his Cabinet to continue in his Administration.

One of these was the august Mr. Mellon, who a fortnight ago publicly assailed the bill as unsound, unworkable, and bad. Another was the erudite Mr. Hoover, who two years ago made no secret of his conviction that the principle of the bill was economically wicked and its theory vicious and menacing, and who from the start has been its most formidable opponent. The third was the earnest Mr. Jardine, who because of his agreement with Mr. Hoover and his generally unsympathetic attitude toward the bill was burned in effigy out in Iowa and denounced in several other States.

Leaving aside Jardine, the idea of Mr. Coolidge approving a proposition so abhorrent as this one to Mr. Mellon and Mr. Hoover is manifestly absurd. Except in the matter of political appointments in which they are uninterested, not since Mr. Coolidge has been President has he once failed to act in accord with the judgment of these two men—for which he deserves credit. Take away from him their support and he would collapse like a toy balloon.

Then there were the newspapers. Since Mr. Coolidge entered the White House he has had a more solid press support than any other President. Frequently he has through the Spokesman expressed his appreciation. It would be strange indeed if he did not feel it. So far as this bill is concerned, outside of Iowa at least 98 per cent of the newspapers, daily and weekly, were strongly opposed. Not only that, but east of the Mississippi River 100 per cent of the great metropolitan newspapers were opposed to it. Not only that, but the Republican organs of most weight and influence were violent in their opposition, denouncing the bill as an offense against decency, a brazen raid on the Treasury, a radical makeshift ruinous to the country, and so forth.

After its passage the leading newspapers of the East redoubled the violence of their attack and declared anything but a veto on the part of Mr. Coolidge unthinkable unless he chose completely to stultify himself and turn traitor to his friends, which was certainly true. Now it is even harder to conceive of Mr. Coolidge bucking this sort of press opposition than it is to conceive of him hitting Mr. Mellon, Mr. Hoover, and Mr. Jardine in the eye.

And finally there were the banks. The antagonism of the great banking and business interests—whose support Mr. Coolidge has consistently had since the appearance of the first Mellon bill nearly four years ago—to the McNary-Haugen bill was as uncompromising and intense as their advocacy of the McFadden branch banking bill was ardent and sincere. Mr. Morrow was against the bill, and it is believed by those best posted that he did not conceal the fact from his White House friend. Neither did others of the Amherst group.

Even more ludicrous than thinking of the courageous Mr. Coolidge smacking Mr. Mellon and Mr. Hoover in the face, and even more comical than imagining him ignoring the almost solid sentiment of his unprecedented press support is the thought of his pushing against the weight of the great New York banks, which as Senator Reed, Missouri, pointed out the other day are not only more influential in this Administration than ever before but are actually part of it.

Mr. Coolidge ought to have credit for following Mr. Mellon and Mr. Hoover—particularly Mr. Hoover—on this bill. He ought to have credit for taking his convictions from them instead of from others not so sound. He ought to have credit for realizing that the political threats of the farmers are not as serious as they sound. He ought to have full credit for these things, but when it comes to giving him credit for political heroism and pinning on him medals for bravery it isn't very clear, if you know the facts.

But then, who cares about the facts? The fact is that if he had done anything else there would not be enough left of him politically to sweep up in a corner and strike a match to. That is a fact, but it won't convince those who want to think him a hero.

In the Driftway

WHENEVER the Drifter feels blue or out of sorts with himself he visits the safe-deposit company where he has a small box in an immense and imposing building. It is the only place accessible to him where he is made to feel important; as an elixir and tonic for his self-respect it has no equal. At its entrance stands a massive guardian, neck stiff and head thrown back, wearing a uniform as perfectly fitting and free of wrinkles as the suits in the advertisements. Just as the Drifter is about to take off his hat and prepare to be finger printed, the impressive guardian bows deferentially and swings the revolving door for him to enter. Inside the Drifter brushes elbows with ladies loaded with more furs than the entire output of the Arctic Zone for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1870. He passes on to a door of iron latticework and presses a bell-button. Instead of waiting five minutes for an office boy to slouch up, shift his gum from right to left jaw, inquire negligently "Whadda you want?" and then disappear for a quarter of an hour, the Drifter marvels as a young man approaches briskly, smiles, unlocks the door, and murmurs a polite greeting. The young man unlocks another door, steps aside for the Drifter to pass first into the sacred vault, and then both approach the rows of boxes. The young man always remembers the Drifter's number (which is fortunate, as the Drifter rarely can). The young man clicks the lock; the Drifter clicks it after him and withdraws the metal box. "It's nice weather we're having," observes the young man with an almost reverent glance at the box containing nobody knows how many thousand dollars' worth of bonds and other securities. Nobody knows how many is right—luckily for the Drifter. The deference paid to the holder of a safe-deposit box lies right there. He must have thousands and he may have millions. His is the Box Nobody Knows.

* * * * *

IT is otherwise in a bank. There the teller knows how puny is the account of the Drifter, and looks at him pityingly. It is otherwise in the neighborhood grocery store. The Drifter does not stalk in, choose goods right and left without considering the price, and then sail out, ordering his purchases to be charged and delivered. He is not the Man Nobody Knows. He is known to all too well as the Man Who Buys Ten Cents' Worth of Cheese and a Nickel Box of Crackers and Carries Them Home Under His Arm.

* * * * *

BUT in the safe-deposit vault we millionaires are all equal. A man who has only four or five petty millions is as good as Henry Ford. We must all be men of substance or we wouldn't rent boxes to keep our securities in. If the safe-deposit company ever takes to using X-rays, the Drifter's name will still begin with D but it will end with Ennis. Happily this time has not arrived, so the young man who has a glance almost of reverence for the Drifter's box leads the way to a private room, and then silently withdraws. The Drifter shuts and locks the door behind him and sits down at a desk half as large again as any he usually works on. There is no dust to be blown off, and a clean blotting pad gazes at the Drifter instead of one stained and grimy and turned up at the edges. The penholders contain new points which will actually write; the ink in the wells is still liquid. The Drifter, who is more accustomed to the facilities offered in post offices, sits down and scribbles his name several times just for the pure pleasure of it. He glances appreciatively at the shears for clipping coupons. He wishes he could work every day in a room like this, silent, comfortable, well-equipped—and locked. Sometimes it occurs to him that he might do so. The employees would respect him the more highly, believing that it took him all of every day to clip his coupons.

* * * * *

AFTER ten minutes' pleasant reverie the Drifter opens the door of his private office, calls the young man, and puts away the safe-deposit box—without opening it. Why should he? He doesn't want anything that it contains: some old manuscript, a few mussy memoranda, a $500-bond of a real estate company that went into bankruptcy ten years ago, the receipt for a cemetery lot, some postage stamps left from the Drifter's last trip to Europe, and a few articles of greater value belonging to friends of the Drifter who have no safe-deposit box.

* * * * *

THE Drifter steps into the street a better and nobler man. The thermometer of his spirits and self-respect has risen forty degrees. If the Drifter is ever poorer than he is today, he will take his butter without bread and his sugar without coffee, but he will guard religiously those articles upon which depends his self-esteem. He will keep his evening clothes and his walking stick until the last—and his safe-deposit box even after that.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Gesegnete Mahlzeit!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Every once in a while you come over here with an editorial or a Driftway on pie for breakfast, hog and hominy, corn on cob. But where, outside Germany, is mealtime—Mealtime—sublimated into a greeting? Where else does one say Mahlzeit? inquiringly to the others at the lunch table and, having heard a cordial Mahlzeit in response, feel at once accepted? Where, outside Germany? Where else do faces kindle into smiles any time between eleven in the morning and two in the afternoon, or between four in the afternoon and eight in the evening, at the greeting Mahlzeit? Caviare in Leningrad; muktuk, i.e., whale skin, at Point Barrow; pâté de foie gras in Paris—yes, and oysters at Lynn Haven, but where, outside Germany, do you have "Mealtime" as a greeting? Mahlzeit!

Hamburg, Germany, February 10 E. J. WARD

Keep the Schools Clean

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The campaign against militarism in education during the year 1926 was marked by the following indications of progress: (1) Discontinuance of bayonet combat in R. O. T. C. and C. M. T. C. by order of the War Department; (2) revision of at least two standard manuals of military training, deleting many passages of barbarous and objectionable character; (3) removal of all military training from the Cleveland high schools, R. O. T. C. from Hampton Institute, compulsory drill from Boston University and the College of the City of New York; (4) introduction of bills in both houses of Congress for the elimination of compulsory military training from non-military civil educational institutions; (5) disapproval of compulsory drill expressed by President Coolidge, Federal Council of Churches, American Federation of Labor, the Presbyterian, Northern Baptist, and Disciples' national conventions, the National Council of Jewish Women, and about fifty other church and educational groups in various States; (6) the formation of State citizens' committees opposed to militarism in Nebraska and Massachusetts; and inauguration of a campaign in Great Britain by the British National Council for the Prevention of War to get the War Office out of the British schools.

On the other hand, the year saw: (1) The introduction of Naval R. O. T. C. units in Harvard, Yale, Georgia University of Technology, University of California, University of Washington, and Northwestern University; (2) the initiation of the Munitions Battalion; (3) interference with free speech for peace in a number of colleges.

The Committee on Militarism in Education, which is carrying on a national campaign of education, needs $15,000 to do its work this year. It is an independent committee including in its membership David Starr Jordan, President Arthur E. Morgan, Manley O. Hudson, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, John Nevin Sayre, Bishop Francis J. McConnell, Charles M. Sheldon, Wilbur K. Thomas, and William Allen White. It can be helped by sending to it at 387 Bible House, Astor Place, New York City, names and addresses of those on whom the committee may count; or by sending a contribution, however small, to carry on the fight against the process of militarization, which, unless stopped, will destroy all hope of making America a leader in establishing world peace.

New York, February 17 GEORGE A. COE, Chairman
THOMAS GUTHRIE SPEERS, Treasurer

The Disappointed Censor

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

